Some of these weapons may have been stolen from the IDF itself:

It is possible that in rare cases, weapons were taken from IDF warehouses and stored in hiding places; it is conceivable that maps and information were collected, and that the early stages of the practical preparations for the outbreak of world war also began. The only operative plans dealt with a response to the possibility that the Revisionist [i.e. Jabotinskyite] Right would take power by force over the state. (Hazan: Movement of Life, Yad Izhak Ben-Zvi Institute, Ze'ev Tzahor, 1997, pp. 199-201) (IMG)

The cells established by the Mapam Military Committee propagated among the army officers, educating them about communist ideas and/or Hashomer Hatzair 'Socialist Zionist' ideas, and instructed them on methods of sabotage:

Little is known about cell activity. From the remaining descriptions one can learn about the influence of the literature of the Russian Revolution on the way the cells were constructed and the method of their operation. The cells were secluded, gathering in secret places outside the base, usually in a nearby kibbutz or in the private home of one of their friends. The cell was egalitarian, with no regard for ranks, and meetings were held without uniforms. They were attended by soldiers in regular service and permanent officers. The management of the cell was entrusted to a secretary, elected by the cell. Sometimes the military rank of the cell secretary was lower than that of the other members. The main function of the cell was to secretly infuse the spirit of the revolution into the tents of the army, and to wait for the day of command. In the cell the unit problems were also discussed, including promotions and roles.

Recruitment to the cell is done in the best underground tradition. A man who was then a cadet in an officers' course says that one day he was secretly approached by a cadet from his friends and invited him to a secret meeting of cadets from his course in a private apartment in Netanya. Yisrael Bar attended the meeting, which convinced them to participate in the cell. The meetings were held once every two weeks, on an evening assigned to After Duty. There were guest lectures, and mostly internal discussions. Thus, for example, the question was discussed, what should the soldier do if he is required to unload a weapon ship intended for the army in the port of Haifa - to attach the weapon to the sea, or whether the needs of the army require him to receive weapons from any source, even American. Apparently, the activity in the cells did not deviate from their social formation, and the ideological and theoretical discussion was emphasized in it. (Hazan: Movement of Life, Yad Izhak Ben-Zvi Institute, Ze'ev Tzahor, 1997, pp. 199-201) (IMG)

In the Shin Bet and the Mossad, Mapamite intelligence networks were woven:

The expansion of the secret cell network could have led to their exposure. Indeed, the bustling activity did not go unnoticed by Isser Harel, especially the one that was woven in his immediate environment. He himself [unintentionally/unwillingly] added to the security service a concentrated group of about thirty Palmach men, led by Gershon Rabinowitz of Ruhama. In the television program "Such a Life" dedicated to the cantor, Isser Harel told about "Mapam's underground, an underground within government ministries, within my organization, within the security service." (Hazan: Movement of Life, Yad Izhak Ben-Zvi Institute, Ze'ev Tzahor, 1997, pp. 199-201) (IMG)

Ben-Gurion himself had expressed serious concern about this matter. In a conversation with US intelligence representative in Israel, Prime Minister Ben-Gurion remarked:

"... in [the] event world conflict ... Mapam could possibly cause embarrassment...". According to Tzahor, citing the testimonies of people he contacted, Moshe Sneh had established a network of cells made up of handpicked communist and progressive loyalists that would have taken secrets with them to the grave rather than reveal their weapons caches:

Later testimonies relate to the activity that took place in the cells of another leader, Moshe Sneh. Hazan treated with suspicion the brilliant Doctor, who had just replaced stormy Zionist activism with equally stormy revolutionary activism. Sneh's attempt to bypass the 'historical leadership' and build a direct channel of dialogue with the young people of the 'national kibbutz' by virtue of his charisma provoked unrest. Sneh, who wanted to cultivate his relations with the young people of the 'Kibbutz HaArtzi' without provoking the anger of the leadership, preferred that his connection to the cells not be known to Hazan. Sneh's connection to the cells was thus limited to a small and determined part of them, and kept a secret within a secret. In the distance of time it is not possible to determine with certainty the method of activity of the two in the cells and their personal part in their management. There is room for speculation, whose role was limited to shaping the ideological framework of the organization. (Hazan: Movement of Life, Yad Izhak Ben-Zvi Institute, Ze'ev Tzahor, 1997, p. 198) (IMG)

As can be seen, there existed a powerful communist resistance network in Israel. Such a communist resistance intelligence network was able to grow and become a force to be reckoned with, lest we forget, thanks first and foremost to the strong presence of the kibbutzim in the Israeli economy in the alliance with the proletariat as well as the high soft power influence of socialism among the Ashkenazim. The Palmach arose out of the kibbutzim although it was commanded by the Achdut Haavoda operatives based in the urban proletarians. The kibbutzim and the proletarians frequently fought for expelling the United States from Israel.

There were other Mapam-affiliated Soviet spies in the high ranks of the Israeli state apparatus. One of them allegedly was 'Wolf Goldstein'. Since the Yiddish migrants to Israel often changed their names to Hebrew names, his name changed to 'Ze'ev Avni'. Avni's case is covered by a fog of Mossad-sponsored sensationalism. Nonetheless, it was said that Ze'ev Avni had been a communist spy of the Soviet intelligence service since 1943, that he had migrated to Israel and linked up with the Mapam, and that he had thereupon been catapulted to the high ranks of the Mossad while actually continuing his service to the Soviet secret service. Christopher Andrew, the official historian of the MI5, wrote:

Potentially the most important KGB agent during Israel's first decade was Ze'ev Avni, born Wolf Goldstein, a multilingual economist and ardent Communist who had spent the Second World War in Switzerland where in 1943 he had been recruited by the GRU. Avni was a committed ideological agent. 'There was no doubt in my mind', he wrote later, 'that I belonged not only to the vanguard of the revolution, but to its very élite.' In 1948 he emigrated to Israel, joined a kibbutz and contacted the Soviet embassy to try to renew his links with the GRU. He was disappointed to receive a lukewarm, non-committal welcome - possibly because of his lack of security at the kibbutz, where he had made no secret of his Communist convictions and told a senior Mapam member that he would be happy to help the Party establish 'a direct link to Moscow'. In 1950 Avni entered the Israeli Foreign Ministry, where he behaved with much greater discretion. A later security enquiry 'had no difficulty finding people who had known Avni as a militant Communist' at his kibbutz but found 'practically universal admiration' for him among his fellow diplomats, who were entirely unaware that his real loyalty was to the Soviet Union.

In 1952 Avni had his first foreign posting as Israeli commercial attaché in Brussels, where he was also appointed security officer and given the keys to the legation's only safe, in which classified documents were kept. Having successfully renewed contact with the GRU, he began photographing the contents of the safe. After his arrest four years later, he admitted to his interrogator, 'I gave them everything I had.' Remarkably, Avni's enthusiasm for the Soviet Union survived even the paranoia of the 'Jewish doctors' plot'. He later told his interrogator that Stalin had been a 'genius' and initially refused to believe that Khrushchev's 'Secret Speech' of 1956 denouncing Stalin was genuine.

(The Mitrokhin Archive II: The KGB in the World, Christopher Andrew, 2005, p. 193) (IMG)

On behalf of the Mossad, Avni was to establish contacts with the West German Nazis (i.e. Gehlen agents) and the regime of the Gestapo agent Tito:

While in Brussels, Avni also began to be employed by Mossad, using his fluent German to pose as a German businessman and make contact with former Nazis. Late in 1953, Avni was offered both a full-time position in Mossad and the post of commercial attaché in Belgrade and Athens. It was agreed that during his next posting he would combine espionage for Mossad with work as commercial attaché, based chiefly in Belgrade, and thereafter move to a permanent position in Mossad. Once in Belgrade, Avni was assigned a new controller operating under diplomatic cover as first secretary at the Soviet embassy. (The Mitrokhin Archive II: The KGB in the World, Christopher Andrew, 2005, p. 193) (IMG)

According to Christopher Andrew,:

In 1955-56 Avni supplied the KGB residency in Belgrade with the ciphers used by Mossad for communications with its Belgrade and Athens stations (probably enabling them to be decrypted), as well as details of Mossad personnel (probably both officers and agents) in France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Switzerland and Yugoslavia. As in Brussels, he gave his controller 'everything I had'. Avni was caught early in 1956 and sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment. (The Mitrokhin Archive II: The KGB in the World, Christopher Andrew, 2005, p. 194) (IMG)

However,:

Avni was caught early in 1956 and sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment. (The Mitrokhin Archive II: The KGB in the World, Christopher Andrew, 2005, p. 194) (IMG)

The precise date of Avni's arrest was in April, only one month after the 20th CPSU Congress. The 20th CPSU Congress was the Party Congress in which the Great Purge was denounced as 'criminal' and the Soviet intelligence service was condemned as the 'Stalinist' body responsible for such 'crimes'. A course of 'de-Stalinizing' the Soviet intelligence service began. 'De-Stalinizing' the Soviet intelligence service really meant destroying the Soviet intelligence service, elevating MI6 operatives at its high ranks, and most importantly for Avni's case, eliminating the agents of the Stalin faction in the Soviet intelligence. One of those Stalin faction loyalists reportedly was Avni:

Avni ... told his interrogator that Stalin had been a 'genius' and initially refused to believe that Khrushchev's 'Secret Speech' of 1956 denouncing Stalin was genuine. (The Mitrokhin Archive II: The KGB in the World, Christopher Andrew, 2005, p. 193) (IMG)

The 'De-Stalinization' of the Israel branch of the Soviet intelligence service seems to have come about in the form of the betrayal of Avni to the Shin-Bet chief, Isser Harel. 1956 was also the year in which the 'Cambridge Five', who were described as the Stalin-era Soviet spies in the high ranks of the MI6, were publicly exposed.

Levi Levi, an alleged Soviet spy in Israel, was captured in 1957:

Zeev Avni, who worked in the Foreign Ministry and carried out special missions for the Mossad, was caught, convicted and sentenced to a lengthy prison term in 1956. Levi (Lucian) Levi worked for the Operations Unit (today the Operations Branch), of the Shin Bet, which as part of its mission, according to foreign reports from Poland, broke into the embassies of the communist countries, in order to photograph documents and install listening devices. He was arrested and sentenced to prison in 1957. (In Depth: The KGB's long history of running agents in Israel, The Jerusalem Post, Yossi Melman, October 27, 2016) (IMG)

It is interesting to note that Yisrael Bar was hunted down by the Shin-Bet in 1961, the year in which the Khrushchev group launched what Western historians refer to as the 'Second Wave of De-Stalinization'. Paul Lendvai, a Zionist Hungarian defector to Austria and a journalist for the CIA-sponsored Die Presse, wrote

At the Central Committee plenum in November-December 1961, Gheorghiu-Dej coped easily with the repercussions of Khrushchev's second de-Stalinization campaign. The Party leader, who since March 1961 had also been President of the republic, asserted that he had been a helpless prisoner of the Pauker group and, by purging them, had restored "collective leadership." (Anti-Semitism without Jews: Communist Eastern Europe, Paul Lendvai, January 1, 1971, p. 337) (IMG{Romania})

1961 was the year in which the concept of the 'Dictatorship of the Proletariat' was denounced by the Khrushchev group and the CPSU officially described the Eurasian state as an 'All People's State'. An official split with China and Albania happened and there was an effort to rehabilitate Yugoslavia's role in the 1956 affairs in Hungary. The year 1961 was also the last year of the Syro-Egyptian unity in the United Arab Republic. That was the year in which the leverage of the progressive forces throughout the Middle East went on the decline, and the arrest of Yisrael Bar was undoubtedly influenced by such factors.

The question of boycott, divestment, and sanctions against any reactionary regime in any part of the world is a question of factional conflict, in turn based directly on class conflict. The crippling sanctions and the campaign of economic warfare shall be directed against the pro-fascist faction, the dominant faction, of the pro-fascist regime. By contrast, economic warfare should be used to sponsor and economically elevate the faction of the progressive infiltrators in the reactionary regime. What does this mean in the context of Israel? It means that economic warfare was to be directed towards sabotaging the Israeli regime's trade ties to the Anglo-American imperialists and their allies while increasing Israel's trade ties to the Soviet Union. The minimum gain that the reorientation of Israeli trade away from Anglo-American imperialists towards the USSR would have yielded was to make Israel less dependent on Anglo-American finance capital and thereby less susceptible to accepting the presence of the CIA-MI6 front companies in Israel; this would have reduced the CIA presence in Israel thus weakening the Ben-Gurion faction. The medium-level gain would be that the Soviets use this trade for purchasing products from the Mapam-affiliated kibbutzim so to increase financial support for the Mapam. The maximum gain would have been that the Soviets would utilize the trade ties to establish their 'Joint-Stock Companies' with Israel for investing there – and for using their front company presence in Israel to furnish the Mapam with all kinds of covert military and financial aid for preparing for the eventual conquest of Israel by Israel's proletariat. The extensive influence of the Israeli proletariat over Israel would have thereupon caused Israel's alliance with the Palestinian Arab proletariat.

For sabotaging Israel's trade ties to the Anglo-American imperialists and economically isolating the Ben-Gurion regime, the Israeli proletariat led by the Mapam took major steps in this direction. In an interview, Mapam leader General Moshe Sneh had said:

Today we are an independent state and we are in a position to reject all American demands. It is evident that our resistance can only succeed if it is supported by help from sincere friends of our independence, that is, in the first place by the help of the Soviet Union and the people's democracies. We do not have the least confidence that the present government of Israel will put up effective resistance to the demands of American imperialism. The composition of the government – right-wing social democrats (Mapai), religious front, small bourgeois parties – determines in advance its political line of submission to the policy of the United States. That is why we are conducting a fight of unswerving opposition to the policies of the government inside and outside of the Knesset. (...). Our economic program aims at the following objectives: nationalization of the land, of water sources, of natural resources (the Dead Sea), of electricity, of oil refineries and of foreign trade; radical recasting of the fiscal system by increase of direct taxation and suppression of indirect taxation and creation of the tax on capital; increase in the volume of trade with the USSR and with all European countries which would replace imports solely from Anglo-Saxon countries, which inevitably lead to the increase in the deficit of our trade balance; democratization in general of the whole economic system, as closely as possible in accordance with the example of the popular democracies and in the spirit of the pioneers of our renaissance. (INTERVIEW WITH DR. SNEH, Neie Presse (a Paris Yiddish daily), Interviewer: L. Bruck, interviewee: Moshe Sneh, pp. 1-2. MIA) (IMG)

To this end, the Mapam launched one of the biggest labour strikes in Israel's history. An excerpt of the 'World Communist Movement' document, which was the major document for the McCarthyite US Congressional Committee on Un-American Activities, was as follows:

November 16 – Israeli Sailors Union stages strike

In the ports of Haifa and Jaffa 800 seamen of the Israeli Sailors Union staged a "resignation strike against the role of Histadrut. the Israeli trade union federation, in the affairs of the union. The Sailors Union was controlled by the "pro-Soviet" Mapam Party.

('The World Communist Movement: Selective Chronology, 1818-1957', Vol. 3: 1951-1953, the Legislative Reference Services of the US Library of Congress, 1954, p. 562. Printed for the use of the: Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC), US Congress.) (IMG)

The Mapam-led strike was prolonged and strong in participant count. It economically isolated the Ben-Gurion regime, nullified Israel's navy, and slowed down the pace of Zionist migration for the while. Howard Sachar, the notorious Ben-Gurion apologist and prominent American-Israeli historian who spoke to the Ben-Gurion agent and Kautskyite trade-unionist Joseph Almogi, wrote:

One fact seemed certain: Almogi would never enter an alliance with the Communists. His reaction to the seamen's strike of 1951 was reassurance enough. That year Israel's Zim Steamship Company listed eight hundred sailors and officers on its rosters. All of them belonged to the seamen's union – and thus to the Histadrut. At the same time, a few Communists and fellow travelers had penetrated their ranks. Most of these extreme leftists had fallen under the influence of the pro-Communist Mapam party and of its leader, Dr. Moshe Sneh. Sneh detested the socialist gradualism of the Mapai party, and of the Mapai-controlled Histadrut. Sparing no effort to embarrass the Ben-Gurion administration, he and his followers resorted to such tactics as wildcat strikes and artificial "hunger" demonstrations. These were old Stalinist tricks, of course, but from time to time they seemed likely to produce results within the Israel merchant marine. Sneh's principal lieutenant in the seamen's union was Nimrod Eshel, a twenty-five-year-old bosun and native-born Israeli who had been deeply influenced by the Communist-controlled seamen's unions of France and Italy.

Gathering a few picked sailors around him, most of them skilled agitators, Eshel concentrated his fire on working conditions in the Zim company. He was on strong ground here, for in those days many of the ships were quite old, and crew facilities on board were far from satisfactory. Instead of bringing his grievances before the local workers' council, however, Eshel initiated a series of wildcat strikes on every one of Zim's freighters in Haifa harbor. Hardly a week went by without a walkout on one vessel or another – and this at the most critical period of Israel's economic development. Eventually, by sheer persistence, Eshel induced most of his fellow seamen to go out on a general strike. And still he refused to meet with the Zim representatives.

Almogi tried to reason with the bosun. "Look here," he said, "we've got a workers' council precisely for the purpose of negotiating with the owners. Give us a chance at least to bargain with them."

"Nothing doing," Eshel insisted, "we want no interference from the Histadrut. We're handling this affair entirely on our own."

As later events made clear, Eshel's ultimate goal was the paralysis of the Israel maritime industry. Almogi suspected this at the time, but could not prove it. He knew only that the fiery young agitator parroted Sneh's line down to the last syllable, that he stubbornly avoided recourse to the very machinery of collective bargaining which was capable of redressing the workers' grievances. Almogi recognized, too, that if the Histadrut surrendered to Eshel's demands for autonomy, Mapam would be in a position to encourage other unions to break away – and thus disrupt altogether the painfully created solidarity of the labor movement. Finally, Zim itself might well fall into the hands of the Communists, and that would mean the end of maritime connections with the most important shippers in the free world.

(Aliyah: The Peoples of Israel, Howard Morley Sachar, 1961, pp. 275-276) (IMG)

Further evidence of attempts to sabotage Israel's trade with the US-led camp lies in the fact that the Israeli workers in New York and Baltimore joined the Mapam-led strike as well, with a Histadrut official in USA warning those workers that such worker action was economically isolating Israel from its Western anti-Arab allies:

The 59 striking Israel seamen who tied up two Israeli ships in New York and Baltimore and were interned on Ellis Island were deported today from the United States to Israel on the Greek vessel Nea Hellas. Their ships – the Yafo and the Haifa – sailed from the ports of New York and Baltimore, respectively, manned by other crews.

Dr. Joseph Burstin, representative of the Histadrut in the United States, told a press conference here today that the Federation of Labor in Israel is opposed to the demands by the striking Israel seamen who are seeking the right to declare strikes in foreign ports and request autonomy for their employment bureaus. Dr. Burstin emphasized that Israel cannot permit the seamen to strike while in foreign ports since this might paralyze normal traffic between the Jewish state and the outside world.

The representative of the Histadrut pointed out that Israel is surrounded by enemies on land and that its only contact with the outside world is by sea. Israel's entire import and export trade would be exposed to sabotage by irresponsible elements if Israeli seamen were permitted to strike in foreign ports, he emphasized.

(Striking Israeli Seamen Deported from U.S. to Israel on Greek Ship, The Jewish Telegraphic Agency, December 21, 1951, p. 2) (IMG)

Ehud Sprinzak, an advisor to the former Palmach commander Yitzhak Rabin and a potentially pro-Mapam scholar, wrote:

The shutdown of Israel's entire shipping industry was not regarded by the government as a legitimate labor dispute but as a treacherous attempt to paralyze the state fomented by "enemies of the nation and communists." Referring to the conflict in the Knesset, Ben-Gurion asserted, "There was and there is no strike. What is at stake is an effort by the enemies of the state to paralyze the Hebrew navy, an effort strongly supported by several factions for whom the desire to sabotage the state takes first priority.... It is for the working public to decide whether it is a strike, not for the Yevsektzia [a Jewish communist organization in the Soviet Union that always represented the party line] and their collaborators in other factions." (Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination, Ehud Sprinzak, 1999, p. 81) (IMG)

Meanwhile, as Israel's commercial ties to the US-led camp were being sabotaged, the Soviet Union and Israel continued to foster trade relations with each other. The Israeli long-time career diplomat Yosef Gavrin wrote in the timeline section of book:

9 December 1951

Israeli-Soviet trade negotiations were concluded concerning the exportation of 5,000 tons of citrus fruit from Israel to the USSR.

(Israeli-Soviet Relations, 1953-67: From Confrontation to Disruption, Yosef Govrin, 1990, p. 33) (IMG)

This measure by the Soviet Union was interpreted by Israel's Foreign Ministry as a means of strategically reorienting Israel further away from American imperialism:

at the end of 1951, Russia and Israel signed an agreement for the supply of 125,000 crates of citrus fruit worth $100,000. In the Foreign Ministry this Soviet step was interpreted as a Soviet regional tactic, prompted by rumors of the establishment of a Mideast Command at American initiative; purchases from Israel were perhaps intended to "reinforce neutrality in the Middle East." (Between East and West: Israel's Foreign Policy Orientation 1948-1956, Cambridge University Press, Uri Bialer, 1990, p. 127) (IMG)

Almost from the moment the request for [American] credit was submitted Israeli economic activity in Russia did indeed cease until 1950. In his sharp criticism of this policy in February of that year Mordechai Namir, then Israel's Minister in Moscow, pointed out that since the end of 1949 "not a single proposal has come [from Israel] for us to attempt any economic operation an absolute zero in the USSR. paragraph of our trade balance will not keep us going." The figures substantiate Namir's claim: in 1949 Israeli imports from the Soviet Union totaled some $400,000 and exports some $26,000; the next year imports were reduced to $20,000 worth of goods and Israeli exports to Russia were about one-third of that sum. (Between East and West: Israel's Foreign Policy Orientation 1948-1956, Cambridge University Press, Uri Bialer, 1990, p. 126) (IMG)

As the Israeli Foreign Ministry staff rightly implied, the expansion of the Israeli-Soviet trade that took place during the Sailors' Strike definitely served as a means of reducing the influence of American finance capital in Israel while increasing the influence of the Soviets there. In the context of Israel, that is what so-called 'neutralism' meant: moving away from Israel's ally, USA, and moving towards the Soviets. It is even possible that the Soviet purchase of citric fruits was targeted; it may have been an indirect means of economically supporting the Mapam-affiliated kibbutzim by purchasing their goods via Israel's fruits board.

The Mapam tried to maximize popular front and united front cooperation with the Maki in the struggle against the Ben-Gurion regime. As the Soviet Embassy in Israel reported in 1949:

Mapam and the Communist Party have recently begun to make joint statements on certain questions. (The Situation in Israel, P. I. Ershov. In: I.N. Bakulin to A.A. Gromyko (Moscow) COPY: AVP RF, F 089, OP.2, P.3, D.8, LL.2-11, Moscow, September 29, 1949, Secret. In: "Documents on Israeli-Soviet Relations, 1941-1953, Parts 1-2", Israeli Foreign Ministry, Russian Foreign Ministry, Israel State Archives, Russian Federal Archives, p. 536) (IMG)

In early December of 1951, the Mapam and the Maki actively lobbied for the regime to receive the strikers' delegation in the Knesset. The JTA reported:

The Mapam-Communist demand was turned down by Deputy Speaker M. Shefer who insisted that the Parliament hear an announcement by Police Minister Shitreet on the case of detained religious dissidents involved in the bombing of the Knesset earlier this year. The Mapam and Communist deputies inside Parliament jumped to their feet and began shouting at the Speaker. At the same time, a demonstration of striking seamen and Mapam and Communist representatives outside the building demanded that a strikers' delegation be received by the praesidium of the Parliament.

The disorder lasted for half-an-hour until Speaker Shefer announced that the Police Minister would read his announcement and then the Knesset would adjourn to permit its House Committee to work on the agenda. The deputies calmed down and Minister Shitreet announced that the government had instructed the Inspector General of Police to indict any policeman who broke the regulations. Also, the announcement said that there are no grounds for acting against any of the policemen involved in detaining the religious underground members, who had charged police cruelty during their incarceration. Later, when the Knesset praesidium promised to receive a delegation of striking seamen, the demonstrators dispersed.

(Leftists Provoke Disorder in Knesset over Seamen's Strike, The Jewish Telegraphic Agency, December 6, 1951, p. 1) (IMG)

While the cooperation between the Maki and the Mapam was a positive event, there existed major problems. Back then, the Soviets and the communist forces in Israel had invested more in the Mapam than in the Maki, because unfortunately there was no way that Israel's working class was going to so pervasively be attracted to the Maki, a Party with a long track record of self-describing officially as 'non-Zionist'. Yet, not surprisingly, the lesser investment into improving the situation in the Maki had made it more susceptible to Ben-Gurion faction infiltration than the Mapam. Recall that Shmuel Mikunis, the Maki leader, had with the approval of the Malenkov group in Moscow and with the support of the Yugoslav regime, aimed to mislead some of the progressive-minded Yiddish individuals into serving in the armed forces of the Ben-Gurion regime (see C16S5). The Mikunis group did not represent all of the Israeli Communist Party, and in that Party, there existed what would later become known as the 'Rakah' contingent that formed the Brezhnev-era Moscow-approved Party. However, back then, the Mikunis group dominated the Maki, which was why the Soviets had problems with the dominant faction in the Maki. In the Soviet Embassy in Israel too it was stated that the Maki was making serious errors:

The Communist Party of Israel is insignificant in numbers and in influence in the country. It makes mistakes both in tactics and in matters of organization. It badly needs help. (The Situation in Israel, P. I. Ershov. In: I.N. Bakulin to A.A. Gromyko (Moscow) COPY: AVP RF, F 089, OP.2, P.3, D.8, LL.2-11, Moscow, September 29, 1949, Secret. In: "Documents on Israeli-Soviet Relations, 1941-1953, Parts 1-2", Israeli Foreign Ministry, Russian Foreign Ministry, Israel State Archives, Russian Federal Archives, p. 536) (IMG)

Many commentators incorrectly put Sneh and Mikunis into the same category. Sneh and Mikunis did appear to have similar ideologies – eclectic mixtures of Zionism and communism – and they did work in the same Party since the mid-1950s. However, in spite of the appearance of similarity between these two, the differences were fundamental. Sneh was the top face of the trend of communist infiltration into the Zionist movement whereas Mikunis was the top face of the Zionist infiltration into Israel's communist movement. On the surface however, since in their rhetoric, one could observe eclectic mixtures of Zionism and communism, many were led to the confusion that Mikunis and Sneh belonged to the same category. By December 16, 1951, the Mapam had mobilized a large segment of the proletarian masses as well as some of the revolutionary elements in the intelligentsia into a protest of 3,000 people in support of the sailors' strike. The Maki, the Israeli Communist Party, assisted the Mapam in this effort but Mikunis, the Zionist agent who had risen to the position of the leadership of the Maki, pursued a left-sectarian agenda and tried to cut off Moshe Sneh. A December 17, 1951 document from Israel's high command stated:

On December 16, 1951 at 5:30 PM ... a truck arrived ... at the Maki club.... They mounted a loudspeaker and several dozen teenagers boarded the truck to the Magen David Square, a place crowded with an audience of about 3,000 people. At that time a truck arrived.... It began with the speech of Dr. Moshe Sneh, who attacks the government in connection with its attack on the sailors.

Maki members arrived at the Magen David Square ... and Shmuel Mikunis gave his speech on the loudspeaker, and the Maki and the Mapam began to compete to have their voices heard louder.

After Moshe Sneh's speech, Pinchas Tobin delivered a speech that would agitate the audience to support the sailors' strike. His speech was occasionally interrupted by shouts of contempt against the government from the assembled crowd.

(SUBJECT: Protest Demonstration by the Committee for the Defense of the Seamen's Association, Tel Aviv Headquarters, General Department, National Headquarters, Memo Tel Aviv, December 17, 1951, p. 1) (IMG)

An intelligence document from the Israel police stated:

During the first period of the conflict, the sailors' representatives organized organizing meetings themselves, but later the "Public Committee for Sailors' Aid" convened meetings and organized demonstrations in support of the seafarers' struggle. The organizational origin of the public committee is not clear, but most of the activists who appeared in it all belonged to Mapam. At one point, Maki tried to join the operations, but this joining was apparently undesirable. In one case (a demonstration in Tel Aviv, about December 16, 1951), Mikunis tried to participate over the car with a speaker and was interrupted by the Mapam speaker. Up to 3,000 people took part in the demonstrations. (Report on the Strike of the Sailors, Israel Police, January 9, 1952, p. 3) (IMG)

Here was Mikunis again in December 1951 entering a Mapam-led protest, trying to cut off the speaker, Dr. Moshe Sneh, and behaving in a left-sectarian manner that benefited the Ben-Gurion regime. How typical of Mikunis and his left-and-right-opportunist group. In any case, large-scale Mapam-led protests throughout Israel erupted. Ehud Sprinzak, an advisor to the former Palmach commander Yitzhak Rabin, wrote:

The seamen's organization had the support of the entire Israeli radical left of the time, including Mapam activists, former Palmach commander Yigal Alon, and the movement's writers and artists. (...) Massive pro-seamen demonstrations involving former Palmach members and supporters of Mapam erupted all over the country. (Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination, Ehud Sprinzak, 1999, pp. 81-82) (IMG)

The Ben-Gurion apologist Howard Sachar wrote:

Almogi returned to Haifa and publicly announced the Histadrut's opposition to the seamen's strike. He called for volunteers to man the ships; and within a few days nearly 40 per cent of the men responded to his request and returned to work. But many of the other sailors staged sit-down strikes on the vessels and had to be carried ashore bodily by the police. Even as Almogi had predicted, furious outcries were immediately raised in all parts of the country. Mapam mobilized supporters for the striking seamen from among both union and nonunion members. Thus, in Tel Aviv, doctors, writers, and school teachers paraded through the streets, carrying placards demanding the overthrow of Almogi and Ben-Gurion. Many of the kibbutzim sent Elaganah veterans to remonstrate with Almogi. (Aliyah: The Peoples of Israel, Howard Morley Sachar, 1961, pp. 275-276) (IMG)

The regime imposed mandatory military draft on the sailors:

One of the government's methods of dealing with the seamen was a mandatory military draft. Many of the striking seamen, who were earlier urged to serve in the nation's commercial navy instead of serving in the army, were ordered to report immediately to their army bases. The pretext was that since they were no longer seamen, they were legally obliged to complete their army mandatory service. (...). They had to serve in the army like all other Israelis. (Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination, Ehud Sprinzak, 1999, pp. 81-82) (IMG)

The police resort to physical force and the drafting of many strikers into the army led to the spread of the strike to all Israeli ships docking in foreign ports. Israel's entire commercial navy was nearly paralyzed. (Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination, Ehud Sprinzak, 1999, p. 82) (IMG)

The murderous Ben-Gurion regime was determined to crack down on the sailors' strike through terror against Israel's proletarians:

Mordechai Namir, the Histadrut's secretary general; Joseph Almogi, Histadrut's Haifa chief; and Ben-Gurion were all determined to use any means necessary to impose the Histadrut's authority on the sailors. Substitute seamen were brought to Haifa to replace the striking sailors, creating violent confrontations. Thousands of former Palmach members also came to show their support. (Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination, Ehud Sprinzak, 1999, pp. 81-82) (IMG)

The seamen who were considered exemplary Zionist pioneers before the strike were now called "communist agents and black market dealers" by Joseph Almogi. (...). Violence erupted almost from the beginning. As soon as the first ship, the Galila, docked at the Haifa port on October 22, 1951, and declared a strike, substitute seamen tried to board her. A fist fight involving the use of knives ensued and was quickly joined by a large number of policemen. All the company's other ships arrived in Haifa after the Galila strike. (Brother against Brother: Violence and Extremism in Israeli Politics from Altalena to the Rabin Assassination, Ehud Sprinzak, 1999, pp. 81-82) (IMG)

The Ben-Gurion apologist Sachar who interviewed Joseph Almogi, corroborated the claims of the Rabin advisor:

"I met with Ben-Gurion," Almogi recalled. "He agreed with me; we had no choice but to break the strike. It was a terribly difficult decision, and we expected it to arouse the protests of many honest laboring men in other unions. But under the circumstances we had no alternative."

"Don't forget that this was the austerity period," Almogi reminded me. "The standard of living of the entire country had fallen drastically – because of the huge immigration, of course. Many well-meaning people viewed this 'betrayal' by Ben-Gurion and myself as the last straw."

Although the strike was the most acrimonious Israel had thus far experienced, within Haifa, at least, Almogi managed to keep a firm grip on his labor followers.

(Aliyah: The Peoples of Israel, Howard Morley Sachar, 1961, pp. 275-276) (IMG)

The Mapam/Palmach could not stand by and watch as the Ben-Gurion regime was terrorizing the people of Israel. Hence a series of special military operations were launched. An intelligence document by the Israel police stated:

In the assembly and demonstration system and especially in the attempt of the masses to storm the port of Haifa, a planning and organizing hand was evident. The port gates were attacked deceptively and the masses were occasionally directed.... The equipment was prepared retrospectively (piles of stones, rubble, fragments of logs, etc.) and command nuclei were evident. In all the demonstrations, calls were made against the government, the Histadrut and especially derogatory calls against the police. The most serious cases were in Haifa during the operation against the ships "Negba" and then "Tel Aviv" in which the protesters roamed for hours, controlled the streets near the port and conducted mass assaults on the port gates. The sailors themselves were a tiny and fragile minority. The composition of the participants in these disturbances can be discussed from the fact that all six injured in Haifa on December 28, 1951 were members of agricultural farms and that 16 of the 29 detainees in Haifa on December 14, 1951 were also from the farms. (Report on the Strike of the Sailors, Israel Police, January 9, 1952, p. 3) (IMG)

The party affiliations of these kibbutznik farmers and their squad leaders, while easy to identify, is difficult to prove. However, everyone can infer whom the revolutionary usual suspects were. Meanwhile, the sailors themselves engaged in battles against the terrorist police, thus forcing the police to launch a naval operation in response:

It was known that the "Tel Aviv" team in particular, under the guidance and help of the leaders of the strikes on the coast, valued active resistance against the police's attempt to board the ship, while continuing to continue the battle with all the means at their disposal. Indeed, the sailors on the ship "Tel Aviv" held a planned and organized battle of resistance in a cohesive planned and organized manner when their means of tackling the police were firing water jets, throwing axes, knives, iron bars, tools, planks, etc. at the chiefs of policemen approaching the ship. These measures resulted in the injury of 13 policemen and by chance no casualties were caused to the police.

Police were forced to conduct a rather complex naval operation. For this purpose, the boats of the port administration (including the fire boat) were recruited as an addition to the police vessels. (...). The advantage of the sailors was that they were fortified and under cover and above all that they were in a high position about 7 meters above the heads of the policemen in the boats, [and] the policemen maintained substandard and inefficient equipment. The sailors overturned the ladders, damaged them, and hit every policeman who tried to get on them. The strikers did not refrain from knocking down a ladder that had police officers on it, one of whom fell into the sea and others were dropped into a boat. The number of wounded among the policemen has been growing....

(Report on the Strike of the Sailors, Israel Police, January 9, 1952, p. 2) (IMG)

Israel's terrorist police, in its naval operations against the sailors, required the cooperation of the other workers, a cooperation it was largely denied by the workers of Israel:

Knowing these practices, the police were forced to take precautionary measures and stop the service of "anchor" boats, to flee to the concentration of all boats near the dock and to prohibit their voyage to the port area without permission. These restrictions were also imposed on the fishing castles. Customs workers also did not tend to cooperate with the police. A uniformed customs officer was arrested by police for refusing to comply with a police officer's request to render assistance in stopping a storming crowd at the port.

Another example of non-cooperation that could have thwarted the police operation in the "Tel Aviv" ship was discovered among the employees of the port administration who serve its boats. The port manager made available to the police three of his most appropriate dedications for this operation (two tugs and one fire engine equipped with pumps of water) and without which it was difficult to withstand the operation.

3. The Position of the Workers of the Haifa Port

In the case of the Haifa Workers' Council, the workers' positive attitude towards the government's position as a seafarers' conflict did not match.

There were many cases in which the Histadrut encountered the refusal of some of the workers to fill positions that the Histadrut had given them, usually involving indifference and unwillingness to cooperate on the part of the workers.

The dismay between the port workers, which was marked by open sympathy for the strikers, apparently had a considerable effect on the entire public.

(Report on the Strike of the Sailors, Israel Police, January 9, 1952, p. 3) (IMG)

The Sailors' Strike had done its damage to the pro-fascist Ben-Gurion faction through undermining the anti-Palmach elements in the Israeli navy. It had sabotaged Israel's trade ties to the West, had sabotaged Israel's naval fleet, and inflicted damage on the fascist police. The Mapam thereafter launched the successor campaign to the Seamen's Strike. Major protests of thousands of Israeli workers erupted against the Ben-Gurion regime's subservience to Anglo-American imperialism in the region:

About 3,000 Mapam sympathizers this week-end demonstrated against the Israel Government's new economic policy and assailed Israel's alleged subservience to the United States. The demonstration was preceded by a three-hour "warning strike."

The strike and demonstration, called by the Mapam Party and Communists, was denounced by the Histadrut, the Israel labor federation, as sabotage of the labor movement and misuse of the strike weapon. The Histadrut threatened participants in the strike with dismissal from their jobs.

The strikers marched in a two-mile procession through the streets of Tel Aviv bearing placards denouncing the government and critical of the United States. Women waving empty shopping bags, in protest against the food situation, were prominent in the line of march.

Workers committees in a number of industries here under domination of the left-wing Mapam Party, decided today to call a strike on Thursday in a demonstration of protest against the Government's new economic policy.

Spokesmen for the Mapai, considering counter-measures, warned that every striking worker would be subject to dismissal.

Even before the official establishment of Medinat Yisrael, the Soviets had invested in boosting their soft power influence in Israel. Since great masses of the Yiddish and Hebrew citizens of Israel already were influenced by communism and Soviet ideas, the Soviets already had a presence in Israel in terms of soft power. To lose such soft power would have been a grave error for the Soviets. Hence, in cooperation with the Mapam, the Soviets established, the VOKS – the Soviet-Israeli friendship association, whose task was boosting Soviet cultural influence among the Israelis. The Soviet legation in Israel took on this task. Whereas the Mapai aimed to utilize its 'Friendship' association with the USSR as a channel for intelligence penetration into the USSR for anti-Soviet subversion, the Soviets used their Friendship association as a channel for fomenting pro-communist subversion against the Mapai-Irgun forces. In the list of instructions to the Soviet intelligence base in Israel, the following were stated:

6. The legation must work through the leaders of the League for Friendly Relations with the USSR who are loyal to us, and who are under the guidance of Mapam and the Communist Party, in order to guide the league towards activities which will popularize the Soviet Union among the people of Israel. As for the public Israel-USSR Friendship Society, which was formed by the ruling Mapai Party to counterbalance the League for Friendly Relations, the legation must define its attitude to this committee according to the latter's activity, keeping in mind that Mapai organized the committee in order to make contact with the Jews in the USSR rather than to promote friendship with the Soviet Union.

7. The legation must expand the activity in Israel of VOKS, Mezhdunarodnaia Kniga, Soveksportfilm and Sovinformburo, by organizing exhibitions, opening a Soviet bookshop, publishing a popular periodical on behalf of the League for Friendly Relations and increasing the screenings of Soviet films.

In an interview with the Paris-based Yiddish daily Neie Presse, Mapam leader General Moshe Sneh stated:

The fight for the independence of Israel is tied to the fight for peace just as the act of dragging Israel into a regional pact under American control would be tied to the preparation for a new war by American imperialists against the Soviet Union, against the people's democracies and against the independence of all peoples. We have just established in Israel a Committee for Peace which has affiliated with the World Congress of the Partisans for Peace. We are also in the process of enlarging the scope and strengthening the activity of the League for Friendship with the USSR. The popular masses have warmly – even enthusiastically – responded to the call of these two organizations. We hope to be able to create a mass movement in support of the fight to promote peace and friendship with the Soviet Union. Mapai recently attempted to split the League for Friendship with the USSR, but the result has been just the opposite. The League has been strengthened and the number of members doubled. Our view is that friendship with the USSR is a touchstone for every individual on the question of world peace; for every Jew who wishes to remain true to the real interests of his people and his country; and for every worker who wishes to remain faithful to the banner of genuine socialism. It is necessary to add that not only the Movement for Peace but also the League for Friendship with the USSR take part in and collaborate harmoniously with all progressive forces in Israel, both Jewish and Arab. (INTERVIEW WITH DR. SNEH, Neie Presse (a Paris Yiddish daily), Interviewer: L. Bruck, interviewee: Moshe Sneh, pp. 1-2. MIA) (IMG)

Describing the level of the success of the Soviet soft power program in Israel, a report from the Soviet legation stated:

Thus, on 1 January 1949, an exposition opened in Tel Aviv, 'Upbringing and Education in the USSR', organized jointly by the VOKS representative and the League for Friendly Relations with the USSR. At the exposition, representatives of the Israeli intelligentsia delivered five lectures: 'Lenin, Teacher of Generations', 'Upbringing and Education in the USSR', 'Modern Soviet Literature', 'Soviet Theatre', and 'Soviet Cinema'. Four Soviet films were shown and four musical-literary evenings were organized with the participation of local performers. The exposition and related cultural events attracted the attention of the entire Israeli press. Several newspapers (Kol haam. Al hamishmar, Davar, Haaretz, and Haolam hazeh) published positive reviews of the exposition and articles about education and upbringing in the Soviet Union.

An exhibition, 'The Military Art of the Red Army', was opened in Haifa on 8 January 1949. It was organized by the VOKS representatives together with the Haifa committee of the League for Friendly Relations with the USSR.

About 5,000 people visited the exhibition in 15 days, more than half of whom were soldiers or officers in the Israeli army. A lecture, 'The Soviet Army in Soviet Literature', was read, and books and journals on the exhibition topic were displayed. Lecturers from the league, chiefly from the ranks of the Israeli army, gave explanations at the exhibition. Large articles with detailed descriptions of the exhibition appeared in several Israeli newspapers (Al hamishmar, Davar, and others). They noted the heroic struggle of the Soviet army against fascist occupation and expressed gratitude to the Soviet Union for defeating Hitler's Germany

On 2 April 1949, this same exhibition was organized in Tel Aviv jointly with the Tel Aviv committee of the league. (...). On the first day about 1,500 visited the exposition. In this connection, Soviet films were shown, lectures were delivered about the Soviet army and concerts of Soviet music were held. All the exhibitions enjoyed great success in Israel.

However, as is well-known, the CIA had launched Operation MOCKINGBIRD for the purpose of anti-Soviet agitation and American soft power influence in various countries. In Israel too, as the influence of the Palmach and the Mapam over the regime apparatus reduced, the agents of the United States were able to gradually raise their voice and agitated libelous content against the Soviets. One of the major targets was the Soviet film industry. The Ben-Gurion faction, having emerged militarily triumphant over the Arab armies in the 1948 War, was able to free up some of its funds to the secret service conflict against the Mapam in the Israeli military bodies, and then the Israeli security and intelligence bodies. Since Israel's 'non-state' media was controlled by the Shin Bet and the Mossad, increased influence by the Ben-Gurion faction over the 'non-state' media allowed him to agitate and propagate heavily against the USSR. A Soviet intelligence report from the legation in Tel Aviv stated:

The leading role in the anti-Soviet propaganda campaign is played by the newspaper Hador, the organ of the main government party Mapai. Hador is joined by Henil (the organ of the fascist party Herut [note: Herut was Menachem Begin's Party and the Likud predecessor]), Haboker, and other bourgeois papers.

Anti-Soviet propaganda in Israel is inspired by the reactionary American press, the American-Jewish bourgeoisie, which has a great deal of influence on life in Israel, and reactionary circles in Israel itself, beginning with Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion, who, in fact, directs all anti-Soviet propaganda in the country, although formally he 'does not interfere' in the affairs of the press, referring to 'freedom of the press' in Israel.

The main methods for implementing anti-Soviet propaganda are the following:

(...). 4) Printing libellous anti-Soviet reviews, mainly of Soviet films;

The reactionary Israeli press gives a slanderous picture of life within the Soviet Union. In particular, it paints an anti-Soviet and Zionist picture of the 'situation of the Jews' in the USSR. Defending the capitalist system, it gives a slanderous impression of the living conditions of the workers in the USSR; it tries to detract from the achievements of Soviet culture, in an effort to paralyze Soviet influence on the workers of Israel.

1. In a review of the film The Tale of a Real Alan, Hador (1 June 1949) wrote that 'this is the weakest of films... everything in it is done almost in bureaucratic form... tears and joys are measured out with mathematical precision'.

(Anti-Soviet Propaganda in the Israeli Press: Memorandum, Excerpts from a Memorandum by M. Popov, COPY: AVP RF, F.089, OP.2, P.3, D.13, LL.8-20, Tel Aviv, December 7, 1949. In: "Documents on Israeli-Soviet Relations, 1941-1953, Parts 1-2", Israeli Foreign Ministry, Russian Foreign Ministry, Israel State Archives, Russian Federal Archives, pp. 562-566. No Screenshot.)

In replacement, Israel's ruling Kautskyites promoted the Yugoslav regime films:

At present the Histadrut has taken upon itself the considerable task of distributing Yugoslav films, and under the Histadrut's 'patronage' films from Yugoslavia are to be shown in workers' and agricultural settlements.

All this takes on a certain hue in light of fact that the events organized by the League for Friendly Relations with the USSR not only evoke no sympathy from the Histadrut, but even encounter opposition in such matters as making premises and funds available.

(REPORT OF THE USSR MISSION IN THE STATE OF ISRAEL FOR THE PERIOD FROM THE FORMATION OF THE STATE IN MAY 1948 TO DECEMBER 1949, Excerpts from the Political Report of the USSR Legation in Israel, COPY: AVP RF, F.089, OP.3, P.6, D.8, LL.211-26; 262-4 Tel Aviv, March 10, 1950, In: "Documents on Israeli-Soviet Relations, 1941-1953, Parts 1-2", Israeli Foreign Ministry, Russian Foreign Ministry, Israel State Archives, Russian Federal Archives, p. 612. The regime that promoted settler-colonialism against the Albanians of Kosovo was befriended even in the film industry by the regime that promoted settler-colonialism against the Arabs of Palestine. No surprise. The friendly attitude of the Yugoslav regime towards the Ben-Gurion regime does not mean friendship with the people of Israel. Forget not that well into the 1970s, the Tito regime, the stance of which in support of Zionist fascist reaction never changed, funded the PLO terrorist "freedom-fighters" who carried out the numerous terror attacks against civilians in Israel.

By late 1952, the Zionist agents of the Anglo-American secret services had greatly stepped up their media campaign against the USSR via the ostensibly 'private' 'non-state' media outlets. The USSR responded in kind in its media campaign against the regime of Israel culminating in the Soviet media coverage of the Prague Trials and the Doctors' Plot. At the height of the Stalin-era Soviet media campaigns against Israel in 1953, the Israeli regime launched a campaign of vicious colour revolutionary propaganda, agitating among the 'Jews' and Jews. the Israeli Foreign Minister Moshe Sharett, Ben-Gurion's henchman, instructed his subordinates in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to launch a vicious anti-Soviet slander campaign, explicitly stating that Israel "should not rely on the facts" and instead should "incite" "public tension" for "arousing public opinion constantly and repeatedly" against Moscow. Israel and its agents based in Washington launched a campaign to denounce the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies as hostile to the Israelites. While acknowledging that the doctors' plot case in the USSR is a prelude for a purge of "unreliable elements," the Israeli Foreign Minister Moshe Sharett remarked:

Here are my instructions in the matter of Moscow's calumnies

(a) This is not a major line of policy but the result of a general trend to strengthen the regime whether for its own sake or in preparation for war, by means of blood-letting, tightening internal espionage, targeting a scapegoat and laying the groundwork for the mass liquidation of unreliable elements.

(b) Even if for Moscow the libel is of secondary importance, for us it is the crux of the matter.

(c) The libel is the outcome of a deliberate decision, and we should expect more such manifestations and prepare for a prolonged campaign.

(d) We have very few weapons in hand and we should not underestimate the [importance of] arousing public opinion constantly and repeatedly, on the assumption that Moscow is not entirely indifferent to the repercussions of its policy in international public opinion and its influence on people and circles sympathetic to it.

(e) We should not rely on the facts themselves to maintain the level of public tension; we must constantly incite it.

Therefore, I favoured from the beginning the initiative for a world Jewish conference to react to the calumnies. This is now the government's stance. The conference should be convened in Paris for greater resonance in Europe. The government of Israel will not participate in either the initiative or the debates but will send an observer. The conference of the organizations for reparations can serve as a precedent for the composition which should be as broad as possible. The aims of the conference: (1) condemnation and refutation of the calumny in a well-considered, dignified and forceful manner; (2) unification of Jewish public opinion and isolation of the enemies of the Jewish people's (3) an appeal to world public opinion; (4) Let My People Go.

The conference will not go beyond the bounds of demanding rectification of the slander of the Jewish people and its organizations, (voicing) its concern for the safety of the Jewish masses, their protection and the demand for their aliya, the denunciation of hatred of the Jewish people and an appeal to the world to rise up against it. It will not condemn communism as a regime and will not overtly join the political war against the Soviet Union.

Through such a massive incitement campaign, Sharett provoked a Zionist terror attack and bombing campaign against the Soviet legation in Israel: February 9 1953

The Soviet Union's diplomatic outpost in Tel Aviv is bombed, leading the Soviets to break off diplomatic relations a few days later. One Soviet diplomat and the wives of two others are injured by the blast of 70 pounds of explosives in the garden, and the building is damaged. (...). The bombing is blamed on an Israeli terrorist group that calls itself the Kingdom of Israel and is known to the public as the Tzrifin Underground. The leader of the group, former Lehi member Yaakov Heruti, denies involvement in the explosion, and the government lacks proof. But Heruti and other Kingdom of Israel members are sentenced to prison sentences of one to 12 years for other attacks and plots and for the danger they pose to state security. Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion commutes the sentences after two years.

(Soviet Embassy Bombed in Tel Aviv, Center for Israel Education) (IMG)

Ben-Gurion freed the 'Kingdom of Israel' terrorists from 'prison' because the latter's activities were godsend for the Israeli secret service. The notorious 'Kingdom of Israel' is known to have had the tacit – if not active – support of the Shin Bet and was later held responsible for assassinating the Mossad operative Rudolf Kastner, just when the latter was believed to be going to reveal secrets of the Mossad support for the Nazis against USSR (see C16S1). Only two weeks prior to the military operation against the Soviet Embassy, Ben-Gurion had asked the rhetorical question 'we permit the enemies of Israel in Moscow to maintain here, overtly and legitimately, agents...?'

What has [Stalin] to do with the Semites? His present political aims require that he attack and accuse the Jews and their state. He is arousing worldwide hatred of Israel. And perhaps we can do nothing against him, but shall we permit the enemies of Israel in Moscow to maintain here, overtly and legitimately, agents of and collaborators with the enemies of Israel? (D. Ben-Gurion to the Members of the Israeli Government, COPY: ISA 130.02/2157/14, Tel Aviv, January 20, 1953. In: "Documents on Israeli-Soviet Relations, 1941-1953, Parts 1-2", Israeli Foreign Ministry, Russian Foreign Ministry, Israel State Archives, Russian Federal Archives, p. 858) (IMG)

Anyways on February 12, 1953, the Soviet-Israeli:

diplomatic relations [were] broken off 12 February [1953] after the bombing of the Soviet legation in Tel Aviv... (The Beria Purge and Subsequent Soviet Policy, Central Intelligence Agency, July 24, 1953, p. 8) (IMG)

Certainly, in their attacks on Soviet intelligence presence under 'diplomatic' cover in Israel, the left-deviationist critics of the USSR on this matter are – most of them unintentionally – standing with the Ben-Gurion faction and the Zionist terror organizations against the Arabs. Plus, such an intelligence base could continue to serve as a base for supporting the progressive elements of the Hebrew society, which contrary to left-opportunist propaganda, were not actually so few. The Soviet intelligence base in Tel Aviv would have allowed the USSR to more easily maintain contact with the people of Israel and could pave the way for the establishment of a socialist state in Israel. It was certainly unfortunate to see that such a base was lost and contact with the people of Israel was reduced.

One of the co-founders and leaders of the Mapam was Meir Ya'ari. Ya'ari was an interesting Mapam activist, for his views were generally communistic but also contained doses of Judaism. As Shimon Peres recalled,:

Meir Ya'ari, the Mapam – Hashomer Hatzair leader, sat in his kibbutz, Merhavia, and spoke of the dictatorship of the proletariat. He insisted on "ideological collectivism." He had a rabbinical air about him, and his followers were like disciples. He quoted from Lenin but still managed to sound like a rabbi! ('Ben-Gurion : A Political Life', Shimon Peres, 2011, p. 134) (IMG)

To support his arguments, the late Meir Ya'ari used to cite the works of Marx, Engels, Lenin, and Stalin - as well as the Hebrew Bible. Ya'ari pretended to oppose the communist faction of the Mapam but in reality, he himself belonged to the communist faction that dominated the Mapam back then. He opposed the conspiracy of Isser Harel's fascist secret service in causing a split in the Mapam and was famously wiretapped by the Shin Bet:

"A group of extreme Leftists had been set up in heart of Mapam," Iser says, "and ... [t]he Mapam leaders did not know of this group, whose leader was Moshe Sneh, the former chief of Haganah. Apparently the Soviet Embassy was directing by remote control a subversive plan which the ... communist groups inside Mapam were putting into execution.... To me, Mapam was first and foremost a Zionist party, and I made up my mind to stop its drift toward communism. Through a friend I informed Meir Ya'ari about the conspiracy that was going on behind his back."

Meir Ya'ari, however, violently objected to Iser Harel's interference. Shin-Bet, therefore, decided to keep a close watch on the activities of the communist faction inside Mapam, and that was why the mike had been installed in Ya'ari's office [to surveil Ya'ari and his comrades].

(Spies in the Promised Land: Iser Harel and the Israeli Secret Service, Michael Bar-Zohar, 1972, pp. 128-129) (IMG)

Then, in 1952 and 1953, a new series of problems arose in the Mapam. The Prague Trials of 1952 and the Doctors' Plot case in 1952-1953 were absolutely necessary for purging off the Zionist agents of the Anglo-American secret services in Eastern Europe, but such purges, while increasing communist soft power influence in the Arab countries, were also utilized as pretexts by the Ben-Gurion faction for condemning the socialist forces. A vicious propaganda campaign by Israel's regime began, with the partial objective of driving a wedge between the people of Israel and the USSR, and engineering a split within the Mapam. The Mapam leader Dr. Moshe Sneh, the Haganah commander who sided with the USSR against Anglo-American imperialism, supported the anti-Titoist purges of Prague Trials. In an article titled 'Israel is in Danger', Moshe Sneh wrote:

And the Soviet Union, and together with it the people's democracies, and the Czechoslovak People's Democracy among them—they were the ones who extended to the Jewish people full assistance to set up its own state in Israel. In the two most violent and most fateful occurrences in Jewish history—in the attempt to destroy the Jewish people and in the struggle for its establishment—it was the Communist world, and the Soviet Union at its head, which showed and proved that it and only it was a true friend of the Jewish people, as of all the nations of the world. And every "explanation" that the Prague trial shows, so to speak, that "Communism is the enemy of the Jewish people" or of the state of Israel or of the liberation movement of our people, is no more than a malevolent libel and a lying slander.

The fact that the government of Israel has harnessed itself to the chariot of American imperialism, the speeches of Sharett and Eban and Ben Gurion, which are laden with hate, and spread enmity to the Soviet Union and to Communism – could produce no other effect. Therefore, we cannot react to the Prague trial in partnership with the enemies of socialism in Israel. And their attempts by word and deed, to turn those in Israel who are loyal to socialism against the strongholds of socialism in the world and to cut us off from the world revolutionary camp, of which we are an inseparable part, will not succeed.

If you want to know what is the true psychical cause of the anti-Communist outburst in the Knesset, on the "Voice of Israel," and in the bourgeois Mapai press, you have only to listen to the outpouring of love and to the glorification which Ben Gurion, and Namir and Labun and Livneh and Begin pour out to the betrayers of communism: to Trotsky and Bukharin, to Kamenyev and Zinovyev, to Tito, Rykov and Kostov, to Slansky and Clementis. What hymns of praise did the ministers and spokesmen of Mapai sing about each one of these whose liquidation saved a socialist state from destruction!

('ISRAEL IS IN DANGER: The hysteria in Israel about socialist "anti-Semitism" is being fed by bourgeois Israeli leaders to cover up the critical situation there', Dr. Moshe Sneh, March 1953, p. 2) (IMG)

The Mapam had been waging a revolutionary class struggle on the side of the USSR and the progressive revolutionary forces in the Arab world against the CIA-MI6 puppet regime headed by Ben-Gurion. The Soviets and the Czechoslovaks were hunting down the agents of the Ben-Gurion faction. Was this strike against the Mossad in Eastern Europe not a step towards the liberation of Israel from the Anglo-American puppet regime and the elevation of the socialist forces in Israel? Was this not what the Mapam too would have desired? Alas, the relentless propaganda campaign of the Ben-Gurion faction partially worked, the Prague Trials were denounced as 'anti-Semitic' by Mapam's party organs, the philosophy of Zionism was placed above scientific socialism, and a reactionary tide against the Moshe Sneh faction began. To this anti-Soviet grouping joined Ya'ari and Ya'akov Hazan, neither of whom, to the best of my knowledge, were genuinely anti-Soviet. They joined this grouping as 'stay-behind' forces: if you cannot beat the reactionary tide, join the reactionary tide, and take leadership of the reactionary tide, so that you may sabotage and slow down the reactionary tide. Since Sneh was going to be ousted anyways, it was better that people with views similar to those of Sneh take leadership (or mis-leadership) of the movement against Sneh. Ya'ari and Hazan chose to be those individuals. They were to pretend to side with Zionist reaction against the socialist forces. In reality, behind the scenes, Hazan and Ya'ari seem to have been loyal to the socialist forces. Hazan himself had shown the degree of his strategic affiliation with the anti-imperialist forces:

At a concentrated seminar held in the late 1950s, attended by security personnel from Kibbutz HaArtzi and Hakibbutz Hameuchad, Hazan said that Mapam sees itself as committed to the Soviet Union. He gave an interesting example: if the Soviet Union requests Israel to refrain, for strategic reasons, from building a deep-water port in Haifa, Mapam must grant the request, even if Israel's economic interest requires the construction of such a port. (Hazan: Movement of Life, Yad Izhak Ben-Zvi Institute, Ze'ev Tzahor, 1997, p. 199) (IMG)

Although Hazan was speaking of the Khrushchev-era 'Soviet Union', the above quote was in line with the Mapam's previous behaviour of blocking the strategic objectives of the Ben-Gurion regime and promoting the cause of the socialist-oriented forces in the region. In response to Khrushchev's 1956 Titoization speech denouncing Stalin, Meir Ya'ari defended the legacy of the Stalin-era purges, stating that some 'mistakes' by Stalin do not tarnish the entire legacy of Stalin. Ya'ari expressed these points in his usual rabbinical way. The Israeli Likudnik media outlet 'Mida' stated:

The interesting thing is that the shock waves from Khrushchev's speech began operating in Israel within a week or so of the incident; Long before the spies did their thing. Discussions at the top of Mapam, the buzz around the 20th conference, began in the first days of March, and there were also some discussions led by Mapam (Hashomer Hatzair) at the end of March. The shock waves did not wait for the full content of the speech to be published in the New York Times in June.

A strategy of [psychological] containing, denial, and holding the stick at both ends was activated, mainly by Mapam leader Meir Yaari, who refused to draw conclusions [against Stalin and the USSR]. "We have not cultivated ... a blind admiration for Stalin," he claimed. "In any case, do not let [Stalin] be forgotten as one of the fathers of socialism." He reminded ordinary members, especially in the kibbutzim, that "the guillotine also operated in the French Revolution." "An entire generation died in the wilderness to save the tablets of the covenant," he said. (...). "Without the severity of the dictatorship [of the proletariat], it would not have been possible to carry out the revolution and establish it at home and abroad," he continued to justify Stalin's work. And most importantly: "Do not pour the baby with the bath water!"

In spite of the relentless propaganda campaign, the Mapam members and leaders continued to honor the USSR and expressed hope that the IDF would become an Israeli Red Army in the tradition of the Palmach:

On the anniversary of the October Revolution, November 7, 1952, Mapam's central committee said in a greeting address to the Israeli soldiers: "Let us remember the Red Army of liberation and fight for the transformation of our own forces into a People's Red Army in the noble tradition of the Palmach." Neither the Prague trials, nor the wave of [supposed/alleged] anti-Semitism that followed them in November 1952, nor the trial of the doctors in Moscow in January 1953 could shatter the mystical faith of Mapam. On the day Stalin died, one of Mapam's leaders delivered a public oration in Tel Aviv, in which he said: "If there is one grave in the world to which the Jewish people ought to make grateful pilgrimage, it is Joseph Stalin's." (Spies in the Promised Land: Iser Harel and the Israeli Secret Service, Michael Bar-Zohar, 1972, pp. 127-128) (IMG)

Nonetheless, the Mapam ceased to be effective as a political party since late 1952 onwards. Indeed, from that time onwards, the Mapam as a party became a small party. Instead, it began to operate more so as a powerful intelligence network with agents in the highest ranks of the Israeli regime apparatus. Yisrael Bar, Shimon Avidan, Moshe Sneh, Yisrael Galili, Shlomo Argov, Haim Bar-Lev, David Eleazar, Yigal Allon, Nahum Admoni, Yitzhak Hofi, and Yitzhak Rabin were among the major Mapam-Palmach agents in Israel's security, intelligence, and military bodies. These individuals had been chiefs of the IDF, Mossad, Israeli embassies, government ministries, Prime Ministry, etc. As indicated elsewhere, their leader was Rabin, who, as Israel's 'Last Stalinist', died in the 1990s, when the communist forces were at their weakest and American imperialism at its strongest.

C16S7. The Lehi-Soviet-Mapam Connection and the Palmach's Armed Struggle against the Irgun

As is well-known, the Lehi, or 'Fighters for the Freedom of Israel', was initially a Nazi Zionist terror gang led by Avram Stern, an Israelite who sought cooperation with Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany. In those years, the Lehi, an eclectic organization, admired Hitler and Gandhi for their 'struggle' 'against' the British colonizers. Yet, during the Second World War, Avram Stern was eliminated and the Lehi cadres were decimated. Such a decimation of the fascist faction allowed the pro-Soviet operatives to penetrate the Lehi and to give the Soviet-backed progressive tendency a significant voice in that fascist terror organization. Nonetheless, a powerful fascist faction remained, capable of carrying out massacres such as the Deir Yassin massacre.

Having come under the partial influence of the pro-Soviet elements, the Lehi denounced the partition of Palestine, to which it referred as the colonial partition of Eretz Yisrael, called for an Israeli alliance with the USSR against the British Empire, played down the hostility with the Arabs, and called for respect for the Arab nation as a friend and ally against British colonialism. Uri Milstein – the prominent Jabotinskyite historian, a genocidally anti-Arab and anti-Soviet author, and an IDF official affiliated with the faction of Ariel Sharon and Rafael Eitan – did some interesting research on the history of the Lehi. Below are excerpts of his research:

The ideological component was represented by a former member of the center, Dr. Israel Shaiv (Eldad), the chief ideologue and publicist in the HaMaas newspaper. The next day, November 29, Eldad wrote openly: "The division of the Land of Israel by the UN resolution – in addition to the first division by Britain in 1922 – is a crime against the geographical and economic truth of the land and a robbery against the Hebrew people." The sympathy for the "World of Tomorrow" [i.e. Hebrew euphemism for the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies] was represented by Natan Friedman-Yellin (Yellin-Mor), who saw the Soviet Union as an ally in the fight against Great Britain. After all, an excerpt from a booklet published by Lehi, "A Reply to Esther Vilenska" (Vilenska wrote an article condemning Lehi in the communist newspaper "Kol Ha'am"), in Elul 5777 (August – September 1947) was as follows: "Our interests are against war in the world. And therefore the Soviet Union is our ally. Where does the Soviet Union meet us? In the need to take the entire Middle East, or part of it, out of the hands of imperialism and its feudal servants. The Soviet Union is interested in a free population in a country with developed industrial development, with a free working class, that will not allow the country to be turned into an anti-Soviet imperialist base. Of all the factors in the Middle East, the Hebrew people are the strongest and most reliable factor for such a guarantee. The Hebrew nation concentrated in the Land of Israel is an objective and necessary ally for Soviet Russia, for its peace and security from the south. It is a strong force against all Arab Quislings. Soviet Russia is interested in world peace and the freedom of nations. It is an objective ally of the Hebrew people." (...). The heads of the Lehi believed that the Arabs of the Middle East were their potential allies in the anti-imperialist struggle. Even though the rulers of the Arab countries still do not understand the identity of the interests, they will.

"We do not recognize any Arab-Palestinian people. There is one great Arab nation, which is in the process of awakening and self-recognition. The Arabs of Israel are part of the same nation, just as the Hungarians living in Romania are part of the Hungarian people and not a separate people.... We recognize the Arabs who live in this land, who are part of the great Arab nation, which resides in the Middle East, in Saudi Arabia, Iraq and Syria.... Admittedly, between us and the Arab leadership, which still dominates the opinion of the Arab public in the overwhelming majority, there is a fight. The quarrel is over the right of political sovereignty over the land.... The Arabs of the land are our rival, for the time being. But the British in Israel are an enemy to all of us. With the Arabs of the country, we must and are entitled to reach an agreement, a political discussion. With the British in Israel, any agreement, any law, any negotiation, any contact, except contact with arms, are invalid. This position of ours is in complete contrast to the position of the Haganah, which sees England as a rival and the Arabs as an enemy.... Just an Arab is a resident of this country and should not be harmed. There is no [desire on the part of Lehi for] war against him. Only the Brit is the representative of the enemy. He himself is an enemy, a stranger here. He is not innocent. His very being here is an international crime, a political crime, a moral crime, in addition to the long list of practical crimes committed by him day in and day out. He is an enemy, his sentence is death. This is the difference, and these are the conclusions."

(The Truth About the War of Independence, Chapter 31: Was the leader of Lehi a Soviet agent?, Uri Milstein, October 28, 2016. News1. Bold and underline added.) (IMG)

The Lehi, an eclectic organization made up of communist agents, pro-communist progressives, and fascists, was constantly facing internal struggles. On the one hand, shortly prior to the start of the War of Independence, under the influence of the pro-communist contingent led by Yellin-Mor, the Lehi denounced war with the Arabs:

In October 1947, a month before the outbreak of the War of Independence, Yisrael Eldad wrote in "Ha-Maas" that the Land of Israel should be saved from "the fate of India", that is, from a war between Jews and Arabs: The choice is: British bloodshed today, or Jewish and Arab bloodshed tomorrow".

Nonetheless, Yisrael Eldad later recounted that after the assassination in Hawaii, in August 1947, he demanded that the Lehi Secretariat expand the organization's news and operations department toward the Arab front. But Yellin-Moore objected, saying, "There will be no Arab front." After years, Eldad hit on a sin: "The idea of neutralizing the Middle East interfered with the realistic vision of our organization's members. It blinded Friedman's eyes. All preparations for the Arab front were not made."

(The Truth About the War of Independence, Chapter 31: Was the leader of Lehi a Soviet agent?, Uri Milstein, October 28, 2016. News1. Bold and underline added.) (IMG)

Nonetheless, by the time of the War of Independence, the Lehi was factionalized into the pro-Irgun elements and the Lehi soldiers who fought in the Palmach. In April 1948, the fascist faction of the Lehi, to which Yitzhak Shamir and secretly also Yisrael Eldad belonged, committed a major massacre in Deir Yassin in collaboration with Irgun. The US intelligence station in Jerusalem reported:

431. Early morning April 9 combined force Irgun and Stern Gang numbering over 100 attacked Arab village, Deir Yasin, several miles west Jerusalem. Attackers killed 250 persons of whom half, by their own admission to American correspondents, were women and children. Attack carried out in connection battle now still in progress between Arabs Jews on roads leading to Jerusalem from Tel Aviv. Arab reaction to attack has been violent and emotions, already at high pitch following death April 8 of Abdul Kader Hussein (Arab Jerusalem commander) during Arab attempt retake village captured by Haganah, now at bursting point. Officer ConGen visiting Hussein Khalidi, secretary Arab Higher Executive, April 11, found him still trembling with rage and emotion and referring to attack as "worst Nazi tactic". (867N.01/4-1348: Telegram, The Consul at Jerusalem (Wasson) to the Secretary of State, Confidential, Jerusalem, April 13, 1948, 5 PM. In: 'Foreign Relations of the United States, 1948, Near East, South Asia, and Africa: Part 2', US State Department, p. 817) (IMG)

Such a major crime by the Lehi's fascists was condemned by Natan Yellin-Mor, the leader of the pro-communist, pro-Soviet, and Arab-friendly contingent in the Lehi:

Even more significant are his views on the Arab question. Indeed, during the course of his address Friedman-Yellin for the first time revealed his differences with Eldad and Zetler over Deir Yasin. The path to a new age in the Middle East, he implied, was not to be sought by such actions, but by giving encouragement to the establishment of socialist and neutral states in Arab lands. ('The Stern Gang: Ideology, Politics and Terror, 1940-1949', Joseph Heller, 1995, p. 276) (IMG)

The voice of Yellin-Mor represented the majority in the Lehi. Indeed, in a party meeting, the majority voted for Yellin-Mor's program, which envisioned closer ties to the Mapam-Palmach, opposition to the Anglo-American imperialist presence in the Middle East, and the call for an anti-colonial struggle for the eventual establishment of a socialist state in Israel and other Middle Eastern countries. In contradiction to the fascist faction of the Lehi, it did not call for 'population transfers', the chauvinist program by which the Arabs of Palestine would be expelled to the Arab countries in 'exchange' for the Mizrahim of the Arab world. Set within the context of the post-1948-war period, when the progressive factions in Syria and Lebanon had been decimated, the majority program in the Lehi called for the revolutionary overthrow of the reactionary regimes of the Arab countries surrounding Israel. Anyways, Heller, the prominent scholar on the Lehi, wrote:

On the organisational question, too, Friedman-Yellin expressed definite views. Convinced that a 'club' was not enough ('we also need an instrument'), Friedman-Yellin was far more optimistic than Eldad. Although he did not, on this occasion, speak of the impending disintegration of the large parties, he did speak of the possibility of an association with Mapam ('the camp containing the Palmach'). Altogether, 'even though few in number, we must strive for expansion ... it will bring closer the day of the entire homeland's liberation'. Although the speakers seem to have been divided more by organisational issues than by those of ideology, the 'political committee' of the conference presented two separate resolutions. The first, tabled by Friedman-Yellin, voiced the views of the majority and received 14 votes; the second, tabled by Eldad, received only six votes.

It is interesting to compare these two resolutions with Lehi's previous programme. The majority decision, for instance, certainly leaned far more to the left wing of the party than had the earlier document. Thus it made no reference to 'historical natural' borders, instead it employed the new phrase 'the entire homeland' (but did retain the reference to Uri Zvi Greenberg's call for Hebrew 'mastery' (adnut)). On the other hand, the resolution was far more specific in its call for the establishment of a 'socialist' regime (whereas the July programme had spoken of 'national ownership of the country's resources and means of production'). Similarly, the new resolution spoke of the 'identity' between the workers' struggle for their true interests and the national fight for political liberation. Some of these changes might have been generated by a wish to draw somewhat closer to Mapam, as may have been also the explicit reference to the Histadrut as 'the sole unit of professional organisation'. Whatever the case, it is also noteworthy that the new resolution had some significant omissions: no mention was made of the pronounced right-wing call for population exchanges; the code-word 'neutralisation' was absent and the notion was only alluded to; similarly dropped (perhaps under Shamir's influence) was the original programme's reference to an alliance with 'the eastern bloc'. (...). In the plenum, too, Eldad was defeated. The majority resolution was passed by 49 votes to 13 (with 25 abstentions); the minority resolution was defeated by 41 to 19 (with 27 abstentions). Eldad took his defeat badly. (...). The remainder of the conference was devoted to the passage of largely ceremonial resolutions. These spoke of the dangers inherent in the spread of British imperialism and of the American economic monopoly; deplored the UN armistice commission as an imperialist tool and the plan to form regional blocs under NATO influence as a threat which could involve Israel in war; rejected the armistice agreements signed with the neighbouring Arab countries, since they had forfeited portions of the homeland to 'backward' regimes which were tools in the enemy's hands; called on the Arab masses to bring down their 'enslaving' governments; expressed horror at the anti-Jewish persecutions in Arab lands (but did not call for population transfers, only for the free immigration of Jews to Israel); expressed sorrow at the 'impediments' which in the 'People's democracies' lands had been placed on the free immigration of Jews to Israel; supported the settlement of barren land; and protested at the continued retention of the emergency decrees.

Milstein, who claimed to have contacts with Yellin-Mor, wrote:

In the perspective of 68 years, Natan Yellin-Mor functioned in the style of a Soviet agent of influence, his attitudes and behavior were almost identical to the attitudes and behavior of the Soviet agent, Moshe Sneh. No documents in this direction were revealed about Yellin-Mor, neither in the archives of the Soviet Union after its fall, nor in the Israel Defense Forces. Neither did the Shai members testify about suspicions against him, as they testified about suspicions against Sneh. But not only his positions, but also the way in which the Soviets allowed him to reach Israel strengthens these assumptions about him. For the record, I was friends with Yellin-Mor, and in the 1960s I published lists under the pen name "Uri Sa'ar" in the biweekly Etgar that he edited. I was also in contact with Moshe Sneh, and I had a long conversation with both of them. In light of their intense activity to remove Britain not only from the Land of Israel but also from the Middle East, and in light of their desire for Israel to belong to the Soviet bloc and not the American bloc, at the beginning of the Cold War, the possibility that one of the leaders of the Jewish People served Soviet interests should not be ruled out. The claim in his book that the alternative he proposed had a chance is totally unfounded, if not cynical, because not only would most Israeli Arabs have rejected it, but so would most Jews. And without these two publics it is baseless and delusional speculation. (The Truth About the War of Independence, Chapter 31: Was the leader of Lehi a Soviet agent?, Uri Milstein, October 28, 2016. News1. Bold and underline added.) (IMG)

There has indeed been much speculation and suspicion about ‘the way in which the Soviets allowed [Yellin-Mor] to reach Israel’. The circumstances of his arrival in Israel are unclear. Nonetheless, the CIA and the US State Department regarded the movement which Yellin-Mor as a Soviet-backed cause. According to the US intelligence, the Lehi was funded by the Soviets. In November 1947, the CIA reported:

Recent reports confirm the fact that the Stern gang has connections with the USSR, which is furnishing it with money. The organization has stated that it considers a turn towards Soviet Russia necessary because of the present world situation. It explains that the USSR and the Stern Ganga both desire the creation of a “strong and independent Palestine” which would constitute a rampart against British “imperialist designs” but would “not be hostile” to the Soviet Union. (THE CONSEQUENCE OF THE PARTITION OF PALESTINE, ORE 55, CIA, November 28, 1947, p. 14) (IMG)

In June 1948, the US intelligence station in Jerusalem reported:

Various sources indicate that guidance, money and arms were being provided to Stern gang by Russia through Satellites particularly Poland. Polish Consulates in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv are believed to be in close touch with Stern gang and its commanders Nathan Friedman Yellin and deputy Dr. Israel Scheib. It is also believed Russia will make every effort widen this support as effective means of gaining subversive foothold in Israel. While reports have been received that Menachem Beigin, Commander of IZL, has ordered his followers to orient themselves toward Russian recognition of [and Russian support of Jewish State, no concrete evidence is available to substantiate report. (867N.01/6-2448: Telegram, The Vice Consul at Jerusalem (Burdett) to the Secretary of State, Secret, Jerusalem, June 24, 1948. In: ‘Foreign Relations of the United States, 1948, Near East, South Asia, and Africa: Part 2’, US State Department, p. 1142) (IMG)

That Begin was funded by the Soviets was a lie, about which Begin himself joked in his memoirs. It is difficult to confirm how accurate the reports of Soviet funding for the Lehi are. Nonetheless, they have been provided here for reference. Undoubtedly, the Soviets would have liked to support the pro-communist faction of the Lehi, officially headed by Natan Yellin-Mor. Almost a decade later, Yellin-Mor founded the party ‘Ha-Peulah Ha-Shemit’ or ‘Semitic Action’, a post-Zionist, pro-Nasserist, communist-inspired organization that called for the unification of the Arab, Hebrew, and Abyssinian peoples into a pan-Semitic federation in ‘clash’ with the colonial powers. The movement publicly declared support for the FLN and established the ‘Israeli Committee for a Free Algeria’. Exotic and sexy though Ha-Peulah Ha-Shemit may sound, one must exercise caution about it, not just because it promoted eclectic and idealistic rhetoric but also for its membership. The movement also had such co-leaders as the Irgun operative Uri Avnery, a rather questionable ‘progressive’ close to the Palestinian terror godfather Yasser Arafat Abu Ammar and close to the Nazi agent Anwar Sadat. Avnery opposed Hafez Al-Assad’s policy of ruthlessly suppressing the Palestinian terrorists and advocated an IDF strike against Syria as assistance to the Palestinian ‘freedom-fighter’ death squads. These facts of course do not discredit the entirety of the Ha-Peulah Ha-Shemit; Avnery could not, on his own, spoil an entire movement and Yellin-Mor reportedly had conflicts with Uri Avnery. Nonetheless, Avnery’s role in this movement is alarming and calls for vigilance.

Back to Lehi in the 1940s. Lord Moyne, a sworn enemy of the Israeli proletariat and kibbutzniks, aimed to establish an ostensibly ‘independent’ State of Israel which would then be subjugated to a Hashemite monarcho-fascist ‘Greater Syrian Federation’:

Moyne’s reputation amongst the Jews was that he was generally hostile to the Zionist cause. In a debate in the House of Lords in June 1942, Moyne had made a speech which was, indeed, highly antagonistic. He stated that neither the Mandate nor the Balfour Declaration had intended Palestine ‘to be converted into a Jewish State against the will of the Arab population’. He opposed ‘the racial domination by the newcomers over the original inhabitants’, and turned the ‘Nazi’ epithet back on the Zionists – ‘If a comparison is to be made with the Nazis, it is surely those who wish to force an imported regime upon the Arab population who are guilty of aggression and domination.’ What is more, Moyne’s interest in anthropology seemingly led him to make racist observations, such as when he remarked that the Arabs were the real Semites and referred to the ‘Armenoid features’ of Sephardi Jews and the ‘Slav blood’ of the Ashkenazim. Yet privately, Moyne had advocated the establishment of a partitioned Jewish state attached to a Greater Syrian Federation. Several historians have argued that, ironically, if Moyne had lived, the State of Israel may well have come into existence in 1945.

The Labour Zionist leadership were aghast at the assassination, not simply because it marked a different set of mores, but because of the political implications, since Moyne was a minister of state and a close friend of Churchill.

(The Land Beyond Promise: Israel, Likud and the Zionist Dream, Colin Schindler, 2002, p. 178) (IMG)

Note that the 'Greater Syrian Federation' did not mean mainland-Syrian leadership of the Levant region but rather was aimed at ensuring an MI6-backed Hashemite Jordanian monarcho-fascist domination of the Levant. Hashemite pan-Syrianism had the support of the British Empire:

Egyptian opposition to Bernadotte Plan has greatly increased due to widely held belief that British support for plan is based principally on desire secure merger Arab Palestine and Transjordan as step in enlarging their sphere of influence and toward creation Greater Syria. (501.BB Palestine/10-1348: Telegram, The Ambassador ;n Egypt (Griffis) to the Acting Secretary of State, Cairo, October 13, 1948. In: 'Foreign Relations of the United States, 1948', Vol. 5, Part 2, US Department of State, 1976, p. 1471) (IMG)

In the meantime, the Amir Abdallah of Transjordan, under the stimulus of Iraq's Arab unity plan, had intensified his own campaign for a Greater Syria oriented toward Jordan. This project of Abdallah's -- like that of Iraq -- was motivated by a long-standing resolution to restore the Hashimite rule over Syria which had collapsed when the French drove Abdallah's brother Faysal from Damascus in July 1920. (Disunity Among the Arab States: The Hashemite Controversy and Arab Palestine, Intelligence Report, Office of Intelligence Research, Department of State, November 24, 1954, p. 4) (IMG)

The 'independent' State of Israel, which could have come to existence in 1945 through the Churchill-Moyne plan, would have been colonially dependent on Jordan, and thus not bearing real independence. Openly supporting the establishment of even a pseudo-independent Israel, however, would have antagonized Moyne in the Arab public, rendering his contacts with the Hashemite monarchy in Jordan more difficult. As such and as mentioned above, publicly, Moyne pretended to be on the side of 'the Arabs' -- the reactionaries among the Arabs -- and 'against' the idea of a pseudo-independent Israel.

The Moyne plan, which was also the Churchill Plan later renamed as the Bernadotte Plan, was an MI6 conspiracy against the region. Nonetheless, the assassination of Lord Moyne was a reckless adventure out of the trouble of which the progressive forces in the Lehi got out solely by fortune. The Mapai, the party of Ben-Gurion and Moshe Dayan, would have liked to crack down on the perpetrators of the assassination. Had the progressive forces in the Lehi not been so fortunate to receive the Palmach's protection, they would have been quickly crushed. Yet, the Palmach agents protected the Lehi and instead canalized the crackdown away from targeting the Lehi and onto combat against the Jabotinskyite fascist terror group, Irgun, led by Menachem Begin. Thus began 'La saison', 'The Season', the Mapam-Palmach military campaign against the Jabotinskyites. A thesis paper by a scholar affiliated with and writing for the US Naval Postgraduate School (NPS), drawing from Israel's experience of disbanding such independent militant groups, aimed to present the US military with options for unifying the militia forces in Iraq and 'stabilizing' the Iraqi military. On the campaign against the Irgun, the paper stated, with reference to the period immediately after the Moyne assassination,:

In September 1944, Moshe Sneh, the commander of Haganah along with another Haganah leader, Eliyahu Golomb, participated in two meetings with Menachem Begin, the leader of the Irgun. The Haganah commanders told Begin that the actions of the Irgun and Stern Gang were not sanctioned by the Jewish community, Haganah or the Jewish Agency, and ordered him to cease the attacks immediately or face civil war and military elimination. Begin attempted to dissuade the Haganah leaders for two months from attacking a fellow Jewish militia, but the assassination of Lord Moyne by members of the Stern Gang resulted in immediate offensive actions by Haganah against both the Stern Gang and the Irgun.

Moyne's assassination in Cairo on November 6, 1944 dealt a major blow to ongoing negotiations between British and the Haganah over their possible integration as a legitimate security force in conjunction with the British occupation. Soon after the assassination, Winston Churchill proclaimed: "If our dreams for Zionism are to end in the smoke of assassins' pistols and our labours for its future are to produce a new set of gangsters...many like myself will have to reconsider the position we have maintained so consistently and so long in the past." The Haganah also immediately condemned the assassination and produced a plan, which involved the collaboration with British police and military, to capture members of the Irgun and Stern Gang. The Haganah's intelligence branch, the Shai, amassed over 250 names, and the Palmach was employed to kidnap suspects and turn them over to British authorities. The Jewish Agency also established a Department of Special Assignments designed to cooperate with the British Intelligence in collecting information on suspected Irgun members. The Season drew to a close in March 1945, when the Haganah abandoned the kidnapping of Irgun and Stern Gang members in response to condemnation by the Jewish community. Joint British-Haganah operations of the Hunting Season resulted in the detention of over 1,000 suspected members with hundreds deported to detention camps in Africa, while severely limiting offensive operations of the Irgun and Stern Gang. This resulted in seven months of increased security and stability. However they did not eliminate the more radical militias.

('U.S. Post-Conflict Integration Policy of Militias in Iraq', Naval Postgraduate School (NPS) - Monterey, California. Calhoun: The NPS Institutional Archive, James J. Smith, March 2008, pp. 81-82) (IMG)

Actually, the military campaign of the Haganah was launched almost exclusively against the Irgun, and not the Lehi. This was thanks to the lobby of Haganah General Eliyahu Golomb, a leader of the Achdut Ha-Avoda which would later merge with other parties to constitute the Mapam. The Lehi's commander-in-chief Nathan Friedman, known more commonly as Natan Yellin-Mor, headed a pro-Soviet, Arab-friendly, and pro-communist current in the Lehi. He met Eliyahu Golomb and ostensibly 'threatened' the latter that the Lehi would take action against the Haganah if harmed. Supposedly, Golomb was 'scared' off by this threat and thus was ostensibly 'forced' to lobby for the Haganah campaign to be directed merely against the Irgun and not against the actual planners of the Moyne assassination. A prominent scholar on the Lehi wrote:

On the day of the assassination, the leadership of the Yishuv met in special session, where a decision was taken to co-operate fully with the authorities against the 'dissidents' in what was to be termed the 'saison'. The prime target was the larger organisation, which - after their meeting with Begin - Sneh and Golomb considered to be the greater danger to the 'organised Yishuv'. In fact, the Haganah kidnapped dozens of IZL members and only one Lehi member; moreover, while 700 IZL names were handed over to the authorities, no Lehi name is known to have been communicated. Eldad, who was then in prison, thought (as did the IZL internees) that Friedman Yellin and Shamir had managed to frighten the Haganah. What he did not then know was that Lehi and the Haganah had in fact reached some form of agreement, formulated when Friedman-Yellin met Golomb in the wake of the kidnapping of 'Todi' Pelion 16 December 1944. The meeting had not been an easy one (as is illustrated by the fact that Friedman-Yellin placed a gun on the table); as he was later to recall, Friedman-Yellin considered himself to be caught in 'an awful dilemma'. He wanted at all costs to avoid a civil war, but nevertheless felt duty-bound to warn Golomb that Lehi would fight to the bitter end if it had to. Ultimately, and contrary to Eldad's later charges, Friedman-

Yellin did not mean to implement a full 'union' with the Haganah, and any assurance that he might have given to that effect was merely tactical. He did, however, promise to refrain from further actions while Hakim and Bet Tsouri were still awaiting trial and (in response to a direct question from Golomb) not to make any attempts on Churchill's life. However, there was to be no relaxation in Lehi's ideological struggle. Lehi was even more insistent than the IZL in denouncing the 'saison' and in castigating its perpetrators as 'Quislings', 'collaborators' and 'informers'. ('The Stern Gang: Ideology, Politics and Terror, 1940-1949', Joseph Heller, 1995, p. 138) (IMG)

In reality, contrary to the Lehi narrative, there likely was no real 'threat' against Golomb. Golomb and Yellin-Mor had a 'personal relationship' and 'a common line'. In an interview years later, Natan Yellin-Mor recalled:

Q. Regarding the relationship with the Haganah, the beginning of 1942, from the small video, the persecution of your people and the hunt for them, and then during the great season, the Haganah did not persecute the people of Lehi. In general, we hear and read with great interest about the ... Golomb affair and it seems to us that there is a unique relationship between Lehi and the Haganah.

A. First of all, there were personal relationships between Eliyahu Golomb and me. We both had a common line in that neither of us got into a fight, even the most difficult things we said quietly and anyway we didn't come to a dead end soon. Apart from that, I told in the first book that ... I met with Eliyahu Golomb, it was a rather difficult conversation, but I think this conversation was important. I wasn't interested in the war over existence, on the contrary, it was something that haunted me like a nightmare because I knew that even if we managed to hit the Haganah hard, they would hurt us more, and our damage to the Haganah would weaken the main force that eventually join the war, to fight the British.

Q. You saw in Haganah the military arm of the Jewish Agency's organized settlement of the collaborators with the British.

A. On the other hand, I was very careful not to create in Eliyahu Golomb's heart the impression that if they hurt us, we will pass in silence so that there will not be a fratricidal war. We said the opposite, I said and emphasized and conveyed by message to the defense headquarters in Latrun, that this time and in the future we will not pass by in silence for harming us, that we will fight against the foreign government and whoever stands in our way, we will also fight him because it is our duty to defend ourselves.

('Natan Yellin-Mor Tells about His Background', Interviewer: Yehuda Kaveh (from 'Kol Yisrael'), Interviewee: Natan Friedman Yellin-Mor, lehi.org.il) (IMG)

Haganah General Eliyahu Golomb was a leader of Achdut Ha-Avoda, which would later merge with the Poale Tzion Smol and Hashomer Hatzair to form the Mapam. Golomb has been described as a leader who drew inspiration both from right-wing circles and from the Soviet Union, making him the Lehi's preferred eclectic candidate to negotiate with. The Lehi itself received financial support from the Soviet secret service, according to the CIA. The pro-communist current in the Lehi, officially headed by Yellin-Mor, called for cooperation with the Palmach and the Mapam. The Mapam and the pro-Soviet faction of the Lehi were de facto allies. In light of such parallels and connections, it is highly unlikely that Yellin-Mor would have ever seriously threatened Golomb. More likely, the case was rather a collusion between the pro-Soviet commanders in the Haganah and the pro-Soviet commanders of the Lehi with the objective of jointly undermining the Irgun. The Irgun command's assessment of the situation as no significantly different. "Lehi's true colours," reported Heller describing the Irgun command's views, "had been shown during the 'saison', when its leadership – unlike the IZL – had bowed to the Haganah's ultimatum and agreed ... effectively maintaining a cease-fire for an entire year" (p. 159). Thus was unleashed the campaign against the Irgun. The Palmach warriors went ahead for the 'Hunting Season' against the Jabotinskyite terror network. They hunted 'Irgun people, removed Irgun wall posters, protected people who had been threatened by the Irgun, and beat, kidnapped, and arrested Irgun personnel, hiding them in prearranged sites, including kibbutzim':

In the fall of 1944 young men wearing khaki and high boots began appearing in the cities. This marked the beginning of the "hunting season," the saison. They trailed Irgun people, removed Irgun wall posters, protected people who had been threatened by the Irgun, and beat, kidnapped, and arrested Irgun personnel, hiding them in prearranged sites, including kibbutzim. These operations were conducted by the Palmach and the Haganah's security service. More than 200, perhaps 300, Palmach members were recruited for the operation. All the commanders were from the Palmach. In short order the Irgun's archives and arms caches were uncovered. Its apparatus was broken and its ability to raise money dried up.

Palmach members who were involved took pride in their operational ability and military prowess. Allon, the Palmach commander, said that in all the reports from the field there was not a single case in which an operation against the Irgun ended in failure. The Palmach seemed intent on taking the opportunity to demonstrate at long last its military skills.

(The Making of Israeli Militarism, Indiana University Press, Uri Ben-Eliezer, 1998, p. 120) (IMG)

Subsequently, the Mapai, the party of the Kautskyite agents of the Anglo-American secret services, lobbied to ensure that the Irgun terrorists would be handed over to the British police. This measure was outrageous since Menachem Begin, a member of the Betar, had been commander of the MI6-run Anders Army in the 1940s, and had become the commander of the Irgun only upon allowance by the Anders Army hence by the MI6. Seeking to ensure a real prosecution of the Irgun terrorists, the Palmach was opposed to this measure advocated by the Mapai:

The Palmach at first objected to the idea of turning over Irgun members to the British. Allon, the Palmach commander, proposed a one-time operation to arrest 300 Irgun activists. (...). The Palmach's opposition to handing over Irgun people put to the test the leadership's power and authority. At the heart of the conflict between the Palmach and the leadership were two conflicting principles. (The Making of Israeli Militarism, Indiana University Press, Uri Ben-Eliezer, 1998, pp. 121-122) (IMG)

Although, due to the Mapai lobby, the efforts of the Palmach against the Irgun were being undermined, the Palmach nonetheless successfully continued its campaign of capturing the weapons caches of the Irgun and decimating the latter's capability to propagate their fascist views:

The saison afforded the Palmach an opportunity to show its stuff. Some Palmach personnel were cited for their fine work, and a report of the Haganah's intelligence service enumerated the Palmach's achievements: most Irgun branches were eliminated, its arms caches were depleted, its operational ability was paralyzed, its influence on the young generation declined, its members' arrogance was tempered, and many were turned over to the British police.⁵⁴ The effective blow to the breakaways gave the Palmach a stamp of approval for its military way. So when the order came from above to end the saison, bitter complaints were voiced in the organization: Why? After all, the Irgun has not been totally liquidated. The frustration was palpable in a song aimed at the leadership: "Listen, liquidation is a pipe dream, / Don't believe what you might hear. / This is it, the end of the saison, / You know you have a grand illusion." A controversy developed, pointing to the fact that the right to command and the duty to obey did not yet fully characterize the relations between the young fighters and the political leadership. (The Making of Israeli Militarism, Indiana University Press, Uri Ben-Eliezer, 1998, p. 123) (IMG)

Subsequently, the Mapai successfully lobbied for the end of the 'Season':

To clarify the controversy and to put an end to the season, representatives from the national institutions and the Haganah attended a meeting of season activists called by its commander, Shimon Avidan. Palmach members objected to the termination of the season. The Irgun is not totally liquidated, they claimed, and we should not stop the job before it is completely done. The leadership's answer was surprising. It hinted at the need to stop the operations in order to unify all forces against the British. The activists were not convinced. One of those present later recalled that thirty of them spoke and not one favored calling off the operation. Finally, Sneh's patience ran out. "I have spoken!" he exclaimed, repeating the words four times. This event was supposed to show the young people who really had the power to decide in the Yishuv, but Sneh's pathetic repetition later became a means of derision, part of Palmach folklore that symbolized the problems that accompanied the leadership's attempts to constitute its authority over the armed forces. Chapter 17

C17S1. Via Iran and Turkey, the Anglo-American Plan for the Nuclear Annihilation of the Soviet Union  IMG-All-{Iran}

The nuclear bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki was regarded as not only an anti-Soviet menace, but also as a prelude for war against the Soviet Union. Approximately a month after the US nuclear destruction of Nagasaki and Hiroshima, the US Air Force produced a strategic plan for the nuclear annihilation of the Soviet Union. Written on September 15, 1945, a copy of the document was submitted by US Airforce General Lauris Norstad to Major General Leslie Groves. "It is ... obvious," stated the US Airforce's report,:

that during this period Russia and the United States will be the outstanding military powers. (Atomic Bomb Production, Memorandum for Major General, War Department, Headquarters of the Army Air Forces, September 15, 1945. p. 2) (IMG)

Thus:

For the purpose of this study the destruction of the Russian capability to wage war has therefore been used as a basis upon which to predicate the United States' atomic bomb requirements. (Atomic Bomb Production, Memorandum for Major General, War Department, Headquarters of the Army Air Forces, September 15, 1945. p. 2) (IMG)

Of the Soviet cities, 66 were designated as most strategic:

As a foundation, a list was compiled of all Russian cities having any major strategic importance. These 66 cities were plotted on the map shown as Appendix "A" to TAB "A". This list is quite comprehensive. - The following percentages of total Russian production are accomplished in these cities: Aircraft 95%, tanks 97%, guns 73%, trucks 88%, steel 45%, oil refining 95%, aluminum 100%, lead 48%, nickel 60%, zinc 44%. in addition, the majority of all ball-bearing, synthetic rubber, and machine tools are manufactured in these areas. It is to be noted that the above statistics mainly include basic and heavy industry which is normally more remotely located than those industries engaged in the manufacture of the end products. It is therefore logical to assume that an even greater proportion of Russian total manufacturing is concentrated in these 66 cities, which include all of Russia's large population and industrial concentrations. (Atomic Bomb Production, Memorandum for Major General, War Department, Headquarters of the Army Air Forces, September 15, 1945. p. 3. Retrieved from: Alex Wellerstein's 'Nuclear Secrecy') (IMG)

The US army designated:

a group of 15 first priority cities and a group of 25 first and second priority cities.... (...). [T]he bulk of all major industries upon which statistics are available is concentrated in the fifteen first priority targets. Only in aluminum and oil refining is there any significant increase in percentage produced between the first priority cities and the total list of cities. (Atomic Bomb Production, Memorandum for Major General, War Department, Headquarters of the Army Air Forces, September 15, 1945. p. 3. Retrieved from: Alex Wellerstein's 'Nuclear Secrecy') (IMG)

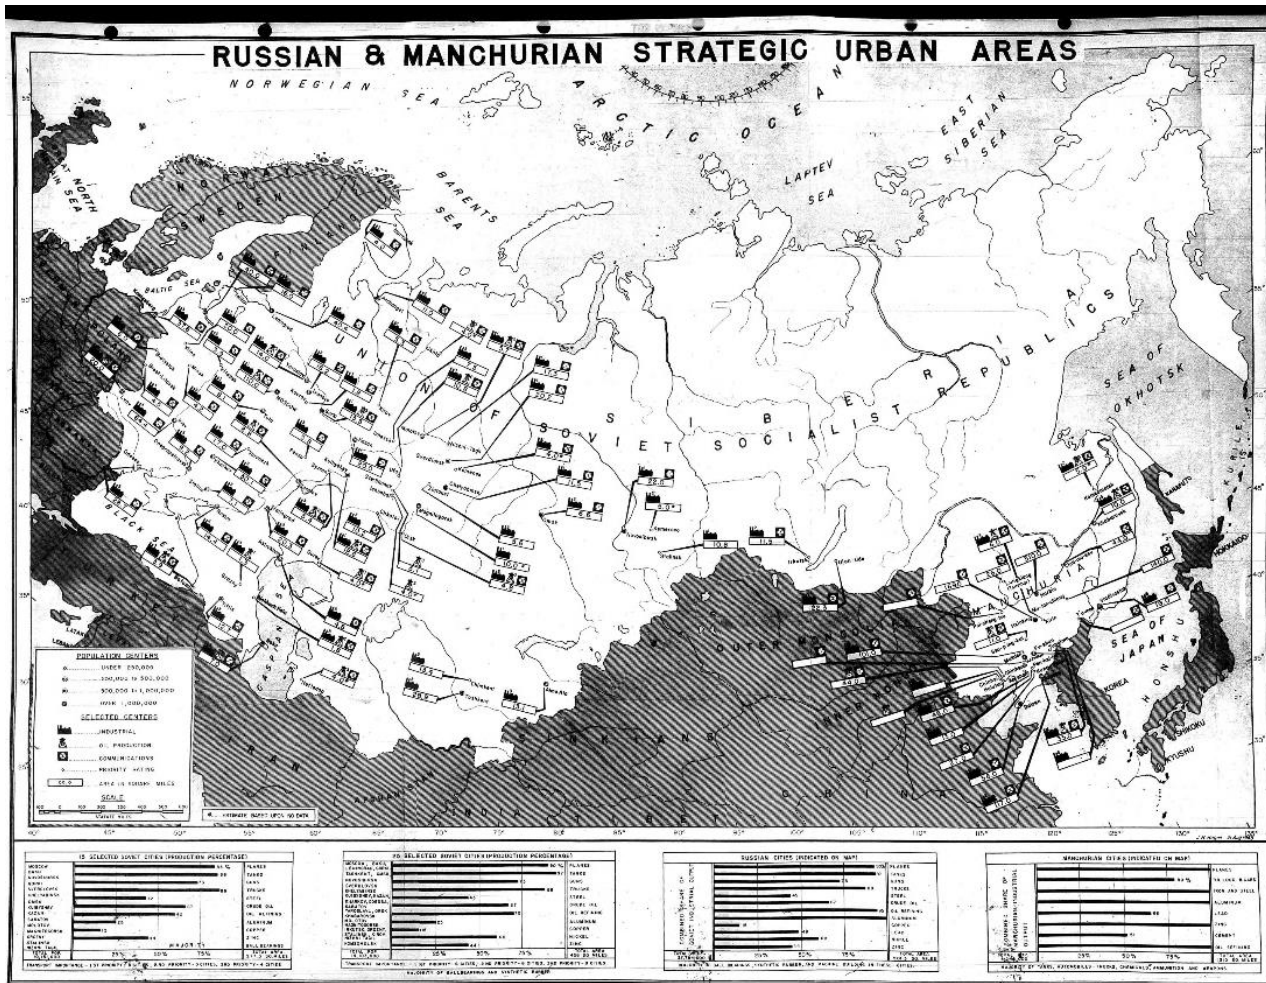

The above-shown map and table, retrieved from the US Airforce document, summarizes the number of atomic bombs for each number of priority-category of cities.

Why is this point about nuclear weapons being mentioned within the context of the Middle East conflict? It is because the USSR's South Caucasus flank was the only area in which there did not exist a geostrategic buffer against Anglo-American aggression. At the same time, it was a very oil-rich area which the Anglo-American imperialists prioritized as the target for the nuclear bombing. After Moscow, Baku was the topmost target for a nuclear strike in the Pentagon planning. Hence, on the one hand, the Soviet Caucasus was essentially critical for the Soviet war effort and on the other hand, it was geostrategically vulnerable to an Anglo-American invasion, in the spirit of Operation PIKE (see C9S7), against the Soviet Caucasus oilfields. That is why the Middle East theatre gained an additional importance for during the Cold War. More will be mentioned about this.

18. In summary, it is computed that the United States requirements for stocks of atomic bombs are as follows:

Minimum		Optimum
For incapacitation of 15 first priority targets -	39	For destruction of 66 cities of strategic importance -	204
For neutralization of possible enemy bases in the Western Hemisphere -	10	For neutralization of possible enemy bases in the Western Hemisphere -	10
For Strategic isolation of the battlefield -	10	For Strategic isolation of the battlefield -	10
Total	59	Total	224
Probable effectiveness factor -	48%	Probable effectiveness factor -	48%
Minimum requirement = $59 \div .48$ or		Optimum requirement = $224 \div .48$ or
123 bombs		466 bombs

Oil Concessions from Iran's Regime * IMG-All-[Iran]

Even Stephen L. McFarland – who was a Visiting Professor of Military History at the United States Air Force Air War College, during 1992-1993 – acknowledged that Iran's regime was aiming to hand over Iran's northern petroleum to the Americans. In McFarland's words, the 'Iranian government in April included the northern provinces in the prospective American concession':

In early 1943 the Iranian commercial attaché in Washington approached Standard Vacuum to seek an agreement for an oil concession. The American government and firms jumped on the invitation once it was made, in spite of warnings from the U.S. minister in Tehran and from the head of the American economic advisory mission that oil negotiations in Iran might jeopardize Allied unity. In December the Iranian government sent official invitations to Standard Vacuum and Standard Oil of New Jersey. Constant delays in the negotiations over the next year caused the Iranian prime minister to encourage American companies to forestall any Soviet or British interference. In February 1944 the Soviets reminded Iran of their "prior rights" to northern Oil. Disregarding the warning, the Iranian government in April included the northern provinces in the prospective American concession. British oil interests joined the competition in late 1943, but the Soviets did not join until September 1944. (Peripheral View of the Origins of the Cold War: The Crises in Iran, 1941-47, Stephen L. McFarland, American Diplomacy in the Second World War, Vol. 8 of: The American Experience in World War II, Edited with introductions by: Walter L. Hixson, University of Akron, Ohio, p. 253) (IMG)

Once again, the regime in Iran was violating the 1921 treaty with the USSR, which stated that the USSR would renounce all Tsarist-era claims over Iranian resources, including oil, provided that Iran does not grant oil concessions to any other foreign power. The Article 13 of the 1921 Soviet-Iranian Friendship Treaty had stated:

The Persian Government, for its part, promises not to cede to a third Power, or to its subjects, the concessions and property restored to Persia by virtue of the present Treaty, and to maintain those rights for the Persian nation. (Persia and the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic - Treaty of Friendship, signed at Moscow, February 26, 1921 [1922] LNTSer 69; 9 LNTS 383, p. 5) (IMG)

In other words, the treaty had given Iran's oil exclusively to Iran, while prohibiting it from granting oil concessions to any other foreign country. Since the 1920s, Iran had consistently violated the treaty, and had variously granted Iran's oil to the Americans, the British, and the Nazi Germans. Iran once again was violating the treaty by aiming to grant the northern oil to the American companies. This time around, the Soviet Union could not afford to allow Iran's regime to get away with its violations of international treaties. The Soviets took firm steps and tough measures to prevent Iran's regime from granting the oil to the Americans:

Actual Soviet aggression and interference in Iranian affairs was limited until October 1944, when Iran announced its decision to postpone all negotiations for an oil concession until after the war. The oil crisis of that month became a catalyst for the Soviet-American confrontation over Iran. The apparent anti-Soviet nature of the postponement encouraged the Soviet Union to see an American attempt to seize Iranian oil for itself. (Peripheral View of the Origins of the Cold War: The Crises in Iran, 1941-47, Stephen L. McFarland, American Diplomacy in the Second World War, Vol. 8 of: The American Experience in World War II, Edited with introductions by: Walter L. Hixson, University of Akron, Ohio, p. 252) (IMG)

Thus, in accordance with international law, the Soviets demanded a petroleum concession from Iran:

On 2 October 1944 the Soviets made an official offer, followed shortly by demand for an oil concession. (Peripheral View of the Origins of the Cold War: The Crises in Iran, 1941-47, Stephen L. McFarland, American Diplomacy in the Second World War, Vol. 8 of: The American Experience in World War II, Edited with introductions by: Walter L. Hixson, University of Akron, Ohio, p. 253) (IMG)

The purpose of this demand for an oil concession was not Soviet 'imperialist' 'ambition' to 'steal' 'Iranian' resources. Rather, in the words of the staunch anti-Soviet Cold Warrior George Kennan, the Soviets undertook this measure in order to force the Persian regime to not grant oil to foreign countries:

The basic motive of recent Soviet action in northern Iran is probably not need for the oil itself but apprehension of potential foreign penetration in that area coupled with the concern for prestige which marks all Soviet policy these days. The oil of northern Iran is important not as something Russia needs but as something it might be dangerous to permit anyone else to exploit. The territory lies near the vital Caucasian oil centers which so closely escaped complete conquest in the present war. The Kremlin deems it essential to Russian security that no other great power should have even the chance of gaining a footing there. It probably sees no other way to assure this than by seeking greater political and economic control for itself and finds this aim consistent with contemporary Soviet conceptions of prestige. (891.6363/11-744: Telegram, The Chargé in the Soviet Union (Kennan) to the Secretary of State, November 7, 1944; Received: November 8, 1944. 4266. In: FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES: DIPLOMATIC PAPERS, 1944, THE NEAR EAST, SOUTH ASIA, AND AFRICA, THE FAR EAST. Vol 5.) (IMG)

As a result of this Soviet move,:

Iran's movazaneh strategy had backfired. Instead of attracting the United States as a buffer against Anglo-Soviet participation in oil matters, Iran was left with all three countries simultaneously demanding concessions. (Peripheral View of the Origins of the Cold War: The Crises in Iran, 1941-47, Stephen L. McFarland, American Diplomacy in the Second World War, Vol. 8 of: The American Experience in World War II, Edited with introductions by: Walter L. Hixson, University of Akron, Ohio, p. 253) (IMG)

'Movazaneh' in Farsi means 'balancing'; in the context of Iranian strategy, it implies striking a 'balance' between foreign superpowers, much like what the 'non-aligned movement' officially claimed to represent. By demanding an oil concession from Iran, the Iranian government had no other option than to prohibit any further oil concessions to any country – not just the Soviets, but also to the British and the Americans. For the Iranian leaders, as McFarland put it:

The only way out was to deny concessions to all, which Iran did on 8 October. (Peripheral View of the Origins of the Cold War: The Crises in Iran, 1941-47, Stephen L. McFarland, American Diplomacy in the Second World War, Vol. 8 of: The American Experience in World War II, Edited with introductions by: Walter L. Hixson, University of Akron, Ohio, p. 253) (IMG)

The Soviets had reached their objective of preventing US infiltration into northern Iran. While preventing Iran's regime from handing over Iranian people's oil resources to the Anglo-Americans was necessary, the fact remains that Iran's regime itself was an Anglo-American puppet state. This meant that the revenue generated by Iran's extraction of the northern oil was not going to go to the Iranian people but rather to the Anglo-American imperialists and their fascist anti-Soviet mercenaries. In this midst therefore, it was necessary to deprive the Anglo-American puppet state from its access to the natural oil resources. The Soviet Union on the other hand represented the interests of the people of Iran's north, people who were opposed to the Anglo-Americans' covert control of their oil through the puppet state. The presence of a Soviet front company, under the cover of oil exploration, in Iran could facilitate the process of funding and arming anti-regime rebels that would bring about a Tudeh-led Iranian People's Democracy.

As such, a large-scale popular unrest took place against the government's decision to not grant oil concessions to the USSR. In Tabriz, the major Turkic and industrial city in Iran, massive demonstrations led by the Tudeh Party erupted against the Persian government over the oil concessions:

About 8 o'clock on October 30 a serious demonstration took place in Tabriz following upon demands made by the Tudeh (Communist) Party on the Iranian Government to reverse its policy on the petroleum concession demanded by the Russians. (891.00/11-144: Telegram, The Ambassador in Iran (Morris) to the Secretary of State, Tehran, November 1, 1944; Received: November 1, 1944. In: FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES: DIPLOMATIC PAPERS, 1944, THE NEAR EAST, SOUTH ASIA, AND AFRICA, THE FAR EAST, Vol. 5, p. 464) (IMG)

Similar events occurred in Rasht, the capital city of Iran's Gilan province:

The shops at Resht have been closed in so-called protest against the Iranian Government's decision not to grant the Russian petroleum concession. Rumors of disorder are trickling in from other points north. (891.00/11-144: Telegram, The Ambassador in Iran (Morris) to the Secretary of State, Tehran, November 1, 1944; Received: November 1, 1944. In: FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES: DIPLOMATIC PAPERS, 1944, THE NEAR EAST, SOUTH ASIA, AND AFRICA, THE FAR EAST, Vol. 5, p. 464) (IMG)

Finally, the Iranian Prime Minister Sa'ed feared a similar event in Tehran:

The [Iranian] Prime Minister apprehends the possibility of further trouble in Tehran next Friday. (891.00/11-144: Telegram, The Ambassador in Iran (Morris) to the Secretary of State, Tehran, November 1, 1944; Received: November 1, 1944. In: FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES: DIPLOMATIC PAPERS, 1944, THE NEAR EAST, SOUTH ASIA, AND AFRICA, THE FAR EAST, Vol. 5, p. 464) (IMG)

All of these facts about the protests in Tabriz, Rasht and potentially Tehran were confirmed by the top ranks of the Persian government and the British Consul General in Tabriz:

The facts about the demonstration cited above are reported to me personally by Prime Minister Saed and by Court Minister Ala and are confirmed by a telegram from the British Acting Consul General at Tabriz to his Ambassador here. (891.00/11-144: Telegram, The Ambassador in Iran (Morris) to the Secretary of State, Tehran, November 1, 1944; Received: November 1, 1944. In: FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES: DIPLOMATIC PAPERS, 1944, THE NEAR EAST, SOUTH ASIA, AND AFRICA, THE FAR EAST, Vol. 5, pp. 464-465) (IMG)

The Prime Minister has just told me and the British Ambassador that he plans to offer his resignation this afternoon. He believes that this will relieve the tension, at least temporarily. The Shah will accept the resignation reluctantly unless he is given encouragement by the British and American Governments to resist Russian interference. (891.00/11-144: Telegram, The Ambassador in Iran (Morris) to the Secretary of State, Tehran, November 1, 1944; Received: November 1, 1944. In: FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES: DIPLOMATIC PAPERS, 1944, THE NEAR EAST, SOUTH ASIA, AND AFRICA, THE FAR EAST, Vol. 5, pp. 464-465) (IMG)

Unable to suppress the unrest, Prime Minister Sa'ed resigned shortly after.

C17S2. Introduction to the Tudeh Party  IMG-All-{Iran}

Iran was still in the phase of bourgeois-democratic revolution against feudal vestiges and imperialism-fascism. As such, the Tudeh Party of Iran, which was formed by the communists, was officially a bourgeois-democratic party. It was a progressive anti-imperialist popular front party led by the communist agents of the Iranian proletariat. This is why, instead of calling itself the 'communist party', the Party named itself 'Tudeh' because the term meant 'mass'. Analyzing the stances of the Tudeh Party of Iran, the CIA corroborated:

The party machinery, organized along Communist lines of "democratic centralism," has been dominated from the outset by a combination of veteran Soviet-trained agitators and Marxist intellectuals, most of whom have been comrades in arms ever since they were thrown together in the prisons of Iran during the Reza Shah regime. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 1) (IMG) the party has also advocated such objectives as the eight-hour [work] day, recognition of the rights of unions, social insurance, protection of mothers and children, and legal and social equality for women. Although most of its platform relates to the laboring classes, it has asserted that it is not merely a party of the workers but the spokesman for 90 percent of the nation. It has repeatedly stated that it works to uphold the Constitution, is in no way opposed to "constitutional laws," and "has no quarrel with the principles of private ownership." Apparently nothing has angered the leaders of the Tudeh Party so much as the accusation that the party is Communist and has ties with the USSR. Statements in Tudeh newspapers and books stress the democratic, anti-fascist, and anti-reactionary character of the party. The official line is that the party is a native organization, working for the good of the Iranian nation, which is not and will not become Communist; "if our party publishes pro-Soviet articles, it is because the Soviets fight well against the fascists."

(THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 6) (IMG)

As a matter of fact, during the Great Patriotic War, the Tudeh Party officially and rightly favored a system similar to the bourgeois-democratic model existing in the United States and Britain, but by the end of the war, denounced the Anglo-American imperialists once the alliance between the Axis and the Anglo-Americans became increasingly clear:

The official attitude of the party toward the US and UK was at first mild; in 1944 it spoke of establishing a government "on the type of the English and American democracies," while the party leaders then appeared to view the US with a certain amount of good will. However, the party line soon thereafter began to harden first against the UK and then against the US. Against the British, the Tudeh leaders developed the theme of the "one-sided policy" arguing that the British had maintained dominance over Iranian foreign affairs and Iranian politicians, particularly of the reactionary elements.... (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 6) (IMG)

insisting that Iran receive a much return from the operations of the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company; alleging that the British-owned Imperial Bank of Iran LS operated entirely for the benefit of the UK; stating that the Shah's visit to the UK in the summer of 1948 was for the purpose of instructions from the British; and repeating the common charge that many of present "reactionary" leaders of Iran are in the pay of the British. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 7) (IMG)

The party is most vehement, as might be expected, about US activities in Iran. vigorously opposed the US arms credit bill which was finally passed by the Majlis in February 1948 and has consistently dismissal of the US military missions to the Iranian Army and to the gendarmerie, alleging that US activities in Iran are part of a plan for creating military bases in various parts of the world and charging that airports are being constructed in Iran under US supervision. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 7) (IMG)

Note that during that time period, the religious population of Iran were unwilling to 'convert' to communism. They instead preferred progressive politics. That is why the Tudeh Party was rightly presenting itself as a secular progressive non-communist party favouring close strategic relations with the Soviet Union, just like the Mapam in Israel. And just like how the communists in the Mapam had adopted the 'Socialist Zionist' culture as the political culture of their popular front party in order to blend more easily amongst the Israeli proletarians, the secular Tudeh Party did adopt some of the Shia Islamist 'values' as its political culture and "initially ... organized Moharram processions, and designated a special prayer room in its main clubhouse" (See: 'Tortured Confessions', written by Ervand Abrahamian, page 77) as a popular front tactic of including as many the progressive-minded proletarians and intellectuals, who nonetheless held religious views, in the struggle against Anglo-American imperialism in Iran. The Tudeh Party is of course well-known for having advanced women's rights and secular politics, but it did adopt a Shia Islamic image to some extent. For a while, the left-deviationist current resurged in influence in the Tudeh Party, but was later put down. The left-deviationist tendency in the party sought to weaken communist influence by eliminating the popular front and ending the proletarian alliance with the bourgeoisie. In so doing, the left-deviation would have undermined communist influence in Iran which had taken the form of the communist-led popular front. In response, the:

Tudeh leadership felt compelled ("since the party is neither communistic nor revolutionary") to denounce the "Marxist Trotskyites" within its ranks as representing a "left deviation." (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 6) (IMG)

Since the anti-Trotskyite purge, however,:

the Tudeh Party has devoted energy to denying any ties with the Soviet Union and more energy to attacking the "enemies" of the USSR. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 6) (IMG)

In itself, popular front activity was the most correct policy line for the situation in Iran. However, the challenge faced by popular fronts is that it can allow infiltration by opportunists. The Tudeh Party made note of this serious problem and self-criticized:

On 1 January 1947 ... the Tudeh leadership confessed that the party, by encouraging quantity rather than quality, had granted membership to corrupt opportunists and adventurers who had ignored the instructions of the Central Committee and injured the feelings of many of their fellow countrymen. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, pp. 4-5) (IMG)

Again, the main source of opportunism during that time period emanated from the left-opportunists who aimed to sabotage the Tudeh Party's popular front tactics. In spite of the challenges it faced, the Tudeh Party of Iran, as confirmed by the CIA in the 1949 document and US Army Captain James Muhl, grew to become the only genuinely popularly-supported party and movement in Iran:

The Tudeh Party is significant not only because of its Soviet connections, which make it the logical nucleus for a quisling government should the USSR accelerate its efforts to interfere in Iran, but also because of the head start it has obtained in rousing certain important elements of the Iranian people from their political apathy. The other parties which have sprung up in Iran since the fall of the Reza Shah dictatorship are at present chiefly loose associations of notables, leaving the Tudeh Party as the only political group which has achieved any degree of genuine popular support. Although the Tudeh organization has scarcely begun to organize Iran's vast peasantry, it has made notable strides in the towns, which constitute the principal centers of power and control in Iran. Utilizing the Tudeh-created Central United Council of Trade Unions, the party at one time had more than 70,000 members — about one-third of Iran's industrial population — and has been particularly active in such key installations as the Iranian State Railway, the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, and government-owned factories. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 1) (IMG)

The Tudeh had become the largest political organization in the country after a spurt of rapid growth. By August 1946, it had a core membership of 50,000 and a total roster of 100,000 active members. Together with the Democratic Party of Azerbaijan and Kurdistan and through its several trade unions, the Tudeh could mobilize about 335,000 political supporters — a formidable force. (Iran and the Big Powers, 1900-1953. DTIC, Captain James Howard Muhl, Jr. April 26, 1985, p. 61) (IMG)

sixty percent of this membership consists of factory and railroad workers, with the remainder scattered rather evenly through Iran's other social classes. The country's predominant peasant population accounts for only about eight percent of the membership total. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 13) (IMG)

Due to its widespread influence among the urban proletarians,:

the Tudeh organization is well fitted to further Soviet policy by undertaking sabotage, work stoppages, and disturbances at critical points within Iran or by setting up a new group of regional autonomist movements. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, pp. 1-2) (IMG)

Iran's regime banned the Tudeh Party of Iran in early 1949. As confirmed by the CIA:

In February 1949, the Tudeh organization was outlawed by the Iranian Government, and a number of its leaders were arrested (and later convicted) on charges of treasonable activity. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 1) (IMG)

However even as late as July of that same year, the CIA remarked:

Despite these reverses, the Tudeh Party will continue to be an important factor in Iran's future so long as the lagging of social and economic reform creates a reservoir of popular unrest upon which to draw. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 1) (IMG)

While the party has been temporarily driven underground, it will undoubtedly proceed with its announced intentions of carrying on the struggle.... (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 1) (IMG)

The undemocratic and anti-popular system in Iran, having banned the Tudeh Party in 1949, made revolutionary uprising the only option for the Tudeh party:

It is hardly likely that the Tudeh leadership has any real hope of gaining power through peaceful means, especially in view of the tight control over electoral processes exercised by Iran's present ruling class. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, pp. 1-2) (IMG)

Hence, to this popular communist-led bourgeois-democratic movement in Iran, the camp of the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies provided covert military, financial, intelligence, and transportation support. The US intelligence reported:

practical types of Soviet support are provided through appropriate Soviet commercial and cultural organizations in Iran. The assistance provided by such organizations is considerable. the Soviet Hospital at Tehran has supplied the party with newsprint; Iransovtrans has supplied weapons and vehicles, has transported individuals, and has maintained courier services; Iranian-Soviet Fisheries Company has used its boats to smuggle individuals and weapons into Iran; and VOKS and Tass have supplied propaganda material. A number of Soviet organizations have supplied the party with financial assistance, and there is even a report as yet unconfirmed, that the party receives (via the Czechoslovakian Legation) a monthly subsidy of 2,225,000 rials ($69,000) in cash or easily disposable merchandise. In Tehran, mohajirs [emigrants from the Soviet Union] have been supplied with second-hand clothing to hawk in the street and have received free meals at the Hotel Gilan-i-No against ration cards issued by the Soviet Embassy. agents have been supplied for Tudeh organizational work; for example, a Czechoslovakian Communist named Franz Jingar has been active with the party at Isfahan, while a Russian-born agent named Hushangi was at one time the leader of organizational activity at Nowshahr, on the Caspian Sea. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 12) (IMG)

In 1945, the Tudeh Party of Iran participated in the Majlis (Parliament) election, but its key representative Ja'far Pishevari, who was elected from Tabriz, was discriminated against and not allowed into the Parliament:

(Ja'far Pishevari, later head of the free Azerbaijan regime, was elected from Tabriz but the Majlis refused to seat him), while an additional seven deputies are believed to have been covert members of the party. This small Tudeh "fraction" in the alert, more skilled in debate, and more sure of purpose than the other deputies – was very outspoken in the chamber and did much to obstruct the legislative process. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 4) (IMG)

In response to the undemocratic character of the regime, the:

Tudeh organization in the field worked to strengthen its hand in preparation for the Soviet-directed attempt to shatter the Tehran government's authority which was made at the end of the war. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 4) (IMG)

Thus:

At the end of September 1945 a group of Tudeh-backed army officers began a premature revolt in the Khorasan area east of the Caspian Sea. Meanwhile, however, the very active Tabriz section of the party had set itself up as a new and nominally distinct organization, the Democratic Party of Azerbaijan, and had begun its agitation for autonomy. By the spring of 1946 the Iranian Government was confronted Soviet-backed autonomous regimes in both Azerbaijan and Kurdistan, new Tudeh agitation in Khorasan and along the Caspian coast, Soviet demands for an oil concession, and strong opposition from the right-wing politicians. The term of the XIV Majlis was ending in confusion, its final sessions left quorumless because of the Tudeh demonstrators massed before its meeting place. C17S3. The Rise and Struggles of People's Democratic Azerbaijan in Iran / Use of Turkey and Iran as a Route for a Nuclear Holocaust in Baku / The Assassination of Ja'far Pishevari  IMG-All-{Iran}

By the end of the Great Patriotic War, the Azeri population in Iran no longer identified itself with the latter. As mentioned in C4S2, this trend had started since the end of the First World War. Referring to the Azeri population in his 1979 book, Richard W. Cottam – the infamous American spy who served in the covert operations division of the CIA between 1953 and 1958 and as a diplomat and Political Officer in the US Embassy in Tehran between 1956 and 1958 – admitted:

nothing that happened prior to 1946 indicates positively that the majority of the population identified themselves with Iran. These were lean years for Azerbaijan. Reza Shah's policy of centralizing commerce in Tehran hit Tabriz particularly hard. The city lost its commercial pre-eminence, and the most active and vital of its citizenry moved to Tehran. Their departure emasculated Azerbaijan as a political center. (Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, p. 124) (IMG)

Under such circumstances, the Azeris of Iran grew increasingly sympathetic towards a communist-led sovereigntist popular-democratic movement:

the strong dissatisfaction plus whatever separatist sentiment existed helped create the impression that influenced Soviet policy makers in the latter days of World War II. In Tabriz and in every other Azerbaijan city of any size, a communist coterie existed, ready and willing to assume the leadership of a separatist movement. Support could be expected from much of the Christian element; the Iranian army could easily be neutralized by the Soviet occupation forces; land and social reforms should produce acquiescence, if not sympathy, from the huge peasant and illiterate worker population; and because of general dissatisfaction, little opposition could be expected from the small layer of Iranian nationalists. (Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, p. 125) (IMG)

The leader of the new communist-led Azeri sovereigntist partisan resistance movement was:

Ja'far Pishevari, a life-long communist with official credentials: the first Secretary of the Adalat Committee in Baku, one of three Secretaries of its successor Communist Party of Iran, a participant in the Jangali movement and a member of the nine-man executive committee heading the Soviet Socialist Republic of Gilan. When Reza Shah imprisoned Pishevari from 1925 to 1941, he made contact with Dr. Erani's communist group. (Iran and the Big Powers, 1900-1953. DTIC, Captain James Howard Muhl, Jr. April 26, 1985, p. 58) (IMG)

On September 1945, Pishevari founded the 'Firqeh ye Demokrat', or the Democratic Party of Azerbaijan, a communist-led partisan sovereigntist movement:

Pishevari announced the formation of the Firqah-i Dimokrat in September 1945. Immediately, he was able to absorb the local Tudeh Party and convene the first party congress that October. (Iran and the Big Powers, 1900-1953. DTIC, Captain James Howard Muhl, Jr. April 26, 1985, p. 58) (IMG)

The Azerbaijan Democratic Party enjoyed the overwhelming popular support of the peasant and proletarian masses. Referring to the population of Azerbaijan, Cottam admitted:

the elements of the population that gave support were the very groups that understood politics the least – the peasants and illiterate laborers. Large numbers of these people willingly served in the Democratic army and accepted Russian uniforms and Russian equipment. (Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, pp. 126-127) (IMG)

On September 16th, the Democratic Party:

launched their revolution in Azerbaijan. ('Iran and the Big Powers, 1900-1953'. DTIC, Captain James Howard Muhl, Jr. April 26, 1985, p. 58)

The Soviets aimed to assist the Azeri proletariat and peasantry in Iran to emancipate themselves and create a People's Democratic state:

The Soviets were willing to work with the Azerbaijani communists, despite differing party orthodoxy and allegiances. The Democratic Party of Azerbaijan, or the Firqah-i Dimokrat, was a communal organization appealing exclusively to the people of Azerbaijan. ('Iran and the Big Powers, 1900-1953'. DTIC, Captain James Howard Muhl, Jr. April 26, 1985, p. 58) (IMG)

As always, the strategic interests of the Soviet state of the proletariat converged with those of the proletariat and peasantry in other countries – in this case, the Azerbaijani proletariat and peasantry in Iran. The position of the Soviet Union in its southern Caucasian flank was rather weak. The Soviet Caucasus region had been encircled by a hostile treacherous Turkey and a royalist Persia, both neo-colonies of the Anglo-American imperialists. Via this route, the Anglo-American imperialists could launch their nuclear strike on Baku. Note that after Moscow, Baku was the priority for the Anglo-American imperialists because of its tremendous oil resources, the most strategic commodity for resisting the Anglo-American imperialist aggressors during the potential Third World War. The Soviet state's support for the Azerbaijani uprising in Iran helped strengthen the defenses of the southern Caucasian flank of the USSR against the Anglo-American imperialist bombardment plots. In the words of CIA and State Department consultant Melvyn Leffler:

one suspects that Soviet military planners were eager to capitalize upon the presence of Soviet troops in Iran to safeguard their strategic interests, especially to help protect their petroleum fields and refining industry. They certainly must have known, as did American planners, that in 1940 the British and French contemplated bombing Soviet oil fields in the Caucasus in order to deny petroleum to the Nazis. Soviet planners, having observed the functioning of the Persian Corridor during World War II, must also have been wary of its future use in wartime if it should be controlled by an adversary. (Safeguarding Democratic Capitalism: US Foreign Policy and National Security, 1920-1950. Melvyn P. Leffler, 2017, p. 211) (IMG)

According to the professional journal of the US Army,:

In Moscow, only a week after the formation of the Azerbaijan Republic, the American Secretary of State, James F. Byrnes, queried Stalin about the Soviet troops in northern Iran. Stalin replied that they were necessary to prevent Iran from sabotaging Russian oil fields in Baku. (The Azerbaijan Incident, US Major William R. Andrews. In: 'Military Review: The Professional Journal of the US Army', Vol. 54, No. 8, August 1974, p. 79) (IMG)

The vulnerability of the Soviets in Caucasus was real, as the Anglo-Americans seriously planned to use Turkey as a launching pad for a nuclear and conventional strike on the Soviet Caucasus oilfields. It was in September 1945 that the United States military hatched the plots for 204 nuclear bombs to be dropped on 66 Soviet cities (more details in C17S1). The US military designated 15 Soviet cities in particular as the priority cities for a nuclear strike; in that list of 15, the second greatest priority for the United States was Baku due to its industrialization as well as the rich petroleum resources it contained. A CIA document corroborating the significance of the Middle East frontier, pointed to the strategic importance of Baku's oil fields for the USSR:

It is, moreover, an area of Soviet strategic interest, even greater than that of eastern Europe, in view of the general shift of Soviet industry away from the European Frontier, but still within range of air attack from the south, and of the vital importance of Baku oil in the Soviet economy. It is in the Middle East, however, that Soviet interest comes into collision with the established interest of Great Britain and that there is consequently the greatest danger of precipitating a major conflict. Soviet policy in the area must therefore be pursued with due caution and flexibility. (Soviet Foreign and Military Policy, ORE 1, Central Intelligence Group (CIA Predecessor), July 23, 1946, p. 7) (IMG)

The threat of an American nuclear attack on Soviet Caucasus oilfields was very real. Leffler noted:

It was this very vulnerability that United States strategic planners hoped to capitalize on. In fact, United States interest in Turkey accelerated as war planners began to develop a strategic concept for the postwar era and as overall United States-Soviet relations deteriorated sharply in early 1946. In September 1945 strategic planners emphasized "the necessity of keeping a prospective enemy at the maximum possible distance, and conversely of projecting our advance bases into areas well removed from the United States, so as to project our operations with new weapons [i.e. nuclear weapons] or otherwise nearer the enemy." (Safeguarding Democratic Capitalism: US Foreign Policy and National Security, 1920-1950. Melvyn P. Leffler, 2017, p. 172) (IMG)

the Joint War Plans Committee (JWPC) launched a series of studies code-named PINCHER late in 1945 to explore the problems of waging a war against the Soviet Union. The first fruit of this exercise appeared on March 2, 1946, when the JWPC forwarded a broad concept of operations to the Joint Staff Planners. With refinement, this became the basic concept of operations around which strategic planning revolved for the next several years. Dealing only with the opening stages of a conflict, PINCHER envisioned war breaking out in the eastern Mediterranean or Near East and spreading rapidly across Europe. (Council of War: A History of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, 1942-1991. Joint Chiefs of Staff, Published for the Joint History Office of the Director, Joint Staff, Steven L. Rearden, 2012, p. 71) (IMG)

Thanks to the presence of People's Democratic Azerbaijan in Iran's north, the Anglo-American imperialists had been forced to rely, in the military planning, for the while, on the Turkish route to Baku and less so the Iranian route. To the Anglo-Americans, Continental Europe was no longer as strategically significant, especially when compared to the Middle East:

Turkey's special role emerged in March 1946 when ... State Department officials pressed military planners to define more clearly the importance of Turkey and when strategic analysts were forced to come to terms with the effects of Western Europe's military weakness and the United States's rapid demobilization. Assuming that Soviet troops would easily overrun all of Western Europe and that United States forces would be evacuated from the continent, the utilization of air power took on more significance than ever before. Turkey was seen as a key to the effective application of air power. (Safeguarding Democratic Capitalism: US Foreign Policy and National Security, 1920-1950. Melvyn P. Leffler, 2017, p. 173. (IMG)

Obviously, the geostrategic conditions dictated that after Turkey, Iran would be the most important geostrategic avenue for an Anglo-American military strike on Soviet Caucasus:

the initial (and tentative) plans of the United States for waging war against the Soviet Union envisioned, among other things, an air assault from the south (from bases at Cairo-Suez). These war plans also denoted a route through the Balkans or through Iran as one of the few likely avenues for a land invasion of the Soviet Union, should it ever become necessary." (Safeguarding Democratic Capitalism: US Foreign Policy and National Security, 1920-1950. Melvyn P. Leffler, 2017, p. 211. Sherman Papers (Naval Historical Center, Washington, D.C.), box 2.) (IMG)

Note also that the Anglo-American imperialists had aimed to base their warplanes in Egypt, as stated above. That was because Egypt was far away from the USSR, and thus harder for the Red Army to hit. The Air Force of the United States was the strength of the US military, and was capable of travelling to the Soviet Caucasus while landing back in Egypt. Ironically, in contradiction to the Anglo-American imperialist intents, Wafdist Egypt was one of the Arab countries closest in strategic relations to the USSR during this period.

The creation of a People's Democratic Azerbaijan would have helped prevent the Anglo-American warplanes from reaching the Soviet Caucasus oilfields. The people's revolution would have emancipated the Azeri peasantry and proletarians from Anglo-American-backed royalist oppression while also helping the Soviet Azeri people from a nuclear holocaust. The Soviet Red Army aimed to prevent direct involvement in the conflict in Azerbaijan; instead, it maximized efforts to logistically back the Democratic Army partisans:

The Soviets wished to remain as much as possible in the background, probably to avoid antagonizing the local population....

(Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, p. 126) (IMG)

On November 15, 1945 the Soviets began to distribute arms to the Firqah-i Dimokrat. (Iran and the Big Powers, 1900-1953. DTIC, Captain James Howard Muhl, Jr. April 26, 1985, p. 58) (IMG)

Beside logistical support, however, the Soviet Red Army also tried to prevent bloody repression by Iran's royalist forces:

Soviet intervention in support of the rebellion limited the amount of bloodshed since their overwhelming forces discouraged any official resistance. Whenever the rebels challenged a military or police station, Soviet troops would appear and inform the Iranian commander to submit to the rebels. This pattern of Soviet interference was demonstrated when a relief column sent by the central government on November 20 was halted near Qazvin by a Soviet military force and 86 turned back. This Soviet signal to the central government ended any military opposition to the rebellion. (Iran and the Big Powers, 1900-1953. DTIC, Captain James Howard Muhl, Jr. April 26, 1985, pp. 58-59) (IMG)

This pattern of Soviet interference against Iranian regime repression happened in a number of cases:

In two instances they were compelled to reveal their hand, but in neither case because of the resistance of Iranian nationalists. Russian troops had to give open support to the Democrats in Ardebil when the Shahsevan tribe joined the local gendarmery in resisting the communist take-over. (Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, p. 126) (IMG)

As one of the first steps of the revolt, the Democratic Army's partisans took over the agricultural center in Mianeh, as the Soviet armed forces prevented Persian regime repression:

A communist-dominated group seized control of the Azerbaijan agricultural center of Mianeh. Simultaneously, the Iranian army garrison in that city was confined to its barracks by Soviet occupation forces and then disarmed. This pattern was repeated in the next few weeks throughout Azerbaijan. (Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, p. 126) (IMG)

Over time, a People's Democratic state was established throughout the whole of the Azerbaijan region in Iran. Once the People's Democratic government in the Azerbaijan region in Iran was established, scientific socialist measures towards improving the conditions of the proletariat and peasantry were undertaken:

The Pishvari government immediately inaugurated social and economic reforms and promised to begin a land distribution program. Even strongly anti-Pishvari residents of Tabriz admitted that more improvements were made in the city of Tabriz in one year of Democratic rule than in the twenty years under Reza Shah. Because of these accomplishments, the regime attracted significant support from the populace. (Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, p. 126) (IMG)

The General-Secretary of the CPSU, Joseph Stalin, assessed that the Qavam group, while fascist agents of the MI6, could nonetheless be coopted by the Tudeh Party and progressive bourgeois-democratic politicians in Iran's regime, so to drive a wedge between Iran and the Anglo-American imperialists. The Qavam group were preferred over the gang of former Prime Minister Sa'ed. In his letter to Pishvari, Stalin remarked:

We see a conflict between the Qavam government and the pro-British circles in Iran, which represent the most reactionary elements in Iran. Today, Qavam, no matter how reactionary he was in the past, must make some democratic reforms to protect himself and his Administration [from democratic backlash] and to gain the support of Iran's democratic forces. What should be our tactics in such a situation? In my opinion, we should use this conflict to take advantage of Qavam, to [coopt and] support him, to isolate the pro-British forces, and to prepare the ground for further democratization of Iran. All our advice to you is based on this diagnosis. Of course, another tactic was possible: spitting on everything, severing ties, and thus ensuring the victory of the pro-British reactionaries. But this is not really a tactic but is rather stupidity. This is in fact a betrayal of the people of Azerbaijan and Iranian democracy. (...). Here we have used a technique that every revolutionary is familiar with. In any situation that is similar to today's situation in Iran, if someone wants to obtain a certain minimum of demands from the government, then the movement must continue on its way, go beyond the minimum demands and pose a danger to the government until concessions are provided by the government. If you did not advance much in the current conditions of Iran, you would not be able to achieve objectives that the Qavam government is forced to concede today. This is the law of the revolutionary movement. (...). On the contrary, if you behave wisely and with our spiritual support, demand the legalization of the real and current situation in Azerbaijan, then both Azeris and Iran will respect you as a pioneer of the progressive and democratic movement in the Middle East. (Stalin's Letter to Pishvari, May 8, 1946. The full text of this document has been released by the Russian history magazine, Novaya I Noveishaya Istoriya, Nr. 3, May-June 1994. The text of this letter can be found in the Islamic Republic of Iran's 'Political Studies and Research Institute' (PSRI) as well as USA's 'Wilson Center'.) (IMG)

Stalin's policy line concerning the Qavam group in Iran was one of bribe-and-blackmail or carrots-and-stick. Stalin aimed to utilize the Tudeh-led revolt along with the Azeri and Kurdish rebellions as a means of posing so severe a pressure on Iran's regime so as to obtain concessions from Iran's pro-British regime. These concessions would enable the Soviets to force the Qavam group into the hands of the Tudeh forces, to coopt the reactionary Qavam group in the struggle against the Anglo-American imperialists, and to increase the influence of the proletariat over Iran's regime so as to advance the interests of the progressive and democratic forces in Iran and the Middle East. Indeed, as Stalin had implied in his letter to Pishvari, the armed revolt of the Democrats in Azerbaijan-Iran, the Democrats in Kurdistan-Iran, and the Tudeh Party in the rest of Iran inflicted so great a material cost on the CIA-MI6 satellite regime that the Anglo-American intelligence agencies were bogged down towards countering the uprising, leaving the communist and progressive agents in Iran's regime apparatus the operational freedom to penetrate and to turn the tide in the favour of the communist and democratic forces. The material undermining of comprador reaction reduced the material possessions, and hence the leverage, of the comprador agents, thus, in relative though not absolute terms, increasing the material strength and leverage power of the revolutionary agents within the Iranian regime apparatus. This increased communist and progressive intelligence penetration had encircled, compelled, and coopted the Qavam group into accepting the Tudeh Party, taking action against the MI6 spies, and undermining the reactionary forces in Iran while fighting for the democratic forces:

Prime Minister Qavam, enabled to act freely by the adjournment of the Majlis on 16 March, turned first against the so-called reactionary element in the opposition, arresting Sayyid Zia ad-din Tabatabai and General Hasan Arfa and ending the activities of Sayyid Zia's allegedly anti-Soviet National Will Party. Toward the USSR and its supporters, Qavam adopted a conciliatory policy, with an immediate view to obtaining the evacuation of Soviet occupation troops from Iran. In Mazandaran the Tudeh Party proceeded to arm the workers, to take over the government-owned factories, and to police communications. The Tudeh-backed Central United Council of Trade Unions sponsored a rash of unauthorized strikes, Tudeh members seized factories at Isfahan, and party speakers at Abadan heaped abuse on the government and the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company, all without governmental opposition. In June a preliminary agreement was reached between Qavam and the "Azerbaijan Democratic Government," while Abbas Eskandari, brother of the Tudeh Party leader, was named mayor of Tehran; in August, Qavam named three prominent Tudeh leaders to his cabinet, thus enabling them to place loyal followers in important government posts, even in such former right-wing strongholds as Yazd and Kerman. (THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 4) (IMG)

In the letter to Stalin, Pishvari had stated:

Secondly, now that Qavam has started the war and spilled the blood of our brothers, let us also put pressure upon him from all sides, so that in this way the freedom-fighters may rise up all over Iran, and a great movement throughout Iran shall emerge to overthrow the reactionary government of Tehran and to establish a democratic government instead.

If this is not good, let us cut ties with Tehran completely and establish our own national government. Whichever policy the Soviet state will choose, we can execute it honorably and succeed.

(Pishevari's Letter to Stalin, December 8, 1946) (IMG)

Note that People's Democratic Azerbaijan had still not officially separated from Iran, and had instead argued that it was fighting for sovereignty and autonomy – not separation. Upon the suggestion of the Soviet officials, the Azeri Democrats had argued so, but the point of non-separation had not been understood. Pishevari's assessment was that, preferably, all of Iran should be conquered by the progressive and democratic forces, with Azerbaijan serving as a major base for this move. Should this Plan A not succeed, Pishevari held, then the Azeri Democrats should pursue Plan B which is the establishment of a Azerbaijan's 'own national government' completely separate from Tehran. Pishevari was not incorrect to say that Plan A should be the revolutionary takeover of the whole of the country and that separation should be pursued only if Plan A fails. Where Pishevari was mistaken, however, was in his assessment of the revolutionary situation in Iran, which clearly did not exist. Such was why Stalin replied:

There is no strong revolutionary situation in Iran. In Iran, the number of workers is small and they are not well organized. Iran's peasants still do not show serious activity. [Unlike Tsarist Russia in 1905 and 1917] Iran is not in a war against a foreign enemy that will weaken the [reactionary regime] circles through a military defeat. As a result, the conditions in Iran are unlike the effective tactics of 1905 and 1917. (Stalin's Letter to Pishevari, May 8, 1946. The full text of this document has been released by the Russian history magazine, Novaya I Noveishaya Istoriya, Nr. 3, May-June 1994. The text of this letter can be found in the Islamic Republic of Iran's 'Political Studies and Research Institute' (PSRI) as well as USA's 'Wilson Center'.) (IMG)

The content of Stalin's letter to Pishevari, as mentioned previously, shows that the Soviets wanted Azerbaijan to be a part of Iran, so that this sovereign People's Democratic Azerbaijan would conquer many of the resources in its territory and would operate as a base which shall destabilize the central government of Iran, allowing communist and progressive intelligence penetration to its higher ranks – such was why the Tudeh Party was able to obtain positions in the cabinet – driving a wedge between Iran and its patron, the British Empire. Had Azerbaijan officially separated from Iran, it would have been difficult for it to launch a military assault on the central government at the opportune time because such a military assault would have been denounced as an "Azeri invasion of Iran," whereas Azerbaijan staying in Iran would have been regarded as an "Azeri people's uprising against the central regime" – huge differences in international law implications and propaganda effects. In time, a militarily sovereign Mahabad plus a militarily sovereign Azerbaijan could help in launching a major rebellion to overthrow the central regime of Iran and then establish a territorially integral Peoples' Democratic Iran in which the democratic freedoms and cultures of all ethnicities are respected, while territorially integrity is pursued along with military and economic recentralization as basis for the rise of a powerful socialist Iran. This Soviet policy was class-wise diametrically opposite, but strategically analogous, to the present-day policy of Israel and the United States concerning Iraqi Kurdistan; contrary to Arab bourgeois-nationalist assumptions, and contrary to what Israel itself pretends, the CIA and Mossad do not support the full separation of Kurdistan from Iraq; the CIA and Mossad both support the full military autonomy of a reactionary Iraqi Kurdistan region strictly without the full separation of Iraqi Kurdistan from Iraq – that is so, because the continued existence of reactionary militarily autonomous regime in Iraqi Kurdistan yields a powerful American-Israeli base inside Iraq, allowing them to use that base and Kurdish bourgeois-nationalist 'fifth column' to launch rebellions against the central government of Iraq, rather than have a separate Kurdistan invade Arab Iraq. The CIA and Mossad support such a militarily autonomous Kurdistan region against the Iran-backed central government of Iraq from inside Iraq, as a step towards destabilizing the central government, and then bringing about in the Arab parts of Iraq the ISIS terrorists that then 'ethnically recentralize' Iraq, by savagely terrorizing and suppressing the Kurdish people, and then the CIA and Mossad strengthen this ISIS terror regime as a bulwark against Iran. The same goes for why the Anglo-American and German imperialists in the 1990s and 2000s fought for the military autonomy of Kosovo but not the full separation of Kosovo from Serbia – a NATO-backed so-called "Kosovar people's heroic rebellion against the Russian-backed chauvinist central government of Serbia" would have sounded very differently than a NATO-backed "separate Kosovar state's invasion against poor Serbia" both in terms of the international law implications and in terms of propaganda effects. The Soviet policy concerning the support for People's Democratic Azerbaijan and People's Democratic Mahabad was the socialist pro-democratic anti-fascist anti-imperialist version of the Anglo-American-German and Israeli strategy concerning Iraqi Kurdistan and Kosovo. Military federalization as a step towards the installation of a new government that then recentralizes the military – such a strategy is sometimes more effective than full partition.

As always, MI6 agent Beria had a radically different vision of the situation. Luckily for Beria, Mir Ja'far Bagirov, the First Secretary of the Azerbaijan Communist Party in the Azerbaijan SSR, was on his side. Sergo Beria wrote:

My father's relations were excellent with the First Secretary of the Azerbaijan Communist Party, Jafar Bagirov. The two men had no secrets from each other. (...). This man spoke Turkish and Iranian perfectly, had a lively mind, was able to find his bearings quickly in the most diverse situations, and had shown himself to be a competent administrator, well informed about the oil industry. He ... believed in neither God nor the devil, and still less in communism. His first wife died giving birth to a son. He remarried, to an animated German woman who brought with her three sisters and their mother.

'It's a real harem,' said my mother, laughing at all these women, of whom she was nonetheless very fond. In order to house his tribe Bagirov had to have a house built, and this brought down on him a shower of criticisms. Bagirov was reviving the Turkish way of life, he was organising a brothel, and so on ... whereas the persons involved were perfectly civilised German ladies.

(Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 300) (IMG)

Forget not that Bagirov had been responsible for recruiting the Menshevik/Musavat spy for the MI6, Lavrenti Beria, into the Bolshevik Cheka. Long before the Great Patriotic War,:

Being a Georgian, Beria could not be given the command of the Cheka in Azerbaijan; therefore, Bagirov, who was a Turk Azerbaijani, headed it. In reality, however, the Baku Cheka was run by Beria. ('Bagirov, M D/Beria, L P', CIA, August 19, 1953, p. 1) (IMG)

Beria wanted the Azerbaijan Socialist Soviet Republic to cease to become a socialist state, to separate from the USSR, and most importantly, to join Royalist Iran. Some time in late 1945 or 1946, in a conversation with his loyal supporter Bagirov, Beria suggested:

You would do better to think of attaching your Azerbaijan to Iran! ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 202) (IMG)

In other words, Beria was aiming to help the Iranian regime, comprador terror regime allied to Anglo-American finance capital, to steal the Soviet Union's oil resources by taking over the Azerbaijan SSR. The drive to destroy socialism and liquidate the dictatorship of the proletariat in the Azerbaijan SSR required extensive levels of sabotage at every level. Bagirov's project to corrupt the Azerbaijan SSR would have served precisely that end. The First Secretary of the Azerbaijan Communist Party, indeed a staunch anti-communist, lived the decadent life of a corrupt official, engaging in nepotism, providing a special privilege for his own clan, and controlling a brothel and a harem made up of German women.

The corruption of the Bagirov gang on the one hand created a network of privileged elites in the Azerbaijan Communist Party, a corrupt bureaucratic class hostile to Soviet power, workers' statehood, and scientific socialism. On the other hand, it would have served to drive a wedge between the state and the masses, foster resentment among some towards the USSR, and thereby pave the way for the collapse of the Azerbaijan SSR and its subsequent separation from the Union.

The Soviets had tried to stay in Azerbaijan. However, the pressure of international law caused the Soviet Union to withdraw. In the letter to Ja'far Pishevari, Stalin had stated that the Soviet Red Army withdrew from Iran because it aimed to take up the issue of international law to expose Anglo-American imperialist hypocrisy concerning the military occupation of the many colonies of the British Empire:

Certainly, if the Soviet forces remained in Iran, you could count on success in the revolutionary demands of the people of Azerbaijan. However, we could no longer keep the Soviet troops in Iran, primarily because their continued presence in Iran would disrupt the foundation of our liberationist policies in Europe and Asia. The British and Americans told us that if the Soviet forces can stay in Iran, then why cannot the British forces stay in Egypt, Syria, Indonesia, Greece, and similarly why cannot the American forces stay in China, Iceland and Denmark? For this reason, we decided to withdraw the troops from Iran and China in order to take this excuse from the hands of the British and Americans, to fuel the liberation movement in the colonies and thus make our liberation policy more legitimate and effective. (Stalin's Letter to Pishevari, May 8, 1946. The full text of this document has been released by the Russian history magazine, Novaya I Noveishaya Istoriya, Nr. 3, May-June 1994. The text of this letter can be found in the Islamic Republic of Iran's 'Political Studies and Research Institute' (PSRI) as well as USA's 'Wilson Center'.) (IMG)

The withdrawal of the Soviet Red Army forces, however, allowed the comprador military of Iran's central government to fight against the Democratic forces in Mahabad/Kurdistan and Azerbaijan, paving the way for the restoration of Iranian regime rule. The Iranian regime then launched its fascist war to "liberate" Azerbaijan and to restore feudalism and corruption. The CIA operative Richard Cottam wrote:

After the liberation of Azerbaijan, the Status quo ante returned. Turkish books and the Turkish press were destroyed, and the Persian language was once again taught; the Army and feudal landowners again controlled the Azerbaijan Majlis delegation; and the general policy of sloth, corruption, and neglect returned. (Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, p. 129) (IMG)

The military defeat of these Democratic forces reduced the lobbying power of the Tudeh Party, allowing Qavam to quickly oust the Tudeh Party agents encircling him in the cabinet:

The mushrooming of Tudeh influence was soon checked, however. Qavam was already becoming annoyed with the Tudeh Party because of its pressure for ratification of the Soviet oil concession agreement and for specific concessions in the forthcoming elections, and when the powerful Qashqai tribes openly rebelled against the ascendancy of Tudeh leaders in the government, he moved effectively. Quickly making an agreement with the Qashqais, he dismissed the Tudeh mayor of Tehran, forced the Tudeh members out of his cabinet, and stressed the rapid expansion of his own newly formed political party, the Democrats of Iran.

(THE TUDEH PARTY: VEHICLE OF COMMUNISM IN IRAN (ORE 23-49), CIA, July 18, 1949, p. 4) (IMG)

When the royalist regime of Iran fully crushed People's Democratic Azerbaijan, many of the Democratic Army militants sought refuge in the Azerbaijan SSR. Many including Pishevari himself were accepted. However, in the midst of this process, Bagirov made sure to filter out as many Democratic Army refugees as he could:

Although some of the leaders were given refuge, Bagirov relayed that all others should stay put, surrender to the Iranian authorities and play the final act of the tragedy. Many of the democrats were killed in the early months of 1947, while most of the leaders managed to survive the worst phase of repression in December 1946 in the safe haven of Baku, and many others continued fighting in the hills until early summer 1947. (Origins of the Cold War: An International History, Melvyn Leffler, David S. Painter, p. 107) (IMG)

According to Jamil Hasanli – an Azerbaijani government official and a scholar of the CIA-backed Wilson Center – a prominent Soviet intelligence official stated, during the trials of Bagirov, that there was a 'coordinated' attempt 'to kill Pishevari' through a 'car accident':

In the meanwhile, former chief of the Yevlakh regional KGB department Salayev Latif Samed oglu declared as follows: "I believe that the car accident was coordinated to kill Pishevari." Salayev's evidence made it clear that attempts had been made to seek the instigators of the car accident abroad. The blame for this crime was laid on Karnik Melikhyan, driver of Pishevari's car. ('Khrushchev's Thaw and National Identity in Soviet Azerbaijan, 1954-1959'. Jamil Hasanli, 2014, p. 71) (IMG)

The testimony of the Soviet intelligence official was occurring during a time in which Beria's agents throughout the USSR were being purged in 1953, and Bagirov was among them. The Soviet intelligence official added:

after Pishevari's death, chief of the Shamkhor regional KGB department Sarkisov Ruben Mirzayevich told me that before the accident he had been aware of the fact that driver Melikhyan was a son of Dashaks' leader.... ('Khrushchev's Thaw and National Identity in Soviet Azerbaijan, 1954-1959'. Jamil Hasanli, p. 71) (IMG)

Another close relative of Melikhiyan was described by Salayev as having:

worked in the British Embassy to Iran. ('Khrushchev's Thaw and National Identity in Soviet Azerbaijan, 1954-1959'. Jamil Hasanli, p. 71) (IMG)

A 2006 work by Teyyub Qurban was a prominent Azerbaijani intellectual. A graduate of journalism studies, he was a researcher defending the legacy of the Beria agent Bagirov, and was linked to the MI6-run Musavat Party, the Party which Beria served in the early days of the October Revolution and the Civil War. Qurban's work serves to corroborate the remarks by the Soviet intelligence official, and provides additional details. Qurban started by saying:

The guests were welcomed by General Qulam Yahya in whose 'Hudson' car they began driving towards Shaki, in the calm of night. Who was the driver of the 'Hudson' car? Karnik Melikhiyan. (Strong Personalities from the Enemies. Original Azerbaijani title: Düşmənlərindən güclü şəxsiyyət. Teyyub Qurban, Baku, 2006, p. 34) (IMG)

Referring to Melikhiyan, the author confirmed:

His dad was a leader of the Dashnak partisans in Iran. His wife at the time worked in the British Embassy in Iran. The local MGB branch of the Azerbaijan SSR provided him with a personal card after the car accident. (Strong Personalities from the Enemies. Original Azerbaijani title: Düşmənlərindən güclü şəxsiyyət. Teyyub Qurban, Baku, 2006, p. 34) (IMG)

The Dashnaks in the USSR, as the local assistants of the British intelligence service, had invited the British Empire to invade the Soviet Union. With his wife working in the British Embassy, and his father for the British-backed guerrillas, the perpetrators of the crime should become increasingly clear. Moreover, Melikhiyan apparently possessed an amount of money worth a thousand Manats as well as a gun:

During a search [of his pockets], an amount of money worth 1,000 Manats as well as a 'Walther' gun were found. (Strong Personalities from the Enemies. Original Azerbaijani title: Düşmənlərindən güclü şəxsiyyət. Teyyub Qurban, Baku, 2006, p. 34) (IMG)

Qurban continued:

The driver insincerely claimed that the accident was not his fault. He claimed that while driving, he fell asleep. (Strong Personalities from the Enemies. Original Azerbaijani title: Düşmənlərindən güclü şəxsiyyət. Teyyub Qurban, Baku, 2006, p. 34) (IMG)

Melikhiyan's claim is by no means convincing; after all, the rhetorical question to be asked is why Melikhiyan saw virtually no harm during the car accident, whereas Pischevari was horrifically injured:

No one [seems to have] asked the driver as to why, in spite of the fact that the steering wheel in front of you [i.e. the driver] was split in half, you were not hurt at all, whereas sitting beside you, Pischevari had his rib crushed, his leg broken, and his head injured? (Strong Personalities from the Enemies. Original Azerbaijani title: Düşmənlərindən güclü şəxsiyyət. Teyyub Qurban, Baku, 2006, p. 34) (IMG)

Even Jamil Hasanli, the official advisor to the Anglo-American puppet despot in Azerbaijan, admitted Melikhiyan's role in the matter. In enforcing the will of those whom Hasanli called the 'the true perpetrators of the crime' of murdering Pischevari, Hasanli agreed that 'Melikhiyan was directly involved':

Beyond any doubts, Melikyan was directly involved in this provocation. ('Khrushchev's Thaw and National Identity in Soviet Azerbaijan, 1954-1959'. Jamil Hasanli, p. 71) (IMG)

Though injured during the car 'accident', Pischevari did not yet die. However, adequate medical care and aid for him was deliberately withheld by the killer-doctors around him. After briefly 'recovering consciousness' in the hospital on the 11th of that month, Qurban noted, Pischevari:

demanded from the doctors that they bring his brother from Baku; his brother was a doctor and a surgeon. (Strong Personalities from the Enemies. Original Azerbaijani title: Düşmənlərindən güclü şəxsiyyət. Teyyub Qurban, Baku, 2006, p. 34) (IMG)

However, this demand was completely ignored and:

Instead they brought Dr. Asriyan from the Stepankert City. Pischevari asked to see his twenty-year-old son from Ganja next to him. Who could be closer to the father than his son at the most difficult moment of his life. His son was not informed. Had he been informed, he would have surely discovered the criminal plot and would have rushed to his father's help. (Strong Personalities from the Enemies. Original Azerbaijani title: Düşmənlərindən güclü şəxsiyyət. Teyyub Qurban, Baku, 2006, p. 34) (IMG)

That day, on the 11th of June 1947, Pischevari passed away. However, when did the actual team of surgeons come to perform the surgery on Pischevari? They did not arrive until one day after Pischevari died:

Only one day after, on the 12th [of June] the team of doctors and nurses arrived with the plane to Baku. But it was too late. Pischevari did not recover during the surgery. (Strong Personalities from the Enemies. Original Azerbaijani title: Düşmənlərindən güclü şəxsiyyət. Teyyub Qurban, Baku, 2006, p. 34) (IMG)

The Soviet intelligence official Latif Samad-Oglu, a witness during the trials of Mir Ja'far Bagirov years later, said:

I was in the USSR's domestic intelligence service from 1930 to 1950, and from 1944 to 1949 I was in charge of the Soviet intelligence service's branch in Yolakh. In June 1947, 14 kilometers from Yolakh, Pischevari's car had an accident. As soon as I was informed of this incident, I went there and found the 'Hudson' car there which had been torn apart. The car had hit the fence near the bridge. There had been four people inside the car, but in the site of the incident, only the car driver Karnik Melikhiyan was there alive. He had the documents related to the other people in the car and was standing there. When I searched him, I found 10,000 manat [note: 'manat' is how Azeris referred to the Soviet currency] and a 'Walther' gun. I drew the croquis [i.e. visual sketch] of the incident and returned to Yolakh. I went to the hospital, Pischevari was still conscious. His leg and part of his spine were broken and his head was damaged. Qoliyev was also conscious. General Gholam-Yahya was mildly injured but since his face was wounded, he could not speak. I asked Pischevari to speak of the car accident. He told me that during the night, he was a guest of Nazar Heydarov, the head of the Kirov-Abad Oil Exploration Department. 'We ate dinner there and were resting', Pischevari said, adding 'At 4 AM in the morning Qoliyev suggested that we go to Nukha because Nukha was his birthplace...'

In the end, Pischevari used the word 'treason' several times and said: 'I endured 11 years of solitary confinement in Iran, Reza Shah and his Qavam did not succeed in eliminating me, but now, with such a stab in the back, they reached their goal.'

I asked Pischevari why he thought such and told him that after all, the car and the driver are your own. Pischevari responded: 'The car and the driver are both Gholam-Yahya's'.

Pischevari told me that he would never sit in the front of the car and beside the driver, but this time they had made him sit beside the driver. In the midst of our chat, Pischevari started feeling not good, and asked for help. I immediately contacted Yemiliyanov in Baku and let him know about it. Approximately 5 to 6 hours later, the airplane came. Karimov, the deputy minister, Soleiman, the deputy minister of health, and Dr. Zolfaqar Mohammadev, Major-General Sarjialinski, and the nurses all came with this airplane.

Professor Zolfaqar Mohammadev personally took charge of the surgery of Pischevari. Upon my request, specialist doctor Qasim-khan Talishinski from Ganja City and the surgeon Asriyan from Karabakh reached there as well.

The driver Melikhiyan said that during the night he had fell asleep and this caused the accident but in order for him to not die, he used all his might and his two hands to steer the wheel [so to turn such that he would not die] thereby causing the wheel to break. This [self-contradictory story from Melikhiyan] shows that he actually was not sleeping and was conscious prior to the incident [hence why he was able to steer before the collision]. I feel that this incident was not at all a real ‘accident’, but rather was a deliberate premeditated attempt at murdering Pischevari. I have reached this conclusion based on the following reasons:

- 1) There was no need to take the craft to Nukha at night. It was not necessary to drive a car at a speed of 90 km.
- 2) [Pischevari] was not riding in his own car, and the driver was not his own driver. Rather, he went with Gholam-Yahya's car. And these could not be coincidence.

After this incident, Sarkisov Reuben Mirzayevich, the head of the Soviet intelligence in the Shamkhor District told me that the driver Melikhiyan was a son of the leader of Iranian Dashnak forces and his mother Pliyak Gala was working in the British Embassy. For this reason, Sarkisov Reuben Mirzayevich found Melikhiyan to be suspicious. He starts working on his case, and demands information from the Azerbaijan intelligence, and finds out that Melikhiyan had recently been licensed [as an agent] by the Alpha branch of Azerbaijan's intelligence.

Colonel Fursov, who was in charge of the security in the Nakhichevan region, told me after this car ‘accident’ that long before the ‘accident’, he had reported via a telegram to Yemiliyanov, the head of the intelligence service in the Azeri SSR, that Melikhiyan is a foreign intelligence operative. However, the Azeri branch of Soviet intelligence did not heed to such warnings, and Melikhiyan continued to be the driver for Gholam-Yahya and trusted him so much that he even took Pischevari for travelling.

But what is [even more] significant is that all of the people linked to the death of Pischevari were later subjected to harassment by Bagirov and Yemiliyanov. Sarkisov Reuben Mirzayevic, the head of the Soviet intelligence in the Shamkhor zone lost his job in the intelligence, and is now the manager of a public bath. They also purged me from the Soviet intelligence service's ranks and I am now a manager of a school. Farajov was a minister in Nakhichevan, but was demoted to the head of a local branch. By contrast, Nuri Qoiyev was the head of a secretariat but after this event got the position of a deputy minister.

(...). It is also worth mentioning other facts, such as the fact that Pischevari, after being severely wounded, insisted on having his son near him. And his 20 years old son was in Kirov-Abad. It would have taken merely an hour at most, for his son to come and meet him. However, they [the people responsible] did not pay attention. They feared that Pischevari might tell his son about the deliberate nature of the car ‘accident’.

C17S4. The Mahabad Republic  IMG-All-{Iran}

Simultaneous with the Azeri uprising, there came the Kurdish People's Democratic uprising in Mahabad, a more developed district of the Kurdistan province of Iran. The Kurdish revolutionary Qazi Mohammad and the communists and progressives in his team had the support of the people in Mahabad. The British military commander Edgar O'Ballance admitted that Qazi Mohammad was highly popular in Mahabad, the territory of the people's republic. O'Ballance wrote:

While extremely popular in Mahabad, Qazi Mohammad was distrusted by many Kurds because of his seeming friendship with the godless Soviets, and the fact that during the First World War the [Tsarist] Russians had sacked the city. (‘The Kurdish Struggle, 1920-94’, Edgar O'Ballance, 1995 p. 29) (IMG)

Mahabad was a more economically developed area of Kurdistan, and was the dream place of many Kurds in Iran. The progressive classes were stronger in that area, a factor explaining in the popularity of Qazi Mohamad among the Mahabadi people as in contrast with his lack of popularity in the rest of Kurdistan. While Azerbaijani Democrats were leading the struggle against imperialism at the time,:

In Mahabad in November 1945 Qazi Mohammed announced that the Komola would become the Kurdistan Democratic Party of Iran (KDPI), and although he held no formal office in this new political party he continued to dominate it. Its aims were autonomy for the Kurds, not complete independence. (‘The Kurdish Struggle, 1920-94’, Edgar O'Ballance, 1995 p. 28) (IMG)

Note that:

The KDPI was distinct and separate from Barzani's KDP. (‘The Kurdish Struggle, 1920-94’, Edgar O'Ballance, 1995 p. 28) (IMG)

The letter ‘I’ in KDPI makes it clear that the leadership of this organization at least officially regarded the Kurdish people as belonging to Iran, and as confirmed by the British commander O'Ballance, the aim of the KDPI was not separation from Iran, but rather autonomy. The autonomy would be socio-cultural, political, and economic:

A Provisional Council of Kurdistan was to be formed. The party's manifesto was a nationalist one, including the use of the Kurdish language. [Most] officials were ... Kurdish, there would be self-government in local affairs and Kurdish revenues would be spent in Kurdish areas. (‘The Kurdish Struggle, 1920-94’, Edgar O'Ballance, 1995 p. 28) (IMG)

The Soviets – Stalin himself included – did not support the full separation of Kurdistan from Iran, because as mentioned before, Mahabad and Azerbaijan were important bases through which regime change in the rest of Iran could be pursued; in time, a militarily sovereign Mahabad plus a militarily sovereign Azerbaijan could help in launching a major rebellion to overthrow the central regime of Iran and then establish a centralized Peoples' Democratic order in all of Iran in which the democratic freedoms and cultures of all ethnicities are respected.

However, in light of the fact that Iran's regime was chauvinistic towards the Kurdish population, and was furthering its collaboration with the Anglo-American imperialists, the fighters for the Kurdish autonomy needed to raise their defenses. The Soviets provided provide military assistance so that the Kurds could defend their newly-gained sovereignty. The war-torn USSR, which did not have nuclear arms yet, was facing a nuclear-armed USA. As such, the Soviets were not able to guarantee the defense of the People's Republic of Mahabad. Nonetheless the Soviets provided as much military assistance as possible in the face of Anglo-American-backed central government:

Qazi Mohammed had two major problems, the first being that the Soviets refused to guarantee the defence of his new republic. The second was that his only means of defence were small groups of armed followers of various sheikhs who had promised allegiance, but these were mercurial, undisciplined and of doubtful reliability. Work was in progress to organise government services and it was also decided to raise a standing army. A Soviet officer was sent to form and train it. (‘The Kurdish Struggle, 1920-94’, Edgar O'Ballance, 1995 pp. 29-30) (IMG)

The USSR also provided aid to this newly established government in the media sphere. Shortly after the establishment of the republic:

A Soviet printing press arrived [in Mahabad].... ('The Kurdish Struggle, 1920-94', Edgar O'Ballance, 1995 p. 28) (IMG)
Because of the chauvinist attitude of the CIA-MI6-backed regime in Iran, the circumstances were polarized such that pro-independence rhetoric was growing. Thus, in Mahabad:

a Kurdish newspaper, Kurdistan, was published, which began openly to advocate independence. ('The Kurdish Struggle, 1920-94', Edgar O'Ballance, 1995 p. 28) (IMG)

The central government of Iran no doubt benefited from such pro-independence rhetoric in the newspaper because it would have helped it in depicting Qazi Mohammad and other Kurdish freedom-fighters who sought autonomy – as opposed to fully separation – as 'separatists' or as people who sought to partition Iran, hence weakening the image of the KDPI. Having said that, and regardless, the chauvinism of the central government nonetheless made the call for mere 'autonomy' superficially appear less and less reasonable, and thus the call for independence began to make more sense. In this situation, there came:

a small consignment of Soviet arms, believed to be about 1200 rifles and pistols, as well as bundles of Soviet military uniforms. The euphoria generated by the Kurds in Mahabad was such that on 11 December 1945 the new Kurdish national flag was hoisted in the town. On to this scene arrived Mullah Mustafa Barzani and his '9000 followers' in November. At first he was treated with suspicious reserve as he was thought to be in the pay of the British. However Qazi Mohammed, whose defence forces were negligible, cautiously welcomed Barzani and agreed that he and his allies could stay in areas just to the north-east of the town, and that a number could actually live in Mahabad. In view of Barzani's military strength and his own weakness, Qazi Mohammed could do no other. ('The Kurdish Struggle, 1920-94', Edgar O'Ballance, 1995 p. 28) (IMG)

By early 1946, the USSR increased its military aid to the Mahabad forces:

The Mahabad army received two more small consignments of arms in February 1946, believed to consist of about 5000 rifles, a few machine guns, ammunition and some petrol bombs (Eagleton, 1963). At a later date it also received a few Soviet and American military vehicles. These were by no means free gifts as the Soviets took the whole of the republic's tobacco crop in exchange.

At its maximum, in theory at least, the Mahabad army consisted of '70 officers, 40 non-commissioned officers and 1200 soldiers' (Chaliand, 1993). Most of the officers had formerly served in the Iranian or Iraqi armies, or auxiliary services, but many were at once seconded to undertake essential jobs in the administration, so the army was always under-officered.

The Mahabad army remained in or near Mahabad and never achieved any degree of effectiveness, becoming a sort of presidential guard. The real defence of the republic continued to rest in the hands of those tribal sheikhs who were able to muster groups of armed fighting men. Soon the army, as well as members of the government and officials, were clad in Soviet-style uniforms.

On 31 March the Mahabad government appointed four generals, one of whom was Mullah Mustafa Barzani. He proudly retained his rank and used it for the rest of his life. Barzani's personal armed following remained intact and apart, distrusting the Mahabad government. In fact Barzani was secretly lobbying the Soviet authorities to appoint him president in place of Qazi Mohammed, who seemed at times to lose control of events. However the Soviets refused as they did not trust Barzani, and in any case they no longer cared as they were in the process of withdrawing.

On 9 May 1946 the last Soviet troops pulled out from Iran.... The Iranian army, which had mustered about 13000 troops, had been marching towards Mahabad since early April. Probably about 12 000 armed Kurdish tribesmen were available for defence (Eagleton, 1963), all still under the control of their own sheikhs, and a large proportion of them set off to defend their vague frontiers. For example contingents from the Shikaki and the Herki tribes moved to an area just north of Baneh.

The Soviets and Qazi Mohammad, as noted previously, rightly distrusted the Titoist renegade Mustafa Barzani, but Barzani, ever the opportunist, had launched some military strikes against the British imperialist forces in Iraq. Despite being led by a renegade, Barzani's troops nonetheless had anti-British sentiments and had been well-trained. As such, Qazi Mohammad and the Soviets had to coopt the Barzani forces, even though behind the scenes, they regarded him as an enemy. As a result, the troops under the command of Mustafa Barzani were armed by the Soviets as well:

Mustafa Barzani had managed to obtain a share of the Soviet-provided arms, said to be some 1200 rifles, which would bring his armed element up to the 3000 mark (Eagleton, 1963). Barzani marched south towards Saqqiz to counter a small Iranian force that had left that town on 24 April and was moving towards Mahabad. The Iranians were ambushed and the prisoners were sent to Mahabad. This boosted the Barzanis' military reputation to such an extent that the government began to plan for a Kurdish, meaning Barzani, advance southwards to occupy as much Kurdish territory as possible. ('The Kurdish Struggle, 1920-94', Edgar O'Ballance, 1995 p. 31) (IMG)

Indeed, the Soviet arming of Barzani's troops paid off because his troops really did combat the imperialists. Nonetheless, when the Soviets further retreated from Mahabad due to the previous agreement for Soviet troops to leave northern Iran, the intelligence presence of the USSR and the People's Democratic forces declined in that territory, meaning that Mustafa Barzani was less under pressure to perform well. This gave Barzani the opportunity to reveal a part of his covert face, which was that of a traitor. At this critical time, the diversionary group of Barzani opened the way for the fascist occupation forces of the Iranian regime to cross through, and hence to undermine the Mahabad republic:

The Barzanis had taken up positions in mountains overlooking roads leading from Saqqiz to both Baneh and Sardasht (to the south-west), and so were able to block the Iranian advance. On 3 May, under an impromptu agreement between Mullah Mustafa Barzani and Iranian commanders, the Barzanis withdrew a little way to allow the Iranians road access to their beleaguered garrisons. This did not go down very well in Mahabad, where the government was planning to concentrate its forces at Saqqiz, preparatory to an offensive southwards to Sanandaj. ('The Kurdish Struggle, 1920-94', Edgar O'Ballance, 1995 p. 31) (IMG)

Increased Iranian military pressure caused differences to arise between Kurds, especially tribal Kurds and urban ones in Mahabad. ('The Kurdish Struggle, 1920-94', Edgar O'Ballance, 1995 p. 31) (IMG)

Eventually, the Mahabad Republic was overthrown and Qazi Mohammad and his comrades were executed. Barzani was able to escape the scene.

C17S5. MI6 Satellite Turkey's Collaboration with the Nazi Germans during the Great Patriotic War / Turkey as an Avenue for an Anglo-American Assault on the Soviet Union / USSR Defending itself by Demanding Turkish Territory  IMG-All-{Turkey}

Well until the summer of 1941, Turkey's regime had collaborated with the Nazi Germans against the Soviets. In the words of a US military intelligence document:

both Turkey and Germany were hostile toward the Soviet Union.... (WARTIME ACTIVITIES OF THE GERMAN DIPLOMATIC AND MILITARY SERVICES DURING WORLD WAR II, U.S. Army, European Command. Intelligence Division, published online by CIA, p. 116) (IMG)

Thus, the Abwehr, the German intelligence service, closely cooperated with the Turkish intelligence against the USSR. The US intelligence reported that in the summer of 1941:

with passive and active assistance by Turkish intelligence, information was obtained [by the Abwehr] on Russian troops and their movements. At the same time the Turkish intelligence and the Abwehr employed their operatives interchangeably in assigning additional missions for more Russian information. Although the Turks assisted the Germans in regard to espionage against Soviet Russia, they were strictly neutral in matters concerning the Western Powers. (WARTIME ACTIVITIES OF THE GERMAN DIPLOMATIC AND MILITARY SERVICES DURING WORLD WAR II, U.S. Army, European Command. Intelligence Division, published online by CIA, p. 115) (IMG)

Note that the Abwehr, the intelligence agency of Nazi Germany, was heavily dominated by the MI6. Turkish intelligence cooperation with the Abwehr against the Soviet Union also marked the collaboration of Turkey with the MI6. By the time of the onset of Operation BARBAROSSA, however, the Turkish intelligence service, on behalf of the MI6, temporarily ceased cooperation with the Nazi Germans. The victory of the Soviets in the Battle of Stalingrad meant that the Anglo-American imperialists and their henchmen in Israel were to support Nazi Germany and the Axis forces as a bulwark against Soviet power. Hence, the Anglo-American intelligence services re-established their covert alliance with the Nazis some time in between late December 1942 or early January 1943. The alliance was reflected in Turkey and Iran as well. Indeed, the Anglo-German alliance was reflected in Turkey's increasingly friendly policy towards Germany. Firstly, note again that:

Throughout the war, Turkey, ... has remained a non-belligerent ally of Great Britain. (Great Britain and the Problem of the Turkish Straits, T-517, US Intelligence, H. N. Howard, January 24, 1945, p. 13) (IMG)

As a British satellite, Turkey permitted the entry of Axis warships through the Straits. In 1943, the Anglo-Americans overtly 'warned' Turkey against allowing Axis vessels through the Straits. Turkey officially accepted the Anglo-American call:

As the result of representations by the British Embassy and ourselves the Turkish Government has decided to hereafter prohibit the transit thru the Straits of so-called barges of which the Germans have thus far transited light.

The representations made by the British and ourselves were based on information to the effect that these so-called barges altho giving the outward appearance of being commercial vessels were built solely for military purposes and that on their arrival at Greek ports they discharge military supplies and the crews immediately don German naval uniforms.

The Turkish Government anticipates a vigorous protest from the German Embassy as soon as the prohibition is made effective, particularly as a considerable number of these barges have been constructed by the Germans during the past year in Bulgarian and Rumanian ports.

(767.68119/1044: Telegram, The Ambassador in Turkey (Steinhardt) to the Secretary of State, Ankara, September 8, 1943, FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES: DIPLOMATIC PAPERS, 1943. THE NEAR EAST AND AFRICA, Vol. 4, pp. 1086-1087) (IMG)

However, just a few months later, MI6 satellite Turkey once again permitted the entry of Axis naval units through the Straits:

The vessels which were passing through the Straits were of two types. The first were known as K.T. vessels, of about 800 tons, with a normal armament of two 3.7 inch guns and machine guns. The second were E.M.S. craft of about 40 or 50 tons, with a normal armament of one three pounder, machine guns and depth charges. The former could be used for transport of troops and supplies, the latter for various purpose, including submarine chasing. To obtain passage, the Germans dismantled their armaments, which was reinstalled on reaching the Aegean Sea. (Great Britain and the Problem of the Turkish Straits, T-517, US Intelligence, H. N. Howard, January 24, 1945, pp. 16) (IMG)

In response:

Moscow press and radio grew more and more hostile to the Turks and began ... criticizing the Turkish Government for having allowed Axis vessels passage through the Straits.... ('Turkey', SR-1/1, For: the Deputy Director, Joint Intelligence Group, & Joint Staff. CIA, December 22, 1948, p. 33) (IMG)

Again, in order to keep its alliance with the Axis covert, the British Empire overtly joined the Soviet Union in condemning Turkey's policy regarding German warships. As reported by a January 1945 US intelligence document,:

Early in June 1944 Great Britain officially protested against the use of the Straits by German warships which had been employed in the Black Sea. When Mr. Eden announced in the House of Commons on June 14, that Great Britain was profoundly disrupted by the fact that the Turkish Government, by allowing German vessel to pass through the Straits from the Black Sea into the Aegean, had helped to increase German naval strength in that region, Numan Menemencioglu, the Turkish Foreign Minister, who was responsible for the policy, was forced to resign. (Great Britain and the Problem of the Turkish Straits, T-517, US Intelligence, H. N. Howard, January 24, 1945, pp. 15-16) (IMG)

Foreign Minister Eden announced in the House of Commons that the British Government was "profoundly disturbed" by the fact that the Turkish Government, by allowing German vessels to pass through the Straits from the Black Sea into the Aegean, had helped to increase German naval strength in that region. As a result, Foreign Minister Menemencioglu was forced to resign. ('Turkey', SR-1/1, For: the Deputy Director, Joint Intelligence Group, & Joint Staff. CIA, December 22, 1948, p. 52) (IMG)

Behind the scenes, Britain could only thank its Middle Eastern satellite for allowing Germany to gain strength in the War as a bulwark against the Soviets. In this context, the best way for Turkey and Britain to continue to appear 'anti-Nazi' was for Turkey to declare war on Nazi Germany:

The resignation of Numan Menecioglu accelerated the development of Turkish policy toward a break with Germany, which took place on August 2, 1944. (Great Britain and the Problem of the Turkish Straits, T-517, US Intelligence, H. N. Howard, January 24, 1945, p. 16) (IMG)

The Soviets did not trust the Turkish declaration of war, whereas the British were satisfied as it covered up the collaboration of its satellite with the Third Reich:

Although the Soviet Government was distinctly reserved in its attitude toward the Turkish break with Germany, British Prime Minister Churchill announced the break in relations with Germany, with apparent satisfaction in his address to the House of Commons on August 2. (Great Britain and the Problem of the Turkish Straits, T-517, US Intelligence, H. N. Howard, January 24, 1945, p. 16) (IMG)

As a result of consistent Turkish regime treachery.:

On 19 March 1945, less than one month after Turkey's entry into the war, the USSR denounced the 1925 Soviet-Turkish pact of friendship, stating that it no longer conformed to current conditions and would therefore be allowed to lapse after its expiration on 7 November 1945. ('Turkey', SR-1/1, For: the Deputy Director, Joint Intelligence Group, & Joint Staff. CIA, December 22, 1948, p. 33) (IMG)

As shown in greater detail in C17S3, the Pentagon high command had developed Operation PINCHER, an American military contingency plan for invasion against the USSR, through a nuclear strike on Baku and the Caucasus oil fields and the march onto the Soviet heartland via the Soviet Caucasus. In March 1946, the US military finalized PINCHER, its studies on the plans for a potential Third World War against the USSR launched from the Middle East. At that same time, the leaders of treacherous Turkey pretended to be still on friendly terms with the Soviet Union even though the Soviet-Turkish Friendship Treaty of 1921 had expired in November 1945:

The Turkish Government officially accepted the Soviet statements at their face value and indicated its willingness to negotiate a new pact. ('Turkey', SR-1/1, For: the Deputy Director, Joint Intelligence Group, & Joint Staff. CIA, December 22, 1948, p. 33) (IMG)

The Soviets were not very interested in maintaining this relationship with Turkey. The history of betrayals by Turkey's government had sown distrust. Furthermore, the Soviets did not expect Turkey to accept the USSR's new terms and conditions for a new friendship treaty:

In conversation with the Turkish Ambassador in Moscow, however, Foreign Commissar Molotov showed how remote the possibility of agreement was, for he is reported to have demanded that any substitute agreement must provide special privileges for the USSR in the Straits and also territorial concessions in northeastern Turkey (in the Kars-Ardahan region). Moreover, later in the same year, the semi-official Moscow press commented favorably upon a claim made by two Georgian professors and published in a Tbilisi (Tiflis) periodical to an area of northeastern Turkey which, it was said, should be annexed by historical right to the Georgian SSR. ('Turkey', SR-1/1, For: the Deputy Director, Joint Intelligence Group, & Joint Staff. CIA, December 22, 1948, p. 33) (IMG)

Thus, in late:

1946 the USSR demanded a share in the control of the Straits and the right to station Soviet troops there. (SUBJECT: NIE-9: TURKEY'S POSITION IN THE EAST-WEST STRUGGLE, Office of National Estimates, CIA, February 20, 1951, p. 4) (IMG)

unofficially claimed the Kars plateau area in northeastern Turkey. (SUBJECT: NIE-9: TURKEY'S POSITION IN THE EAST-WEST STRUGGLE, Office of National Estimates, CIA, February 20, 1951, pp. 3-4) (IMG)

This foreign policy maneuver of the USSR was by no means aggressive. For one, Turkey had stabbed the Soviet Union in the back numerous times. From 1941 onwards, Turkish intelligence closely collaborated with the Nazi Germany's intelligence service in spying on the USSR. Between 1943 and 1944, Turkey, as a British satellite, had actively collaborated with the Third Reich by allowing German vessels through the Straits. For another, the Soviet demands were not forced on Turkey and therefore did not violate international law. Turkish stabs in the back of the Soviet Union and the consequent end of the Friendship Treaty created a reasonable pretext for getting those Turkish-occupied territories back. Geo-strategically, the Soviet Union, by liberating the oppressed ethnic groups such as the Georgians and Armenians in eastern Turkey, was also creating a buffer zone against an Anglo-American-Turkish aggression against the Soviet Caucasus. In Leffler's words:

In fact, despite the rhetoric about the Soviet expansionist thrust southward, military analysts and civilian officials acknowledged that Soviet demands on Turkey had a substantial defensive component. "Soviet pressure in the Middle East," concluded the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) in March 1946, "has for its primary objective the protection of the vital Ploesti, Kharkov and Baku areas." Three months later, in a comprehensive assessment of Soviet intentions in the Middle East, British intelligence emphasized Soviet efforts to move the center of Soviet industry eastward, to safeguard the Caucasian oil fields, and to protect the development of Soviet resources from prospective attack. In their report to the president, Clifford and Elsey also noted that "the Near East is an area of great strategic interest to the Soviet Union because of the shift of Soviet industry to southeastern Russia, within range of air attack from much of the Near East." And in November 1946, in a still more detailed assessment of the region, United States war planners stressed that the Soviet Union wanted to control the eastern Mediterranean and Persian Gulf areas in order "to deny them as possible enemy air, sea, and ground offensive bases. By this increase in the depth of her southerly territorial border, the Soviets would greatly increase the security of their vital areas from air attack and from seizure by ground forces." (Safeguarding Democratic Capitalism: US Foreign Policy and National Security, 1920-1950. Melvyn P. Leffler, 2017, p. 172. Turkish leaders of course refused to accept Soviet demands. From the West of the Caucasus, the USSR remained vulnerable to an American nuclear and conventional strike. Throughout all of those years, the United States invested heavily into building up the Turkish air force, which could assist the United States in bombing the oil fields of not only Soviet Caucasus but also Romania:

Accordingly, next to the army, the Turkish air force was the largest recipient of United States assistance. During 1948, for example, the United States transferred over one hundred eighty F-47s, thirty B-26s, and eighty-six C-47s. Smaller numbers of jet fighters began arriving in 1950 and 1951. At the same time, the United States placed a great deal of stress on reconstructing and resurfacing Turkish airfields at places such as Bandirma and Diyarbakir. As a result, Turkey began to develop the capability to attack vital Soviet petroleum resources in Rumania and in the Caucasus; Ploesti and Baku, for example, came within range of the F-47s and the B-26s. Even more important, the rehabilitation of Turkish airfields and the construction of new ones, at Adana for example, meant that if war erupted the United States would be able to bring in its own B-29s to bomb the Soviet Union. Secretary of the Air Force W. Stuart Symington and Secretary of Defense Forrestal were contemplating that contingency in early 1948. A more systematic effort to achieve such bombing capability was inaugurated in late 1949; significant progress toward that goal was expected during 1952. C17S6. Soviets Strengthen Defenses  IMG-All-{Iran}

After the military defeat of the People's Democratic movements in Azerbaijan and Kurdistan in Iran, the Soviets, knowing that the Anglo-Americans plotted an invasion of the USSR via Iran, laid plans to fortify their borders. A CIA document on this matter is as follows:

The following was contained in a speech given in March 1947 by Colonel Hladko, member of the Soviet Army General Staff and of the All-Union Communist Party.

Theory Concerning US/British Plan of Attack

1. Soviet leaders believe that US and British political and operational plans for attack on the USSR include the following military operations:

(a) Action on several fronts, with the main attack through Turkey and Iran, where troop concentrations will cut off Soviet access to oil and Ukrainian food and industrial resources. Every effort will be made to hold the territories guaranteeing free movement along the Mediterranean.

(b) Simultaneous ... launching of a complementary attack from the north. The latter's aim will be to cut the USSR off from the Baltic, take Leningrad and drive to Moscow to meet the southern prong. The Soviet Army consequently will be put in a pocket.

2. The US will strike hard and fast, using all-out tactics to secure a quick break in the Soviet defense. The Americans and British are counting on a short war because they realize the expenditure of time, men and materiel necessary to cover the vast distances in the USSR. Upon successful accomplishment of this plan – and the US and British General Staffs do not doubt this eventuality – the Communist Party will be liquidated....

3. (...).

4. Another US/British plan is based on exhaustion of the USSR through a long-drawn-out civil war in China, prolonged by extensive US aid to Chiang Kai-shek in the form of equipment and instructors.

Soviet Military Defense Plans

5. Preparing [the] defense of the USSR necessitates securing these two main invasion routes:

(a) The southern route through Baku, Batum and the Don Basin, and

(b) the Scandinavian and Arctic Route threatened by the US. Strong bases for ice-breakers and specially prepared ship and aircraft are being built. Docks and shops are being constructed at Novy Port on the Ob River, Igarka on the Yenesei, and Tiksi on the Lena. To protect this strategic line further, the USSR desires greater access and facilities in Spitsbergen.

6. Fortifications are being built under the guise of industrial enterprises; the local populations are being deported to the Soviet interior. ('1. THEORY CONCERNING US/BRITISH PLAN OF ATTACK 2. SOVIET MILITARY DEFENSE PLANS', CIA, September 12, 1947, pp. 1-2) (IMG)

C17S7. Iran's Titoist Movement, a CIA Creation / The Razmara Administration / Stalin-era Soviet Aid to Mosaddeq Administration / Khrushchev-Malenkov-Beria Betrayals of Iran Cause 1953 CIA Coup / Yugoslav-linked Titoists help 1953 Iran Coup  IMG-All-{Iran}

The CIA was interested in establishing a Titoist movement in Iran. The Chief of the Plans Staff of the Near East and Africa Division of the US intelligence reported to the Acting Chief of the Policy, the following:

We are even investigating the feasibility of establishing a local or "Titoist" Communist Party as a possible means of splitting and therefore weakening the Soviet Communist movement in Iran. This is obviously a dangerous undertaking which, if not very skillfully handled, could turn out to be a boomerang. Its potentialities as an anti-Soviet weapon, however, demand that we give it careful consideration.

("SUBJECT: Comments on your memorandum, 'The Limitations of Diplomacy,' dated 13 March 1951" "Memorandum From the Chief of the Plans Staff, Near East and Africa Division, Directorate of Plans ([name not declassified]) to the Acting Chief of the Policy, Plans and Review Section, Office of Policy Coordination, Directorate of Plans, Central Intelligence Agency ([name not declassified])", Washington, April 12, 1951. In: "Foreign Relations of the United States, 1952-1954", Iran 1951-1954, p. 65) (IMG)

The new Titoist party would be formed by Khalil Maleki and Mozaffar Baqai. As admitted by Homa Katouzian – a pro-Maleki researcher who worked as an economic consultant with the CIA front 'Organization of American States', the International Labor Organization, and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) – when Maleki was a member of the Tudeh Party of Iran, he was the contact of the Yugoslav Embassy in Tehran. In an interview with US liberal news agency PBS, Katouzian admitted:

Maleki had been the official Tudeh Party contact with the Yugoslav embassy in Tehran. ("Homa Katouzian on Khalil Maleki | Part 1: Nonalignment and the 'Third Force'", PBS, Eskandar Sadeghi-Borujerdi, April 12, 2012) (IMG)

The CIA operative Richard Cottam too confirmed that:

Khalil Maleki [was] the leader of the Titoist Third Force... (Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, pp. 294-295) (IMG)

Maleki, who had been a contact of the Yugoslav embassy in Tehran, had a favorable view towards the Yugoslav regime because of its anti-Sovietism:

Maleki's regard for Yugoslavia was both because of its break with Stalin and (as part of that) because of its own independent approach.... (Khalil Maleki: The Human Face of Iranian Socialism, Homa Katouzian, 2018) (IMG)

The notorious American spy and CIA coup perpetrator Mozaffar Baqai too regarded:

Maleki as a Titoist communist element and symbol. (“SUBJECT: Conversation with a Prominent Leader of the National Front”, Despatch From the Embassy in Iran to the Department of State, Tehran, October 27, 1952. In: “Foreign Relations of the United States, 1952-1954”, Iran 1951-1954, p. 383) (IMG)

as early as 1949, Maleki wrote:

I am not concerned with the details of Tito's policies, nor even his major policies which may well be open to criticism and about which I know very little. [I am only concerned with the view] that having regard to one's national self-interest is not in conflict with healthy and proper international relations.

The special reference to the Balkan countries in the above quotation was not accidental, for, surprisingly, Maleki also predicted a rift between Russia and China, despite the apparently solid bond that existed between them at the time, and for many years to come:

The movement that ... Mao Tse-tung now continues, will not in the end remain a satellite of the Soviet Union. Indeed it can be confidently predicted that similar developments to those of Yugoslavia will also take place in China. The forms which these developments will take will doubtless be different from what happened in Yugoslavia. But their substance would be similar resistance against [Soviet] pressures and expansionist behaviour.

(Khalil Maleki: The Human Face of Iranian Socialism, Homa Katouzian, 2018) (IMG)

Among most intelligence circles both in the imperialist camp and in the anti-imperialist camp, it was a well-known fact that Mao's group would eventually follow the path of Tito's group although the forms by which Mao's group presented themselves was going to be different and was going to be in a fake 'anti-revisionist' clothing. The imperialist agent Khalil Maleki was aware of this. Contrary to what is too often stated, Khalil Maleki was actually not a founder of the Tudeh Party. In fact, he:

refused to become a founding member of the Tudeh Party in 1941, when Reza Shah abdicated in the wake of the Allied occupation of the country. (“Homa Katouzian on Khalil Maleki | Part 1: Nonalignment and the 'Third Force'”, PBS, Eskandar Sadeghi-Borujerdi, April 12, 2012) (IMG)

within a year or so, some of the party's leading young intellectuals persuaded him to join the party with the express purpose of helping them to reform its leadership and program. (“Homa Katouzian on Khalil Maleki | Part 1: Nonalignment and the 'Third Force'”, PBS, Eskandar Sadeghi-Borujerdi, April 12, 2012) (IMG)

Maleki's goal was to form a party that would serve as:

a social democratic alternative in the context of the Cold War against ... Soviet totalitarianism. (“Homa Katouzian on Khalil Maleki | Part 1: Nonalignment and the 'Third Force'”, PBS, Eskandar Sadeghi-Borujerdi, April 12, 2012) (IMG)

After the 1948 split, Maleki made overt his opposition to communism:

The time for reflection enabled Maleki to discover the roots of the problem in Soviet Stalinism, on the one hand, and Marxist-Leninist ideology, on the other. He openly denounced the former and grew out of the latter by making it clear that he was no longer a Leninist nor did he subscribe to the Marxist ideology, although he still used Marxian concepts wherever suitable. (“Homa Katouzian on Khalil Maleki | Part 1: Nonalignment and the 'Third Force'”, PBS, Eskandar Sadeghi-Borujerdi, April 12, 2012) (IMG)

In fact, as far as his background can be traced, Maleki was never a communist. Well prior to the split, he had opposed Ja'far Pishevari and Soviet power. Among the scholars of Iranian history, it is a well-known fact that Khalil Maleki had broken with the Tudeh and the Soviets over ... the ethnic rebellions in Kurdistan and Azerbaijan. (The Coup, Ervand Abrahamian, p. 41)

Well prior to his split, he had problems with the Tudeh Party and wanted to 'reform' it. After failing to 'reform' the Party, he decided to lead a split, thus breaking away from the Party in 1948. Katouzian remarked:

The young reformist intellectuals – led by Jalal Al-e Ahamad – were in contact both with the young and fiery theorist Eprime Eshag [Keynesian] and the "elder" statesman of the party opposition, Khalil Maleki. It was they who persuaded Maleki to lead the famous split of January 1948. (“Homa Katouzian on Khalil Maleki | Part 1: Nonalignment and the 'Third Force'”, PBS, Eskandar Sadeghi-Borujerdi, April 12, 2012) (IMG)

Together with Maleki, the CIA spy Baqai formed the 'Hezb e Zahmatkeshan e Iran' (Translated as "Toilers' Party of Iran" and sometimes as "Workers' Party of Iran"). Explaining the origins of the Titoist party, the US intelligence reported:

The break-up of the Iranian Workers' Party is based on issues long buried, but early recognized by Bagai. The beginning was in 1948 when Bagai believed that he could make a strong labor party, based on socialist convictions, if he could unite with him in a middle-of-the-road policy the anti-communist socialists led by Maleki and the largely leaderless religious elements. He found the Maleki-men to be hard and efficient workers but not good socialists and too ambitious to attempt to dominate the party through their own faction. (“SUBJECT: Conversation with a Prominent Leader of the National Front”, Despatch From the Embassy in Iran to the Department of State, Tehran, October 27, 1952. In: “Foreign Relations of the United States, 1952-1954”, Iran 1951-1954, p. 382) (IMG)

Furthermore, Baqai admitted to the CIA that Maleki and his gang were in fact disloyal to Mosaddeq. Referring to Maleki's group in third person plural, the US intelligence reported:

When Dr. Bagai left on his trip to Europe and to the United States (and more lately) when he was ill, he left the power of the party in their hands. On his return to active participation in party affairs he found that although they paid lip service to socialist principles, they were in fact ... not loyal to Dr. Mosaddeq. (“SUBJECT: Conversation with a Prominent Leader of the National Front”, Despatch From the Embassy in Iran to the Department of State, Tehran, October 27, 1952. In: “Foreign Relations of the United States, 1952-1954”, Iran 1951-1954, p. 382) (IMG)

Another CIA document reveals that the Titoist agent Khalil Maleki was supported by the CIA for combatting the communists:

Any attempt to build American directed organizations, no matter how indirect the direction, within state institutions and outside, is bound to be discovered and consequently suspected. Roger, for example, can give you the details as to the difficulties we ran into with the Shah through our support of the Workers' Party and then of Maleki's Third Force because they were publicly anti-communist. It became known to the Shah that we were giving the support, even at a time when these organizations were critical of him. This served to encourage his suspicions that the United States was supporting Mosadeq as against him, thus reenforcing his innate irresolution. This is an example of how one of our worthy objectives may help stymie another. There is also a potential future complication in that Baqai and Maleki may never believe, if we are not going along with them, that we are not covertly supporting others. (Letter From the First Secretary of Embassy in Iran (Melbourne) to the Officer in Charge of Iranian Affairs, Office of Greek, Turkish, and Iranian Affairs, Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian and African Affairs (Stutesman), Tehran, November 30, 1953. Source: US National Archives, RG 59, Central Files 1950–1954, 788.00/11–3053. Top Secret; Security Information. In: “Foreign Relations of the United States, 1952-1954”, Iran 1951-1954, pp. 858-859) (IMG)

It became increasingly necessary for Maleki and Baqai to pretend to be enemies. Baqai was assigned the task of actively working against Mosaddeq whereas Maleki was going to be a disloyal 'friend' of Mosaddeq seeking to undermine his Tudeh allies. As such, Maleki's group formed the Third Force, which as the CIA admitted, was supported (and directed) by American intelligence. The 'Third Force' as the name of the Party was a slogan in itself. The 'First Force' (i.e. 'First World') was the capitalist-imperialist and pro-fascist camp, to which Maleki, as would later be revealed, had favourable opinions. The Second Force ('Second World') referred to the anti-imperialist camp led by the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies. The 'Third Force' was named after the Yugoslav-inspired 'non-aligned' approach – promoting 'non-alignment' in the camp of the US-led forces is a pro-Soviet measure, for the slogan 'neutrality' promoted among the pro-American elements shifts the pro-American movement away from the United States and onto the direction of strategic partnership with the Soviet Union. In the context of socialist labour movement politics, however, calls for 'non-alignment' meant shifts away from socialism and onto the camp of American imperialism. This Third Force tendency was actively subsidized by the British spy, CIA agent, and Gestapo agent (see C12S1, C12S2, C12S3, and C12S4) Tito. Recall the following excerpt of a CIA document which stated:

the Yugoslav dictator backs up the so called “Third Force” and the neutral block; his activities are very intense in this field, and especially so among the Asiatic peoples. He holds up the bream (backs up) the labourist [i.e. Labour Party] dissident Bevan ... while his diplomatic mission to Tehran numbers not less than thirty persons. (“SUBJECT: Tito’s True Face”, Political Information (Analysis of Tito’s Relationship with Stalin and the West), CIA, November 28, 1952, p. 13)

The Third Force was a reflection of such reactionary ideologies as 'Third-Worldism' or 'Third World Socialism'. The Third-Worldists ignored the fact that the war-torn USSR had experienced a famine due to the war, not to mention the extermination of at least 27 million of its people by the Nazis, as well as the US plans to carry out a nuclear holocaust against it as early as September 1945. Similar was the case of the peoples of the Peoples' Democracies who had suffered under the savage persecution of fascists and the newly arising Anglo-American imperialist nuclear threats. Portraying the victimized USSR and the Peoples' Democracies as the victimizers mirroring the US-led camp, the Third-Worldists (or the Third Force, or the 'non-aligned socialists') advocated a pseudo-neutral camp when in fact they were objectively on the side of Anglo-American secret services and were actively working to turn the peoples of the colonized world against the peoples of the liberated socialist or popular-democratic camp. This is why, contrary to the popular perception, Gamal Abdel-Nasser regarded the concept of 'non-alignment' as basically junk (C1S3) as well. Tito's sponsorship of the Third-Worldist tendency, by the way, was dictated by the Trotskyite Fourth International, not surprisingly. As the reader may recall from C12S4, the Fourth International instructed Tito the following in 1948:

you would have to become the champion ... of all colonial peoples revolting against their imperialist masters; (An Open Letter to Congress, Central Committee and Members of the Yugoslav Communist Party, International Secretariat of the Fourth International, July 13, 1948. From Marxists Internet Archive) (IMG{Titoist Yugoslavia})

Through his 'Third Force', the Titoist agent Maleki represented the:

social democratic [read: Kautskyite] alternative in the context of the Cold War against and between Soviet totalitarianism and Western imperial machinations. (“Homa Katouzian on Khalil Maleki | Part 1: Nonalignment and the 'Third Force'”, PBS, Eskandar Sadeghi-Borujerdi, April 12, 2012) (IMG)

Reporting to the CIA, Baqai pointed out:

that his split with Maleki will go on indefinitely, with Maleki gradually losing the intellectuals' support he now has; that no worker does, or will, support Maleki. He pictures a withering away of Maleki.... (“SUBJECT: Conversation with a Prominent Leader of the National Front”, Despatch From the Embassy in Iran to the Department of State, Tehran, October 27, 1952. In: “Foreign Relations of the United States, 1952-1954”, Iran 1951-1954, p. 383) (IMG)

Another US intelligence report, describing the Titoist agents of the CIA, the Third Force, admitted:

This political group is headed by Khalil Maleki, once a leader of the Tudeh Party and more recently party organizer and theoretician for Baghai. Maleki claims 10,000 members, certainly an exaggeration as the party publications appeal to intellectual socialists. (FACTORS INVOLVED IN THE OVERTHROW OF MOSSADEQ, “SUBJECT: Transmittal of Branch 4 Estimate Entitled ‘Factors Involved in the Overthrow of Mossadeq’”, Memorandum From the Chief of the Iran Branch, Near East and Africa Division (Waller) to the Chief of the Near East and Africa Division, Directorate of Plans, Central Intelligence Agency (Roosevelt), Washington, April 16, 1953. Estimate Prepared in the Iran Branch, Near East and Africa Division, Directorate of Plans, Central Intelligence Agency, Washington, John H. Waller. According to Waller, the Branch 4 Estimate entitled ‘Factors Involved in the Overthrow of Mossadeq’ was drafted by Mr. Wilber and represents Branch thinking. Waller referred to the Estimate as a useful as a guide for the CIA’s PP planning, and as a reference source of background information. In: “Foreign Relations of the United States, 1952-1954”, Iran 1951-1954, p. 538) (IMG)

Baqai's own 'new' party was by no means popular either:

Earlier a lieutenant of Mossadeq, Baghai has openly opposed him over the allegedly undemocratic and unconstitutional methods of Mossadeq. Should a show down between Mossadeq and the Shah be diverted to a vote on the continuation of Mossadeq’s plenary powers, Baghai would probably oppose Mossadeq. Baghai has not more than three faithful followers among the Majlis deputies. The Party claims 10,000 members but—given the defection of Maleki, probably has less than 2,000 active members.

Contrary to how he is often depicted, Razmara was actually Soviet-friendly:

Razmara was called pro-West, but he did far more to accommodate Iranian policy to the USSR than did Dr. Mossadeq. (Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, p. 210) (IMG)

Officially, Razmara had been among the generals who were ordered to suppress the Democratic force in Azerbaijan, but the fact that others ordered him to participate in these operations does not necessarily mean that he genuinely sympathized with such measures. Razmara was elected as Prime Minister by the same parliament that later elected Mosaddeq as Prime Minister. On the other hand, the Soviets sought to strengthen the Razmara government's hand:

The Iranian Government is finding it increasingly difficult to adhere firmly to its pro-Western policy. In aligning itself with the West, Iran had hoped to receive aid comparable to that given Greece and Turkey. Having failed to receive such aid, the Iranians are skeptical of Western intentions and question the wisdom of maintaining their pro-Western alignment. They are, instead, inclined to listen to the "friendly" Soviet protestations which characterize the current attitude of the USSR toward Iran. This attitude is manifest in the Soviet release of captured Iranian soldiers and in the wish to negotiate such important matters as trade agreement, frontier disputes, and the return of Iranian gold and dollars held in Moscow. The USSR thus appease eager to make arrangements which would sharply point up Soviet willingness to help Iran, and the Iranians feel that a suitable response to the Soviet approach may lessen the likelihood of direct intervention by the USSR. (SUBJECT: Current Iranian Problems, CIA, September 20, 1950, p. 1) (IMG)

This was why the imperialist-fascist secret services decided that Razmara must be ousted. The Shah's faction eliminated him. Regarding the role of the Shah in the Razmara assassination, a US intelligence document stated:

In 1956, the then minister of court in a conversation with a US Embassy officer "clearly implied" that former prime minister Razmara had been murdered "with the full knowledge of the Shah, if not on his direct order." The minister of court also stated that he had acted as intermediary between "the court" and the murderers of Mossadeq's police chief, General Afshartus. In general, however, the Shah continued in a passive position apparently attempting the role of a constitutional monarch, reigning but not ruling. (Centers of Power in Iran, Directorate of Intelligence, CIA, May 1972, p. 10) (IMG)

In mid-1951, therefore, Razmara was assassinated. Mansur Rafizadeh, who was the SAVAK director for US affairs and was the SAVAK's link with the CIA and US State Department, recalled:

During Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi's reign, thousands of people were killed and the blame was always laid on "Muslim fanatics."

In Answer to History, the shah sings his familiar tune over and over. "On March 7, 1951, Prime Minister Haj Ali Razmara was by a member of the Fedayeen Islam, a terrorist group of the extreme right, while attending a religious ceremony in the Great Mosque." And again, "On January 21, 1965, Moslem fanatics shot and killed another one of my Prime Ministers, Hassan Ali Mansur. Later several guards were killed and in the early seventies [MEK] terrorists murdered three American Colonels in the streets of Tehran." In reality, these people, including the three American advisers to the Iranian Army, were all killed by the shah's directive.

(Witness: From the Shah to the Secret Arms Deal : An Insider's Account of U.S. Involvement in Iran, Mansur Rafizadeh, April 1, 1987, p. 134) (IMG)

After the elimination of Razmara however, the Shah's Persian bourgeois-nationalist faction maintained control over the Iranian government for a brief period:

Happily, the meaning of the Razmara regime and of its alleged American support is clear with respect to Iranian nationalism. Nationalism reigned supreme after Razmara's assassination, and the overwhelming sentiment among the victorious Nationalists was that Razmara's removal, even by assassination, was fully justified. In fact, the Mossadeq government was condemned for jailing Razmara's assassin.... (Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, p. 210) (IMG)

The pro-Shah elements, however, lasted for only less than a month in power. Quickly, in April 1951, Mosaddeq became the Prime Minister of Iran. The progressive character of his politics quickly won him the support of the people of Azerbaijan:

in 1951, when Dr. Mossadeq became prime minister, the entire political complexion of Azerbaijan changed. No other province joined more completely in the Mossadeq movement. There was a bitter election conflict in Tabriz in 1952, but not between Mossadeq Nationalists and royalist conservatives; the contest was between competing elements of the Mossadeqist National Front. Even some of the smaller Azerbaijan cities fell under Nationalist domination, and Ayatollah Kashani was able to swing several rural districts over to the Nationalist side. (Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, p. 129) (IMG)

Azerbaijan had been the territory from which Shia Islam was spread to the rest of Iran. It was a hotbed of 'Bolshevism' during the days of the October Revolution and 'Stalinism' by the 1940s. It had also been a zone whose socio-economic conditions at the time generated pro-Mosaddeq, or pro-Soviet tendencies. A commonly held myth is that Prime Minister Mohammad Mosaddeq was pro-American or anti-Soviet. Yes, Iran's liberals and Shia Islamists really do claim that Mosaddeq was 'pro-American' and was overthrown due to his 'excess trust in the United States'. Such claims against Mosaddeq are not true; though the Iranian government was officially pro-American, and as the official head of the Iranian state, Mosaddeq had to make pro-American gestures, behind the scenes he was pushing for an alliance with the USSR and the Peoples' Republics. A CIA document corroborated;

Although Mossadeq will probably continue to seek US aid to enable him to meet his budgetary deficit—which would make it easier for him to stand firm on his own terms for an oil settlement and would temporarily strengthen his political position — it is increasingly clear that he opposes the development of closer military and political ties with the West. He has vacillated on giving formal approval to the continuance of the US military missions and the military aid program. He also has strong objections to becoming subject to the US economic advice. Although he was recently prevailed upon to sign a Point IV agreement, he has thus far refused to provide the assurances that would enable Iran to obtain military assistance under the Mutual Security Program. If he fails to receive US aid to relieve his growing budgetary difficulties, he may terminate the contracts of the US military missions and eventually curtail US technical and economic assistance activities in Iran. However, it is also possible that internal pressures may force him to go further in giving commitments to the US than he would personally favor. Meanwhile, he will almost certainly make greater efforts to expand Iran's economic relations with other countries including the Soviet bloc, providing they do not appear to involve foreign interference in Iran's domestic affairs. (PROBABLE DEVELOPMENTS IN IRAN IN 1952 IN THE ABSENCE OF AN OIL SETTLEMENT, National Intelligence Estimate (NIE-46), CIA, February 4, 1952, p. 3) (IMG)

The document further acknowledged:

As an alternative to US aid, Mossadeq almost certainly would press forward with negotiations now under way with Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary for the sale of some two million tons of Iranian oil, and will probably also seek oil deals with other members of the Soviet bloc or with the USSR itself. However, it is unlikely that the Soviet bloc could provide enough tankers to move financially significant quantities of oil from Iran, and thus the sale of oil to the Soviet bloc would probably not provide Mossadeq with a lasting solution of his financial problems. (PROBABLE DEVELOPMENTS IN IRAN IN 1952 IN THE ABSENCE OF AN OIL SETTLEMENT, National Intelligence Estimate (NIE-46), CIA, February 4, 1952, p. 3) (IMG)

Lastly, the document predicted:

The USSR might attempt to gain political advantages in Iran by providing Mossadeq with limited advances against future oil deliveries or by satisfying Iran's dollar and gold claims against the USSR. (PROBABLE DEVELOPMENTS IN IRAN IN 1952 IN THE ABSENCE OF AN OIL SETTLEMENT, National Intelligence Estimate (NIE-46), CIA, February 4, 1952, p. 3) (IMG)

When the government of Iran took steps towards nationalizing its oil:

The USSR also expressed its sympathy with Persia's action against the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company.... (The Soviet Bloc (Survey 1950 and 1951), CIA, May 7, 1952, p. 2) (IMG)

The Mosaddeq team was a road-paver team planted elevated to the top ranks of the Iranian regime. The Mosaddeq Administration, by pushing against the Anglo-American imperialist agents in Iran, was increasing the operational freedom for the Tudeh Party, thus paving the road to increased Tudeh influence in the Iranian state apparatus.

Some historians state that the US coup against Mosaddeq was due to the oil, as opposed to Soviet influence. Such a distinction between the 'oil issue' and the 'Soviet influence issue' is, in practice, a false distinction since Iran's oil nationalization would have antagonized the Anglo-American imperialists and moved it closer to a sympathetic USSR. Mosaddeq's oil nationalization project denied the Anglo-Americans the access to Iranian oil, while Mosaddeq's overtures to the USSR brought Iran closer to the socialist anti-imperialist camp. The Mosaddeq faction was a progressive bourgeois-democratic faction. The progressive bourgeois-democratic factions around the world represent the alliance of the anti-colonial national bourgeoisie with the proletariat and the cooperativists. The expansion of the influence of the progressive bourgeois-democrats of Iran over Iran's oil industry was the expansion of the influence of the Iranian proletariat, the ally of the Soviet dictatorship of the proletariat, over Iran's oil industry at the expense of Anglo-American finance capital. The increased influence of Iran's proletariat over the Iranian petroleum resources meant the increased influence of the Soviet proletariat, and hence the Soviet state, over Iran's petroleum resources. The petroleum resources were a key economic resource over which Iran's proletariat, backed by the Soviet proletariat, was fighting against Anglo-American finance capital. Yes, the Anglo-American imperialists went after Iran 'because of the oil' in the sense that they sought to reduce the influence of Iran's proletariat, and hence Soviet proletariat, over Iran's oil resources.

After the oil nationalization, Britain sanctioned Iran and withdrew its technicians so that the Iranian economy collapses. The West followed Britain in the anti-Iran sanctions:

No major Western European or US oil company has offered to provide Iran with technicians for her oil industry. (Daily Digest July 21, 1951, CIA, Section 2 (Eastern), p. 1) (IMG)

The USSR, on the other hand, was reported to have offered its economic support for Iran:

The Soviet Oil Administration of Austria, however, has reportedly offered Iran 150 technicians and two Soviet-controlled Austrian distributors are reported to be exploring opportunities for selling Iranian oil. (Daily Digest July 21, 1951, CIA, Section 2 (Eastern), p. 1) (IMG)

It is a fact that indeed the USSR began to send its oil technicians. According to another US intelligence report,:

The SMV (Soviet Oil Administration) has sent 15 oil technicians to Iran to instruct the Iranians. The group consists of engineers and drillers, and is known as the Austrian Drilling Delegation. (SMV Technicians in Iran, CIA, November 14, 1951, p. 1) (IMG)

In relative terms, the USSR was providing enormous economic infrastructure support for the government Mosaddeq. In absolute terms, the USSR could not possibly provide as much economic aid, because the terrain of Iran made it brutally difficult for the USSR to provide much economic support:

Transporting the oil from Iran would present formidable problems to the Soviet Union because the Soviet bloc owns only about 1% of the world's tanker tonnage; more than 10% of the world's tanker capacity is necessary to handle Abadan's production. Without some tanker facilities from non-Communist countries, the USSR would operate the Abadan refinery, for some time at least, at the cost of a large loss in production. The Iranian railroads at present can carry about 250,000 metric tons of oil per year. This amount is a small fraction of the USSR's yearly domestic output, but it would represent most of Abadan's annual capacity for the production of alkylate, the key component in the manufacture of high-octane aviation gasoline. An operating staff unfamiliar with the plant would require at least a year to achieve substantial production of alkylate. Supply of an additional 250,000 tons of alkylate would more than double the USSR's estimated annual production of this commodity, which is vital to the conduct of a long-range strategic air offensive. Overland transport could in time be increased with new tank cars and possibly with air transport.

The Iranian terrain would make construction of a pipeline to the USSR a most difficult and expensive proposition, though it is not an impossible engineering feat. Such a pipeline could conceivably be constructed in two to three years and would presumably be used for refined products. While the USSR might be unwilling to lay so costly a pipeline in view of Iran's vulnerability to Western interdiction efforts in the event of war, there is a strong possibility that such a pipeline would be built if the Soviet Union were to commence integrating Iran into the Soviet bloc in time of peace. There is every likelihood that if the USSR gains control of the oil resources, Iran would be exploited in the familiar pattern.

Khalil Maleki, who did not hold a favourable view of the USSR, the Peoples' Democracies, and the Tudeh Party, was a prominent Iranian Titoist activist backed by and directed by the CIA, as revealed previously. At the time, Maleki was trying in vain to sabotage the Mosaddeq Administration's efforts to lift and shift Iran out of the Anglo-American imperialist camp. While portraying the Tudeh Party of Iran as enemies of Mosaddeq as opposed to allies, Khalil Maleki supported the CIA's World Bank 'mediations' which called on Mosaddeq to back down in the face of 'international' (i.e. Anglo-American) pressures. This fact was admitted by Homa Katouzian, the economic consultant to the Organization of American States and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, and a leading Iranian reformist intellectual known for his extensive research on and support for Khalil Maleki. Katouzian wrote:

On solving the issue concerning oil, the logic of Khalil Maleki was on the same track as the view of Mosaddeq in the [National] Movement. The nationalization of oil, before all else, was a strategy for gaining the independence of the nation and establishing a democratic system. Considering the apathy of the Soviets and the US support for the British, Iran was too weak at the time to be able to carry the struggle forward to the end, especially when there was an enemy in the form of the ruling regime [pro-Shah deep state] and the Tudeh Party, weakening the country from within. Maleki supported the mediation efforts of the World Bank (Chapter 12), and in the end, was the only major voice in the National Movement to dare to emphasize the necessity of resolving the oil issue for the purpose of the survival of the entire [National] Movement. A decent resolution (lower than the ideal goal), could have reduced international pressures, normalized the economic conditions of the country, increased the financial power of the government, so that it could execute the economic and social development projects. (Mosaddeq and the Struggle for Power in Iran, [Mosaddeq w Nabard Qodrat], Homa Katouzian, 1993, pp. 204) (IMG)

Thus, the CIA and MI6 jointly plotted Operation AJAX. The main figure on the ground responsible for launching this fascist coup d'états was, quite famously, General Fazlollah Zahedi, a member of the Nazi intelligence underground:

During World War II several generals were involved in German-sponsored clandestine political activity; one – Fazlollah Zahedi – later became Prime Minister. (Iran After the Shah: An Intelligence Assessment, CIA, August 1978, p. 10. In: CONTROL RECORD FOR SUPPLEMENTAL DISTRIBUTION) (IMG)

On March 1953, MI6 agent Beria and his Titoist circle of British intelligence agents at the top ranks of the Soviet successfully eliminated Joseph Stalin and some of his comrades in the Red Army command (see chapter 19). Upon gaining power in Moscow, the ruling Titoist agents of the MI6 did not follow the Stalin-era policy of supporting anti-imperialist and Soviet-friendly governments abroad, and on the contrary embarked upon a program of sabotage against the anti-imperialist and socialist forces. It was during this time period that drastic de-funding of the Peoples' Democracies occurred, and most violently of all, the June 1953 East Berlin riots occurred. It was also at this time that Moscow drastically cut support for the government of Mosaddeq. According to a document published by the American intelligence front, the Woodrow Wilson Center, the Soviet intelligence had knowledge of the Anglo-American coup plans, but the ruling circles in the Kremlin did not provide assistance to Mosaddeq in the face of Anglo-Americana plots:

The KI received data from the MGB and GRU stations in Teheran, much of it quite accurate. The analysts knew that the Americans wanted to topple Mossadeq because he refused to join an anti-Soviet "aggression pact." They learned that US ambassador Loy Henderson, the Shah, and various generals had been conspiring against the Iranian Prinr Minister since 1952. General Fazlollah Zahedi was identified as a likely candidate to succeed Mossadeq. Why, then, did the Soviets not leak this to him? One cannot tell from KI documents.

There is plenty of evidence, however, that the Soviets neither trusted nor supported Mossadeq. (...). But it was not now ready to ally with the "bourgeois nationalist" Mossadeq in Iran.

("Soviet Intelligence and the Cold War: The "Small" Committee of Information, 1952-1953", Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, Vladislav Martinovich Zubok, December 1992, pp. 20-21) (IMG)

Owing to his anti-Stalin bias, the author from the Woodrow Wilson Center falsely claims that Joseph Stalin did not support Mosaddeq, but the earliest Soviet intelligence document which he cites for the context is dated July 7, 1953, three months after the death of Stalin, when the Titoists were in charge of the Kremlin. The ruling Titoist elites, not Stalin, were the ones to have to assist Mosaddeq against the coup. The elimination of Stalin and the subsequent reign of the Titoist agents of the MI6 in the Kremlin paved the way for Operation AJAX. As Mohammad Mosaddeq rightly reflected in his memoirs:

The death of Stalin on March 5 created the suitable conditions for the overthrow of my government (The Memoirs and Pains of Mohammad Mosaddeq, Mohammad Mosaddeq, p. 189) (IMG)

And the other one was [Anthony] Eden, the Foreign Minister of Britain's Conservative Government, who after a while of waiting, as soon as Stalin died and thus the setting for the oppressive behavior of the colonial regimes was created, made a trip to America and convinced the President Eisenhower to trade the freedom of a nation with 40% stock [from Iran's oil].... (The Memoirs and Pains of Mohammad Mosaddeq, Mohammad Mosaddeq, pp. 395-396) (IMG)

The facts mentioned here are also corroborated by the prominent Titoist Third Force officials. Masoud Hejazi, a founder of the Titoist Third Force, recalled that Mohammad-Ali Khonji, another founder of the Titoist 'Third Force', had analyzed that the elimination of Joseph Stalin and the rise of the Titoist circle meant that Mosaddeq could no longer rely on Soviet assistance against the coup. In his memoirs, referring to Mosaddeq's view that Stalin's death led to the coup, Hejazi recalled:

The interesting thing is that Dr. Mohammad-Ali Khonji, as stated before, had reached the same conclusion [as Mosaddeq on the role of Stalin's elimination on the AJAX coup]. In one of the meetings of the Joint Executive Committee and the Central Committee of the Toilers' Party of the Iranian Nation (Third Force), he spent a number of hours to analyze the international political situation concerning Iran, and concluded that due to the death of Joseph Stalin, the Soviet government has moved away from its aggressive [confrontational] approach in the Cold War and is now busy caring about its own domestic affairs, and Dr. Mosaddeq can no longer utilize the existing contradictions between the Eastern Bloc on the one side and the Western Bloc on the other, and as such, Western colonial policy, through England and America having reached common understanding, will pursue the necessary measures for bringing about the collapse of Dr. Mosaddeq's government. ("Events and Judgements, 1950-1960: The Memoirs of Masoud Hejazi", Masoud Hejazi, p. 316) (IMG)

Dr. Khonji's analysis served as warning of an impending coup. Khalil Maleki strictly prevented such a correct analysis to be handed to Mosaddeq: Dr. Khonji, based on this theory, was trying to show that the plot to overthrow the government of Dr. Mosaddeq is near, and I, who identified his remarks as completely logical and corresponding to reality, rose to defend him [Khonji], and called for forming extraordinary meetings of the Executive Committee and Central Committee of the Third Force Party's Youth Organization to equip the Third Force Party and the other National forces and for coordination of these [forces].

However, unfortunately, due to the silence and later the resistance of Khalil Maleki, as well as the slanders against Dr. Khonji, including the slander of him being Melancholic, such clear vision of Dr. Khonji did not bring any results....

("Events and Judgements, 1950-1960: The Memoirs of Masoud Hejazi", Masoud Hejazi, p. 317) (IMG)

The Titoist Third Force pursued the Anglo-American intelligence services' policy of divide-and-conquer against the anti-imperialist forces in Iran. One such case has been noted by Mr. Sadiqi, who, in the words of Iran's official modern historical research center, was:

the Minister of Interior of the late Mossadegh government.... (Factors for the Defeat of the National Movement of Iran in the Coup d'Etat of August 19, Political Studies and Research Institute, Pahlaviha.) (IMG)

In an interview Sadiqi corroborated:

In my opinion, the dough for the August 19 [1953] coup was prepared on July 21 [1953], because all the people and all the classes were in favor of Dr. Mossadegh and praised him wholeheartedly. But the late Khalil Maleki and others insisted that elements affiliated with the Tudeh Party participate in a separate demonstration, and millions at another time. As a result, on that day, a half of the day was a leftist demonstration with a special order and great organizational power and the other half of the day was a National [Front] demonstration with organizational weakness demonstrated, and such division of strength signalled to the Western governments assessing Dr. Mosaddeq's strength that the [socio-political] base of the government had weakened.... The Tudeh Party demonstrations that day had apparently been several times the number of the supporters of the [Mosaddeq's] National Movement of Iran. (Factors for the Defeat of the National Movement of Iran in the Coup d'Etat of August 19, Political Studies and Research Institute, Pahlaviha. Source cited: Source: The "Ettela'at" Daily Information 1388/05/28 (August 19, 2009)) (IMG)

The same excerpt of the interview was also presented in the memoirs of Masoud Hejazi, a co-founder of Maleki's Titoist 'Third Force'. Defending Maleki's decision, Hejazi remarked:

What must be added to this text is that when Khalil Maleki and Co. insisted that Tudeh Party affiliates must participate in a separate rally and at a separate time than the National [Front elements], they were, for several reasons, rightful in their plea and insistence. ("Events and Judgements, 1950-1960: The Memoirs of Masoud Hejazi", Masoud Hejazi, p. 362) (IMG)

The evidence makes it absolutely clear that the Third Force pursued the Titoist policy of dividing the anti-imperialist forces, and driving a wedge between Mosaddeq and his Tudeh Party allies, thus, as Mosaddeq's Minister of Interior stated, leading to the 1953 coup in Iran. Upon their release, the Titoist agents of the American secret service and Yugoslav regime continued their collaboration with the regime of the Shah, and extended their ties to the Mossad. The CIA-backed Titoist leader Maleki began to blatantly and unashamedly collaborate with the newly-installed regime of the Nazi spy Zahedi and the Shah:

In addition, there was one significant dissent by a loyal Mossadeghist from the policy of total opposition. After his release from prison, Khalil Maleki, the leader of the Titoist Third Force, argued publicly for a policy of accepting political realities. Maleki said that Mossaddeq's overthrow, whatever the immediate causes, would not have been possible had the base of social support for nationalism been larger. Therefore, the Nationalists should drop their intransigent opposition and instead seek to cooperate with the liberal wing of the "ruling class" until social evolution had progressed further. Maleki stressed that this "ruling class" should not be viewed as a monolith—all of one color and traitorous—but rather as a group of men whose views range from the reactionary to the liberal. Were the Nationalists to throw their strength to the liberal wing, an evolutionary trend could be set into motion which might bring the Nationalists back into positions of influence.

Maleki's arguments were published in his magazine Elm o Zendegi and were read widely. But instead of convincing his colleagues, Maleki was charged with having sold out to the Court and the imperialist powers. For a man who had lost most of his worldly possessions after the coup and had spent many months in prison because of his unwavering devotion to the Nationalist cause, the realization that many of his supporters now questioned his loyalty was surely a heavy blow. Yet in a day when censorship was increasingly strict, Elm o Zendegi had appeared without repercussions; and Maleki had called for collaboration with the men who had overthrown the greatest of Iranian leaders, Dr. Mossadegh. To many Nationalists the case against Maleki was a clear one. The Third Force split into pro- and anti-Maleki factions. The pro-Maleki wing atrophied; Elm o Zendegi ceased regular publication, and Maleki joined Maki and Baqai in obscurity.

(Nationalism in Iran: Updated Through 1978, Richard W. Cottam, 1979, pp. 294-295) (IMG)

Against communist science, CIA's Titoist agent Maleki and his Titoist friend Jalal Aal-e Ahmad had the audacity to openly argue for an Israel under the influence of the Ben-Gurion faction as their model of a 'socialist' society. It is good to support the communist-led 'Socialist Zionist' popular front party Mapam, or to support the agricultural cooperatives and state ownership in Israel, but to hail Kautskyite Israel in general, and the Israel under the influence of Moshe Sharett in particular, as the model for a 'socialist' alternative in 'contrast' to the Soviet Union was characteristic of Titoist renegades. For their service, Moshe Sharett invited them to Israel. Jalal Ahmad subsequently wrote an infamous travelogue hailing Israel's 'socialism'. Referring to Maleki's travel to Europe, Katouzian remarked:

While in Europe, Maleki was invited to visit Israel by Moshe Sharett, an Israeli socialist leader, ex-prime minister and ex-foreign minister.... Maleki, like all European socialists in the 1950s, regarded Israel as a model socialist country and a viable alternative to the Soviet model, and Elm o Zendegi and Nabard-e Zendegi wrote favourable comments on its kibbutz farms while discussing possible programmes for an Iranian land reform. (...). Jalal Al-e Ahmad and his wife Simin Daneshvar also visited Israel as guests shortly afterwards. He wrote a favourable travelogue.... C18S1. Soviet Military Aid for the Communists in China  IMG-All-{China}

The Soviet Red Army sacrificed so much in order to liberate Manchuria from Japanese fascist yoke. Upon liberating Manchuria, the USSR established a base for Chinese communist activity against the KMT, covertly funding the communist rebels against the CIA-backed KMT regime. A “Nationalist informant from Chiamussu area” reported to the CIA:

300 Soviet-trained Chinese pilots have arrived in Chiamusu....

The Soviets are giving the Communists 100 planes which will be delivered to Harbin this month.

(‘MILITARY INFORMATION: SOVIET AID TO COMMUNISTS, MANCHURIA; KOREAN AND MONGOLIAN TROOPS, MANCHURIA’, CIA, October 3, 1947, p. 1) (IMG)

Another CIA report stated:

A group of 150 Chinese students is attending the Soviet military academy at Inokentevskaya ... near Irkutsk. (...). The academy regularly trains Chinese Communist army officers. (MILITARY INFORMATION: TRAINING AND SUPPLY OF FAR EASTERN MILITARY FORCES BY THE USSR, CIA, May 18, 1948, p. 1) (IMG)

Another CIA report on the Soviet training of Chinese and Korean units stated the following:

Chinese and Korean Communist Units

8. The only Korean Communist unit in Hunchun is a small liaison detachment called the Hunchun Branch of the China Liaison Group, Korean Volunteer Army. The Chinese Communist units, listed below, are small groups of picked troops.

9. One Chinese Communist infantry battalion is stationed in the city. It was trained in Vladivostok and Khabarovsk by Soviet officers from “sniper” and cavalry units for a period of about one year. Comprising approximately 500 officers and men, the battalion is divided into companies, each consisting of three rifle and one machine gun platoon. Each (rifle) platoon has four sections, each of which is armed with:

One Jakov grenade launcher, requiring a loader and a gunner

Three Fedorov automatic rifles

One rang finder with periscope

Three to five Soviet infantry rifles, M-1930, with telescopic sights

Hand grenades and smoke candles

10. A signal company, also Soviet-trained, is housed in the building formerly used by the Japanese signal unit in Hunchun. It includes about 250 technicians and soldiers, equipped with Soviet M-1930 rifles and sub-machine guns. The company’s equipment consists of five radio transmitters and twenty wireless telephones. It maintains contact with Chinese Communist headquarters in Harbin and Chiamussu and is used by the Soviets for contacting Soviet units in North Korea and the USSR.

(MILITARY INFORMATION: SOVIET AND CHINESE COMMUNIST UNITS AND INSTALLATIONS IN HUNCHUN, CIA, March 30, 1948, p. 2) (IMG)

A report by the CIA’s Office of Report and Estimates (ORE) stated:

Partial evacuations from certain areas had taken place earlier, with little or no prior notification to the Chinese National Government. The latter did obtain, on 22 March 1946, a Soviet note giving the target date for complete withdrawal, but that note contained no area-by-area schedule for evacuation. Chinese Communist forces were thus placed in a highly favorable position to replace the departing Soviet occupation forces, thereby gaining physical control over most of Manchuria.

Intelligence reports correctly emphasize the importance of the "capture" of great supplies of Japanese arms and equipment by the Chinese Communist forces after they replaced the Soviet troops in Manchuria. Somewhat less well known is the fact that at least part of such Japanese supplies fell into Chinese Communist hands even during the Soviet occupation. A trained US observer personally saw unarmed Communist troops enter the Japanese arsenal in Mukden while it was completely under Soviet control and Soviet guard, and subsequently saw those troops emerge fully armed. (Other sources, including a Japanese, a Manchurian ex-puppet officer, and a Czech refugee in Dairen, cite similar episodes in Soviet-controlled areas containing Japanese Army materiel.) (IMPLEMENTATION OF SOVIET OBJECTIVES IN CHINA, CIA, Office of Reports and Estimates, ORE 45, September 15, 1947, p. 7) (IMG)

The US intelligence staff under diplomatic cover also confirmed the Soviet training of the Chinese forces:

In June 46 the US Consul General Dairen reported that the morale and efficiency of the Chinese police in Dairen had visibly increased and that “it is obvious that they are carefully and systematically trained”. Again in September 1946, he reported that the Soviet military in Dairen were training the Chinese police in the use of the rifle and bayonet. (IMPLEMENTATION OF SOVIET OBJECTIVES IN CHINA, CIA, Office of Reports and Estimates, ORE 45, September 15, 1947, p. 11) (IMG)

Furthermore:

Chinese Nationalist sources have indicated that these trainees in groups of several hundreds have been sent to Chefoo and Antung for service under the Chinese Communists. A US oil company official, who left Dairen in July 1948, reports that the transfer of trainees to Chinese Communist forces is “generally known.” (IMPLEMENTATION OF SOVIET OBJECTIVES IN CHINA, CIA, Office of Reports and Estimates, ORE 45, September 15, 1947, p. 11) (IMG)

C18S2. Sino-Soviet Economic Relations  IMG-All-{China}

Upon defeating the Japanese forces in Manchuria, the Soviets began to remove military-industrial materials from Manchuria as war booty. International law on war booty, established by the Hague Convention, unambiguously states that forces occupying former enemy territories have the right to take as war booty those assets which were used by their enemies for making war. In the words of the document of the Hague Convention:

An army of occupation can only take possession of cash, funds, and realizable securities which are strictly the property of the State, depots of arms, means of transport, stores and supplies, and, generally, all movable property belonging to the State which may be used for military operations.

All appliances, whether on land, at sea, or in the air, adapted for the transmission of news, or for the transport of persons or things, exclusive of cases governed by naval law, depots of arms, and, generally, all kinds of munitions of war, may be seized, even if they belong to private individuals, but must be restored and compensation fixed when peace is made.

(“Enemy Material”, MEMO: For the Assistant Chief of Staff, G-4, Judge Advocate’s Office, General Headquarters, A. E. F., February 1, 1919. In: “United States Army in the World War, 1917-1919: 1917-1919”, United States Department of the Army, Office of Military History, p. 610) (IMG)

Referring to this rule of the Hague Convention, the US Army Department's Office of Military History stated:

This language is not ambiguous. It means that an art" of occupation is entitled to take possession of the materials of war and supplies belonging to the enemy state if such property is susceptible of use for military operations. either by the occupying Army o[r] the enemy; and property so appropriated may either be used by the occupying Army in its own operations or held to prevent its falling into hands of, and being used by, the enemy. It is equally clear, however, that property, not susceptible of a military use by either belligerent, though belonging to the enemy and at one forming a part of the supplies of his Army, cannot lawfully be appropriated much less destroyed or sold and the proceeds pocketed by the occupying state. In plainer words we are entitled to take only what we can use or what the enemy could use; (“Enemy Material”, MEMO: For the Assistant Chief of Staff, G-4, Judge Advocate’s Office, General Headquarters, A. E. F., February 1, 1919. In: “United States Army in the World War, 1917-1919: 1917-1919”, United States Department of the Army, Office of Military History, p. 610) (IMG)

Regarding the Soviet removal of Japanese assets in Manchuria, American ambassador Edwin Pauley, the personal representative of US President Truman on the subject of reparations, wrote a fairly famous document fiercely condemning Soviet removals of industrial assets in Manchuria. Nonetheless, he admitted that virtually all of the industrial machinery in Manchuria were built by the militarist Japan:

Since all of Manchuria’s major industrial plants are former Japanese assets, as such they are subject to Allied reparations claims. (Report on Japanese Assets in Manchuria to the President of the United States, Edwin Wendell Pauley (Ambassador of the United States and Personal Representative of the President on Reparations), July 1946, p. 15) (IMG)

This fact shows that the industrial materials removed from Manchuria by the Soviets were militarist Japanese industrial assets, thus liable to removal by the occupying force. As admitted by Pauley in his viciously anti-Soviet report, the Soviets did not remove everything from Manchuria, but rather focused on the industrial assets, which as Pauley had admitted previously, belong to the Japanese military occupation. Pauley wrote:

The term “stripping” as it has been used in the press in connection with removals from Manchuria may be confusing. The Soviets did not take everything. They concentrated on certain categories of supplies, machinery and equipment. In addition to taking stockpiles and certain complete industrial installations, the Soviets took by far the larger part of all function power generating and transforming equipment, electric motors, experimental plants, laboratories, and hospitals. In machine tools, they took only the newest and best.... (Report on Japanese Assets in Manchuria to the President of the United States, Edwin Wendell Pauley(Ambassador of the United States and Personal Representative of the President on Reparations), July 1946, p. 9) (IMG)

The Soviet forces also confiscated approximately three million U.S. dollars worth of gold bullion stocks and over a half billion Manchurian yuan from Manchukuo banks. They also circulated nearly ten billion yuan in occupational currency, almost doubling the total Manchurian note issue. In addition to removals, mentioned above, occupational currency was used to purchase factories and properties and some privately-owned merchandise and materials. (Report on Japanese Assets in Manchuria to the President of the United States, Edwin Wendell Pauley (Ambassador of the United States and Personal Representative of the President on Reparations), July 1946, pp. 10-11) (IMG)

The Soviets soon consolidated their hold on Manchuria and shortly after 1 September 1945 began a systematic and selective removal of industrial machinery. Principal attention was centered on power-generating and transforming equipment, electric motors, experimental installations in the fields of heavy industry, mining, chemicals and cement. As the Soviets made a progressive take-over from the Japanese, production stopped.... (Report on Japanese Assets in Manchuria to the President of the United States, Edwin Wendell Pauley (Ambassador of the United States and Personal Representative of the President on Reparations), July 1946, p. 15) (IMG)

It is also worth noting, by the way, that the Soviets did not pursue the policy of removals from Korea:

Soviet actions in Manchuria are high-lighted by the entirely different policy followed in Korea where there were practically no capital removals or destruction of industry. In Manchuria the confiscation and removal of food stocks, the destruction attendant upon and following the removals of machinery, the almost complete halting of productive effort.... (Report on Japanese Assets in Manchuria to the President of the United States, Edwin Wendell Pauley (Ambassador of the United States and Personal Representative of the President on Reparations), July 1946, p. 12) (IMG)

This non-removal from Korea was because the northern region of Korea was run by a communist-led bourgeois republic, friendly to the USSR, whereas Manchuria was susceptible to capture by the US-backed KMT.

For the same kind of reason, once China was liberated by the CCP-led popular front, an agreement was signed with the USSR through which the Soviets would return Manchuria's industrial assets to the liberated China, without China paying any compensation. In a document submitted to the US Congress, Leo A. Orleans, the China Research Specialist in the Research Services of the Library of Congress, remarked:

In 1950, less than 5 years after the Soviet Union drastically reduced Manchuria's industrial capacity by dismantling and carrying off most of the more modern equipment from that region's industrial installations, a series of agreements were signed between the new Communist regime in China and the U.S.S.R. which laid the foundation for Sino-Soviet economic cooperation. An agreement signed in February 1950 committed the Soviet Union to return to China, without any compensation, all the properties and buildings appropriated by the Russians in Manchuria after the defeat of Japan and to help rehabilitate, reconstruct, and build anew 50 enterprises. In some instances, therefore, this involved not only the delivery of whole plants, but also in research and design work, in developing the production of new types industrial goods, and in assembling and adjusting the equipment. The equipment and materials involved in this agreement were later calculated to be worth $300 million.... (SOVIET PERCEPTIONS OF CHINA'S ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT, Leo A. Orleans. In: "Chinese Economy Post-Mao: A Compendium of Papers", submitted to: the Joint Economic Committee of Congress of the United States, Vol. 1: Policy and Performance, Printed for the use of the Joint Economic Committee, US Government Printing Office, Washington, 1975, pp. 126-127. "Leo A. Orleans is a China Research Specialist in Research Services of the Library of Congress" (p. 115 of the same document).) (IMG)

The CIA's Office of Research and Reports (ORR) stated:

Two investment credits have also been extended to Communist China by the USSR. The first of these, covering 141 large industrial installations, was granted on 14 February 1950. It provided a credit of $300 million for the purchase of equipment and other materials for restored or newly built industrial enterprises. Among the projects for which this aid was scheduled were electric power plants, metal and machine manufacturing plants, coal mining installations, and equipment for transportation. ('SOVIET ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO THE SINO-SOVIET BLOC: LOANS, CREDITS, AND GRANTS', Intelligence Memorandum, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), August 20, 1956, p. 11) (IMG)

Other Soviet-owned assets in Manchuria were generously given to China according to the 1950 treaty:

Under the 1950 Treaty of Friendship, Alliance and Mutual Assistance, the Soviet government also pledged to restore and handover to China, free of charge, and before the end of 1952, all its rights to the Changchun Railway and all its property; a commitment they honored. The two Governments agreed on Soviet troop withdrawal from Port Arthur and Dairen and on relinquishing to the Chinese all the facilities, including the naval base, at this strategic location. Three Sino-Soviet joint-stock companies were established: Sovsinmetal—to prospect for, extract and process nonferrous and rare metals in Sinkiang Province; Sovsinoil—to prospect for and extract oil and gas; and the SKOGA company to operate China's air services. Both sides were to share equally in the capital and management of the companies, but in 1954 all three companies were turned over to the Chinese. (SOVIET PERCEPTIONS OF CHINA'S ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT, Leo A. Orleans. In: "Chinese Economy Post-Mao: A Compendium of Papers", submitted to: the Joint Economic Committee of Congress of the United States, Vol. 1: Policy and Performance, Printed for the use of the Joint Economic Committee, US Government Printing Office, Washington, 1975, p. 127) (IMG)

A trade agreement- signed in Moscow in April 1950 was to provide China with gasoline, paraffin and lubricants, machines and tools, transportation equipment, cotton, raw materials, fuel and other materials that were indispensable for China's economic rehabilitation. By 1952, the Soviet Union accounted for more than 53 percent of China's overall foreign trade turnover. Numerous other agreements signed in 1950-51 ranged from postal, telegraph, and telephone communication to the navigation of rivers bordering the two countries. During these early years, the Soviet Union claims to have supplied with 943,000 tons of ferrous metals (equivalent to about 40 percent of China's total output) and 1.5 million tons of petroleum products, including over 500,000 tons of gasoline and 477,000 tons of kerosene. Although in 1952 there were nearly 1,000 Soviet specialists in China, the U.S.S.R. never sought to use Its specialists to gain any kind of control over the Chinese economy. While Soviet specialists participated in design work and construction, assembly and commissioning of enterprises, they also were involved in training large numbers of Chinese personnel. Furthermore, large groups of engineers and technicians, as well as tens of thousands of Chinese workers, came to the U.S.S.R. for training during those years.

Even though the Soviets may overstate their claim, it is difficult to quarrel with the importance of their support and experience (and "the aid of the Soviet people") in enabling China to overcome her economic difficulties and in laying the groundwork for a successful transition to planned Socialist construction.

(SOVIET PERCEPTIONS OF CHINA'S ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT, Leo A. Orleans. In: "Chinese Economy Post-Mao: A Compendium of Papers", submitted to: the Joint Economic Committee of Congress of the United States, Vol. 1: Policy and Performance, Printed for the use of the Joint Economic Committee, US Government Printing Office, Washington, 1975, pp. 127-128) (IMG)

The interest rate was very low:

The repayment was to be made at an annual interest rate of only 1 percent and was to be made in the form of Chinese raw materials to be delivered to the Union in equal parts over a period of 10 years. Parenthetically, however, it should be pointed out that this represents but a fraction of the support Mao asked for. (SOVIET PERCEPTIONS OF CHINA'S ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT, Leo A. Orleans. In: "Chinese Economy Post-Mao: A Compendium of Papers", submitted to: the Joint Economic Committee of Congress of the United States, Vol. 1: Policy and Performance, Printed for the use of the Joint Economic Committee, US Government Printing Office, Washington, 1975, pp. 126-127) (IMG)

C18S3. The War against Fascist Japan / The Nuclear Strikes on Japan  IMG-All-{Japan }

Imperial Japan was the ally of Nazi Germany. When Nazi Germany would ally with the Anglo-Americans against the Soviets, so too would Japan. Much like Nazi Germany, Japan' imperialist interests actually were in an alliance with the Anglo-American imperialists since 1943. From a Japanese imperialist point of view, the defeat of the Nazi Germans in the Battle of Stalingrad meant a mightier USSR, a Soviet Union with much more productive forces. Such a USSR could then turn eastwards and take out the Japanese Empire. Such a mighty USSR only be defeated through the joint struggle of the Japanese imperialists and the Anglo-American imperialists. Hence began the Japanese alliance with the American imperialists. In their negotiations with the Americans in Europe, which began as early as May 1943 and probably earlier, the Japanese sought to convince the OSS representatives that securing the US interest necessitated a US-Japan alliance against the Soviet Union. According to the declassified files, the Japanese repeatedly asked the OSS representatives:

on [the] status [of] Soviet-American relations with evident desire to impress us that a reasonably strong Japan [can serve] as buffer to protect America from Soviet expansion in [the] Far East.

(From Caserta, Italy. Office of Strategic Services, Field Section, X-2, May 1943, p. 1. in: 'OSS - CONTACT WITH JAPANESE OFFICIALS IN EUROPE/JAPANESE PRE-SURRENDER APPROACH TO ALLIED AUTHORITIES THROUGH OSS/MEMORANDUM ON ALLEGED JAPANESE PEACE FEELERS', OSS, 1943-1945) (IMG)

Thus, Japan's leaders aimed to convince the OSS that the United States should help retain a strong Imperial Japan as a base for anti-Soviet action. This explains the Japanese desire to 'surrender' to the United States. Japanese 'surrender' was a code word for an Imperial Japanese alliance with the United States to counter the Soviet threat. This time, of course, the difference was that the United States had the upper hand in this alliance. Soon enough, the United States would deploy its troops to Japan ostensibly to defeat imperialist Japan but actually to help suppress the rise of the communist forces in Japan and to retain Japan as the imperialist base against the socialist camp. Note that since 1943, the interests of the Japanese imperialists were one and the same with those of the American imperialists. The only major imperialist power whose interests was not the same as those of the Anglo-Americans, the Nazi Germans, and the Japanese, was France. French imperialism was the rival of those powers, and an ally of the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies.

In their contact with '673' – the OSS code for one of its agents in Europe – the Japanese stated their condition for surrender: the Emperor must remain in power. 'Otherwise', the Japanese told the 673, 'communism ... will ensue'. Below is an excerpt of the OSS report:

Our 673 is in touch here with Fujimura understood to be one of chief representatives in Europe of Japanese Navy and formerly Assistant Naval Attaché Berlin. Fujimura is supposed to be in direct and secret cable contact with Jap minister of Marine and believed to have [the] confidence of Jap Government. He indicated to 673 that he believed Navy circles who now control present Jap Government would be willing to surrender but desire to save some face out of wreckage if possible. In particular they stress necessity [to] save [the] Emperor as otherwise communism and chaos will ensue.

In his 1966 memoirs, Allen Dulles confirmed the OSS reports:

On July 20, 1945, under instructions from Washington, I went to the Potsdam Conference and reported there to Secretary Stimson on what I had learned from Tokyo – they desired to surrender if they could retain the Emperor and the constitution as a basis for maintaining discipline and order in Japan after the devastating news of surrender became known to the Japanese people. (The Secret Surrender : The Classic Insider's Account of the Secret Plot to Surrender Northern Italy during WWII, Guilford, Conn. : Lyons Press, Allen Dulles, 2006, p. 219) (IMG)

In his memoirs, the British Prime Minister Winston Churchill also confirmed:

We knew of course that the Japanese were ready to give up ... in the war. (The Second World War Triumph and Tragedy, Volume 6, Winston Churchill, p. 556) (IMG)

All of this explains why the Anglo-Americans were so keen on preventing the USSR from engaging in a combat against the Japanese Empire, with which they were secretly seeking an alliance. Churchill confirmed to his deputy Anthony Eden that:

the United States do not at the present time desire Russian participation in the war against Japan. (The Second World War Triumph and Tragedy, Volume 6, Winston Churchill, p. 553) (IMG)

By engaging in a war against Imperial Japan, Churchill admitted in his memoirs, Generalissimo Stalin was fulfilling:

His word at Teheran and Yalta that Soviet Russia would attack Japan as soon as the German Army was defeated, and [that] in fulfilment of this a continuous movement of Russian troops to the Far East had been in progress over the Siberian Railway since the beginning of May. (The Second World War Triumph and Tragedy, Volume 6, Winston Churchill, p. 554) (IMG)

Nevertheless, and by no means surpassingly, Churchill was disappointed to see that the Generalissimo was staying true to his word, adding that the British did:

not need the Russians. The end of the Japanese war no longer depended upon ... their armies.... We had no need to ask favours of them. (The Second World War Triumph and Tragedy, Volume 6, Winston Churchill, p. 553) (IMG)

A more intricate question was what to tell Stalin. The President and I no longer felt that we needed his aid to conquer Japan. (...). In our opinion they were not likely to be needed.... (The Second World War Triumph and Tragedy, Volume 6, Winston Churchill, p. 554) (IMG)

A means to dissuade the USSR from engaging against fascist Japan was through the use of nuclear weapons as a bargaining chip and a warning. Churchill recalled:

On July 17 [a] world-shaking news ... arrived. In the afternoon Stimson called at my abode and ... said, "that the experiment in the Mexican desert has come off. The atomic bomb is a reality." (The Second World War Triumph and Tragedy, Volume 6, Winston Churchill, p. 552) (IMG)

As an indirect means of threatening the Soviets, Truman and Churchill:

both felt that [Stalin] must be informed of the great New Fact which now dominated the scene.... (The Second World War Triumph and Tragedy, Volume 6, Winston Churchill, p. 554) (IMG)

However, they also wanted to provide:

not ... any particulars. (The Second World War Triumph and Tragedy, Volume 6, Winston Churchill, p. 554) (IMG) about the bomb. However, Churchill wondered,:

How should this news be imparted to [Stalin]? Should it be in writing or by word of mouth? Should it be at a formal and special meeting, or in the course of our daily conferences, or after one of them? The conclusion which the President came to was the last of these alternatives. "I think," he said, "I had best just tell him after one of our meetings that we have an entirely novel form of bomb, something quite out of the ordinary, which we think will have decisive effects upon the Japanese will to continue the war." I agreed to this procedure. (The Second World War Triumph and Tragedy, Volume 6, Winston Churchill, p. 554) (IMG)

In fact, as confirmed by many sources, among them British military historian and Colonel Hughes Wilson,:

Stalin knew all about the 'Manhattan Project' from the start, thanks to a group of committed Communist spies who kept the Soviet leader well informed. (On Intelligence: The History of Espionage and the Secret World, John Hughes-Wilson) (IMG)

Warning Stalin about the bomb, therefore, did not serve as an effective means of discouraging the Soviet leaders from fighting Japanese fascism.

The Soviets defeated the Nazi Germans in Europe. The European theatre was finished and the Soviets were preparing for combat against fascist Japan. According to international law, and particularly according to the so-called 'Neutrality' Pact between fascist Japan and the Soviets, the Red Army could not immediately begin its military operations against fascist Japan after the defeat of Nazi Germany, as some months had to pass. It is also not at all the case that the USSR badly needed to directly declare war on Japan. No, the USSR could respond proportionately to the Japanese fascist pseudo-neutrality by sending advisors, intelligence officers, and all kinds of light and heavy arms to the East Asian freedom fighters in the war against Japan. This would have created some slight inefficiency in work since it required a strong degree of emphasis on covert operations. Nonetheless, the USSR could still do that. Therefore, for expanding its influence in East Asia, no, the USSR did not desperately need a declaration of war or a direct war against Japan.

Nonetheless, the time for a direct war against fascist Japan came in the April 1945. According to the Soviet-Japanese Neutrality Pact, the USSR had the legal right to cease the 'neutrality' and 'peace', and to wage war on fascist Japan. The article 2 of the Pact stated:

ARTICLE TWO

Should one of the Contracting Parties become the object of hostilities on the part of one or several third powers, the other Contracting Party will observe neutrality throughout the duration of the conflict.

ARTICLE THREE

The present Pact comes into force from the day of its ratification by both Contracting Parties and remains valid for five years. In case neither of the Contracting Parties denounces the Pact one year before the expiration of the term, it will be considered automatically prolonged for the next five years.

(Soviet-Japanese Neutrality Pact, April 13, 1941 Avalon Project) (IMG)

Naturally, the dialectical laws of history have left no room for a real neutrality in any international conflict; Japan could either promote a pro-Soviet 'neutrality' or a pro-German 'neutrality'. Within the context of international law, a pro-German 'neutrality' would have been legally acceptable enough, had fascist Japan not so vigorously and actively pushed for the interests of the German aggressors. However, Japan was very active in its favorable stance towards Nazi Germany; Japan and Germany were straight up allies. Japan was bogging down the Anglo-American allies of the Soviet Union in the beginning of the Great Patriotic War and later in the Great Patriotic War, Japan pursued an alliance with the Anglo-Americans against the USSR. All of this could hardly be an observance of article 2 of the pact. Furthermore, according to article 3 of the April 1941 deal, the USSR could denounce the 'neutrality' pact with fascist Japan by April 1945. Hence, the USSR indeed denounced the pact in April 1945:

"The neutrality pact between the Soviet Union and Japan was concluded on April 13, 1941, that is, before the attack of Germany on the USSR and before the outbreak of war between Japan on the one hand and England and the United States on the other. Since that time the situation has been basically altered. Germany has attacked the USSR, and Japan, ally of Germany, is aiding the latter in its war against the USSR. Furthermore Japan is waging a war with the USA and England, which are allies of the Soviet Union.

"In these circumstances the neutrality pact between Japan and the USSR has lost its sense, and the prolongation of that pact has become impossible.

"On the strength of the above and in accordance with Article Three of the above mentioned pact, which envisaged the right of denunciation one year before the lapse of the five year period of operation of the pact, the Soviet Government hereby makes know to the Government of Japan its wish to denounce the pact of April 13, 1941."

(Soviet Denunciation of the Pact with Japan, 1945, The Avalon Project) (IMG)

On August 6, 1945, Hiroshima fell victim to Washington's nuclear bombing. After having murdered tens of thousands of civilians, the US President Truman declared on radio:

Sixteen hours ago an American airplane dropped one bomb on Hiroshima, an important Japanese Army base. (Statement by the President Announcing the Use of the A-Bomb at Hiroshima, Harry S. Truman Presidential Library & Museum, originally published: August 6, 1945, Courtesy: The American Presidency Project, John Woolley and Gerhard Peters, University of California, Santa Barbara. underline added. For more information on USA's 'crazy' nuclear policy, check the works of Professor Michel Chossudovsky on the matter.) (IMG)

The 'fanatical Japs' would not have surrendered unless nuclear-struck, so say the proponents of the nuclear strikes. Such a narrative was obviously false, since the US intelligence had confirmed that the Japanese wanted to 'surrender' since as early as 1943 – 'surrender' as in ally with the United States. Even after World War II, a Truman Administration report stated:

Based on a detailed investigation of all the facts and supported by the testimony of the surviving Japanese leaders involved, it is the Survey's opinion that certainly prior to 31 December 1945, and in all probability prior to 1 November 1945, Japan would have surrendered even if the atomic bombs had not been dropped, even if Russia had not entered the war, and even if no invasion had been planned or contemplated. (Japan's Struggle to End the War, United States Strategic Bombing Survey, July 1, 1946, p. 50) (IMG)

The nuclear strike on Japan was in part a psychological warfare move against the Soviet Red Army which had just recently entered the conflict against fascist Japan. One thing is for sure: there was no need for the nuclear strike to yield the Japanese surrender, as the surrender had already been negotiated long before 1943, and was to take effect by 1945, without the nuclear strike anyways.

C18S4. The Arrest of Yoshio Kodama  IMG-All-{Japan}

Yoshio Kodama was a top mercantile bourgeois leader in fascist Japan, leading a large percentage of the East Asian narco-terrorist network. Describing his background, the CIA reported:

One of the causes to which Kodama has devoted much of his time and money is the right-wing, ultranationalist movement. He joined the movement in his teens, and his name was associated with terrorist incidents and rightist arrests that marked the upsurge of Japanese militarism in the early 1930's. After the outbreak of war with China, Kodama organized an underground agency based in Shanghai to procure strategic material for the Imperial Navy. The Kodama Agency was also involved in smuggling, narcotics trafficking and paramilitary operations. (KODAMA, YOSHIO VOL. 1_0004, Yoshio Kodama – Rightist Leader – Japan, CIA Central Reference Service, p. 1) (IMG)

In October 1937 Kodama began a series of trips to northern China as a special staff official of the Foreign Ministry's Information Bureau. After his return from the first of these trips, he organized the ... China Problems Settlement National League ... aimed at promoting Japanese activity in China. (With unofficial backing from the Foreign Ministry, Kodama spent the next few years working with ... [Japanese] nationalist groups on China, making frequent trips to Shanghai.) In December 1941 he set up a purchasing agency in Shanghai for the Japanese Naval Air Force. This agency, later named the Kodama Kikan (Kodama Organ), involved considerable black market procurement as well as alleged intelligence responsibilities, and reportedly enabled Kodama to amass a huge personal fortune through wartime trade.... His wartime activities also included ... management of the right-wing newspaper Yamato Shimbun in 1943, and the assumption of the presidency of the ... Japan Southern Mining Company, Ltd. ... as well as several other mines, in 1944. In August 1945 he was appointed a member of the Cabinet Advisory Council in the Higashikuni cabinet.... (KODAMA, YOSHIO VOL. 1_0002, Yoshio Kodama – Rightist Leader – Japan, CIA, p. 2) (IMG) activities also included ... management of the right-wing newspaper Yamato Shimbun in 1943, and the assumption of the presidency of the ... Japan Southern Mining Company, Ltd. ... as well as several other mines, in 1944. In August 1945 he was appointed a member of the Cabinet Advisory Council in the Higashikuni cabinet.... (KODAMA, YOSHIO VOL. 1_0002, Yoshio Kodama – Rightist Leader – Japan, CIA, p. 2) (IMG)

During World War II, Kodama's:

When Japan established its alliance with the United States in the form of 'surrender', as a manifestation of to the demagoguery of the Allen Dulles network, many of Japan's fascist war criminals were briefly arrested so that the American imperialist occupation forces could maintain a facade of 'concern' for 'justice'. This included Kodama who:

was arrested the following December [1945] and detained in Sugamo Prison as a Class A war criminal suspect. (KODAMA, YOSHIO VOL. 1_0002, Yoshio Kodama – Rightist Leader – Japan, CIA, p. 2) (IMG)

Kodama's arrest was by no means the end of his narco-terrorist career. Rather, history would prove that it was a new beginning. Prior to his arrest, Kodama had utilized the wealth he had amassed from his narco-terrorist activity in order to finance the creation of the fascist 'Japanese Liberal Party'. The CIA cited a report stating that:

Kodama gave Hatoyama [head of the Liberal Party (LP)] 10 million yen when the LP was formed in late 1945.... He ... was able to exploit his access to top government officials and his inside information on government policy in various profitable financial transactions. (KODAMA, YOSHIO VOL. 1_0001, Yoshio Kodama, CIA, p. 2) (IMG)

According to the New York Times:

Yoshio Kodama, a political fixer and later a major C.I.A. contact in Japan ... worked behind the scenes to finance the conservatives. (C.I.A. Spent Millions to Support Japanese Right in 50's and 60's, The New York Times, Tim Weiner, October 9, 1994) (IMG)

In order to finance the Japanese 'conservatives', really the Japanese fascists, the US intelligence:

smuggled tons of tungsten from Japanese military officers' caches into the United States and sold it to the Pentagon for $10 million. The smugglers included Mr. Kodama and Kay Sugahara, a Japanese-American recruited by the O.S.S. from a internment camp in California during World War II.

The files of the late Mr. Sugahara – researched by the late Howard Schonberger, a University of Maine professor writing a book nearly completed when he died in 1991 – described the operation in detail. They say the C.I.A. provided $2.8 million in financing for the tungsten operation, which reaped more than $2 million in profits....

The group pumped the proceeds into the campaigns of conservatives during Japan's ... elections in 1953....

(C.I.A. Spent Millions to Support Japanese Right in 50's and 60's, The New York Times, Tim Weiner, October 9, 1994) (IMG)

Chalmers Johnson, the consultant for the CIA and author of books studied closely by CIA staff, confirmed these reports. He said:

There is no doubt today that Kodama returned to Japan in 1945 from China as the former head of the Navy's Kodama Kikan (Kodama Agency) [as] a fabulously rich war profiteer. He transferred stolen diamonds and platinum before he went to prison to Hatoyama Ichiro and Kono Ichiro, and the funds these materials produced when sold by Kono, about $175 million, financed the creation of the Liberal Party. The go-between in this famous operation was the kuromaku Tsuji Karoku, whom the Diet questioned in 1947 about the alleged use of former military and black market funds to influence politics. (The 1955 System and the American Connection: A Bibliographic Introduction, JPRI Working Paper: No. 11, Chalmers Johnson, July 1995) (IMG)

Already, Kodama's role as the dominant figure of the post-War Japanese politics was flourishing. For their intelligence work against the Realm of the Proletariat, the US authorities needed the expertise of their Imperial Japanese allies. In Japan, the US intelligence service relied on 'scattered' fascist 'groups and individuals'. The CIA stated:

organized Japanese intelligence work as was carried on between 1945 and 1952 was done by scattered groups or individuals, mostly under the direction and control of occupation authorities. (Intelligence in the New Japan, Center for the Study of Intelligence, Studies Archive Indexes, Vol 7, No. 3, APPROVED FOR RELEASE 1994, CIA HISTORICAL REVIEW PROGRAM, CIA, September 18, 1995) (IMG)

In the meantime, having spent three years in jail, the Japanese narco-terrorist chief Yoshio Kodama was:

Released in December 1948.... (KODAMA, YOSHIO VOL. 1_0002, Yoshio Kodama – Rightist Leader – Japan, CIA, p. 2) (IMG)

Kodama's 'service' to the CIA was a mere manifestation of the alliance of Japan's fascist finance capital with American imperialism. The US intelligence consultant Chalmers Johnson wrote:

There is also little doubt that when Kodama was released from Sugamo on the day after the convicted war criminals were executed, he had been recruited by and was working for U.S. intelligence. On that matter [New York Times journalist] Tad Szulc has written, "Intelligence sources say that Kodama had a working relationship with the CIA from the time he was released from a Japanese prison in 1948"; and another seasoned observer who was also a former SCAP [Supreme Commander for Allied Powers] official, Hans Baerwald, comments, "[Kodama's] release from imprisonment allegedly was tied to his becoming an agent of the American intelligence services in general, and ultimately the Central Intelligence Agency in particular." (Szulc, New Republic, April 10, 1976, p. 11; Baerwald, Asian Survey, September 1976, pp. 817-18.) (The 1955 System and the American Connection: A Bibliographic Introduction, JPRI Working Paper: No. 11, Chalmers Johnson, July 1995) (IMG)

Another CIA file reported:

Since his release in Dec 48 from Sugamo Prison to which he was sentenced as a Class "A" war criminal, Kodama has been forced to conduct his possibly illegal and dangerous activities covertly. Reports of his influential leadership in the revival of nationalist organizations and in shady black-market transactions are both insistent and widespread. (KODAMA, YOSHIO VOL. 1_0024, CIA, April 15, 1952, p. 1) (IMG)

With the backing of the United States, Kodama re-established the military of Japan – an underground army of gangsters and guerrillas was established.

A Washington Post article that was archived by the CIA reported:

After ... World War II, the Yakuza gangs were in almost total disarray. One development that helped them survive was [the] recruitment of gang members by US intelligence officers. The American authorities used Yakuza members to spy on and disrupt the supposedly leftist labor movement in Japan. Several incidents traced to Yakuza thugs in the pay of the US government were aimed at union members in Japan in the late 1940s and 1950s. (U.S. Blamed in Rise of Japanese Gangs, Washington Post, Jack Anderson and Dale Van Atta, June 11, 1986, p. 1. Document archived by the CIA) (IMG)

By March 1953, with the death of Stalin, the new Kremlin Titoist rulers reduced pressure on the Japanese fascists. This resulted in the elevation of the Kodama faction in Japan. The CIA reported

By March 1953 Kodama was described as having regained the ground lost after the war and to be once again the undisputed leader of the Japanese right, a position which he still holds, according to various sources. (KODAMA, YOSHIO VOL. 1_0001, Yoshio Kodama, CIA, p. 2) (IMG{East Asia})

By the time the Washington Post article was written:

The Yakuza number[ed] about 110,000, and the 2,500 individual gangs are organized into 83 groupings. (Narcotics Review, Directorate of Intelligence, CIA, June 1984, p. 2) (IMG)

The Yakuza was the Japanese fascist army of terror performing the function similar to the Gladio networks in Europe and the Schnez Truppe in Germany. As an example of their barbarity, they cut their members' fingers for slight deviation from the line of the Yakuza godfather. Many were pressured to belong to this network of crime syndicates.

The United States, honoring its alliance with Imperial Japan, fostered the narco-terrorist networks upon which the Co-Prosperity Sphere had thrived. Finally, in 1952, and once again with the backing of US intelligence, the Japanese war criminals banded together to form the Japanese intelligence service, known as the 'Public Safety Investigation Agency' (PSIA):

The only investigative service, as such, which evolved within the Japanese Government during this period was the Special Investigation Board created under SCAP directive and influence within the Attorney General's Office. The main cadre of this organization came, not from trained military or foreign intelligence ranks, but from among the procurators of the prewar Justice Ministry. In this context of judicial investigation the Special Investigation Board was able to don a mantle of respectability which permitted its survival and indeed growth as a security agency with some intelligence and gray propaganda functions. A few of the mainland operatives of the tokumu kikan [Japanese intelligence service during WWII], mostly from the China theater, joined this service, which emerged in a sovereign Japan in 1952 as the Public Safety (chian) Investigation Agency, taking on as well some senior military intelligence analysts who at last were no longer proscribed from such duty by the purge. (Intelligence in the New Japan, Center for the Study of Intelligence, Studies Archive Indexes, Vol 7, No. 3, APPROVED FOR RELEASE 1994, CIA HISTORICAL REVIEW PROGRAM, CIA, September 18, 1995) (IMG)

C18S5. The Korean Resistance During the Great Patriotic War / Roosevelt's Plans for Korea / Soviet Industrial Aid to North Korea / The North Korea System / South Korea Invasion of North Korea / US Bombs Soviet Air Bases in the Far East  IMG-All-{Korea}

A document by the Strategic Studies Institute (SSI) of the US Army stated:

The origins of the KPA are a fusion of Koreans fighting in China for the Chinese Revolution and against Japanese aggression (Yanan faction); the Koreans fighting the Japanese in Manchuria under the control of the Soviets (Kaspan faction); and the Koreans fighting Japanese colonialism on the Korean peninsula as well as each other for control in Korea after the Korean War.

The birth of the KPA can be established probably in 1936 when the Korean Fatherland Restoration Association (KFRA) was established to create a united front organization of anti-Japanese Koreans operating in Manchuria. On June 4, 1937, Kim Il Sung led a small group of partisans subordinate to the KFRA on a raid against a small border village in Korea and defeated a small Japanese police detachment. This much celebrated victory subsequently became the source of the Kaspan faction's name and the beginning of Kim Il Sung's legendary military career.

In 1939, the Korean Volunteer Army (KVA) was formed in Yanan, China, to support Mao Zedong and fought with the Chinese Communist forces in World War II and the Chinese Revolution.⁶⁸ In April 1946, the KVA was absorbed by various area commands which ultimately evolved into the newly forming Korean Peace Preservation Corps moving into northern Korea. Eventually, even this Corps was diluted by further officer transfers and reorganizations and eventually passed out of existence. However, the legacy and history of the KVA continued to be used probably for security and morale reasons.

In 1942, Kim Il Sung commanded a company of the Soviet Far East Command's Reconnaissance Bureau's 88th Special Independent Sniper Brigade and received a significant amount of training and experience in his future development of special purpose forces for the KPA.

(“North Korea’s Military Threat: Pyongyang’s Conventional Forces, Weapons of Mass Destruction, and Ballistic Missiles”, Army War College, Strategic Studies Institute, Andrew Scobell, John M. Sanford, April 2007, pp. 17-18) (IMG)

The Yanan fraction actually did not contribute much to the revolutionary struggles of the Korean people but nonetheless aimed to steal the credit at the expense of the Kim faction.

The SSI document also stated:

But more important are the distinctly Korean Partisan characteristics that emerged from the guerrilla origins of the armed band led by Kim Il Sung in Manchuria in the 1930s and 1940s (see “Origins and Evolution” in the Conventional Forces section). Indeed, psychologically, the KPA is very much an indigenous force that considers itself to be heir to the tradition of Kim Il Sung’s Partisans. Officially, the KPA traces its roots back to the band of communist fighters founded by Kim on April 25, 1932. (“North Korea’s Military Threat: Pyongyang’s Conventional Forces, Weapons of Mass Destruction, and Ballistic Missiles”, Army War College, Strategic Studies Institute, Andrew Scobell, John M. Sanford, April 2007, p. 7) (IMG)

In Korea, Imperial Japan had installed collaborationist structures, as part of its ‘Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere’. The advance of proletarian power in East Asia yielded the decline of the Co-Prosperity Sphere, forcing the Japanese Imperial heartland and its helpers into a unique alliance with the United States, in which of course the latter held the upper hand.

During the Great Patriotic War, President Roosevelt wanted a multilateral trusteeship over the Korean Peninsula and to pave the way for democratic development there. A book written with the support of the US Library of Congress's Federal Research Division reported:

The United States took the initiative in big power deliberations on Korea during World War II, suggesting a multilateral trusteeship for postwar Korea to the British in March 1943, and to the Soviet leaders at the end of the same year. President Franklin D. Roosevelt, concerned about the disposition of enemy-held colonial territories and aware of colonial demands for independence, sought a gradualist, tutelary policy of preparing former colonials--such as the Koreans--for self-government and independence. At the Cairo Conference in December 1943, the Allies, under United States urging, declared that after Japan was defeated Korea would become independent "in due course," a phrase consistent with Roosevelt's ideas. At about the same time, planners in the United States Department of State reversed the traditional United States policy of noninvolvement in Korea by defining the security of the peninsula as important to the security of the postwar Pacific, which was, in turn, very important to American security. (‘North Korea: A Country Study’, edited by and written with the help of: the Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress staff, author: Andrea Matles Savada, Washington, GPO for the Library of Congress, 1993) (IMG)

However, the pro-Axis Truman Administration completely reversed such a decision. Disbanding the idea of a joint trusteeship,:

At a midnight meeting in Washington on August 10 and 11, 1945, War Department officials, including John J. McCloy and Dean Rusk, decided to make the thirty-eighth parallel the dividing line between the Soviet and United States zones in Korea. Neither the Soviet forces nor the Koreans were consulted. As a result, when 25,000 American soldiers occupied southern Korea in early September 1945, they found themselves up against a strong Korean impulse for independence and for thorough reform of colonial legacies. By and large, Koreans wished to solve their problems themselves and resented any inference that they were not ready for self-government. (‘North Korea: A Country Study’, edited by and written with the help of: the Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress staff, author: Andrea Matles Savada, Washington, GPO for the Library of Congress, 1993) (IMG)

Nonetheless, respecting the Soviet agreement with Roosevelt era USA, the Soviets tacitly supported the rise of a non-communist anti-fascist leader in North Korea for the first few months:

From August 1945 until January 1946, Soviet forces worked with a coalition of communists and nationalists led by a Christian educator named Cho Man-sik. (...). The Soviets did not set up a central administration, nor did they establish an army. In retrospect their policy was more tentative and reactive than American policy in South Korea, which moved forward with plans for a separate administration and army. In general, Soviet power in the Asia-Pacific region was flexible and resulted in the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Manchuria in early 1946. (‘North Korea: A Country Study’, edited by and written with the help of: the Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress staff, author: Andrea Matles Savada, Washington, GPO for the Library of Congress, 1993) (IMG)

However, the US regime went further in betraying the agreements made by its former, Soviet-friendly President Roosevelt. The US also renounced Roosevelt's line which had supported democratic development. Instead, the Americans went for a fascist military dictatorship in the South. This was clearly reflected in the attitudes of the US and USSR with regards to the Korean people's committees. A US intelligence report stated:

The contradiction between the US and Soviet political ideologies has again been illustrated in Korea where the application of opposing policies to similar situations at the beginning of the occupation had added significance because forty years of Japanese rule had done nothing to prepare the Korean people for self-government. On their arrival in Korea, the US and Soviet forces both found that local politically conscious Koreans ... had formed People's Committees during the interim between the surrender of Japan and the beginning of the occupation. The Soviet forces, which arrived first, at once recognized the People 's Committees north of the 38th parallel as the legitimate interim representatives of the Korean people. The US forces on the other hand refused to commit themselves to support in advance the claims of any one group to rule Korea. General Hodge accordingly refused to recognize the so-called People's Republic, which had been elected by the People's Committees on 6 September 1945, except as another political party. (KOREA, CIA, Central Intelligence Group (CIG), January 2, 1948, p. I-4) (IMG)

Regarding the Korean people in general (and not necessarily just South Koreans), the US intelligence's Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE) admitted:

a socialistic program is favored by the large majority of Koreans..... (THE SITUATION IN KOREA, CIA, Central Intelligence Group (CIG), Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE), January 3, 1947, p. 2) (IMG)

A socialistic program - the will of the Korean people - was implemented in North Korea. The US intelligence's Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE) reported:

revolutionary changes have in fact taken place under Soviet rule. Korean and Japanese landowners have been liquidated as a class, and the traditional system of land tenure, which the Japanese exploited, has been abolished. The Soviets boast that one million hectares (12,471,000 acres) of land have been distributed free of charge to the tenants. Banking, communications, and transportation, as well as heavy industry, are all controlled by the people's committees. In other words, all enterprises susceptible of immediate socialization have been taken over by the state. Private enterprise survives only among small producers, such as artisans and farmers. (...). Child labor has been prohibited, and equal rights, both political and economic, have been given to women. (THE SITUATION IN KOREA, CIA, Central Intelligence Group (CIG), Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE), January 3, 1947, p. 4) (IMG)

And:

The economy of North Korea has also been reorganized on the principles of regimentation and indirect control. With approximately one-third of the total population of Korea and 35% of the total food production, the Soviet Zone is agriculturally self-supporting. Korean mining, electric power, and heavy industry are, moreover, concentrated north of the 38th parallel. (THE SITUATION IN KOREA, CIA, Central Intelligence Group (CIG), Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE), January 3, 1947, p. 4) (IMG)

By 1947, the economy of North Korea was reconstructed:

The economy of North Korea has also been reconstructed on the principle of state control. Banking, heavy industry and communications have all been nationalized. The land has been redistributed, and private enterprise survives chiefly in agriculture and handicrafts. (THE SITUATION IN KOREA, CIA, Central Intelligence Group (CIG), Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE), January 3, 1947, p. 2) (IMG)

Against the myth that the USSR sought to keep North Korea backwards so to easily 'colonize' it, the US intelligence admitted:

Soviet policy in Korea is directed toward the establishment of a friendly state which will never serve as a base of attack upon the In order to attain this objective at a minimum cost, to its scanty resources in the Far East, the USSR has attempted to make North Korea economically self-sufficient.... (THE SITUATION IN KOREA, CIA, Central Intelligence Group (CIG), Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE), January 3, 1947, p. 1) (IMG)

The Pauley report, which was the official report of the US government on the Soviet treatment of industrial infrastructure in areas formerly occupied by Japan, backed up the above fact. The US intelligence's Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE) reported:

After inspecting of the industrial areas of the Soviet Zone, Ambassador Pauley concluded that only minor items of equipment had been removed from North Korea. It seems therefore that the USSR intends to preserve the industrial potential and build up the economic self-sufficiency of its zone.(THE SITUATION IN KOREA, CIA, Central Intelligence Group (CIG), Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE), January 3, 1947, pp. 4-5) (IMG)

Contrast North Korea with South Korea. Commenting on the political attitudes of the South Koreans toward the policies of the Soviet zone, the document further admitted:

There is no doubt of the propaganda value of the Soviet program, especially in the US Zone. Almost all Koreans are leftists by current US standards.... The socialization of basic industries and the redistribution of land figure in the political platform of every party in South Korea. Soviet policies might therefore be expected to have great popular appeal in Korea. (THE SITUATION IN KOREA, CIA, Central Intelligence Group (CIG), Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE), January 3, 1947, p. 5) (IMG)

And:

Communism and Soviet ascendancy are in fact the main issues between the parties of the left and the right in South Korea, where freedom of expression prevails in spite of occasional and temporary restrictions on the press. The leftist parties in South Korea are in general sympathetic, while the rightist parties are opposed to the Soviet regime. (THE SITUATION IN KOREA, CIA, Central Intelligence Group (CIG), Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE), January 3, 1947, p. 5) (IMG)

The Korean people were ideologically socialist or socialist-leaning and the socialist or socialist-leaning parties in Korea were sympathetic to the USSR. The system in North Korea was also highly attractive to the people of South Korea, a 'socialistic program' was favored by the majority of Koreans in general, and the communist party in South Korea drew much support from workers, peasants and students. The US intelligence, while continuing to show disbelief in the popularity of communism in Korea, nonetheless acknowledged the:

lack of evidence ... that the Soviet program [in North Korea] has not won the support of the people. (THE SITUATION IN KOREA, CIA, Central Intelligence Group (CIG), Office of Review and Evaluation (ORE), January 3, 1947, p. 5) (IMG)

Regarding South Korea, as confirmed by a document by the Headquarters of the US Department of the Army,:

The Korean Communist Party, resuscitated in October [1945], ... quickly built a substantial following among the workers, farmers, and students. ('South Korea, a Country Study', Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, Frederica M. Bunge, 1982, p. 23) (IMG)

South Korea's communist party, as the leading anti-fascist resistance force, established popular committees throughout Korea, that led to the establishment of the Central People's Committee and the Korean People's Republic. The people's committees, which were - as admitted by the document by the US Library of Congress's Federal Research Division - rose and grew as a homegrown indigenous movement were regarded as a threat by the American occupiers:

The Korean Communist Party ... had been a major force behind the Central People's Committee.... ('South Korea, a Country Study', Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, Frederica M. Bunge, 1982, p. 23) (IMG)

Before United States forces had landed in Korea in September 1945, the Koreans had established self-governing bodies, or people's committees. The leaders of these committees had organized the Central People's Committee, which proclaimed the establishment of the "Korean People's Republic" on September 6, 1945. ('South Korea, a Country Study', Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress, Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, edited by Andrea Matles Savada and William Shaw, 1992, p. 27) (IMG)

The United States military command, along with emissaries dispatched from Washington, tended to interpret resistance to United States desires in the south as radical and pro-Soviet. When Korean resistance leaders set up an interim "people's republic" and people's committees throughout southern Korea in September 1945, the United States saw this fundamentally indigenous movement as part of a Soviet master plan to dominate all of Korea. ('North Korea: A Country Study', edited by and written with the help of: the Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress staff, author: Andrea Matles Savada, Washington, GPO for the Library of Congress, 1993) (IMG)

In response to the homegrown formation of the people's committees, the US – betraying the goals and promises of former President Roosevelt – decided to destroy such democratic institutions, institutions which would have no doubt benefited the communists since the Korean people were sympathetic to communism. Instead, the US callously imposed military rule over the southern zone of Korea:

The military government that administered the American-occupied zone proceeded to disband the local people's committees and impose direct rule, assigning military personnel who lacked language skills and knowledge of Korea as governors at various levels. ('South Korea, a Country Study', Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress, Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, edited by Andrea Matles Savada and William Shaw, 1992, p. 27) (IMG)

Instead:

By early 1946 the military government had come to rely heavily on the advice and counsel of ideologically conservative elements, including landlords and other propertied persons. ('South Korea, a Country Study', Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, Frederica M. Bunge, 1982, p. 23) (IMG) the initially warm welcome to United States troops as liberators cooled. By early 1946, the United States Army military government had come to rely heavily on the advice and counsel of ideologically conservative elements, including landlords and other propertied persons. ('South Korea, a Country Study', Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress, Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, edited by Andrea Matles Savada and William Shaw, 1992, p. 28) (IMG)

In addition:

the US Military Government furthermore made ... use of the Japanese officials at the beginning of the occupation, [hence] the various Korean factions convinced themselves that they had a legitimate grievance against the US. (KOREA, CIA, Central Intelligence Group (CIG), January 2, 1948, p. I-5) (IMG)

As such:

Once the United States occupation force chose to bolster the status quo and resist radical reform of colonial legacies, it immediately ran into monumental opposition to its policies from the majority of South Koreans. The United States Army Military Government in Korea (1945-48) spent most of its first year suppressing the many people's committees that had emerged in the provinces. This action provoked a massive rebellion in the fall of 1946; after the rebellion was suppressed, radical activists developed a significant guerrilla movement in 1948 and 1949. Activists also touched off a major rebellion at the port of Ysu in South Korea in October 1948. Much of this disorder resulted from unresolved land problem caused by conservative landed factions who used their bureaucratic power to block redistribution of land to peasant tenants. ('North Korea: A Country Study', edited by and written with the help of: the Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress staff, author: Andrea Matles Savada, Washington, GPO for the Library of Congress, 1993) (IMG)

These circumstances had thrown South Korea's economy into complete chaos. ('South Korea, a Country Study', Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, Frederica M. Bunge, 1982, p. 24) (IMG)

The social unrest created by these developments can be easily surmised. By 1947 only about half the labor force of 10 million was engaged in gainful employment. Labor strikes and work stoppages were a recurrent phenomena, and demonstrations the United States and the policies of its military government drew large crowds. Temporary stoppages of electricity supply from the northern areas in the early part of 1946 and late 1947 plunged the southern region into on each occasion, deepening the gloom among the populace. A vast majority of the disillusioned and disconcerted people paid keen attention to political leaders of various persuasions who offered alternative ways of solving the Korean problem. ('South Korea, a Country Study', Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, Frederica M. Bunge, 1982, pp. 24-25) (IMG)

The phony "democratic" institutions set up by the USA's fascist military occupation in South Korea were ignored by the communist-led popular front of progressive parties:

In December 1946 the military government established the South Korean Interim Legislative Assembly to formulate draft laws to be used as "the basis for political, economic and social reforms." South Korea's problems, however, required solutions at a much higher plane. The left-wing political groups, consolidated under the rubric of the South Korean Workers' Party, ignored the assembly. ('South Korea, a Country Study', Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, Frederica M. Bunge, 1982, p. 23) (IMG)

Surely, due to the conditions of war, the economic conditions of South Korea were originally poorer than those of North Korea in some respects. However, the problems in South Korea had solutions, and part of the solution was the abolition of feudalism, recognition of indigenous institutions, the purge of the Japanese fascists and Korean collaborationist officials that were corrupting South Korea, the elimination of the fascist police and its replacement with an anti-fascist police, the establishment of scientific central planning with heavy industry development, etc. None of such institutions were established in South Korea, unlike in the North, a critically important fact which contributed to the widespread unrest in the South, unlike in the North.

Around four months after Japanese surrender, noted William J. Webb of the US Army Center for Military History, Washington initiated the expansion of the South Korean fascist army military capabilities:

Attempts to build a ... defense force in South Korea began shortly after the end of World War II. In January 1946 the Joint Chiefs of Staff authorized General MacArthur to form a Korean police force and, despite problems with equipment and training, the Korean Constabulary grew to 20,000 men by the close of 1947. ('The Korean War: The Outbreak, 27 June – 15 September 1950', US Army Center for Military History, William J. Webb, September 20, 2012, p. 6) (IMG)

Describing the reign of terror by which the South Korean people were suffering and against which the South Korean people supported the communist movement, the US intelligence reported:

The apparent failure of the South Korean Communists to produce a political crisis is hardly surprising and should not be taken as a South Korean “vote of confidence” in US Military Government. On the contrary, the results thus far achieved appear quite remarkable when it is considered that the Communist organization in the US Zone, since August, 1947, has been subject to all the repressive forces that could be mobilized against the rightist police and fanatically rightist youth groups. That it has been able to achieve even the present dislocation of economic and political life in South Korea on the basis of completely clandestine organization, is not so much due to the skill of the Communist organizers as to the fact that they were sowing fertile soil. The Communists have been able to appeal to the traditional Korean hatred of the rightist police force – a hatred which is unfortunately largely justified. Moreover they have been able to call attention to the inequities in the South Korean economy, namely: the failure to enact a land reform law and the galloping cost of living index. While it is true that both of these latter situations are partially attributable to the lack of certainty concerning South Korea’s political future, the fact remains that as long as this situation continues, the South Korean Communists will have the capability of provoking public disorders whenever the need arises. (Intelligence Highlights – Week of 3 February – 9 February 1948, Office of Reports and Estimates, CIA, p. 4) (IMG)

Struck in fear, and determined to wipe out the Korean people’s revolutionary threat, the leaders in Washington:

asked MacArthur about the advisability of creating a South Korean army. MacArthur proposed instead in February 1948 an increase of the Constabulary to 50,000 men. (‘The Korean War: The Outbreak, 27 June – 15 September 1950’, US Army Center for Military History, William J. Webb, September 20, 2012, p. 6, underline added) (IMG)

The Americans helped South Korea to expand its repressive police force against to the popular revolutionary aspirations of the Korean people.

The South Korean Regime fostered ‘March North for Unification’ (Korean: ‘Pukchin Tongil’ or ‘Pukjin Tongil’) as its official slogan; it called for a Southern invasion of the North:

[T]he Rhee regime insisted on its northward marching policy of unification (Pukchin Tongil).... (Korean Studies Information Service System, Sun Won Park, 2017) (IMG)

A July 1949 CIA report stated that several high-ranking South Korean officers were fanatically pushing for war against North Korea:

In a recent discussion concerning the defense of the Republic of Korea. CH’AE Pyung-tuk, Chief of Staff, Korean Army, stated that his interest in defensive plans is only secondary; his primary interest is in attacking North Korea as soon as possible. CH’AE and several staff officers spoke at length of the necessity of obtaining additional arms for the defense of South Korea, but admitted frankly that their personal intent is to establish an army sufficiently strong to invade North Korea before reinforcements from Manchuria and China bolster the North Korean People’s Army and security forces. (DESIRE OF HIGH-RANKING KOREAN ARMY OFFICERS FOR AN INVASION OF NORTH KOREA, CIA, July 7, 1949, p. 1) (IMG)

As another example, Shin Sung-Mo was:

the 2nd Defense Minister of the Syngman Rhee government in 1949. During a July 17, 1949 speech, Shin stated that the ROK Army could occupy Pyongyang or Wonsan in North Korea in one day if were President Rhee to give the order. (Origins of the North Korean Garrison State: The People’s Army and the Korean War, Routledge, Youngjun Kim, 2018) (IMG)

As such, the United States deployed the KMAG to South Korea in order provide more training and logistics for the South Korean military:

[T]he Provisional Military Advisory Group established by MacArthur in August 1948 was redesignated in July 1949 the United States Military Advisory Group to the Republic of Korea (KMAG) and authorized 472 soldiers (‘The Korean War: The Outbreak, 27 June – 15 September 1950’, US Army Center for Military History, William J. Webb, September 20, 2012, p. 6, underline added) (IMG)

As early as November 1948:

South Korea [had] passed the Armed Forces Organization Act, which created a department of national defense. By March 1949 the South had converted its Constabulary brigades into an Army of 65,000 men assigned to eight tactical divisions – the 1st, 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and Capital Divisions. In June 1950 the ROK armed forces consisted of the following: Army, 94,808; Coast Guard, 6,145; Air Force, 1,865; and National Police, 48,273. (‘The Korean War: The Outbreak, 27 June – 15 September 1950’, US Army Center for Military History, William J. Webb, September 20, 2012, p. 6, underline added) (IMG)

Up in the North, the Democratic People’s Republic of Korea developed its military as well:

The North Korean People’s Army was officially activated in February 1948. (‘The Korean War: The Outbreak, 27 June – 15 September 1950’, US Army Center for Military History, William J. Webb, September 20, 2012, p. 7) (IMG)

Immediately, the USSR began supplying extensive military support for the Democratic People’s Republic in the North:

150 Soviets [advisors] were assigned to each division; the number dropped to 20 per division in 1949 and to a lesser number [of Soviet advisors] by 1950 as trusted North Korean officers were developed. By June 1950 the NKPA and the Border Constabulary numbered about 135,000. The primary tactical units consisted of eight full-strength infantry divisions of 11,000 men each, two more infantry divisions at half strength, a separate infantry regiment, a motorcycle-reconnaissance regiment, and an armored brigade. The NKPA benefited from some 20,000 North Koreans who were veterans of the Chinese civil war of the late 1940s, which gave its units a combat-hardened quality and efficiency. The Soviet Union supplied much of the materiel for the NKPA. Of primary importance was the T-34 medium tank, a mainstay of the Soviet armored force in World War II that weighed 32 tons and mounted an 85- mm. gun. The Soviets also supplied artillery support that resembled the weaponry of the older Soviet division of World War II: 76-mm. and 122-mm. howitzers, 45-mm. antitank guns, and 82-mm. and 120-mm. mortars. At the outset of the war North Korea had about 180 Soviet aircraft-60 YAK trainers, 40 YAK fighters, 70 attack bombers, and 10 reconnaissance planes. Like the ROK Navy, the North Korean naval forces had only a few small vessels – sixteen patrol craft and several coastal steamers. (‘The Korean War: The Outbreak, 27 June – 15 September 1950’, US Army Center for Military History, William J. Webb, September 20, 2012, p. 7) (IMG)

The Democratic People’s Republic’s military expansion was for defensive purposes only. The Democratic People’s Republic had no intent on aggressing the fascist South. On July 27, 1949, the CIA reported:

North Korean military forces are at present deployed in depth in defense against a possible invasion by forces from South Korea. The 38th parallel itself is lightly held, with regimental reserves of the North Korean People's Army held in an area twenty to thirty kilometers north of the border.

The reserves of two divisions of the People's Army charged with the defense of the 38th parallel are stationed from thirty to sixty miles north of the border. National reserves are being retained in the Hamhung (127-32, 39-54) and Nanam (129-41, 41-42) areas.

This defense plan has been prescribed by Soviet military advisers to the North Korean government.

(NORTH KOREAN DEFENSES AGAINST AN INVASION FROM SOUTH KOREA, CIA, July 27, 1949, p. 1) (IMG)

By contrast, the South Korean leaders found it increasingly difficult to control their lust for invading the North. For instance:

[T]he old nationalist [Syngman Rhee] also promoted a counterproductive approach during 1949. He openly promoted a plan for unification by invading North Korea. (American Diplomacy and Strategy toward Korea and Northeast Asia, 1882-1950, Kim Seung-Young, p. 188) (IMG)

The Rhee gang's lust for an invasion against the North should not be regarded as being in contradiction in the slightest to the American finance capital's lust for an invasion. The Americans merely pretended to be more moderate than the South Korean fascists. The South Korean President: assertively raised this option of invading North Korea when the US Secretary of the Army, Royal, visited Seoul on February 8, 1949.

Royal had to restrain him by clarifying that no invasion would be allowed as long as US combat forces remained in Korea. (American Diplomacy and Strategy toward Korea and Northeast Asia, 1882-1950, Kim Seung-Young, p. 188) (IMG)

Indeed, only when the Americans would officially 'leave' the South was the South allowed invade the North. The Soviets and North Koreans made note of this:

I report the results of the investigation I have organized of the information about the preparation for the withdrawal of American troops and the preparations of the South Korean army for an attack on North Korea.... (Telegram from Shtykov on Preparations for an Attack on North Korea, Wilson Center, May 2, 1949) (IMG)

Then:

In September 1949, [General Shin] argued that the ROK Army was ready for war and had been waiting for a war. (Origins of the North Korean Garrison State: The People's Army and the Korean War, Routledge, Youngjun Kim, 2018) (IMG)

Only two months later, the South Korean press published an article – which was reprinted by the CIA – titled 'Hypothetical Invasion of North Korea', describing South Korea's plan for invading the north:

Many attempts have been made to effect the unification of North and South Korea, but all have failed miserably. The only way to erase the division at the 38th Parallel is the use of force. We, therefore, propose to discuss a hypothetical invasion of North Korea as follows:

First Stage – Occupation of Pyongyang in Three Days

Our crack troops can occupy Haeju the first day and then advance on Sariwon. Guarding the border in the Kangwondo area presents no problem because of the characteristic terrain of that territory.

(Hypothetical Invasion of North Korea, original source: Ibuk Tongsin, reprinted in CIA, date of information: December 1949, date of distribution: January 26, 1950, p. 1. Underline original. Bold added.) (IMG)

Wary of this fact, the North ramped up its defenses against what a January 1950 CIA report rightly called the 'offensively minded South':

The continuing southward movement of the expanding Korean People's Army toward the thirty-eighth parallel probably constitutes a defensive measure to offset the growing strength of the offensively minded South Korean Army. (Korea: Troop Build Up, CIA, January 13, 1950, p. 11) (IMG)

Two months later, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea received even more military equipment from the Soviet Union. In a letter to Kim, Stalin said:

I have also received your proposal of 9 March about the delivery to you of arms, ammunition and technical equipment for the people's army of Korea. The Soviet government has decided also to satisfy fully this request of yours. (Message, Stalin to Kim Il Sung (Via Shtykov), March 18, 1950, Wilson Center) (IMG)

On June 19th, 1950, John Foster Dulles traveled to South Korea and gave a historic speech, excerpts of which are as follows:

Already, the United States has twice intervened with armed might in defense of freedom.... (...). Today, the Korean people are in the front line of freedom, under conditions that are both dangerous and exciting. (...). The American people give you their support, both moral and material.... (Department of State Bulletin, The Korean Experiment in Representative Government Statement, John Foster Dulles Consultant to the Secretary, June 19, 1950, published in Department of State Bulletin, pp. 12-13. Underline added.) (IMG)

The significance of the speech is that it was timed to be approximately when the South Korean Regime, waiting for war, had placed its troops on the North Korean border. According to Webb:

In the early summer [i.e. the latter half of June] of 1950 four ROK divisions held positions along the 38th Parallel: the 1st, 6th, 7th, and 8th. ('The Korean War: The Outbreak, 27 June – 15 September 1950', US Army Center for Military History, William J. Webb, September 20, 2012, p. 6) (IMG)

The speech by Dulles was a 'moral support' for the South Korean troops that 'with armed might' were 'in the frontline' of the coming offensive war for the 'defense of freedom'.

On June 25, 1950, the Korean War broke out.

John Gunther was the biographer of General McArthur, the American Commander who would lead the Anglo-American forces during the Korean War. In his biography of McArthur, Gunther recalled:

Getting into the station and aboard the coaches hitched on to the regular north-bound train was a picturesque experience, because we used the special entrance reserved for the Emperor. A long, tattered, literally red carpet covered the underground passageway, and a covey of little Japanese officials in shabby uniforms bowed and scraped and squirmed as we climbed in. Two important members of the [US military] occupation [of Japan] were with us. Just before lunch at Nikko, and after we had visited a temple which is one of the most ornately spectacular sights in the world, one of these [important members of the US military occupation] was called unexpectedly to the telephone. He came back and whispered, 'A big story has just broken. The South Koreans have attacked North Korea!' (The Riddle of McArthur, 1951, John Gunther, p. 150. Bold added) (IMG)

The UN – which the imperialist press depicts as a 'neutral' 'impartial' body even though at the time, it was largely boycotted by the USSR and its allies, and overwhelmingly represented by countries and neo-colonies of the Western camp – was quick to blame North Korea as the aggressor. When the 'news' of the 'North Korean invasion of the South' emerged, even the US Secretary of Defense Louis Johnson doubted the accuracy of the report, believing that a North Korean invasion of the South was not imminent:

Returning to Washington, DC, on June 24, Johnson believed that things were going well in the Pacific [for the South Koreans who were going to invade the North]. At 10:00 p.m., a reporter asked Johnson if he had heard that forces of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK, North Korea) had attacked the Republic of Korea (ROK, South Korea). Johnson received a report about the invasion from a Pentagon duty officer but was unsure of its accuracy because Far East briefings had not suggested that such an attack was imminent. (The Encyclopedia of the Korean War, Spencer Tucker, Paul Pierpaoli, p. 383. Bold added) (IMG)

I shall remind that the South Korean press article titled 'Hypothetical [South Korean] Invasion of North Korea' called, first, for a takeover of the city of Haeju the first day and then advance' forward. On June 26, 1950, as planned, that is precisely what occurred. The South Korean Regime itself confessed that Haeju had been taken over by the South Korean Army. The US Far East Command agreed with this report. Despite believing that the South Korean and American report on the seizure of Haeju was incorrect, the military scholar Kim Jungsoo of the US Naval Postgraduate School nevertheless points out:

On 26 June 1950, the Defense Ministry of South Korea made a wrong announcement that Haeju was occupied by the South Korean Army and the United States Far East Command believed that the South Korean Army had taken Haeju on 28 June 1950. (THE PROACTIVE GRAND STRATEGY FOR CONSENSUAL AND PEACEFUL KOREAN UNIFICATION, Naval Postgraduate School Monterey, California Thesis, published in: DTIC, Kim Jungsoo, March 2007, p. 12) (IMG)

In addition to the great volumes of aid which the Soviets provided for the Korean troops, the USSR also provided military and economic aid to the Chinese forces in the War:

In the Far East, the Soviet Union ... extended economic and military aid to the Chinese "volunteers" in the Korean War, but avoided direct involvement in the conflict. (The Soviet Bloc (Survey 1950 and 1951), CIA, pp. 1-2) (IMG)

The Soviets also launched a peace offensive so to expose the Anglo-American unwillingness to pursue peace:

The impetus for the initiation of armistice negotiations came from the Soviet camp. At this time it is not clear whether the USSR really wants to bring about an armistice, or whether it merely wants to gain time to supply Communist China with weapons, ammunitions, military equipment, and economic goods; or to exert pressure toward the achievement of its political aims. (The Soviet Bloc (Survey 1950 and 1951), CIA, p. 2) (IMG)

In the year 1950, the United States military launched a major assault on the Soviet air bases in the Far East, severely devastating the Soviet aerial combat forces in that area. Subsequently, the United States denounced its own military operation by claiming that it was conducted by a rogue officer, rather than on the orders of someone in US high command. Having denounced the military operation, the US government faked a 'trial' of the supposedly-'rogue' officers involved, made sure that the 'rogue' officers would be counted 'not guilty' on the charges against them, promoted them to other prominent military positions, while pretending to have punished them all. Alton Quanbeck described the story of the attack in the 1990 article for the Washington Post. In 1990, the Washington Post published an article by:

Alton Quanbeck, [who] after 22 years in the Air Force, worked for the Brookings Institution, the Senate Intelligence Committee and the CIA. (My Brief War with Russia, Washington Post, Alton H. Quanbeck, March 4, 1990) (IMG)

Quanbeck wrote:

WE WERE skimming the tops of clouds at 37,000 feet when I decided to start our letdown into the target, 10 minutes earlier than planned. We armed our .50-caliber machine guns in preparation for action.

It was Oct. 8, 1950, early in the Korean War, and two of us -- myself and my wingman, Al Diefendorf -- were on a mission over North Korea. Only later did we learn that we had strayed and were, in fact, a few miles inside the Soviet Union.

At 10,000 feet I spotted a small hole through the clouds. We dropped our F-80s in tight circles through the opening and found ourselves above a broad river valley with mountains on each side. Following the river, I proceeded southeast, a heading which I thought would bring us directly to the coastline and well away from the Chinese and Soviet borders.

In the days preceding this mission, signs of the enemy had been scarce, so I was surprised when I saw flashes of anti-aircraft fire from the top of a two-story building in a small town about 500 yards off our right wing. I alerted Diefendorf.

About 20 seconds later I spotted a truck heading west on a dirt road. "Let's go in and get it," Dief said. An instant later, he shouted, "Look at the airfield, it's loaded!"

It was the kind of target that fighter pilots dream about. Parked in two rows were about 20 aircraft of the P-39 or P-63 type. Thousands of them were built and flown by Americans in World War II, and some were sent to our Soviet ally. Those below us had large red stars surrounded by a narrow white border painted on the side of their dark brown fuselages.

I had only seconds to make a decision. At our speed, the airfield would soon pass beneath us unless I positioned us for an attack. We were also nearing minimum fuel. Our low altitude and the low hanging clouds prevented me from seeing more than a mile or two in any direction. Even if I could have identified distinctive terrain features, it was unlikely I could have related them to the crude maps I carried on the mission.

What made me decide to attack? First, we had had intelligence reports of an expected movement of aircraft down the northeast coast of Korea; second, the planes' markings were nearly identical to those used by the North Koreans; third, I had used caution in my dead-reckoning navigation so as to hit the coast well south of Soviet borders. More important, they had shot at us first.

Two uncertainties bothered me. First, P-39 type aircraft had never been seen before in North Korea, and secondly, I was not certain where we were. Our target was an airfield at Chongjin on the far northeast coast of the Korean Peninsula, some 430 miles north-northeast of our base at Taegu Air Field in South Korea and only 40 miles south of the Chinese border and 60 miles southwest of the Soviet border. The airfield below didn't match the description of the one at Chongjin, which was reported to have a hard surface.

But I did not hesitate. We went in for the attack.

In our intelligence debriefing later, we claimed one aircraft destroyed and two damaged. We were conservative. Several months later an intelligence officer assigned to Far East Air Force Headquarters told me "the airfield burned for a week." The aircraft we saw burn must have triggered a series of secondary explosions which reached the other planes. The attack quickly had international repercussions. The Soviet government protested in the United Nations and the United States admitted responsibility. The story was front-page news but it soon became clear that both governments preferred to forget the matter, each for its own reasons. Nonetheless, some historians believe the mission profoundly affected the behavior of the Soviet leaders toward their Korean allies at a critical time.

(My Brief War with Russia, Washington Post, Alton H. Quanbeck, March 4, 1990. Bold added.) (IMG)

According to Mikhail Poltoranin, the former head of the KGB Archives during the Yeltsin Administration:

F-80 group attacked our Naval bases. (...). They bombed 5 of our bases... (Churchill Had Stalin Killed, US Bombed Russian Far East in 50s - Top Russian Official (Video - Mikhail Poltoranin), Russia Insider, May 17, 2018) (IMG)

They destroyed:

a hundred and three aircraft. (Churchill Had Stalin Killed, US Bombed Russian Far East in 50s - Top Russian Official (Video - Mikhail Poltoranin), Russia Insider, May 17, 2018) (IMG)

Four fighter jets. (Churchill Had Stalin Killed, US Bombed Russian Far East in 50s - Top Russian Official (Video - Mikhail Poltoranin), Russia Insider, May 17, 2018) (IMG)

Quanbeck continued:

By early October 1950, MacArthur had enveloped the North Koreans with his amphibious landings at Inchon and the breakout from the Pusan perimeter to the south and was driving north across the 38th Parallel dividing the two Koreas. The People's Republic of China reacted by mobilizing its Manchurian army and committing it to attack across the Yalu River into North Korea as the U.N. forces approached.

Stalin was concerned not only with the possible defeat of his North Korean surrogates but also with the prospect that U.N. forces could soon be located near the Soviets' 15-mile-long border with North Korea. Stalin had to decide whether to intervene actively.

As I sat in the briefing tent of the 49th Fighter Group at Taegu, I was little concerned with these questions. I was being briefed for an armed reconnaissance flight over Chongjin. Our group had flown a mission there the previous day but couldn't find the airfield. Another flight had reconnoitered Chongjin that morning but found no activity. Chongjin received all this attention because our intelligence reported 200 North Korean pilots training in the northeast part of Korea, close to the border.

We were briefed about an hour before takeoff. The briefing officer didn't have much to show us, only a target folder and messages reporting the negative results of the earlier flights. During that stage of the Korean War, photographs or detailed maps of the target areas were not available.

Since we had to fly practically the entire mission without reference to the ground, and since there were no radio navigational aids along the entire flight path, our heading after takeoff and the time of flight would determine our letdown into the target area. A dominant factor was the forecast winds, especially at high altitudes where they were usually strongest. Unfortunately, the Soviets since mid-September had encoded all their weather reports, preventing us from knowing the weather over Siberia, north and west of Korea. The tops of the clouds rose along our path, so we climbed to 35,000 feet and later to 37,000 feet to stay above them. This caused our first deviation from the pre-flight plan.

Then, about 40 minutes after takeoff, flight leader Bud Evans called me on the radio and said his engine had thrown a blade from its exhaust turbine, forcing him to return to base. That was how Dief and I happened to be dropping through the clouds and going after those 20 planes sitting so invitingly on an airstrip somewhere near the Soviet-North Korean border.

I positioned our aircraft for a strafing pass on the northern line of aircraft, then made a sharp, banking turn to the left and fired on the southern line. I could see tracers carving through the aircraft and knew we were getting lots of hits, but there were no explosions. On my last pass, I decided to make sure of one clear kill. I concentrated my fire at one plane and saw it start to burn. Dief followed me closely in each pass. We exhausted our ammunition and were down to minimum fuel -- 400 gallons. Time to go home.

As I pulled off the target, turning right to our homeward course, I saw an island off the coast. "Oh, oh," I thought, "there's no island near Chongjin." After four minutes heading south, I could see a coastal point that matched the coastline at Chongjin. Now I was worried. Dief and I checked our maps and concluded we had struck an unimproved airfield shown at Rashin (now called Najin), 40 miles north of Chongjin and only 20 miles from the Russian border. I felt better.

That evening, after an initial debriefing and dinner, we were summoned to headquarters by Maj. Gen. Earl E. Partridge. I went over the mission completely. Then Partridge laid out a large map, pointed to an area inside the Soviet Union southwest of Vladivostok and asked if we could have attacked there. There were marked similarities to the terrain features we had described at Rashin. It was possible, but certainly not probable. I thought to myself, "My God, the wind would have to be much stronger than we expected to blow us way up there."

(I later figured the winds must have blown from 240 (from the southwest) at 200 miles per hour, twice as strong as predicted and 90 off the direction predicted by our weather forecasters. At that time, such high speeds of winds aloft were poorly understood. Only two months later I flew an F-80 westward over southern Japan with a ground speed of over 600 mph, which translates as a 200-mph tail wind.)

As we were leaving, Partridge said gently, and with some affection, "You'll get either a Distinguished Service Cross or a court martial out of this mission."

Dief met me when I returned from a mission the next day. His succinct words were: "It's hit the fan."

Soon the game was to be played at high levels. Dief and I became pawns as the big boys took over. The headline of the San Francisco Chronicle for Oct. 10, 1950 read: "Moscow Says U.S Jets Strafing Russian Airfield." From The Washington Post: "U.S. Raid on Soviet Plane Base Charged . . ."

Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko delivered the Soviet protest on Oct. 9:

"On October 8 at 16 hours 17 minutes local time two fighter planes of the U.S.A. Air Force of the type Shooting Star F-80 grossly violated the state frontier of the U.S.S.R. and, approaching in a hedge-hopping flight the Soviet aerodrome situated on the seacoast in the Sukhaya Rechka area, 100 kilometers from the Soviet-Korean frontier, fired at the aerodrome with machine guns. As a result of the firing, damage was caused to property of the aerodrome."

To the Soviets, the mission was a surprising and confusing violation of their territory and frustrating evidence of their vulnerability. Soviet radar probably picked up our F-80's about 100 miles from the Soviet border, then tracked us through the descent and lost us in ground clutter when we dropped into the river valley. A general alarm went out, but the Soviets had no aircraft, guns or missiles to meet the attack. Besides, it was Sunday afternoon; no one was around to do anything. To them, it was like Pearl Harbor, a dastardly sneak attack.

The Oct. 8 incident forced Soviet leaders to recognize the vulnerability of their forces, especially in the east, and their inability to defend against the more modern, experienced U.S. Air Force. (. . .). On Oct. 19, Truman had Warren Austin, the chief American delegate to the U.N., admit the attack. His letter to U.N. Secretary Trygve Lie added: "The commander of the Air Force group has been relieved and appropriate steps have been taken with a view toward disciplinary actions against the two pilots concerned." Austin identified the pilots as 1st Lt. Alton H. Quanbeck and 1st Lt. Allen J. Diefendorf. In the meantime, Dief and I were in limbo. The Air Force's investigating officer, Maj. Harry W. Christian, discovered no physical evidence of a crime, and there were no gun-camera records because our base had run out of film. "There is no real evidence in this case," Christian concluded.

But because of the political pressures from Washington, the Air Force ignored his recommendations and scheduled our general court-martial for Nov. 18 in Nagoya, Japan. We were accused of violating an order to stay clear of the Manchurian (Chinese) border, of strafing Soviet territory (a "country at peace with the United States") and of violating an order to make no attack without positive identification. Our attorney, Maj. Bernard Katz, argued that the government was trying to locate us "in Manchuria on one count and in Russia on another count" and added: "They did positively identify a target, and they strafed a target that they positively identified. They identified it as a North Korean airfield, on which was contained certain aircraft, bearing the mark of a star. They had been briefed that any aircraft marked with a star found in North Korea was good game . . ."

Both of us were found not guilty of all charges. But the court martial was closed to the public, and the results were never released. Air Force leaders wanted the Russians, and probably President Truman, to believe we had been properly punished.

The Air Force would not permit Dief or me to fly any more combat missions, reasoning that we would be in jeopardy if we were shot down and captured. Instead, Dief was assigned to a fighter squadron in the Philippines, where his new bride could join him. I was reassigned to a fighter-interceptor squadron in Japan, and then became aide-de-camp to Brig. Gen. Delmar T. Spivey, who had been present at our initial debriefing. I finished up my tour as a combat crew instructor with F-84's back with the 49th Fighter Group. C18S6. Soviet Relations with India  IMG-All-{Soviet-India}

The hostility towards the Nehru faction in India is one of the many things that unites Maoists with the Anglo-American imperial enemies of the USSR. One of the myths promoted by the CIA-owned mainstream media, the Maoists, and the Khrushchev supporters is that the Soviet alliance with India was initiated by Nikita Khrushchev and the Moscow-based Titoists. Actually, positive relations between the USSR and the Indian progressive bourgeois-democracy began during the Stalin era.

In his 1947 speech, Andrei Zhdanov famously listed India as one of the countries sympathetic to the USSR:

The anti-imperialist and anti-fascist forces comprise the second camp. This camp is based on the U.S.S.R. and the new democracies. It also includes countries that have broken with imperialism and have firmly set foot on the path of democratic development, such as Rumania, Hungary and Finland. Indonesia and Vietnam are associated with it; it has the sympathy of India, Egypt and Syria. (Speech by Andrei Zhdanov (member of the Soviet Politburo) at the founding of the Cominform (a Communist International Organization) in September 1947, James Madison University) (IMG{Israel})

The following report by the CIA explains a large part of the matter:

Stalin welcomes Nehru's proposals

The Stalin-Nehru exchange of messages underscores the present Soviet tactic of promoting friendly official relations with India in an attempt to encourage Indian "neutrality" and to promote a rift between Indian and Western leaders. Since 14 January when Stalin, contrary to his usual custom, personally received the new Indian Ambassador, Soviet and Satellite diplomats have displayed especial cordiality to Indian officials both in Europe and in New Delhi.

An additional reason for Stalin's ready acceptance of Nehru's proposals is that Nehru advocated seating the Chinese Communists in the UN, a major Soviet objective, while avoiding any mention of the Security Council resolution on Korea. It has been alleged that Moscow requested Nehru to make his offer of mediation and suggested some points to be included. It is not surprising, therefore, that Nehru's appeal was warmly received by Stalin and hailed by Soviet propagandists as "backing the Soviet point of view without reservations."

Another development which may be calculated, at least in part, to conciliate Nehru is the recent change in Indian Communist Party policy. Abandoning its tactics of violence and sabotage, which have been roundly condemned by Nehru in India and on his tour of Southeast Asia, the Indian Communist Party announced on 19 July that it would concentrate on a united front "agrarian reform" movement. (SECRET)

Another CIA report states:

Prime Minister Nehru's conduct of India's affairs is encountering strong opposition from both within and without the government. Deputy Prime Minister Patel, supported by a majority of the Cabinet, has become sharply critical of several major aspects of current Indian policy, reportedly charging that Nehru has: (1) tossed away the potential benefits of closer ties with the US and UK in the unrealistic hope that India might achieve lasting friendship with Communist China and the USSR as well; (2) ... frightened away foreign and domestic investors with the spectre of socialism at a time when India has urgent need of private investments above and beyond the funds the government itself can obtain. Meanwhile, Nehru is being pressed to take a more belligerent attitude toward by extremist anti-Moslem elements, notably in West Bengal and among the Sikh and Punjabi refugees. (WEEKLY SUMMARY #94, CIA, March 17, 1950, p. 7) (IMG)

When Stalin died, Nehru stated the following:

Sir, I crave your indulgence at the commencement of the proceedings to refer to an event of which the House is no doubt aware. In the early hours of this morning Marshal Stalin passed away. Only two days ago, we had heard of this serious illness; only a fortnight or three weeks ago, our Ambassador in Moscow had met him and it so happened that just a few hours before the news of Marshal Stalin's serious illness came to us, I was reading a long report from our Ambassador about his interview with him. When we think of Marshal Stalin, all kinds of thoughts come to our minds, at least to my mind, and the panorama of history for the last 35 years passes before our eyes. All of us here are children of this age and have been affected by it in many ways. We have grown up not only participating in our struggles in this country but participating in another way with the mighty struggles that have taken place in this world, and been affected by them. And so looking back at these 35 years or so, many figures stand out, but perhaps no single figure has moulded and affected and influenced the history of these years more than Marshal Stalin. He became gradually almost a legendary figure, sometimes a man of mystery, at other times a person who had an intimate bond not with a few but with vast numbers of persons. He proved himself great in peace and in war. He showed an indomitable will and courage which few possess, but perhaps when history comes to be written many things will be said about him and I do not know what opinions, what varying opinions, subsequent generations may record, but every one will agree that here was a man of giant stature, a man such as few who had moulded the destinies of his age, a man – although he succeeded greatly in war – who ultimately would be remembered by the way he built up his great country. Again, people may agree or disagree with many things that he did or said, but the fact remains of his building up that great country, which was a tremendous achievement, and in addition to that the remarkable fact, which can be said about very, very few persons, is that he was not only famous in his generation but as I referred to, he was in a sense 'intimate', if I may say so, with vast numbers of human beings, not only the vast numbers in the Soviet Union with whom he moved in an intimate way, in a friendly way, in an almost family way, if I may say so, but many others too outside who felt that way. I have known people who were associated with Marshal Stalin, who disagreed with him subsequently or who associated themselves with the work that Marshal Stalin did and then who subsequently disagreed with him and came and told me that while they disagreed with him, they felt a personal wrench because of a personal bond that has arisen between him and them, even though they had not come near him or had only seen him from a distance. So here was this man who created in his life-time this bond of affection and admiration among vast numbers of human beings, a man who has gone through this troubled period of history. He may in the opinion of some have made mistakes or succeeded – it is immaterial. But every one must necessarily agree about his giant stature and about his mighty achievements. So it is right that we should pay our tribute to him on this occasion because the occasion is not merely the passing away of a great figure but perhaps in a sense also a greater change, I mean in the sense of the ending of a certain era in history. Of course, history is continuous and it is rather absurd perhaps to divide it up in periods like this as historians and others seek to do; it goes on and on. Nevertheless there are periods which seem to end and take a fresh lease of life and undoubtedly when a very great man passes away who has embodied his age to a great extent, in a certain measure, there is the end of that particular period. I do not know what the future will hold, but undoubtedly even though Marshal Stalin has passed away, because of the great hold he had on peoples' minds and even hearts, his influence and memory will continue to exercise peoples' minds and inspire them. He has been described by many persons, including some who have been his great opponents in the world stage, and those descriptions vary and sometimes are contradictory. Some of them describe him as frank and even gentle person. Others describe him as hard and ruthless, and maybe he had all these feature in him. Anyhow a very great figure has passed away. He was, I believe, technically not the head of the Soviet State – we make reference to the passing of high dignitaries and especially heads of State – but Marshal Stalin was something much more than the head of a State. He was great in his own right way, whether he occupied the office or not. I believe that his influence was exercised generally in favour of peace. When war come he proved himself a very great warrior, but from all the information that we have had his influence had been in favour of peace. Even in these present days of trouble and conflict. I earnestly hope that his passing away will not mean that influence which was exercised in favour of peace is no longer to be availed of. Perhaps, if I may express the hope, this event may loosen all our minds a little from their rigidity in all countries, and that we may view the present problems of the world, not in that rigid way which develops, when people are continually in conflict and argument with each other, but in a somewhat more responsive and understanding way, so that his death may serve to bring us more to think of this troubled world, and to endeavour even more than before to secure peace in this world and to prevent any further disasters and catastrophes from occurring.

In fact, when our Ambassador saw Marshal Stalin three weeks ago or so he expressed himself to him in favour of peace and his desire that peace might not be broken in the world. He expressed then also his goodwill for India and sent his good wishes to our country and to some of us. And it was interesting how he discussed with our Ambassador some of our cultural problems, showing a certain knowledge, which was slightly surprising. He discussed – and it may interest the House – the languages of India, their relationships, their parentage, their extent, and our Ambassador gave him such replies as he could on the subject.

So, I hope, Sir, while expressing our tribute on this occasion, we may also hope that the world will be excited by this event into thinking more in terms of peace. If I may suggest it to you, Sir, perhaps this tribute and our message of condolence might be conveyed by you, Sir, on behalf of the House to the Government of the Soviet Union. May I also suggest, Sir, that the House might adjourn in memory of Marshal Stalin?

Mr. Deputy-Speaker: I am sure the House will fully associate itself with all the sentiments so ably expressed by the hon. Leader of the House, in connection with the passing away of Marshal Stalin. I shall convey, on behalf of the House, to the Government of U.S.S.R. the deep feelings of regret, and the message of condolence that has been passed in this House.

I would request hon. Members to stand in their seats for a couple of minutes.

In token of the memory of Marshal Stalin. I would adjourn this House for the day. The House will meet again on Monday, the 9th of March, 1953, at 2 P.M.

The House then adjourned till Two of the Clock on Monday, the 9th of March, 1953. C19S1. Class Warfare and the Secret Service Conflict to Hijack the CPSU and the Soviet State Apparatus

The following concept outlined by Walter Schellenberg is very important for people to understand:

Heydrich's own theory, which Himmler and Hitler shared, was that military defeat would so weaken the Soviet system that a subsequent infiltration of political agents would completely shatter it. (Hitler's Secret Service, Original title: The Labyrinth, Walther Schellenberg, Introduction by Alan Bullock, Translation by Louis Hagen, first published: 1956, p. 197) (IMG{Canaris})

Via inflicting severe damage upon the Soviet Red Army, the Soviet state would be bogged down in compensating for such damage and would deploy plenty of resources to this end. This would result in the allocation of fewer resources for counter-intelligence, thus allowing anti-Soviet intelligence agents more room for infiltrating the ranks of the Soviet state apparatus. A more powerful intelligence network would arise systematically undermining the Soviet state. At the time, the severe military defeat inflicted upon the German imperialist aggressors blocked the Hitlerian regime from decisively achieving such objectives. Damages were inflicted upon the Soviet Red Army but even greater damages were inflicted upon the Nazis; the anti-Soviet damages by the Nazis did temporarily elevate pro-Nazi intelligence agents in the Soviet system but anti-Nazi damages by the Soviets were greater, allowing the Soviets to infiltrate the Nazis more than the Nazis infiltrated the Soviets. In other words, due to the fact that tide of the military conflict was in the favour of the Soviet Union, the tide of the secret service conflict ended up being in the favour of the communist faction of the USSR as well, preventing Trotskyite and Titoist infiltration from being so mighty.

Nonetheless, it is true that BARBAROSSA caused great damages to the Soviet Red Army and even more so to the CPSU. Indeed, prior to Great Patriotic War, the Party was dominated by the industrial proletariat. The US ambassador Davies reported:

The party heretofore has been dominated by the industrial working class, constituting about 20% of the entire electorate. (THE RUSSIAN BEAR WADDLES THROUGH, NO. 455, Moscow, July 28, 1937, Strictly Confidential. TO THE HONOURABLE THE SECRETARY OF STATE ALLEGED BREAKDOWN OF SOVIET INDUSTRIAL PLAN, In: Mission to Moscow, Joseph E. Davies, pp. 125-126) (IMG{Democratization})

The conditions of the CPSU were to radically change as a result of the Nazi German invasion. During the Great Patriotic War, the bulk of the CPSU membership participated in leading the Red Army. Countless CPSU members participated in or near the frontlines. In an intelligence report to London, Archibald Clark, the British diplomat to Moscow, cited Red Army Major-General Fomichenko for stating that the CPSU sent two-thirds of its membership to the Red Army during the Great Patriotic War:

WITH reference to my despatch No. 798 of the 27th November 1944, regarding the relations between the Communist party and the Red army, I have the honour to invite your attention to a remark made by Major-General G. Fomichenko in Red Star on the 23rd March last to the effect that "the party (has) sent two-thirds of its members, including its best forces, into the ranks of the Red Army." (N 4815/1407/38, Sir A. Clark Kerr to Mr. Eden, No. 250, Moscow, April 11, 1945, Received: May 2, 1945, British Foreign Office (April to June 1945), p. 74. In: British Foreign Office (USSR and Finland, 1945), p. 110) (IMG)

The best of the communists of the CPSU died in the war, paving the way for opportunists and careerists to infiltrate the membership and the ranks of the CPSU. In 1946, Stalin himself stated:

Only in the first six months of the Great Patriotic War, more than 500,000 Communists died on the front lines leading the fight against Nazism, and overall more than 3,000,000 Communists died as the leading cadres in the war. They were the best of all of us – noble, pure, dedicated and selfless fighters for socialism, for the happiness of Soviet people. We miss them. If they were alive now, a lot of our problems would have been eliminated. The task of the Soviet creative people must reflect this, to show the future generations the best traits of a Soviet person. This must be the general line and aspiration for the development of literature, theatre, movies, music and art. (Stalin on Art and Culture, 1946. Revolutionary Democracy, retrieved from: North Star Compass) (IMG)

The Party had numerous communist blue-collar workers, numerous revolutionary intellectuals and bureau workers, and numerous kolkhoz peasants, and yet so many of them died in the Great Patriotic War. This had a severe impact on the CPSU membership. The annihilation of many Red Army generals, Soviet intelligence operatives, and CPSU activists damaged the Soviet Union to a world-historically significant level.

As shown in the table below, the percentage of communist (blue-collar) workers in the CPSU went down from 65.2% in 1932 to 33.8% in 1946. By contrast, the percentage of White Collar workers and intelligentsia in the Party went up from 7.9% in 1932 to 47.6% in 1946 and 49.8% by 1952. Clearly, the white-collar workers – the intelligentsia and the bureaucrats – formed the largest percentage and almost half of the CPSU membership, in contrast to the communist blue-collar workers who went down from a large majority to a minority. The Great Patriotic War killed numerous communist blue-collar workers and thus led to the white-collar workers – the intellectuals and bureaucrats – outnumbering the blue-collar workers the Party. Numerous communist personnel were exterminated by the Nazis, making the work of the CPSU much harder.

Since the days of the October Revolution, the overwhelming majority of the intelligentsia, coming from feudal or bourgeois family backgrounds, were hostile to Soviet power. The official history of the CPSU in 1939 denounced the role of much of the intelligentsia as agents of fascist reaction in the Party of the proletariat:

The defeat of the Revolution of 1905 started a process of disintegration and degeneration in the ranks of the fellow-travelers of the revolution. Degenerate and decadent tendencies grew particularly marked among the intelligentsia. The fellow-travelers who came from the bourgeois camp to join the movement during the upsurge of the revolution deserted the Party in the days of reaction. Some of them joined the camp of the open enemies of the revolution, others entrenched themselves in such legally functioning working-class societies as still survived, and endeavoured to divert the proletariat from the path of revolution and to discredit the revolutionary party of the proletariat. Deserting the revolution the fellow-travelers tried to win the good graces of the reactionaries and to live in peace with tsardom.

The tsarist government took advantage of the defeat of the revolution to enlist the more cowardly and self-seeking fellow-travelers of the revolution as agents-provocateurs. These vile Judases were sent by the tsarist Okhrana into the working class and Party organizations, where they spied from within and betrayed revolutionaries.

The offensive of the counter-revolution was waged on the ideological front as well. There appeared a whole horde of fashionable writers who "criticized" Marxism, and "demolished" it, mocked and scoffed at the revolution, extolled treachery, and lauded sexual depravity under the guise of the "cult of individuality."

In the realm of philosophy increasing attempts were made to "criticize" and revise Marxism; there also appeared all sorts of religious trends camouflaged by pseudo-scientific theories.

"Criticizing" Marxism became fashionable.

All these gentlemen, despite their multifarious colouring, pursued one common aim: to divert the masses from the revolution.

Decadence and scepticism also affected a section of the Party intelligentsia, those who considered themselves Marxists but had never held firmly to the Marxist position. Among them were writers like Bogdanov, Bazarov, Lunacharsky (who had sided with the Bolsheviks in 1905), Yushkevich and Valentinov (Mensheviks). They launched their "criticism" simultaneously against the philosophical foundations of Marxist theory, i.e., against dialectical materialism, and against the fundamental Marxist principles of historical science, i.e., against historical materialism. This criticism differed from the usual criticism in that it was not conducted openly and squarely, but in a veiled and hypocritical form under the guise of "defending" the fundamental positions of Marxism. These people claimed that in the main they were Marxists, but that they wanted to "improve" Marxism—by ridding it of certain of its fundamental principles. In reality, they were hostile to Marxism, for they tried to undermine its theoretical foundations, although they hypocritically denied their hostility to Marxism and two-facedly continued to style themselves Marxists. The danger of this hypocritical criticism lay in the fact that it was calculated to deceive rank-and-file members of the Party and might lead them astray. The more hypocritical grew this criticism, which aimed at undermining the theoretical foundations of Marxism, the more dangerous it was to the Party, for the more it merged with the general campaign of the reactionaries against the Party, against the revolution. Some of the intellectuals who had deserted Marxism went so far as to advocate the founding of a new religion (these were known as "god-seekers" and "god-builders").

(HISTORY OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE SOVIET UNION (BOLSHEVIKS), CPSU Central Committee, 1939, Chapter 4) (IMG)

there is evidence that a considerable number of intellectuals, previously anti-Bolshevist, have decided to throw in the lot, at least temporarily, with the Bolsheviks. (An Appreciation of the Internal Situation in Russia, War Office, General Staff April 25, 1919. In: "PEACE CONGRESS: PARIS", Secret, April 25, 1919. In: Foreign Office (1917-1919), p. 101) (IMG{October Revolution & Civil War})

The Lenin faction undertook measures to retain the scientists inside the Soviet Union so to advance the industry of the proletariat's state, while engaging in purge campaigns against the rest of the reactionary intelligentsia:

The overwhelming majority of scientists were hostile to the new regime, more hostile than they had been to the old regime, but neither side to the conflict could do without the other. With ... joy Lenin exiled religious philosophers and sociologists like Sorokin, but he repeatedly warned his comrades that natural scientists could not be treated the same way, however deviant their politics might be. (The Lysenko Affair, David Joravsky, 1970, p. 27) (IMG{Soviet Science})

In the years after the First World War, with the process of socialist construction, there came a small but growing stratum of intellectuals that came not from feudal or bourgeois families but that rather came from working class or kolkhoz peasant families. The proletarian or kolkhoznik family background of these new intellectuals greatly increased their tendency towards a scientific socialist outlook. This changed during the Great Patriotic War, as numerous revolutionary Soviet scientists, professors, researchers, journalists, etc. were murdered by the Nazis. The conditions of the intelligentsia of the USSR reverted back to the years prior to the days of the October Revolution. The counter-revolutionary intelligentsia began to fill up many of the academic and educational positions. Revisionism, anti-socialism disguised as socialism, therefore made up a much greater percentage of the intelligentsia of the USSR in the years after the Great Patriotic War. And such counter-revolutionary intelligentsia in addition to the bureaucrats, the white-collar workers, made up the bulk of the CPSU membership.

For this reason, after the Great Patriotic War, the communist faction in the USSR stepped up its campaign of cracking down on the counter-revolutionary ideas promoted by the CIA and MI6 among the intelligentsia of the Soviet Union. Zhdanovschina, the campaign spearheaded by Zhdanov with the aim of vigorously criticizing various intellectuals for their reactionary views, was launched.

C19S2. Exploiting Contradictions in Parallel Comprador Networks; The Soviet Communist Faction's Handling of the Comprador Pincer Assault

Understand this: Stalin's strategy of combat against the comprador agents in the socialist state apparatus was to allow for two comprador-dominated parallel unofficial intelligence networks, one left-opportunist and the other right-opportunist in rhetoric, and to pit these comprador-dominated intelligence networks against each other, even though, behind the scenes, these two parallel intelligence networks, both rooted in the comprador classes, were covertly allied and would form a bloc, a pincer assault with a left-opportunist flank and a right-opportunist flank, against the Stalin faction. Stalin pursued this strategy with the Trotskyite left-opportunists and the Bukharinite right-opportunists, the left-opportunist Yezhov network and the right-opportunist Yagoda network, the right-opportunist Beria network and the left-opportunist Malenkov network. In each round of the fight, the Stalin faction would ally with comprador network 1 so to decimate, but not annihilate, the comprador network 2, and thereupon the Stalin faction would encircle with agents and coopt the comprador network 2 so to decimate comprador network 1; upon decimating comprador network 1, the Stalin faction would encircle with agents and thus re-coopt comprador network 1 against comprador network 2; and so forth the cycle would go on. Such a divide and defeat strategy would gradually help annihilate both the comprador intelligence networks. Again, the two comprador networks are secretly allied, but, as they seek to launch a pincer assault on the communist centrist part of the spectrum, they divide themselves into two flanks, the left-opportunist flank (e.g. Trotsky, Malenkov) and the right-opportunist flank (e.g. Bukharin, Beria). The Stalin-led network would utilize these ostensible 'hostilities' between the covertly-allied left-opportunists and right-opportunists so to compile dossier against each of them, demote their members, erode their strengths, and thereby push for a gradual purge of all such comprador agents. To moderate the 'heat' of revolutionary transformation, the left-opportunists and right-opportunists would be used to respectively heat up and cool down the revolutionary transformation, like two components of a thermostat. This strategy pursued by the Stalin faction was clearly manifested in the collectivization drive and the Great Purge of the 1930s. However, the Beria network had personal experience with it. Sergo Beria wrote:

What were Stalin's methods of government? His first principle was to multiply the apparatuses. He encouraged the parallel development of the Party apparatus and that of the government, each of which was watched by a third apparatus, that of State Control, while State Security watched them all. The leader of the Party had at his disposal control organisations within the Party itself. Stalin did not create this system based on universal suspicion. Having inherited it from Lenin he had been able to use it to take power. He utilised the apparatuses against his rivals, whom he succeeded in supplanting because he had much more information than they had. Eventually, this arrangement promoted his personal power. The Party had the organs of repression under its orders, but it was the Party's leader who wielded the sword.

Stalin's second principle was to set those around him one against another. He was a master of this art. He whispered to one man something bad about another, then did the same with the latter.

(Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 145) (IMG)

I have read in the writings of Khrushchev and others that Stalin had begun to fear my father. Actually, he feared no one. He was quite aware of his power and did not know fear, but he was able to judge people's characters. It was not possible to attempt anything against Stalin... He was so strong, he had succeeded so well in setting those around him against each other, and had so effectively multiplied apparatuses which watched each other, that he had erected insurmountable obstacles. (...). Although my father did not control the security organs he had men in place who kept him informed of whatever was happening. Also, and above all, he had his own intelligence network, which was not dependent on any existing structure. Stalin had allowed him to form it (part of his tactic of using some against others) and had never gone back on that decision. He ... passed on to Stalin only facts compromising the organisations which were intriguing against him. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 246) (IMG)

As was mentioned, the Beria network and the Malenkov network were pitted against each other, even though, secretly, behind the scenes, Beria and Malenkov were closest allies. Sergo Beria recalled:

There were, in fact, provocateurs among them, working for Malenkov, who was already busy getting rid of all his potential rivals.

Whenever he saw my father was getting close to someone he began intriguing against that person. He wanted to be the only one close to my father, knowing well that he would never seek the first place [and] would always put Malenkov in front. Worse still, he had believed that he could make Kuznetsov one of his creatures, and now the man had taken up a position against him. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, pp. 215-216) (IMG)

The above quote exposes only a percentage of the depth of the overt-level contradictions behind two covert comprador allies.

Malenkov the left-opportunist was an agent of Beria the right-opportunist. The latter planned to promote Malenkov upon seizing power. Yet, Malenkov, owing to his overt-level ideological contradictions as a left-opportunist in contrast to Beria the right-opportunist, was coopted by the communists so to spearhead purges against the other agents of Beria, despite being an agent of Beria himself.

Beria and Malenkov, two allied comprador agents, were both supporters of the Gestapo agent Tito. Yet, the communist faction led by Stalin, well aware of Malenkov's support for Tito, coopted Malenkov to spearhead anti-Tito action:

After the break between Tito and Stalin in June 1948 my father explained to me that he had never disapproved of Tito: 'Every state has the right to pursue the policy of its choice.' He was conscious of the analogies between Yugoslavia and Georgia. (...). Malenkov, doubtless influenced by my father, who was against that condemnation and often cursed the Cominform, hesitated where the Yugoslav question was concerned. He did not like the anti-Tito campaign but said that he was obliged to take part in it. That was not enough for Stalin, who stuck the label 'Titoist' on him as well as on my father. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 210) (IMG)

The number of parallel comprador networks, though often limited to two, of course needed not to be limited. At times, the Stalin faction sowed dissension and engineered splits among the comprador networks so to give rise to three, four, five, etc. parallel comprador networks, systematically setting maneuvering them against each other.

By 1951, the comprador/Titoist opposition stepped up efforts to circumvent socialist counter-intelligence intrigues and plotted to reduce the overt-level contradictions between the parallel comprador networks. As such, the comprador networks increased cooperation so to compromise the communist faction's attempt to pit them against each other. Nonetheless, the evidence overwhelmingly shows that even after the 1951 agreement, these parallel comprador networks continued their sharp contradiction with each other, despite not being as sharply contradictory as before 1951:

In 1951 the members of the Politburo, Bulganin, Malenkov, Khrushchev and my father began to appreciate that they were all in the same boat and it mattered little whether one of them was thrown overboard a few days before the others. They felt a sense of solidarity once they had faced the fact that none of them would be Stalin's successor.... They therefore agreed among themselves not to allow Stalin to set one against another, and that they would immediately inform each other of anything Stalin said about them, so as to frustrate his manipulations. They recalled their former intrigues and buried their old grievances. Khrushchev told my father that Stalin had asked him for reports on the national question when he was in the Ukraine, though in principle, policy on that matter was still a preserve of the NKVD. This solidarity among the members of the Politburo increased as time went by. They also confided in Mikoyan, who understood the situation. But Stalin's intrigues left traces which were not completely wiped out. It must be said that Stalin constructed his provocations around an element of truth.

After about six months Stalin guessed what was going on and unceremoniously demanded of the members of the Politburo: 'Tell me, are you forming a bloc against me?' He took the steps he thought appropriate and began to meet Ignatiev, the head of the State Security without going through the Politburo.

(Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 239. Bold added.) (IMG)

The overt-level contradictions between the covertly-allied parallel comprador networks continued after Stalin's death and led certain comprador networks, such as those of Khrushchev and Malenkov, to be coopted in the fight against other comprador networks, such as that of Beria.

The use of the parallel comprador networks was manifested in the struggle of the Stalin-Zhdanov faction against the Malenkov-Beria faction. Prior to the Great Patriotic War, while General Zhdanov was being deployed by the Stalin faction to the strategic city of Leningrad, Malenkov, the Trotskyite agent of Beria, experienced a rise in his prestige. The factional influence of Malenkov did not increase as a result of the deployment of Zhdanov to Leningrad, for Zhdanov's role as the commander of the Red Army forces during the German-Finnish Siege of Leningrad undermined the Axis menace, the allies of the Trotskyite agent Malenkov, and thus weakened Malenkov's power base. Nonetheless, Malenkov did see a rise in prestige, an elevation of image among the Soviet state personnel:

Malenkov, a rising young man who had become prominent only in February 1941, was made a member of the Supreme Defense Council, a five-man streamlined Politburo for the conduct of the war. In the Supreme Defense Council Malenkov was Stalin's immediate subordinate for Party affairs, with additional responsibility for aircraft production and for the relocation of Soviet industry from Western USSR to the east. (The Zhdanov-Malenkov Relationship, CIA, July 29, 1953, p. 1) (IMG{Greece})

By the end of the Great Patriotic War and the imposition of Soviet influence over Nazi-collaborationist Finland, Zhdanov returned to Moscow. Then, Zhdanov ... began undercutting Malenkov: he successfully unseated him from key positions, and then attacked such associates of his as Varga and Aleksandrov. As for Malenkov, he appeared to be concerned, from late 1946 on, with agricultural problems and suffered a great loss of prominence. (The Zhdanov-Malenkov Relationship, CIA, July 29, 1953, p. 2) (IMG{Greece})

Zhdanov, a revolutionary communist intellectual, was especially talented in combating the bulk of the intelligentsia, the bulk being corrupt and reactionary. Thus, Zhdanov spearheaded the campaign against intellectuals, the Party membership social base upon which Malenkov and Beria relied for their struggle against the communist faction emanating from the blue-collar workers. Varga, a Malenkov agent and a Hungarian crypto-anti-socialist economic, against the scientific principles of communism, had asserted that Peoples' Democracies were states whose character lied in between the dictatorship of the proletariat and the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie:

The social structure of these states differs from all those hitherto known to us; it is something totally new in the history of mankind. It is neither a bourgeois dictatorship nor a proletarian dictatorship. The old state apparatus has not been smashed, as in the Soviet Union, but re-organized by means of a continuous inclusion in it of the supporters of the new regime. They are not capitalist states in the ordinary sense of the word. Neither, however, are they Socialist states. The basis for their transition to Socialism is given by the nationalization of the most important means of production and by the essential character of the state. They may, with the maintenance of the present state apparatus, gradually pass over to Socialism, developing to an ever-increasing extent the socialist sector which already exists side by side with the simple commodity sector (peasant and artisan) and the capitalist sector, which has lost its dominant position.... (Democracy of a New Type, Eugene Varga, 1947)

This was of course a claim fundamentally opposed to the scientific theses of communism. The Titoists and their American masters considered Zhdanov to be a communist 'fanatic' and 'dogmatic':

Zhdanov is said to have been a fanatic Communist.... (The Zhdanov-Malenkov Relationship, CIA, July 29, 1953, p. 2) (IMG{Greece})

Zhdanov was no 'fanatic' communist. Rather, simply, he understood the fact of the incontrovertible correctness of the Soviet cause on all the grand-scale issues and on almost all micro-scale questions, when so many others around him did not. Zhdanov, a communist loyalist, could assist Stalin, Molotov, and Kaganovich in the Politburo, so to facilitate the outnumbering of the Beria-Malenkov group during the Politburo voting sessions on policy matters. By the end of the Great Patriotic War, Zhdanov returned to Moscow. Then,:

Zhdanov again managed to ... eclipse Malenkov. Zhdanov sold Stalin on the necessity for an ideological cleansing of the Communist Party and for a tightening up of Soviet society generally. Zhdanov himself spearheaded the ideological purge. He then began undercutting Malenkov: he successfully unseated him from key positions, and then attacked such associates of his as Varga and Aleksandrov. As for Malenkov, he appeared to be concerned, from late 1946 on, with agricultural problems and suffered a great loss of prominence. (The Zhdanov-Malenkov Relationship, CIA, July 29, 1953, p. 2) (IMG{Greece})

There was:

strong evidence of rivalry and enmity between Zhdanov and Malenkov during the immediate post-war period.... (Politics and the Soviet Army, Office of Current Intelligence, CIA, March 12, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

After the Great Patriotic War, the Stalin-Zhdanov faction coopted Abakumov – a corrupt bureaucrat, thus a comprador class member, and an agent of Beria – for combat against the Beria-Malenkov group. Stalin personally supported Abakumov's appointment to leadership of the MGB and sowed dissension in the Beria network:

Thus, Stalin, pursuing his goal of keeping Beria under control, appointed Abakumov Minister of the MGB in 1946, and felt that since Abakumov was directly responsible for this dismissal of Merkulov he would not have the opportunity to maintain close relations with Beria. (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, pp. 3-4) (IMG)

The promotion of Abakumov's rank, bringing for him a higher pay, was a bribe, a 'carrot', aimed at coopting him. The promotion of Abakumov at the expense of the Beriaite agent Merkulov was a way of isolating Abakumov (from the Beria network to which he truly belonged), so to better encircle Abakumov with communist faction agents, as a 'stick' to reinforce the 'carrot' in the cooptation process. At the same time, such a promotion obviously resulted in an artificial 'split' in the Beria network. It is nonetheless worth bearing in mind that, at heart, Abakumov was a Beria agent merely coopted to fight against the Beriaites. Indeed,:

After Stalin's death Abakumov told my father what had happened. He claimed that he had only been obeying formal orders from Stalin to complete a dossier against my father. Abakumov protested his devotion to my father and claimed to have done nothing about it. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 217) (IMG)

Having thus engineered the establishment of three parallel comprador networks, the Stalin faction then coopted Abakumov and his followers for combat against the Beria network and the Malenkov network. Thus, under the influence of Abakumov,:

In 1946, on the basis of Smersh documents, many leading generals in the Soviet Army and Air Force, including Marshal A. A. Kovikov, were arrested, decommissioned and sent to concentration camps for detention for various lengths of time, which were specified by a direct order from Stalin. During this period, his agentura disclosed a network of speculative operations in the Ministry of Aviation Industry, which included the Minister himself, Col. Gen. A. I. Shakhurin, who was later dismissed and arrested. This disclosure reflected directly on the position of Malenkov, who was responsible for this ministry during the war as a member of the State Committee of Defense. In addition, this also undermined the authority of one of Beria's closest friends, Army General V. N. Merkulov, Minister of Defense, who was removed from his position on orders of the Central Committee. In 1946, on the basis of Smersh documents, many leading generals in the Soviet Army and Air Force, including Marshal A. A. Novikov, were arrested, decommissioned, and sent to concentration camps for detention for various lengths of time, which were specified by a direct order from Stalin. (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 3) (IMG)

The return of Zhdanov and the rise of the communist-coopted Abakumov network undermined the Malenkov network and consequently also the Beria network. The blow to Malenkov's Titoist network was so strong that as:

early [as] October 1946, a source of the US Military Attaché in Moscow reported that Malenkov had suffered some measure of disgrace.... (The Zhdanov-Malenkov Relationship, CIA, July 29, 1953, p. 4) (IMG{Greece})

Sergo Beria too recalled

Stalin had begun involving himself in the affairs of the atomic committee in 1946, at the time of Malenkov's disgrace, which also marked a weakening of my father's position. It was then that he started to send for scientists. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, pp. 227-228) (IMG)

Abakumov, a bureaucrat, was naturally susceptible to a closer relationship with the MI6 agent Beria, the very man against whom Abakumov was tasked with spearheading purges. Regarding Abakumov's top ally in the Kremlin, a 1955 US intelligence named:

Beriy, with whom Abakumov had very close relations during the last few years before his arrest.... (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 4) (IMG)

Note that long prior to his arrest, Abakumov had been a Beria agent, only coopted and set 'against' the latter artificially through his promotion at the expense of Merkulov.

Kuznetsov, the Leningrad Titoist and close ally of MI6 agent Beria, deepened bonds with Abakumov:

Kuznetsov made a show of his friendship with Abakumov. They were constantly seen together. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 216) (IMG)

Petr Deriabin, a former high-ranking intelligence official of the Soviet Union who defected to the USA in 1954 and became one of the top sources for the CIA, added that Abakumov had a very corrupt personality:

Among the misdeeds of Abakumov were ... [i]gnoring "Communist moral principles" by participation in extramarital affairs and misusing government property by entertaining these women in bedrooms of our officers' club and of MGB safehouses, (True, from what I heard in the Guards Directorate.)

Abakumov had a very serious personal weakness that eventually became part of the pretext for arresting him. The weakness was women. Abakumov went to extremes, not in aberrations like the rapist Beria, but in frequency. He compounded the problem by taking his women to apartments that were supposed to be reserved for quite another type of clandestine meeting, between MGB officers and their agents. Time after time Abakumov compromised these safehouses, which thereupon lost their operational utility, by exposing them to outsiders – actresses, cheating wives, secretaries, foreign visitors, God knows who. Abakumov also took girlfriends to a special room in the MGB club where he stored expensive gifts for them. (Many other State Security generals were similarly guilty.)

One such girlfriend was Olga Chekhova, a German movie star. Abakumov had dispatched a plane to Berlin for her. She was flown to Moscow and taken to the best MGB safehouse for a 72-hour rendezvous. I have seen her photograph in MGB files. Then in her late 40s, she was singularly attractive. Olga was a distant relative of the Russian writer Anton Chekov. She was the descendent of an uncle of his who moved to Germany in the late 18th or early 19th century. She had circulated among the highest levels of the Nazi leadership, and she had been a Soviet agent since before the war. MGB files contained photographs of her with Hitler, Goering, and Goebbels together; with Martin Bormann; and with the last Gestapo Chief, Mueller – all taken before and during World War II. State Security recruited Olga before World War II but lost contact with her during the war, resuming the contact toward the end of 1945. As of 1952 the MGB had determined Olga resided in West Germany, was considering her for operational use, and for the stated reason of tracking down a rumor that she made a trip to Moscow just after World War II (the one sponsored by Abakumov, presumably) asked the Berlin/Karlsborst residency to find out more about her.

Abakumov, furthermore, had been inattentive to complaints that the chief of his Secretariat, Chernov, was rude toward and uncooperative with elements of the MGB.

(‘Inside Stalin’s Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue’, Petr Deriabin, pp. 58-60) (IMG)

As MI6 agent Beria’s ally:

Abakumov ... had free access to Stalin, because he had audio-surveillance put on the houses of all the members of the Politburo and all marshals of the Soviet Union. (The Execution of Viktor Semenovich Abakumov, CIA, January 25, 1955, p. 5) (IMG)

Over time, under Beria’s patronage, Abakumov rose as a prominent corrupt official himself, amassing 5 million rubles:

Abakumov’s ... personal property, which was looted for the most part in Germany, amounted to between four or five million rubles. (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 4) (IMG)

The top CIA spy Deriabin too confirmed:

Among the misdeeds of Abakumov were ... [m]isappropriation of government funds. (True, according to the confession of Abakumov’s wife, Tonya.) (‘Inside Stalin’s Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue’, Petr Deriabin, pp. 58-59) (IMG)

He was later purged for this exact reason:

Abakumov was arrested in 1952 chiefly for moral degeneration, mistakes in his work, and for using his position for his personal interests. (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 4) (IMG)

C19S3.1. The Jewish Bourgeois-Nationalists and the Kremlin Doctors

Establishing a Yiddish anti-fascist committee in the USSR was undoubtedly a positive step, but the problem was that what was officially called the ‘Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee’ was the creature of Beria and Henry Morgenthau:

During the war my father initiated the creation of anti-fascist committees, including the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee, which came into being in April-May 1942. The Jewish intellectual elite helped him to organise this committee, which was intended to form a permanent lobby that would mobilise Jewish capital, financial and political, throughout the world and influence American policy. The substantial sums that the Soviet Union received during the course of the war came to us thanks to the Jewish financial group.... Morgenthau and Lilienthal are the two names that I remember from this group. (‘Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin’s Kremlin, Sergo Beria, pp. 109-110) (IMG)

Note that Henry Morgenthau had been the US State Department official who founded the Zionist terrorist espionage organization, the Joint Distribution Committee (JDC or ‘Joint’):

The AJDC was founded in the autumn of 1914 in New York when Henry Morgenthau, US ambassador to Turkey, approached Louis Marshall and Jacob H. Schiff with a request for $50,000 in support for the Jews in Palestine, who were suffering from famine. (Guide to the Sources on the Holocaust in Occupied Poland, European Holocaust Research Infrastructure (EHRI), Alina Skibińska, Translator: Jessica Taylor-Kucia, 2014, p. 243) (IMG{Israel})

Lavrenti Beria planted Henryk Erlich and Victor Alter, two Bundist leaders of the Kautskyite Second International, in charge of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee:

However, my father made a blunder when he wanted to give the leadership of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee to G. Erlich and V. Alter. They ... had formerly been critics of Stalin. In general he knew little of the conflicts between the Bund and the Bolsheviks. When Stalin saw their names on the list of future members of the Committee he became violently angry: ‘What’s this? You’ve taken people from the Bund, Trotskyists!’ And he ordered their arrests. After this gaffe my father delved into the history of the Bund: I saw Merkulov bring him huge files about it. Any Party could derive inspiration from the Bund’s remarkable organisation, he remarked. I heard my father express regret at the deaths of Erlich and Alter, talking to the actor Mikhoels, who then became the leader of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee. (‘Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin’s Kremlin, Sergo Beria, pp. 109-110) (IMG)

During 1943, when the US imperialists had shifted strategic orientation in favor of the Nazis against the USSR, Shlomo Mikhoels had a trip to the United States in which he engaged in secret negotiations with the United States, negotiations of a kind that could gain an anti-Soviet character:

Mikhoels ... was sent to the USA with the poet Fefer, between June and December 1943. At the same time, my father sent over there a Georgian film director named Kolotozov, accompanied by a very beautiful Leningrad actress. They were supposed to reactivate my father’s old contacts in Hollywood. My father advised Kolotozov to warn Mikhoels that his every move would be reported to the Soviet authorities by his closest colleague and friend Fefer, and to urge him to control his tongue and conceal even from his nearest companions the real purpose of the visit, keeping secret some of his meetings with Americans. The informer was not reporting to my father but to Abakumov and Merkulov. He was therefore unable to get rid of him and could influence Merkulov only at a very high level (which explains why Stalin dismissed Merkulov). Such a move would have attracted suspicion. Fefer was an enthusiastic skirt-chaser, so he was kept busy with women. In his absence, Mikhoels, accompanied by Kolotozov, was able to meet a certain number of influential financiers. Unfortunately he could not stay discreet. (‘Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin’s Kremlin, Sergo Beria, pp. 109-110) (IMG)

The fact that Beria tried to protect Mikhoels from getting caught by Soviet counter-intelligence for these secret negotiations is an indication of the treasonous nature of the visit. In fact, as confirmed by the Israeli anti-Soviet historian Gilboa, during the meeting with Weizmann, Mikhoels and his henchman Fefer gave the American Zionist intelligence official Weizmann ‘a picture of the Jewish community in Russia’ after allegedly 25 years of the loss of intelligence contact:

Firm evidence ... is to be found in Weizmann’s appraisal of his three-hour meeting with Mikhoels and Fefer in the United States, which he termed as a great privilege and a most moving occasion, after having been severed from Russian Jewry for twenty-five years. Weizmann stated that this talk had given him a picture of the Jewish community in Russia.... He said he believed they were interested in Zionism, or not opposed to it at all events. (The Black years of Soviet Jewry, Yehoshua A. Gilboa, p. 70) (IMG)

Fefer, the agent of Mikhoels, had been present in the conversation. Mikhoels and Fefer provided Chaim Weizmann, the Zionist agent of the American secret service, with intelligence materials concerning the conditions in the USSR. Moreover, Fefer was to run a network of intelligence agents and killer-doctors in the Soviet Union. Detailing the intelligence connections between the killer-doctors in the Kremlin, the anti-Soviet Soros agent Brent said:

Fefer had recruited Etinger; Etinger had recruited Vinogradov; Vinogradov had recruited Yegorov; Kuznetsov had sold out to the Americans and had abetted Abakumov, who was preparing for a seizure of supreme power. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 210. Bold added.) (IMG)

Vinogradov was a personal doctor of Stalin. Vinogradov and Yegorov both were involved in the assassination of Zhdanov and were suspected of having masterminded the 1949 murder of Dimitrov, the 1952 murder of Choibalsan, the attempt to murder PCF General-Secretary Maurice Thorez and several others.

Motivated by Zionism, the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee sought to come up with a 'Crimean Proposal', which if implemented would have established an autonomous Jewish settler-colony in Crimea. Shimon Redlich, the agent and former fellow of the CIA front think tank Wilson Center, wrote:

Anastasya Potoskaya, Mikhoels' widow portrayed the atmosphere surrounding the submission of the "Crimean proposal": "...I recall those sleepless nights.... Mikhoels' wisdom was permeated with Hassidic romanticism and he believed that he could save his people...." (...). Mikhoels also discussed the matter with some of his close friends. As for opinions within the JAFK, there were some staunch opponents, particularly Ehrenburg ... [who] ... argued that Jewish evacuees should go back to their prewar homes.... ('War, the Holocaust, and Stalinism', Shimon Redlich, 2013, p. 46) (IMG)

James Rosenberg promised Mikhoels full assistance in this plan:

The "Crimean Proposal" affirmed that the plan for a Jewish republic enjoyed massive support among Soviet Jews and would result in extensive assistance from world Jewry. As we know, Jewish organizations in the US, and particularly the JDC, had promised such assistance to Mikhoels and Fefer a few months earlier. ('War, the Holocaust, and Stalinism', Shimon Redlich, 2013, p. 46) (IMG)

The Proposal was sent to the Soviet leadership:

A copy of the "Crimean Proposal" addressed to Stalin, dated February 15, 1944, is on file in the JAFK archive. An identical copy, dated February 21, addressed to Molotov, is on file in the Party archive.' Molotov sent the proposal to Malenkov, Mikoyan, Shcherbakov and Voznesensky on February 24. ('War, the Holocaust, and Stalinism', Shimon Redlich, 2013,p. 47) (IMG)

Raul Wallenberg was one of the Zionist spies of the American secret service and he collaborated with the Nazis under the cover of 'bribing' (read: funding) them in order to 'save the Jews'. Wallenberg was arrested by the SMERSH, the Soviet counter-intelligence. However, the SMERSH chief Abakumov was a Beria agent, and Abakumov was keen to protect the CIA-Mossad network inside the USSR. He therefore had a habit of slowly but surely murdering any Zionist American spy who was willing to testify compromising information against the CIA-Mossad network inside the USSR. For the cases of the deaths of several Zionist spies arrested in the USSR, the fingers point to Abakumov as the perpetrator. For the death of Shlomo Mikhoels, the fingers point to Abakumov as the conspirator. Of course, throughout his career at the high command, Abakumov was backed by Beria. These murders were part of the case made against him by Riyumin's network and are part of the reason why Stalin promoted Riyumin against Abakumov. The Soviet counter-intelligence indeed arrested Wallenberg in order to extract confessions from him as compromising materials against the Beria-backed Zionist elements in the 'Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee'. Conveniently, since Abakumov was in charge of these efforts, before much compromising material could come out of Wallenberg's mouth against Beria's network, Wallenberg died:

Two or three years later, after his return to Moscow, he told me that Abakumov's Smersh had seized Wallenberg in Budapest in January 1945. Like me, Serov did not know of the connection between Wallenberg and my father. I mentioned the matter to my father as though this had been an exploit of our services. He looked at me and asked: 'where did you hear that name?' 'Serov spoke to me about him.'

My father then telephoned Serov and covered him with invective. 'What got into you to spread such gossip? And before my son, too!' At the time I did not understand this reaction. Later, when the affair of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee was used to undermine my father's position, he explained to me that Wallenberg had been kidnapped for the same reason. My father was the target aimed at through Wallenberg. The Wallenberg family had acted as intermediaries with the Finnish government in the armistice negotiations with the USSR. Raul Wallenberg had connections with the British, German and Soviet services and had used these relationships to save Jews. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 111) (IMG)

The agenda of the Beria agent Abakumov was to save the Zionist intelligence operatives even if that meant murdering the ones arrested by the Soviet counter-intelligence so to prevent the rest of the Zionist intelligence network from being exposed:

Among the misdeeds of Abakumov were ... [f]ailure to take "active measures" against Zionists and failure to heed the Central Committee about removing Broverman from the minister's Secretariat. (True....) ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, pp. 58-59) (IMG)

Shlomo Mikhoels is widely believed to have been murdered by Lavrenti Beria:

One explanation, apparently deliberately leaked out by Moscow to Jewish Communist and leftist circles abroad ... is significant in the light of subsequent happenings: it claimed that Mikhoels had been silenced by American intelligence agents after the Soviet security services had uncovered an extensive spy ring, operated in the USSR by the American Joint Distribution Committee and headed by Mikhoels on behalf of U.S. intelligence. (The Black years of Soviet Jewry, Yehoshua A. Gilboa, p. 83) (IMG)

Mikhoels's murder was a planned, deliberate move. To be assured of this, it was not necessary to wait fifteen years until a Soviet Lithuanian paper should report that Mikhoels had been killed by Beria's agents; already towards the end of 1948 it had become increasingly clear that the alleged accident in Minsk had been an official act. "When Zuskin was arrested," Ehrenburg wrote, "everybody started wondering how Mikhoels had lost his life." Binyamin Zuskin, who had ranked sector Mikhoels at the Jewish State Theater in Moscow, had been a pointed its director on Mikhoels's death. His arrest at the end of 1948 was a link in the chain of mass arrests and liquidations. (The Black years of Soviet Jewry, Yehoshua A. Gilboa, p. 84) (IMG)

Solomon Mikhoels, founder of the Moscow Yiddish theater, was liquidated on orders of Stalin's security police chief Lavrenti Beria, the Soviet news paper Lituaniya Sovietskaya has reported, according to the French press today.

This was the first time that a Soviet organ had officially given the facts of Mikhoels death. Until now Soviet sources had claimed that Mikhoels had died in an automobile accident in 1948. The Lithuanian newspaper said that Mikhoels, a former head of the wartime Soviet Anti-Fascist Committee, died “a victim of Beria’s infamy.” Beria was executed by the Khrushchev regime following Stalin’s death. (Soviet Newspaper Admits Mikhoels Was Killed by Order of Authorities, Jewish Telegraphic Agency, January 17, 1963) (IMG)

A close associate of Fefer was Dr. Shimeliovich. Among the absurd blood-libelous slanders of the Zionist Dr. Shimeliovich was the outrageous comment that the USSR – the state responsible for saving millions of Ashkenazim from extermination – was not only ‘anti-Semitic’, but also that its alleged ‘anti-Semitism’ was worse than even Nazi Germany’s. Shimon Redlich, the agent and former fellow of the CIA front think tank Wilson Center, wrote:

[S]ubmitted by Dr. Shimeliovich, [it] was considered “too nationalistic.” Shimeliovich emphasized the unique tragedy of the Jews under German rule and severely criticized anti-semitism and discrimination against Jews in the non-occupied parts of the country. He openly spoke of the fact that “Anti-semitism in the USSR often causes more anguish than the annihilation of more than four million Jews by the Germans.” Finally, a letter addressed to Stalin and signed by Mikhoels, Fefer and Epshteyn, was drafted mid-February, 1944. The “Crimean Proposal” opened with an impressive statement of what would later be referred to as the Holocaust. It spoke of the total annihilation of the Jews in Nazi-occupied territories of the USSR and of the “tragedy which the Jewish people is suffering in the present war.” Many Jewish evacuees in, according to the letter, did not consider their places of origin, which had turned into mass cemeteries for their kin, as desirable places for postwar resettlement. Hundreds of thousands of Jews from the territories acquired by the USSR in 1939-1940 would stay within the country and seek places to settle. In addition to demographic arguments, the letter also pointed to the national-cultural needs of Soviet Jews after the war. Jewish cultural and professional cadres were not very welcome by other Soviet nationalities who, with the passage of time, had developed their own national intelligentsia. The few existing Jewish cultural institutions were not able to satisfy the needs of the Soviet Jewish population. The letter also explicitly mentioned “new outbursts of anti-semitism.” Since the Jews were experiencing the greatest tragedy in their history, and since their loyalty and patriotism had been proven on the battle front, they became particularly sensitive to wartime anti-semitism, which evoked “sharp reaction in the soul of every Soviet Jews.” The suggested solution to these painful problems would be the establishment of a Soviet Jewish republic, preferably in the Crimea. The Crimea, according to the letter, was “one of the regions where, subject to political considerations, this is possible.” Did such an appeal, formulated in February, 1944, mean that the signatories knew about the future fate of the Crimean Tatars? (...). The letter went on to recommend that even before the liberation of the Crimea, a Government commission should be appointed to examine the idea. This, too, may indicate that the planned deportation of the Crimean Tatars might have been known to the signatories. (‘War, the Holocaust, and Stalinism’, Shimon Redlich, 2013, p. 46) (IMG)

The Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee was working towards the establishment of a Yiddish bourgeois-nationalist regime in Crimea. In so doing, their leaders Mikhoel and Shimeliovich were backed fully by the American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC, or ‘Joint’), the espionage front and center for the Mossad and the CIA.

Much of what has been written about Shimeliovich is with regards to his activity as an agent of the Mossad and the CIA in the Soviet Union. It is remarkable, also, that Shimeliovich was a prominent doctor in Moscow. In 1952, Moscow accused Shimeliovich and Mikhoels as being middlemen or couriers between the CIA and a group of doctors whom the Kremlin accused of being spies and assassins:

Singled out as the doctors’ intermediaries were A. B. Shimelevich, last identified as head doctor at the Botkin Hospital in Moscow in 1947, and Solomon Mikhoels, Chairman of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee during World War II. (The Doctors’ Plot, CIA, July 15, 1953, p. 2) (IMG)

In a book published by the Yale University Press, the Amnesty International official Joshua Rubenstein confirmed:

Shimeliovich also directly supervised Dr. Miron Vovsi, a first cousin to Mikhoels who had served as a chief physician of the Red Army during the war. (Stalin’s Secret Pogrom: The Postwar Inquisition of the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee, Yale University Press, Joshua Rubenstein, Vladimir Pavlovich Naumov, p. 54) (IMG)

Along with Rubenstein, the Israeli anti-Soviet historian Gilboa corroborated:

Professor Miron Vovsi, a former leader in the Soviet army’s medical corps with the rank of major-general, was a relative of Mikhoels (whose surname had originally been Vovsi) and had also been one of the personalities connected with the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee.... (The Black years of Soviet Jewry, Yehoshua A. Gilboa, p. 299) (No Image)

Furthermore, Vovsi worked closely with another prominent Kremlin doctor named Vladimir Vinogradov, who as will be shown in greater detail shortly later, was directly responsible for the murder of Andrei Zhdanov. According to the Jerusalem Post journalist Louis Rapoport:

Vovsi worked closely with Vinogradov, who was the number-one Kremlin doctor and a giant of Soviet medicine. (Stalin’s War against the Jews, Louis Rapoport, p. 148) (No Image)

Quite importantly, Miron Meyer Vovsi was also an: Israeli Citizen....

(‘Re: Dr. Meyer VOVSI, Israeli Citizen’, To: Foreign Office Visa Section, From: Ladislao Molnar (Deputy Director of Health Department for the American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee), January 19, 1953, p. 1) (IMG)

In itself, being an Israeli citizen was not an issue. The problem was the question of dual citizenship. The counter-intelligence divisions of the intelligence services from countries all over the world, both in the socialist camp and in the pro-fascist camp, agree that to be a citizen of two opposing countries and to have a prominent position in one of these two countries should raise suspicion. It does not automatically mean espionage or loyalty to a hostile power, but it does deserve to be investigated.

During late 1952, Vovsi was spending time in Israel, with the British diplomatic channels arguing that he stays there for a while:

As you will note, the British Council suggests that Dr. Vovsi remain in Tel-Aviv until they can confirm his placement at St. Pancras [in London]. (‘Re: Dr Vovsi Med. File #23815a’, To: Dr. Boris Pliskin (in: Malben, Israel), Alexander Gonik (the Medical Director of the American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee), December 16, 1952, p. 1) (IMG)

This was happening at the time of the media campaign of the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies denouncing the Israeli regime as an American imperialist military base. Furthermore, this was at the time of the arrest of the Titoist killer-doctors by the Soviet intelligence. Under the pretext of granting a 'scholarship' to the Israeli doctor, the American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee financed Vovsi:

Dr Meyer Vovsi has been awarded by our organization a six months' scholarship.... ('Re: Dr. Meyer VOVSI, Israeli Citizen', To: Foreign Office Visa Section, From: Ladislao Molnar (Deputy Director of Health Department for the American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee), January 19, 1953, p. 1) (IMG)

We take this opportunity to confirm that our organization will bear the costs of transportation of Dr. and Mrs. Vovsi, their maintenance while in England, and tuition. ('Re: Dr. Meyer VOVSI, Israeli Citizen', To: Foreign Office Visa Section, From: Ladislao Molnar (Deputy Director of Health Department for the American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee), January 19, 1953, p. 1) (IMG)

In late January, 1953, the CIA-funded/Mossad-funded Zionist Dr. Vovsi was arrested in the USSR and denounced as a medical assassin throughout the Soviet press. I cannot confirm the allegations of medical sabotage and espionage. However, Vovsi's prominent position in the USSR as a dual citizen, his ties to the British diplomatic channels, his close connections with Dr. Vinogradov, and above all the financing of him by the JDC under the cover of supporting his 'education' (read: training) made him very suspicious.

According to one article titled 'Zionist Agents of the American Secret Service', written by a very prominent Soviet intelligence analyst Vladislav Minayev, Vovsi was:

connected with the "Joint," an international Jewish bourgeois-nationalist organization founded by the American secret service, supposedly for the assistance of Jews in other countries. In reality, this organization, under the direction of the American secret service, conducts wide-scale espionage, terrorist and other subversive activities in a number of countries, including the Soviet Union. One of the arrested men, Vovsi, admitted during the interrogation, that he had received a directive from the "Joint" Zionist organization in the United States "to exterminate leading cadres of the U.S.S.R." (Zionist Agents of the American Secret Service, New Times, Vladislav Minayev, January 21, 1953, pp. 1-2. Re-published in: CIA)

Even as late as February of that year, the American-Israeli intelligence had the audacity to continue to plan for funding Dr. Vovsi:

Scholarship Committee has established at £ 50 ~ a month the amount to which he will be entitled during 6 months stay in England. As we were informed that the scholarships granted by the British Council are in the neighborhood of £ 30-35, we believe that this grant will be very adequate to cover all Dr. Vovsi's expenses. ('Re: Dr. Meyer VOVSI Med. File #23815', To: Malben, Tel Aviv, Ladislao Molnar (Deputy Director of Health Department for the American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee), February 16, 1953, p. 1) (IMG)

In this case, 'our Accounting Department', said Molnar, would:

pay him his allowance. ('Re: Dr. Meyer VOVSI Med. File #23815a', To: Malben, Tel Aviv, Ladislao Molnar (Deputy Director of Health Department for the American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee), February 16, 1953, p. 1) (IMG)

C19S3.2. The Assassination of Andrei Zhdanov

It is of course completely natural that Anglo-American imperialists would desire to assassinate key communist revolutionaries so to further undermine the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies. In the late 1940s, the CIA plots for assassinating communist leaders were revealed as 'Project X'. The 'U.S. News' reported:

strong-arm squads would be formed under American guidance [and] assassination of key communists would be encouraged. (I Choose Peace, Konni Zilliacus, p. 212, citing: U.S. News) (IMG)

Under this plan, strong-arm squads would be formed under American guidance. Assassination of key Communists would be encouraged. American agents, parachuted into Eastern Europe, would be used to coordinate anti-Communist action. (From Trotsky To Tito, James Klugmann, 1951, citing: U.S. News)

One of the major targets of the imperialist-fascist secret service assassination plots was Zhdanov. As confirmed by Timothy Snyder of the Council on Foreign Relations, in July of 1948,:

Zhdanov suffered a heart attack, the first of several. (Bloodlands: Europe Between Hitler and Stalin, Timothy Snyder, p. 337)

Kees Boterbloem – a history professor at the University of South Florida and a scholar on Zhdanov – put the situation as follows:

On 27 August Zhdanov suffered another heart attack that was not recognized, it seems, by Vinogradov, Egorov, or Vasilenko, who arrived by plane at the spa the next day, accompanied by the radiologist Lydia Timashuk, who prepared an electrocardiogram. She concluded that Zhdanov's condition called for strict bedrest, but the other five attending doctors disagreed with her and rejected her diagnosis. On 29 August, on the suggestion of Zhdanov's bodyguard, A.M. Belov, Timashuk warned the head of the Kremlin bodyguards, Vlasik, about a possible misdiagnosis of Zhdanov's illness, but it was too late. In the early hours of 31 August 1948, Zhdanov, on his way to the washroom, suffered a final fatal heart attack. ('Life and Times of Andrei Zhdanov, 1896-1948', Kees Boterbloem, 2004, p. 333. Bold added.) (IMG)

As Boterbloem stated above, and as confirmed by the Soros agent Brent, the electrocardiogram of Zhdanov's heart was done by:

Timashuk [who] had been a "rank-and-file doctor at the Kremlin Hospital," managing the electrocardiograph unit, with little authority to dispute the findings of the distinguished professors and doctors.... ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 14) (IMG)

Note that the team of the Kremlin doctors arrived 'the next day', almost 24 hours late. This has also been confirmed by Jonathan Brent, currently the head of the Zionist think tank YIVO. As the director of the Yale University Press from 1991 to 2009, Jonathan Brent was invited by and received the financial support of the CIA agent George Soros, in founding the 'Annals of Communism' series. The Soros agent Brent conducted extensive research on the history of the USSR, deep into the long-held secret archives of the Soviet intelligence, and employed numerous prestigious scholars – from the US National Security Council or Council on Foreign Relations – in publishing several books regarding Soviet history. As Brent rightly stated, the electrocardiogram of Zhdanov's heart was done just as late:

At seven-thirty in the morning of August 28, Timashuk was summoned to Valdai. Why she was summoned to Valdai on that date has never been explained. Timashuk took an electrocardiogram of Zhdanov's heart ... and she became convinced that Zhdanov had recently suffered a myocardial infarct.... She immediately brought this information to the attention of Maiorov, Vinogradov, Vasilenko, and was told [by Yegorov and Co.] to alter her conclusion.... ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 19) (IMG)

Yegorov. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 19) (IMG)

However, Timashuk:

This was:

a demand with which she did not comply. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 19) (IMG)

Resisting the threats by Yegorov and Vinogradov to alter her conclusions, Timashuk began writing a letter to Vlasik:

As the head of the Kremlin security guards, Vlasik was responsible for ensuring the physical safety of all leading party and Politburo members. He was the right individual to be informed about this matter, and Timashuk expected him to show her letter to the Politburo, if not directly to Stalin himself. This, she assumed, would bring the responsible parties to justice so that correct medical treatment could be provided. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 15) (IMG)

An excerpt of Timashuk's letter on August 29 is as follows:

I consider that the consultants and physician doctor MAIOROV underestimate the unquestionably grave condition of com. ZHDANOV, permitting him to get up from bed, stroll about in the park, visit the cinema, and so forth, that this provoked the second attack [of August 29] and worsened the indications of the EKG of August 28, and in the future this regimen may lead to a fateful outcome. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 15. Citing: Timashuk to Vlasik, August 29, 1948.) (IMG)

Noteworthy is that:

Timashuk's initial letter had not raised the accusation of murder.... ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 14) (IMG)

Timashuk thus sent her secret letter:

Timashuk's secret letter to Vlasik included the transcript of Zhdanov's EKG examination of August 28, on the basis of which he disputed the conclusions and did not receive a strict bed rest regimen that her diagnosis of a myocardial infarct (heart attack) would have indicated for him. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 14) (IMG)

Nonetheless:

all concerned instantly realized the menacing implications of her charge. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 14) (IMG)

However,:

She could hardly have expected what happened next. Her letter of denunciation had been expeditiously delivered through covert and secure channel, but she soon suspected that it had nonetheless fallen almost immediately into the hands of Dr. Yegorov himself, chief among those she accused. From the Politburo, from the Ministry of State Security (MGB), from Stalin she heard nothing. Nor would she for several years to come. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 15) (IMG)

Yegorov himself was an affiliate of the MGB:

Yegorov held the military rank of major general, and ... had close administrative ties to important governmental networks, including the MGB (the KGB of the time).... ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 16) (IMG)

The roots of Yegorov also went to the Zionist intelligence network controlled by the American intelligence service. Recall from C19S3 that Fefer, the agent of Mikhoels, had been present in the conversation in which Mikhoels and Fefer provided Chaim Weizmann, the Zionist agent of the American secret service, with intelligence materials concerning the conditions in the USSR. Fefer began to run a network of agents and physicians in the Soviet Union:

Firm evidence ... is to be found in Weizmann's appraisal of his three-hour meeting with Mikhoels and Fefer in the United States, which he termed as a great privilege and a most moving occasion, after having been severed from Russian Jewry for twenty-five years. Weizmann stated that this talk had given him a picture of the Jewish community in Russia.... He said he believed they were interested in Zionism, or not opposed to it at all events. (The Black years of Soviet Jewry, Yehoshua A. Gilboa, p. 70) (IMG)

Fefer had recruited Etinger; Etinger had recruited Vinogradov; Vinogradov had recruited Yegorov; Kuznetsov had sold out to the Americans and had abetted Abakumov, who was preparing for a seizure of supreme power. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 210) (IMG)

Vinogradov was a personal doctor of Stalin. Vinogradov and Yegorov both were involved in the assassination of Zhdanov and were suspected of having masterminded the 1949 murder of Dimitrov, the 1952 murder of Choibalsan, the attempt to murder PCF General-Secretary Maurice Thorez, and several others.

As the head of the LSUK, which was the Kremlin medical staff, Yegorov had deliberately concealed the syphilitic condition of Beria from Stalin:

Vinogradov and Yegorov, two of the three Gentiles named by Pravda, were said to be "old agents of British intelligence." Stalin had fired Vinogradov as his personal physician on grounds that he concealed Beria's syphilitic condition. One who did engage in this conspiracy of concealment from Stalin had been the officer heading LSUK, and that was Yegorov. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 105) (IMG)

Vinogradov, furthermore, had close contacts with Beria:

Professor Vinogradov often visited our house. He was not the attending doctor, but we were happy to communicate with this interesting person. (My Father is People's Commissar Beria, Sergo Beria) (IMG)

The head of the MGB was Viktor Abakumov, the financially and sexually corrupt official who had entered a pact with Beria against the USSR. Regarding Timashuk's letter, the CIA agent Petr Deriabin confirmed:

Abakumov ... did not inform Stalin about [Timashuk's] first letter. Perhaps Abakumov suspected that if he were its target, Stalin himself had been the "architect." ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 49) (IMG)

It was most likely Abakumov himself who had informed his friend in the MGB, Yegorov, about this letter:

The letter got into the hands of Dr. P.I. Yegorov, head of the Kremlin hospital and a high-level KGB [MGB] affiliate responsible for the well being of all Politburo members. ('A tangled conspiracy tale, Soviet style', Los Angeles Times, Nina L. Khrushcheva, February 22, 2004) (IMG)

At the same time:

On ... August 29, the date of her first letter to the authorities, Zhdanov suffered his second severe attack in Valdai again. Timashuk was called from Moscow, where she found Vinogradov, Yegorov, Vasilenko and Maiorov in attendance. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 19) (IMG)

Last time, Yegorov and Co. attended Zhdanov one day late; this time, Yegorov and Co. did attend Zhdanov, but, much to the suspicion of Timashuk, they made sure to delay the electrocardiogram (EKG) for one day:

Yegorov and Vinogradov instructed her to delay taking another EKG until the following day, August 30. She could not understand this and interpreted it as another indication of inadequate medical attention. She found the doctors' refusal to entertain the idea of a heart attack or take appropriate measures both inexplicable and inexcusable, and she expressed her anxiety to the chief of Zhdanov's bodyguards, A M. Belov. She told him that she reason to suspect the doctors of mistreating Zhdanov. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 19) (IMG)

And:

The EKG taken on August 30 convinced Timashuk even more that Zhdanov had suffered a heart attack. Once again the doctors categorically instructed her to write nothing about this in her reports. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 20) (IMG) the doctors' notes from this period suggest that they did not fully record the progressive alteration in Zhdanov's medical condition or the treatment they provided. From August 7, when Karpai left Valdi, to August 30, the doctors appear to have been consciously manipulating the official medical record so that Zhdanov's death could eventually be presented as "sudden" and "unexpected." ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 64) (IMG)

The next day, Timashuk discovered that Zhdanov had received fatal 'treatment' by the doctors:

Agitated by the situation in which found herself, Timashuk began to interview the nursing staff. What she discovered appalled her still more. The nurses told her that, instead of strict bed rest, Zhdanov had been allowed to go for walks in the park, take massages, go to the movies, and get up from his bed to use the lavatory. Her August 29 letter to Vlasik emphasized the fatal possibilities of such treatment. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 20) (IMG)

On August 31, 1948, the date of Zhdanov's death:

Timashuk was certain that the "fatal outcome" she had predicted had resulted from negligent treatment. In her mind the charge had now become murder. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 20) (IMG)

Timashuk sent a second letter. However,:

Timashuk's second letter worsened the problem for Abakumov. He could hardly tell Stalin about it without admitting the existence of the first letter and trying to explain why Stalin had not been informed. No explanation would satisfy Stalin. He would blame Abakumov and the Guards Directorate, anybody and everybody, for failure to prevent the "murder" of Zhdanov. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 49) (IMG)

As confirmed by a prominent anti-Soviet official in the Soviet intelligence consulted by Deriabin, Abakumov refused to disclose:

the first two Timashuk letters to Stalin. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 49)

Colonel Goryshev confirmed that these worries inhibited our minister [i.e. Abakumov] from disclosing the first two Timashuk letters to Stalin. My boss mentioned Abakumov's concerns later in 1950 when he told me that Timashuk had resumed writing accusatory letters. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 49) (IMG)

The Soros agent Jonathan Brent wrote:

A letter from her to Lieutenant General Vlasik should have gone straight to the Politburo; to the minister of state security, V. S. Abakumov; and if necessary to Stalin. Appropriate action should have been taken. The safety of the state was in question. Her urgent warning should have elicited an instant response. She remained upset, and four days after Zhdanov's death, on September 4, 1948, wrote another covert letter, this time to Suranov.... ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 16) (IMG)

The CIA too confirmed:

Because the contents of the report supported facts involving physicians who were attending a number of members of the government, Shtsherbakov [i.e. Shcherbakov] among others, Timashuk's report got into the hands of Vlasik, who was at that time chief of the guard protecting the members of the government. Vlasik wrote on the report the remark "yurunda" (Baloney) and put it on the shelf. This "yurunda" soon made the rounds at the Ministry as a sort of joke. ('Committee of State Security / The Doctors' Plot and Its Reversal', CIA, September 24, 1954, pp. 1-2. Underline added.) (IMG)

Vlasik thus betrayed the USSR through such a great crime.

Shortly thereafter, an autopsy of Zhdanov was to be done:

On Poskrebyshev's orders, the post-mortem was carried out in an ill-lit, shoddy bathroom in Kuznetsov's presence. (Stalin: The Court of the Red Tsar, Simon Sebag Montefiore, 2003) (IMG)

The autopsy obviously was done hastily:

The hastily prepared autopsy, performed in Zhdanov's bathtub in Valdai on the evening of August 31, with the staff masseuse, nurse Turkina, taking notes.... ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 20) (IMG)

The official autopsy report of Zhdanov supported the line of the Titoist killer-doctors:

"The death of comrade ZHDANOV, A. A., followed the paralysis of morbidly changing heart that was the consequence of sharp arteriosclerosis of the coronary vessels in combination with general arteriosclerosis. As a result of heart failure there was a sharp attack of emphysema." No heart attack [was mentioned]. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 21) (IMG)

However:

Timashuk could not be quieted or convinced. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 20) (IMG)

In late 1952, Yegorov, Vinogradov, and several others responsible for the death of Zhdanov were arrested. However, after the death of Stalin, they were released by Beria. After his release from prison, Vinogradov had absolutely no need to fear another arrest:

Finally released ... Vinogradov had no need to fear further retribution or punishment. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 48) (IMG)

Nonetheless, during this time when he was off jail and had no need to fear, he made a very important confession:

it is necessary to acknowledge that the autopsy of A. A. ZHDANOV, who died on 31 August, disclosed that he had suffered a recent myocardial infarct. Therefore the rejection of this by me, professors V. Kh. VASILENKO, and P. I. YEGOROV and doctors G. I. MAIOROV and S. E. KARPAI was a mistake on our part. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 48. Citing: 'Concerning the history of the illness of A. A. ZHDANOV', Vladimir Vinogradov, March 27, 1953, p. 4) (IMG)

How could it be a 'mistake' when in fact Yegorov, Vinogradov, Maiorov and Karpai knew and were directly warned of the real results of the autopsy! Regarding the autopsy:

Timashuk sensed collusion.... ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 20) (IMG)

Clearly, this was a cover-up:

The professors were terrified that their misdiagnosis and cover-up would be exposed so they sacked and denounced Timashuk.... (Stalin: The Court of the Red Tsar, Simon Sebag Montefiore, 2003)

A few days after the death of Zhdanov:

On September 6, 1948, ... an emergency session of experts was convened in the Kremlin Hospital to investigate whether the doctors who treated him in Valdai had misdiagnosed Zhdanov's illness and had provided criminally negligent treatment. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 13) (IMG)

However, Timashuk's line was heavily bashed by the Titoist doctors in that session. The next day, Timashuk:

was summarily dismissed on September 7 by Yegorov as manager of the electrocardiographic unit of the Kremlin Hospital and thrown in to the outer darkness of a considerably inferior position in the second polyclinic of the system. Dangerous, stupid, ill-educated, incendiary – in Yegorov's view, Timashuk was an individual to be treated with contempt. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 46) (IMG)

Only an anti-Soviet medical saboteur would ensure delay in the proper treatment of Zhdanov, wrong treatment of Zhdanov, hasty autopsy of Zhdanov after his death, and withholding such critical information about the death of Zhdanov. Clearly, this was an incriminating case of medical sabotage by the killer-doctors of the Kremlin hospital, who arrived almost 24 hours after Zhdanov's heart attack, who made the EKG late for another 24 hours, who knowingly denied the well-evidenced fact that Zhdanov had a heart attack, who at least according to the nurses did not enforce a strict bed regimen for Zhdanov, and who sought to cover up their criminal activity by firing Timashuk. The killer-doctors had collaborators. Again, recall that the intelligence service roots of these Titoist killer-doctors went to Fefer, Mikhoels, and Chaim Weizmann. At home, these killer-doctors were members of the MGB and had direct links with Vlasik, Kuznetsov, Abakumov, three agents of the MI6 agent Lavrenti Beria. The fingerprints of the CIA, MI6, and Mossad can be seen in this conspiracy.

Other Kremlin physicians, also belonging to the intelligence network led by Weizmann, played important roles in the Zhdanov assassination. One of them was Dr. Etinger:

The diagnosis is always established in combination with the clinical facts. For your information, we invited the leading specialists of the Soviet nation – academician ZELENNIN, Professor NEZLIN, Professor ETINGER. They evaluated this electrocardiogram differently [than yours and in agreement with us] on the basis of the clinical data. Is it possible that you really believe yourself to be the Alpha and the Omega...? I can no longer permit you to work in the Lechsanupra system, because you create discord and dangerous confusion in the treatment of each individual.... You are not even interested in x-rays. Clinical facts don't interest you.... ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 34. Citing: Stenographic records, September 6, 1948, p. 12) (IMG)

Recall that Etinger too had been recruited by the Weizmann network. Etinger argued that:

There are no indications of coronary thrombosis. What is present is a grave form of chronic, coronary failure in combination with attacks of cardiac asthma. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 35) (IMG)

To this, Dr. Zelenin responded:

I concur with Professor Etinger that against the hypertension, the patient had severe coronary arteriosclerosis and above all suffered lack of nourishment to the anterior wall.... Facts pointing to a thrombosis do not exist either clinically or from the electrocardiograph; there is no evidence of a major infarct. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 35) (IMG)

'Etinger's comments at the August 31 session', the authors said, was summed up in the following quote:

The patient had a severe lesion of the coronary vessels owing to hypertension.... Definite indications of a coronary thrombosis are not present. There is a severe form of chronic coronary failure that coincides with cardiac asthma. Manifestations of heart failure have grown up. In connection with a grave form of chronic coronary failure the formation of small centers of necrosis is possible (emphasis added)." Zelenin appeared to concur, saying "Undoubtedly this patient is an old hypertensive, with progressive hypertension.... This circumstance – that there were two attacks – is not associated with the clinical picture of an infarct, and I think that there was no massive infarct.... And from the point of view of prognosis each successive attack would be severe and even threatening."

Vinogradov eventually admitted that "ZELENIN gave a garbled conclusion that subsequently allowed me to say that the conclusion did not find a myocardial infarct in A. A. ZHDANOV." This was, in fact, what happened when on August 31, Vinogradov summed up the opinion of the consulting committee:

So, this is the conclusion that was formed at the time ... there is no objection to this diagnosis? (All professors agree.) I would like to turn to you with the question: After the first attack [in July], he was subjected to strict quiet and was kept to his bed. He was not permitted to get up, he used a bedpan. Only after approximately two weeks did he get up a bit. he was permitted to use the toilet' he was given massages on his hands and legs. they did not though his spine. We permitted him to get up, make a few steps in front of the bed and at the maximum he twice went about 50 meters around the verandah.

I want to ask you to turn your competence to this question: Was this incorrect?

"No," Professor Etinger immediately declared. "It was correct."

('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 61. Citing: Protocol of a face-to-face confrontation between Vinogradov and Karpai, February 18, 1954, pp. 3-9. Interrogation of Vinogradov, November 18, 1952, p. 6. Stenogram, August 31, 1948, p. 10. Parentheses, bold, and Italics in this quote are all original.) (IMG)

After being fired by the killer-doctors, the Hero of the Soviet Union and the brave medical freedom-fighter, Timashuk, wrote letters to Kuznetsov, the self-disguised traitor and enemy of Zhdanov who had worked 'with' Zhdanov back when Zhdanov was in Leningrad. Little – if any at all – did Timashuk know of the treasonous character of Kuznetsov and Co. On September 15, 1948, therefore, she sent a letter to Kuznetsov on the death of Zhdanov:

Knowing that she would get no justice from Yegorov or his immediate associates, Timashuk next wrote a letter to A. A. Kuznetsov, the Central Committee secretary with security affairs. She restated her opinion about the diagnosis of Zhdanov's illness.... In her letter to Kuznetsov dated September 15, 1948, a week after the session with Yegorov, she emphasized what earlier she had claimed was never part of her accusation against the doctors: "the treatment and regimen given A. A. Zhdanov were incorrect; that is to say, the disease of myocardial infarct demands strict bed rest for the course of several months. In fact, he was allowed to move around (strolls in the park twice per day, going to the cinema, and further physical exertions)." (Emphasis added.) She continued: "Rudely, improperly, without any lawful grounds, Professor Yegorov on 8 September has thrown me out of the Kremlin Hospital to an affiliated polyclinic for the ostensible purpose of improving the work being done there." Timashuk received no reply. Eventually she would write another letter to Kuznetsov in early 1949. This one, too, went unanswered. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, pp. 48-49) (IMG)

In early 1949 she wrote once more to Kuznetsov. Again she received no reply. The implication was obvious: Kuznetsov took too no interest in saving Zhdanov's life. ('Stalin's Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953', Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 208) (IMG)

Kuznetsov had every reason to cover up the murder of Zhdanov. Kuznetsov could not betray his friend Abakumov, who also was involved in the cover-up of the murder. Note that:

Kuznetsov made a show of his friendship with Abakumov. They were constantly seen together. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 216) (IMG)

Note also that Kuznetsov was one of the leaders of the Leningrad Titoists, a network of Yugoslav intelligence agents who promoted Russian bourgeois-nationalism as a means of fomenting ethnic tensions in the USSR, so to pave the way to the partition of the USSR.

By the time of Zhdanov's death, Kuznetsov was already a member of the Central Committee (CC) and a prominent official in the Soviet intelligence allied to Abakumov. The CIA reported:

In 1948, Kuznetsov was transferred ... to the CC as one of its secretaries and Popkov became head of the Leningrad Party organization on the recommendation of Kuznetsov. As Secretary of the CC, Kuznetsov had direct influence on the external political matters of the Communist Party. Everything which was received from foreign rezidentury of Soviet intelligence organizations was sent in one copy to Kuznetsov's secretariat, as well as to Stalin, Molotov, Beriya, and Malenkov. (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

The death of Zhdanov destroyed one of the true comrades of Stalin in the Politburo; Stalin was still able to coopt Malenkov against Beria and Beria against Malenkov, but surely, the death of a true communist loyalist was a blow to Stalin's efforts in ousting the Titoist members of the Politburo. A prominent strategist and fighter against imperialism had fallen. The MI6 killer-doctors' murder of Zhdanov:

on 31 August 1948 signalled the end of the so-called Zhdanov period. After his Death, Malenkov rapidly achieved a high position in official listings of the Politburo, which was generally taken to indicate that he had returned to grace. Malenkov then allegedly initiated a purge of various persons who owed their positions to Zhdanov's influence. (The Zhdanov-Malenkov Relationship, CIA, July 29, 1953, p. 3) (IMG{Greece})

Timashuk again wrote a third letter to Stalin, which was also suppressed by Abakumov in collaboration with his agents Poskrebyshv and Vlasik, who were officially in charge of Stalin's personal self-defense:

In her third, [Timashuk] reiterated the charge about doctors misprescribing for Zhdanov and added a new claim: they used the same method to kill Zhdanov's brother-in-law, Aleksandr Shcherbakov. (...). "How did Abakumov handle the third letter?" I asked Goryshev. "Gingerly. He took it to the Kremlin, to Poskrebyshv." (...). "It was logical for Abakumov to go to Poskrebyshv with the letter," I said. "I've heard that they get along well." "Oh, they do, Petr Sergeevich, and I venture to say that Abakumov wanted to trade on Poskrebyshev's friendship with General Vlasik. Needless to say, LSUIK comes under Vlasik as the chief of our directorate, and I'm sure you know too that Vlasik and Poskrebyshev enjoy... er, they get together socially."

"So did Poskrebyshev show the letter to the Big Chief [Stalin]?"

"Far from that," [Colonel] Goryshev said. "They agreed that the only thing to do was to suppress all three letters from her and henceforth ignore Timashuk's accusations. Abakumov returned from the Kremlin with a warning to Sled-Chast'."

"A warning?"

"Our Minister [Abakumov] told Sled-Chast', 'If the investigation of the doctors is reopened again, we'll all lose our heads.'" Stalin would see to that.

C19S3.3. The Cases of Shcherbakov, Kalinin, Dimitrov, and Choibalsan / The ‘Treatment’ of Thorez

An indication of the political hostilities between Beria and Shcherbakov can be observed in the following excerpt of Sergo Beria’s biography his father:

Shcherbakov ... took leave of us. After he had gone my father said to my mother ‘I never want to see that shit here again.’ (‘Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin’s Kremlin’, Sergo Beria, p. 244) (IMG)

Clearly, Beria did not like Shcherbakov. Note that the above quote from Sergo Beria was under the heading “The Doctors’ Plot.” Though not a proof, it is nevertheless a hint of Beria being the one to have eliminated ‘that shit’ – referring to Shcherbakov – who he would ‘never ... see ... again’ after 1945, when Shcherbakov died. In the official CPSU statement denouncing the killer-doctors, Shcherbakov was mentioned alongside Zhdanov as one of the key figures assassinated by those killer-doctors.

Moreover:

In June 1946, Dr. Vinogradov was a member of a panel of physicians who signed the death certificate for President Mikhail Kalinin. He and his colleagues were also reported to have treated Maurice Thorez, the late Georgi Dimitrov of Bulgaria, Communist hero of the Reichstag Fire Trial in Nazi Germany, and the late Marshal Choi Balsan of the Mongolian Peoples Republic. (‘Dr. Vladimir Vinogradov Dies; Soviet Therapist Held in ‘Plot’’, New York Times, July 31, 1964) (IMG)

Dr. Petr Ivanovich Yegorov, the killer-doctor and henchman of Vinogradov in the ‘treatment’ of Zhdanov and Dimitrov,; had actually been Chief of the Kremlin’s medical directorate, and hence had ... treated at one time or another all of the Politburo members, including Stalin himself, Dimitrov, and Choibalsan. The French Communist press had reported that Vinogradov and another of the accused doctors, Grinstein, had treated Thorez. It is known, for example, that Yegorov treated Kalinin. (The Doctors’ Plot, CIA, July 15, 1953, p. 1) (IMG)

Both Dimitrov and Zhdanov were ‘treated’ by the same CIA-MI6 killer-doctors aiming for the resignation of Stalin for ‘health reasons’. Both Dimitrov and Zhdanov died at around the same time, and both at a relatively young age. Surely, 67 years is old enough, but for a charismatic Bulgarian leader who should have received high-quality medical care, 67 years old is way too young an age to die a natural death. No need to mention Zhdanov’s death at the age of 52, which was certainly a murder, as documented in C19S3.2.

Stalin, too, found these deaths suspicious:

Efim Smirnov, a member of the Academy of Medical Sciences, said he visited Stalin at his Black Sea vacation home before the middle of January 1953 and found him suspicious about the medical care given a former Leningrad party leader, Andrei A. Zhdanov, and a Bulgarian party chief, Georgy M. Dimitrov.

Smirnov said Stalin remarked to him: “One doctor treated them, and both of them died.”

(Stalin Suspicious of Doctors During Last Months of Life, AP Archives, John-Thor Dahlburg, February 4, 1988) (IMG)

The leader of People’s Democratic Mongolia, Choibalsan, was treated by the same doctors and died a suspicious death in 1952. The life of Maurice Thorez too was in danger though the French communist leader ultimately survived – for the while.

C19S3.4. Etinger Dead

As mentioned previously, Etinger had been recruited by a Zionist intelligence network controlled by the American intelligence service, and had a role in the murder of Andrei Zhdanov. Some time in the late 1940s or early 1950s, the Soviet intelligence service arrested Etinger:

Etinger had been arrested not as a doctor, but as a Jew who ardently supported the state of Israel. (‘Stalin’s Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953’, Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 94) (IMG)

Abakumov was the reactionary Beria agent who wanted the Etinger case closed

At the end of January Abakumov told Ryumin to shelve the investigation and assigned him to another case.

It was here that Ryumin took the initiative that would earn him his unprecedented rise. Instead of dropping the Etinger case, Ryumin secretly made twenty-four trips to Lefortovo, interrogating Etinger thirty-nine times, between January 2 [1951] and the evening of March 2 [1951]

(‘Stalin’s Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953’, Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 111) (IMG)

To the benefit of Abakumov, Etinger died in prison:

On March 2, [1951,] Etinger returned from one such unauthorized interrogation to his cell at 5:15 PM, according to the official summary.

He tasted a piece of [poisoned?] bread, made several steps in the direction of the door, and fell unconscious to the floor. (‘Stalin’s Last Crime: The Plot Against the Jewish Doctors, 1948-1953’, Harper Collins Publishers, Jonathan Brent, Vladimir Naumov, p. 111) (IMG)

This was far from being the first time that a Zionist agent whose confessions would pose a grave threat to Abakumov was being eliminated and silenced. Mikhoels was another one. Another suspected of being so was Wallenberg. Such a case of the Abakumov network eliminating the doctors who could give important confessions was not without precedent. In yet another case, the Abakumov network deliberately tortured some of the doctors so that they would be eliminated, with one dying of supposed ‘pneumonia’:

"That's how it stood after [Timashuk's] first letter," I prompted.

"Yes, but then [Timashuk] wrote the second letter. There was hell to pay considering that Comrade Zhdanov had just died. Abakumov told Sled-Chast' to reopen the investigation and put more oomph into it. This time they threw three doctors in the Lubyanka and gave them a tough going over—you know how Sled-Chast' usually interrogates, Petr Sergeyevich. It was not the toughest going over that can be dished out, but one of the doctors died in jail, they said from pneumonia. Who'd believe that?"

"I don't know anyone who would. Did the doctors confess?"

"No confessions. Nothing. (...)"

C19S3.5. ‘Anti-Semitism’? / The Alleged ‘Hate America’ Campaign

All of those doctors were agents of the MI6 agent Beria’s network as well as of the CIA-owned Zionist network led by Chaim Weizmann. Not all of those doctors were ‘Jewish’; some were ‘gentiles’. In fact, the most strategic conspirators from among the doctors, Yegorov and Vinogradov, were ‘gentiles’:

Vinogradov and Yegorov, two of the three Gentiles named by Pravda, were said to be "old agents of British intelligence." Stalin had fired Vinogradov as his personal physician on grounds that he concealed Beria's syphilitic condition. One who did engage in this conspiracy of concealment from Stalin had been the officer heading LSUK, and that was Yegorov. (‘Inside Stalin’s Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue’, Petr Deriabin, p. 105) (IMG)

The Doctors’ Plot was a conspiracy that involved both ‘Jews’ and ‘gentiles’, with the ‘gentiles’ among them being at the forefront of the medical-terror plots and playing no less strategically significant roles than the ‘Jewish’ conspirators. The ‘gentile’ conspirators fostered close ties to Jewish bourgeois-nationalist intelligence networks. The CIA’s avenue towards these ‘gentiles’ was the Chaim Weizmann network, which closely cooperated with the JDC and the Ben-Gurion faction in Israel. Beria’s avenue of cooperation with them was via the Abakumov network in the MGB, and the ‘Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee’ influenced by the Bundist agents linked to the Second International. Beria was tied to the JDC via Morgenthau and to the Weizmann network via the ‘Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee’. The Soviet purges against CIA-MI6-backed ‘Islamists’ were condemned as ‘oppression of Muslims’, Soviet purges against CIA-MI6-backed Ukrainian fascists were described as ‘Great-Russian Chauvinism’, etc. This time, given that the terror espionage organization was ‘Jewish’ in self-description, the purges were called ‘anti-Semitic’.

The Soviet state emphasized the bourgeois-nationalist feature of the Jews involved in the Doctors’ Plot case, a fact which, as American intelligence admitted, weakens the thesis that the campaign was anti-Semitic. In a telegram to the US Secretary of State in January 1953, US ambassador J. D. Beam admitted that the Soviet government’s emphasis on the ‘bourgeois-nationalist’ character, rather than the possibly Jewish background, of the doctors, indicated that the purges in the USSR and the Peoples Democracies was not out of hostility to Jews and ‘Jews’ as a whole:

Perhaps heavy play given Jewish bourgeois nationalist aspect should cause us [to] re-evaluate Jewish element [in] recent Czech trials.

However, [the] very identification of these groups as “Jewish Bourgeois nationalist” lessens to [a] certain degree [the] hypothesis which has been advanced that anti-Semitism as such is important and [a] growing element [in] Soviet and satellite policy. (MOSCOW EMBTEL 1036 – DOCTORS PLOT, SW:JKS: HMR/15, CIA, Jacob D. Beam, January 14, 1953, p. 2) (IMG)

A CIA document admitted that there were:

no incidents of violence against Jews in the USSR.... (‘1. Resistance Potential and Unrest in the USSR 2. Resistance in Poland’, CIA, date distributed: June 22, 1955, p. 4) (IMG)

Although the CIA document was distributed in 1955, the date of information goes back to much longer and encompassed the entire post-war period including – but not limited to – 1946. In fact, another CIA document, this one dated February 1953, stated:

Another indication of cautious approach is the fact that Ilya Ehrenburg was chosen to make the first attack against Israel and the Zionist movement. What better way to offset the shock in Communist ranks and charges of anti-Semitism from the West than to utilize a well-known Soviet anti-Zionist Jew to launch the attack? (THE JEWISH QUESTION IN SOVIET AND SATELLITE PROPAGANDA, CIA, February 10, 1953, p. 6) (IMG{Israel})

There is no indication that the Kremlin proposes to imitate Hitler in the use of racialist anti-Semitism with the ultimate intention of wiping out the Jews. On the contrary, there are some signs, as the award of the Stalin prize to Ehrenburg, of measures to forestall indiscriminate anti-Semitism. (THE JEWISH QUESTION IN SOVIET AND SATELLITE PROPAGANDA, CIA, February 10, 1953, p. 23) (IMG{Israel})

In spite of this, the Israeli Foreign Minister Moshe Sharett, Ben-Gurion’s henchman, instructed his subordinates in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to launch a vicious anti-Soviet slander campaign, explicitly stating that Israel “should not rely on the facts” and instead should “incite” “public tension” for “arousing public opinion constantly and repeatedly” against Moscow. Israel and its agents based in Washington launched a campaign to denounce the USSR and the Peoples’ Democracies as hostile to the Israelites. While acknowledging that the doctors’ plot case in the USSR is a prelude for a purge of “unreliable elements,” the Israeli Foreign Minister Moshe Sharett remarked:

Here are my instructions in the matter of Moscow's calumnies

(a) This is not a major line of policy but the result of a general trend to strengthen the regime whether for its own sake or in preparation for war, by means of blood-letting, tightening internal espionage, targeting a scapegoat and laying the groundwork for the mass liquidation of unreliable elements.

(b) Even if for Moscow the libel is of secondary importance, for us it is the crux of the matter.

(c) The libel is the outcome of a deliberate decision, and we should expect more such manifestations and prepare for a prolonged campaign.

(d) We have very few weapons in hand and we should not underestimate the [importance of] arousing public opinion constantly and repeatedly, on the assumption that Moscow is not entirely indifferent to the repercussions of its policy in international public opinion and its influence on people and circles sympathetic to it.

(e) We should not rely on the facts themselves to maintain the level of public tension; we must constantly incite it.

Therefore, I favoured from the beginning the initiative for a world Jewish conference to react to the calumnies. This is now the government's stance. The conference should be convened in Paris for greater resonance in Europe. The government of Israel will not participate in either the initiative or the debates but will send an observer. The conference of the organizations for reparations can serve as a precedent for the composition which should be as broad as possible. The aims of the conference: (1) condemnation and refutation of the calumny in a well-considered, dignified and forceful manner; (2) unification of Jewish public opinion and isolation of the enemies of the Jewish people's (3) an appeal to world public opinion; (4) Let My People Go.

The conference will not go beyond the bounds of demanding rectification of the slander of the Jewish people and its organizations, (voicing) its concern for the safety of the Jewish masses, their protection and the demand for their aliya, the denunciation of hatred of the Jewish people and an appeal to the world to rise up against it. It will not condemn communism as a regime and will not overtly join the political war against the Soviet Union.

Sharett thereby created the ideological basis and the atmosphere which encouraged the assault on the Soviet Embassy. The Soviet Foreign Ministry blamed him for this precise issue. On February 1953, shortly after a terror bombing against the Soviet Embassy in Tel Aviv, the USSR officially broke diplomatic relations with the Zionist regime:

The 20 July announcement that the USSR and Israel have agreed to resume diplomatic relations, broken off 12 February after the bombing of the Soviet legation in Tel Aviv, is the logical culmination of Moscow's reversal of the anti-Zionist campaign which was vigorously pressed during the last months of Stalin's life. (The Beria Purge and Subsequent Soviet Policy, Central Intelligence Agency, July 24, 1953, p. 8) (IMG)

The Soviet campaign against the Japanese-backed pan-Islamists was denounced as 'oppression of Muslims', the Soviet campaign against the Ukrainian Nazi-collaborationists was condemned as Soviet 'anti-Ukrainian chauvinism'. American imperialist propaganda went so ludicrously far as to denounce the Soviet hostility to the American imperialists as a "Hate America" campaign, when in fact the Soviets emphasized that the target was American imperialism and not the people of the United States:

Ambassador Kennan sees a "line of retreat" from the Soviet "hate-America" campaign revealed in Soviet efforts to deny its existence. He believes that the Soviet Union realizes that the hate campaign conflicts with the basic "peace"thesis and might conceivably alienate fellow travelers and intellectuals on the fringe of the Communist movement. Consequently, to retrieve the situation, the Soviet Union is assuming an attitude of "shocked innocence" and protesting its "friendship to the American people."

Comment: The "hate-America" campaign has not abated in intensity in spite of recent attempts to cross it with the theme of "friendship with the American people."

The USSR has in the past proved capable of exploiting two diametrically opposed propaganda themes at one time. The Soviet Union has shown itself increasingly sensitive to American exposures of its hate propaganda, however, and the present denials are probably designed to maintain the effectiveness of the campaign, which would be seriously impaired by exposure of its motives.

(Kennan comments on Soviet denials of the "hate-America" campaign. In: CURRENT INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, CIA, August 7, 1952, p. 3. No screenshot.)

The Soviets actively raised the vigilance of the Soviet people against imperialist America, but the 'America' condemned in that context connoted American imperialism, and clearly not the whole country and the people of the United States. The CIA admitted that, along with the campaign to expose American imperialist aggression, the Soviet media was promoting the theme of Soviet friendliness to the people of the United States:

The Soviet Union has been increasingly sensitive of American accusations in regard to its "hate America" campaign. Although the Soviet campaign to "expose US aggressiveness" continues unabated, the new theme of Soviet friendliness to the American people has been added. This theme was given extensive attention at the recent meeting of the World Peace Council in Berlin. (Soviet press denies existence of a "hate-America" campaign. In: CURRENT INTELLIGENCE DIGEST, CIA, August 5, 1952, p. 1) (IMG)

And much as how the Soviet campaign against American imperialism was preposterously condemned as a "Hate" campaign against the people of the United States, the Soviet measures not against the good people of Israel but against the conspiracies of the Mossad and its CIA-MI6 handlers, was denounced as "anti-Semitic." Furthermore, rumours that the Soviet Union was hostile to Israel's right of existence as a country are CIA-Mossad slanders. The Soviet dictatorship of the proletariat had much to gain from overthrowing the murderous Zionist regime, to be replaced by a People's Democracy in Israel, but nothing favourable to socialism would have come out of support for the Palestinian chauvinist objective of 'destroying Israel' as a country.

C19S4. The 1949 Leningrad Purge

The CIA reported:

In 1944, Kuznetsov replaced Zhdanov as Party boss in Leningrad. (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

Zhdanov was by then being promoted to a position in the Kremlin. In vast contrast to the Western press depiction of Kuznetsov as a 'Zhdanov protégé', the former in fact belonged to MI6 agent Beria's faction, and was thus hostile to the USSR. Sergo Beria confirmed:

Kuznetsov was very close to my father, contrary to the widely-held idea that he was Zhdanov's man.... My father had already sometimes made use of him during the war. I knew him well.... (...). Kuznetsov sometimes, though very rarely, visited us in Moscow. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 215) (IMG)

In addition:

Despite the post he now occupied, Kuznetsov wanted the Party reorganized. Like my father, he wanted to end the Party's interference in the economy. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 215) (IMG)

Back then, although the proletariat had lost their majority in the membership composition, the Party was still under the influence of a very large percentage of kolkhozniks and proletarians. Party influence over the economy retained a large portion of the influence of the proletariat and kolkhozniks over the economy, whereas the independence of the economic ministries from subordination by the Party would have allowed the corrupt bureaucrats in the economic ministries to take the reins, not be held accountable, and cruise ahead with their corruption campaign.

The Beria-Kuznetsov alliance went back to as early as the days of the Great Patriotic War. At the time, Kuznetsov:

came to see us at the Military Academy, discussed matters with us and attended Party meetings. He was subsequently accused of seeking support from the youth. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 215) (IMG)

The phrase 'seeking support from the youth' refers to a very specific group of young people – Russian bourgeois-nationalists who wanted the Russian SFSR to have a privileged position over other republics in the Soviet Union, hence to foment ethnic tensions and hatred of the Russians among non-Russians. Referring to these particular youth, Sergo Beria recalled:

I remember things said by young men returned from the front, who belonged to Communist organisations in Leningrad, when I was still a student and Kuznetsov was a Secretary of the regional Party committee. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 215) (IMG)

Such Russian bourgeois-nationalist youth asked:

Why did Russia not have its own Party organisation: Why was Leningrad, a cultural, political, and economic centre which might count for more than Moscow, reduced to this humiliating status? ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 215) (IMG)

The attempt to place Russia above other SSRs was a part of the plot to drive a wedge between the other nationalities and the Russians hence to isolate the Russians. Such ethnic tension could help pave the way for the partition of the USSR. As an enemy of the Soviet Union, Kuznetsov was planning to promote such ethnic tensions in the Soviet Union. Supporting Kuznetsov in such efforts was Voznesensky who also held:

ultra-chauvinistic notions.... ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 215) (IMG)

The fact that the Titoists in charge of the Party's Leningrad branch were the agents of Beria is once again testament to the material nonexistence of 'nationalism' in the classless meaning of the term. Beria, a Georgian bourgeois-nationalist who constantly complained about Bolshevik "Russian colonialism" in Georgia, was allied to the Russian chauvinist gang that called for the colonial "superiority" of Russia over the other Socialist Soviet Republics including Georgia. Superficially 'contradictory' chauvinisms, in this case Georgian bourgeois-nationalism and Russian bourgeois-nationalism, are direct allies, for they emanate from the same parasitic classes. The question is not so much whether 'nationalism' in its classless sense can be good or evil; the question rather is whether it can exist beyond imagination; and the answer to the question is that no, 'nationalism' in its classless connotation has almost never bore material existence. Beria the "Georgian nationalist" was so disloyal to the Georgian nation that he allied with the Kuznetsov the Russian chauvinist and Kuznetsov the "believer" in the superiority of Russia allied with a Georgian anti-Russian chauvinist. By the way, so much for Stalin's alleged "agenda" of promoting Greater Russian chauvinism at the expense of the minorities, the Russian chauvinist foes of the Union of the SSRs were being annihilated by Stalin and his comrades.

In 1949, there was an election in the Leningrad Party organization. Although some party members had voted against Popkov, the result of the election was announced as a 'unanimous' vote for Popkov. Two CIA documents confirmed:

In 1949, as a result of the elections which took place in the Leningrad Party organization, Popkov was re-elected as Secretary of the Leningrad Oblast Party Committee. After the secret balloting, the election results were read by the Election Commission (Schmetnaya Kommissiya), which stated that without exception all members of the Party conference had voted for Popkov. A few days later, letters began to arrive at the Central Committee, directed specifically to Stalin, from many members of the party conference, who it seemed, had voted against Popkov and were very surprised at the peculiar results of the balloting. (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

Popkov was up for re-election as First Secretary and Kuznetsov was up for election to the Leningrad Oblast Committee. Several voters cast ballots against the entire slate, but the commission certifying the election felt that it would look more proper if the election was unanimous. They took their problem to Kuznetsov, who told them that it was their affair, thus indirectly countenancing the falsification. (The Execution of Viktor Semenovich Abakumov, CIA, January 25, 1955, p. 4) (IMG)

It seems like Kuznetsov was trusted by some of those who did not know his true face, perhaps because he was wrongly described by the bourgeois media as a 'protégé' of Zhdanov.

At least:

One of those who had voted against the slate then wrote to Stalin informing him that the election had not been unanimous. (The Execution of Viktor Semenovich Abakumov, CIA, January 25, 1955, p. 4) (IMG)

Clearly, the letters of the Party members showed that Kuznetsov, the electoral commission, as well as almost certainly Popkov himself, had committed electoral fraud during the 1949 elections of Leningrad. The communist faction led by Stalin investigated the case:

A special commission, appointed by the Central Committee, was sent to Leningrad to investigate the situation. The commission found that the results of the election had been shuffled with Popkov's knowledge, and that there were all kinds of discrepancies in the work of the oblast Party Committee. (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

Referring to Voznesensky and Kuznetsov, Sergo Beria recalled:

My father had no reason to persecute the two Leningraders; he had other things to worry about. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 215) (IMG)

Kuznetsov and Beria were under careful surveillance by the Soviet intelligence service:

A few days before his arrest, in August 1949, Kuznetsov came to our house. He told us that he knew he was being watched. 'I am, too,' my father replied. 'I advise you to be careful what you say to your friends in the Party.' ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 215) (IMG)

Then,:

Stalin used this charge [of electoral fraud] as the basis for the arrests which followed. Kuznetsov had attended the election as Party representative from the center and was held doubly responsible for the falsification. (The Execution of Viktor Semenovich Abakumov, CIA, January 25, 1955, p. 4) (IMG)

Ruthless purges began as a result of which:

Popkov and some of his responsible assistants who had close relations with him vanished without a trace. (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

Because Voznesensky supported the Yugoslav agents in Leningrad during the purge of Leningrad,:

he [i.e. Voznesensky] went down with them [i.e. Yugoslav agents in Leningrad]. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 216) (IMG)

Voznesensky was responsible for damaging the Soviet economic planning. The CIA confirmed:

Voznesenskiy ... made major errors in economic planning.... (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 3) (IMG)

Voznesensky, however, was an economist. It seemed unlikely that an economist so knowledgeable as him would 'err' in economic planning, and seemed more likely that his 'errors' were actually a deliberate act of economic sabotage against the Soviet state. A Soviet engineer who defected to the countries of the US-led camp reported hearing that Voznesensky conducted economic sabotage by deliberately presenting false reports about the state of the Soviet economy:

A Soviet engineer who defected from the USSR in 1949, reported hearing that Voznesensky had been removed because he had attempted to deceive Stalin regarding the degree of the fulfillment of the Five Year Plan. (The Balance of Power August 1948 to October 1950, HR70-14, CIA, August 5, 1953, pp. 10-11) (IMG)

In fact, those were not really 'errors' – they were intentional acts of economic sabotage aimed at undermining the industrial backbone to the Soviet military. Like Beria, Voznesensky wanted to reduce Soviet investments into the military:

Voznesensky also understood that we needed to reduce the hypertrophy of the military-industrial complex, which distorted our system, and my father thought well of him for that. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 215) (IMG)

Voznesensky's opposition to the development of the military-industrial backbone:

brought him into conflict with the Party's organs.... ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 215) (IMG)

Even Sergo Beria admits:

Voznesensky did not have the makings of a leader. He would never have been able to head an apparatus or even a ministry. He was, instead, an economist, and his rudeness to his subordinates was not enough to make him a talented administrator. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 215) (IMG)

The fact that Voznesensky's intention in the first place was to undermine the military-industrial backbone of the USSR and that he did indeed 'mistakenly' undermine the military-industrial backbone of the USSR is evidence that the 'mistakes' were deliberate acts of sabotage. Voznesensky was duly demoted, tried, and executed.

Other individuals that were ruthlessly purged were listed by the CIA document:

G. M. Popov, Secretary of the Moscow Oblast Party Committee, and Lt. Gen. I. V. Kovalev, Minister of Communications (sic; Transportation), who like Popov ... used Party funds to build dachy for his mistresses, and finally went so far as ordering a spur-line for his villa on the Black Sea. For the same type of sins, Stalin's personal favorite, Rear Admiral I. D. Papanin, Chairman of the Chief Directorate of the Northern Sear Route, was removed from his post. Papanin soon acquired a taste for the pleasures of social life and built a home, also not with his own money, which, in size, surpassed the estates of great pre-Revolutionary landowners. He had for his own use about ten automobiles, including an amphibious vehicle he had received from the US under Lend-Lease and which he used for duck hunting. To top it all, he ordered the peasants from the nearby collectives to construct a pond for his white swans, for which his wife had a weakness. (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 3) (IMG)

Note that in the Soviet Union, purges were carried out based on law – not on who was 'Stalin's personal favorite'. The survival of a Party member was not dependent on the Soviet leader's emotions. Of course, Joseph Stalin endorsed the purge of Papanin, upon discovering that the latter was corrupt. In short, the CIA agrees that the people whom Stalin wanted punished were indeed 'guilty' and that the purges affected guilty individuals 'regardless of their position or rank in the Party':

Thus, Stalin ruthlessly punished the guilty, regardless of their position or rank in the Party. (Background on The Execution of Abakumov and the Leningrad Case of 1949, CIA, January 14, 1955, p. 3) (IMG)

The communist faction, reliant upon the blue-collar workers in the CPSU and entrenched in many parts of the military and security bodies, was waging the class struggles to entrench its dominance over the state apparatus and to eliminate the corrupt bureaucratic class that constituted the key class base of the Titoists in the Soviet Union.

The corrupt bureaucrats of Leningrad had deep UDB connections as well. In January 1948, Tito's gang in Yugoslavia sent a delegation headed by Milovan Djilas to the Soviet Union. As Djilas wrote in his memoirs, he was politely welcomed by Zhdanov in Moscow, but clearly, Zhdanov and Djilas did not get along much. Djilas recalled:

Even if we had not been idle we still would have wished to see Leningrad, the city of the Russian Revolution and the city of many beauties. I approached Zhdanov concerning this and he graciously agreed. But I also detected a certain reserve. The meeting [with Zhdanov] lasted barely ten minutes. (Conversations with Stalin, Milovan Djilas, p. 166) (IMG)

On the other hand, Djilas was warmly welcomed and could 'get along with' the 'humane' and 'warm' leaders of Leningrad (Popkov and Kuznetsov), who could 'understand the language' of Djilas:

Our encounter with Leningrad's officials added human warmth to our admiration. They were all, to a man, simple, educated, hard-working people who had taken on their shoulders and still bore in their hearts the tragic greatness of the city. But they lived lonely lives and were glad to meet men from another clime and culture [such as Yugoslav leaders]. We got along with them easily and quickly – as men who had experienced a similar fate. Though it never occurred to us to complain about the Soviet leaders, still we observed that these men approached the life of their city and citizens – that most cultured and most industrialized center in the vast Russian land – in a simpler and more human way than was the case in Moscow.

It seemed to me that I could very quickly arrive at a common political language with these people simply by employing the language of humanity. Indeed, I was not surprised to hear two years later that these people, too, had failed to escape the totalitarian millstone just because they dared also to be men.

(Conversations with Stalin, Milovan Djilas, pp. 168-169) (IMG)

The Leningrad leaders were in fact Yugoslav agents – hence Djilas liked them. They leaked intelligence for the Yugoslav delegation:

In January 1948 a Yugoslav delegation led by Milovan Djilas had visited Leningrad and had gotten along well with party leaders there; they had received information from the Leningraders about Soviet internal politics, a leak that had annoyed Stalin. (Rulers and Victims: The Russians in the Soviet Union, Harvard University Press, Geoffrey A. Hosking, p. 254) (IMG)

Again, one ally of the Yugoslav agents in the Kremlin was the Soviet Union's head of the State Central Planning Commission, Nikolai Voznesensky. 'Voznesensky', Sergo Beria recalled,:

supported the Leningraders.... ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 216) (IMG)

Nor was the death toll of the Leningrad so high. A US intelligence file provided a graph of the membership statistics of the CPSU. As can be seen from the graph (to which I added the red line for the reader to more easily see), there was no dramatic decline in Party membership whatsoever. Also, note that alongside the shaded graph, there is the non-shaded zig-zag curve; that one represents the percentage change in Party membership; and for the period of the Leningrad purge, it shows a membership increase. The graph shows that there had historically been considerable declines in Party membership – such as for the period of the Great Purge and the Great Patriotic War – but the Leningrad Purge was not one of them.

C19S5. The Demotion of Molotov and the Purge of Polina Zhemchuzhina

The arrest of Polina Zhemchuzhina, Molotov's wife, on charges of collaboration with the Mossad appears to have been a conspiracy by the Malenkov network with the objective of forcing the demotion of Molotov. The case against Zhemchuzhina had begun during the Yezhov years, for even during those years she had meetings with Zionist leaders. The cooptation and rise of Beria was utilized as a counter-weight against the undue and baseless suspicion directed against Zhemchuzhina and thus she was saved from a fake 'anti-Zionist' witch-hunt:

In Yezhov's time the Party organs began to compile a dossier on Zhemchuzhina. Malenkov busied himself assembling the items and my father was ordered to investigate Zhemchuzhina's links with the Zionists.

One day Stalin showed him the Central Committee's dossier which proved Zhemchuzhina's anti-Party activity³⁴ and told him to check the accusations, making it plain that they were to be confirmed. 'He did not doubt that I would do as he wished,' my father told me. He examined all the reports, dating back to Yezhov. Zhemchuzhina's only sin was to have helped some Jews. She had indeed met representatives of Zionist organisations, but officially and with the permission of the Politburo, and so of Stalin. They [i.e. the Yezhovites] wanted to make this a crime on her part. 'These charges don't stand up. They only want to organise a provocation against Molotov,' said my father to Stalin, who took his report and did not mention the matter again.

('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 169) (IMG)

Malenkov belonged to the Yezhovite group that assembled the dossier against Polina. During the late 1930s, the case against Polina was dropped. However, in 1949, the allegations against her were raised again. The initiative for arresting Zhemchuzhina came from the enemies of Stalin and Molotov, but neither Stalin nor Molotov voted against such an initiative because she had been discredited. Sergo Beria recalled:

In February 1949 the initiative for Zhemchuzhina's arrest came not from Stalin but from people who were competing for his succession.

('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 169) (IMG)

Furthermore, Zhemchuzhina seemed to not blame Stalin for her imprisonment – or at least her admiration for Stalin implied such:

Molotov loved only Zhemchuzhina, who was herself madly in love, all her life, with Stalin. 'There's a man!' she said to Molotov. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 170) (IMG)

The 'evidence' against Zhemchuzhina rested on her hanging out with Israel's ambassador to the Soviet Union, Golda Meir. Lionized in the West, Golda has been wrongly referred to as Israel's 'Iron Lady'. Yet, anyone with a basic knowledge of Golda Meir would know how weak a woman she was. From Moshe Dayan to Ariel Sharon to David Eleazar, Haim Bar-Lev, and Yitzhak Rabin, no one who knew Golda Meir took her seriously. In fact, the Mapam-Palmach faction in the Israeli state apparatus installed her at the helm of Israel's regime precisely for how mentally weak and pliable, and hence easily controllable, she was. No doubt Polina Zhemchuzhina's too frequent hanging out with Golda was unwise as it could be used to discredit Polina, but it is difficult to imagine precisely how a brilliant Yiddish revolutionary woman like her could be a 'Zionist agent' recruited by a weak woman and loser like Golda Meir. Furthermore, although like most Yiddish women, Zhemchuzhina loved Stalin, she grew critical of Stalin's anti-Zionist and anti-Bundist policy:

During the war Zhemchuzhina took an active part in the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee despite my father's warnings. Later she sharply criticised Stalin's anti-Jewish policy. How could he not understand that the Jewish people deserved help after all they had done for the revolution? Ought the proletarian state not to show its gratitude? Molotov said nothing. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 170) (IMG)

Do the calculations. The narrative aimed at framing up Zhemchuzhina would go like this: "Zhemchuzhina befriends Golda Meir, the head of the Mossad base in Moscow. Agent Zhemchuzhina then begins to promote hostile agitation against Soviet power by calling for Bundist settlement in Crimea, which, during the Third World War, would be used by the fascists as a Yiddish settler-colonial separatist base subservient to Anglo-American imperialism." True, befriending Golda Meir and then pushing for Bundist settlement in Crimea normally does imply intelligence service work for the imperialist secret services. However, in exceptionally rare cases, individuals render services to imperialist secret services not as agents but as 'useful idiots'. Polina Zhemchuzhina was a smart woman and did not have evil intentions, but on this issue, she acted usefully-idiotic in favour of the Zionist intelligence network, thus making a case against herself and leaving Molotov and Stalin no excuse to save her from a frame-up.

The imprudent actions of Zhemchuzhina did not represent Molotov's views:

Molotov dared not say anything to Zhemchuzhina, because he was afraid of her. Knowing her volcanic temper, he feared that she would go and make a scene before Stalin. However, he complained to Stalin.... ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 169) (IMG)

my father revealed to us that Molotov had applied Party policy like an automaton and had had people shot, in great numbers, on the basis of mere suspicion. He told us all that in a quite objective way. He warned my mother that Zhemchuzhina was an independent woman with her own ideas. Molotov put up with this, though his attitude was disapproved of by his Politburo colleagues. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 170) (IMG)

Even though Molotov did not agree with his wife's behaviour, the arrest of Zhemchuzhina in turn made her husband Molotov appear as the 'compromised' 'honey-trapped' husband of a 'Zionist agent'. His 'soft' attitude towards his wife was used as an excuse by the Yezhovite agent Malenkov to depict Molotov as a man 'soft' on American imperialism. Malenkov successfully engineered the demotion of Molotov in March 1949, weeks after the imprisonment of Zhemchuzhina. Molotov was replaced by Vyshinsky, a communist loyalist despised by the Titoist faction. Despite the loyalty of Vyshinsky to the socialist state, the position of the communist forces in the Ministry had undoubtedly become weaker with the ouster of Molotov.

C19S6. The Titoist Faction led by Beria Undermines the Soviet Military-Industrial Backbone / CIA Stance on Consumer Goods vs. Producer Goods

Many harbour the delusion that the development of nuclear weapons by the USSR meant that the USSR did not need to invest in its conventional weapons as much, since the USSR was 'not' going to be invaded ever again. This perspective is incorrect. First of all, having nuclear weapons does not automatically prevent a state from being aggressed; the Georgian regime, an Anglo-American satellites state, invaded the nuclear-armed Russian Federation in 2008. Secondly, the USSR needed conventional weapons in order to undermine the terrorist guerrillas that the CIA and MI6 sponsored inside the Soviet Union, the Peoples' Democracies, and other anti-imperialist allies of the USSR. Thirdly, the USSR needed to develop conventional weapons in order to militarily assist the Vietnamese freedom-fighters, the North Koreans in the Korean War, the anti-imperialist Arabs and Mapamite Hebrews in the struggle against the Israeli regime and the reactionary Arab regimes, the anti-Apartheid activists in South Africa, the Latin American guerrillas. All of these wars in which the USSR was to be covertly involved required conventional weapons. Developing nuclear weapons was crucial, no doubt; but the struggle does not end there. The development of nuclear weapons merely turns direct wars into covert or indirect ones.

Stalin supported investments into conventional weapons as well, whereas his Titoist opponents – Beria, Malenkov, Khrushchev, Mikoyan, and Bulganin – opposed him on this matter. The existence of the intelligentsia as the majority in the CPSU meant that the USSR was going to begin to decline. The was USSR running out of time. In order to counter this tendency to decline, it was necessary that the USSR, for a while, speeds up with the expansion of the anti-imperialist movements worldwide, or else the balance would tilt in favor of the enemies of the USSR and the USSR would implode:

Also, he thought that time was working in the West's favour, that the relations of forces was at this moment as favourable to the USSR as it could be. So he set himself to prepare, not public opinion but those close to him, by repeating to them that war was inevitable, and that the Americans would start it. He claimed to have documents that proved his assertions. There were indeed American plans for a preventative war. (...). My father tried in vain to prove to Stalin that the Americans were not at all ready to go to war.... ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 233. Bold added.) (IMG)

The mass-scale development of conventional weapons, the multiplication of bombers, tanks and missiles, all our military preparations pointed to the imminent launching of an offensive. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, pp. 233-234) (IMG)

Rushing is usually what the Trotskyites advocate, but in the context of the USSR, a country that was soon to reach its peak and begin to decline, it was necessary to cause as much damage to the imperialist armies worldwide through the conventional weapons, so that through the weakening of the imperialist militaries, the imperialist intelligence services would also have a weaker backbone, hence being less able to penetrate the USSR. Failing to maximize damage during the golden era of the USSR would have only allowed the imperialists to strike the USSR more easily when it had begun to decline.

Beria on the other hand, advocated the surrender of East Germany to West Germany, the decentralization of the economy, and a cut in military spending:

In 1949-50 the decay of our economy because of the age of our infrastructures and the equipment of our basic industries provided my father with an excuse to go back on the offensive. He initiated economic discussions, using the argument of efficiency, which safeguarded him from accusations of ideological deviation. He urged that Germany be reunited at all costs, that our military expenditure and the size of our armed forces be reduced, and that our production of conventional weapons be cut down in favour of concentration on new types of armament. Only an agreement with Germany would furnish the resources needed to rescue our economy. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 227) (IMG)

For this reason, the Beria group gave false data on the production of the military equipment in 1949-1951 in order to undermine the armed forces of the Soviet Union:

Vannikov thought of a stratagem which he proudly explained to my father. The industries controlled by him published production figures that fell short of reality, so that we could freely dispose of the surpluses that did not appear in the official data. Many people knew of this subterfuge, but nobody brought it to Stalin's attention. Unfortunately, it was impossible to apply this system to foodstuffs, a domain in which it was harder to fiddle the figures. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, pp. 226-227) (IMG)

Who was Vannikov? Vannikov was a military general of the Red Army, arrested in 1941 and was supposed to be executed for treason. However, Beria managed to ensure that he survives and that Stalin would be misinformed of Vannikov's death. Later on, when the Nazi Germans invaded, the leverage of the Stalin faction reduced, which allowed Beria to catapult this renegade back to his position in the armaments sector. Thanks to the lobby of Beria, Vannikov was honoured in the USSR, even though he was a traitor:

Vannikov, my father's deputy and the Number Two of the atomic project, was short and thick-set. Intelligent and kindly eyes brightened his big bald head. Three times a Hero of Socialist Labour, he had known many vicissitudes. When he was Commissar for Armaments he was arrested, in June 1941, and condemned to death. My father succeeded in preventing the worst from happening. When war broke out Stalin remembered him. 'What a pity, an intelligent man like him would have been useful today,' he remarked. 'Who knows, perhaps he may have survived somewhere in the camps,' said my father. Stalin was not deceived by this reply and blamed him for it later. A fortnight after this conversation Vannikov was presented to him and he was made Minister. My father thought highly of him. He ... liked me and I kept his confidences to myself. I did not want interference by my father in our relations. Vannikov, who came from Baku, was over 50, and I was 25 years old. He tried to educate me. 'What feelings do you think this regime arouses in me?' he asked. 'I hate it and yet I work for it. And I work honestly. What else can I do?' One day he said to me: 'I soon gave up my career in the Party. I went to Moscow, studied engineering while living from hand to mouth, and got a diploma. But I liked power at that time. Instead of shutting myself up in research I had to go into politics and end up as a Minister. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 181) (IMG)

The Titoist faction led by Beria was aiming to undermine the nuclear power of the USSR so that the Soviets cannot focus on the conventional military after developing their nuclear weapons. The Titoist faction aimed to undermine the conventional arms production of the USSR in order to prevent Soviet arms exports to the anti-imperialist forces. Remember that the anti-imperialist progressive bourgeois-democracy in Syria as well as the Lebanese republic, were all militarily funded by the Stalin-era Soviet Union during the 1940s and 1950s. The People's Democratic Korea especially needed the arms for the war of liberation against Anglo-American imperialism. The undermining of the Soviet conventional arms could utterly decimate the anti-imperialist forces worldwide. It was not just that, however.

The reduction of the amount of weaponry available to the socialist forces would have weakened the dictatorship of the proletariat. Note that the dictatorship of the proletariat is essentially the control of the proletariat over the means of violence. The reduction of the quantity of the means of violence available to the agents of the proletariat would – in relative terms – mean a greater amount of means of violence available to the anti-proletarian comprador forces in the socialist country. A lowering of the quantity of the means of violence available to the dictatorship of the proletariat results in the reduction of the hold of the proletariat over the state and an increase in the influence of the class enemies of the proletariat. Hence, a reduction in the amount of military funds available to the dictatorship of the proletariat results in an increase in the influence of the comprador agents inside the workers' state at the expense of the proletariat.

In the context of the Soviet Union, a reduction in the quantity and quality of the conventional and non-conventional arms of the Red Army would have rolled back the influence of the communist faction of the Red Army while increasing the influence of the Titoist commanders in the Red Army. The weakening of the Soviet military and the weakening of the armed forces of the Soviet allies would have altogether inflicted heavy costs upon the Red Army, thus reducing the funds available for the communist faction of the Red Army. Such a reduction of funds would force the Red Army's communist faction to reallocate funds away from the anti-Titoist secret service struggle onto compensating the military losses. As such, the Titoist faction in the Red Army could gain greater leverage, thus allowing the Beria-led network to systematically demote the communist loyalist commanders in the Red Army, eliminate such commanders, plant Titoist agents in the command of the Red Army, and thereby make the means of violence in the USSR dominated no longer by the agents of the proletariat but by the agents of the comprador bourgeoisie, particularly the corrupt bureaucrats. Through these means, socialism in the USSR could be liquidated and replaced with comprador capitalism.

Beria promised Stalin the hydrogen bomb, not fulfilling the promise until after Stalin died:

We exploded our second bomb in 1951. This was already more than just a copy of the American bomb.¹⁶ To persuade Stalin to be patient my father dangled before him the prospect of something still better - the hydrogen bomb, very much more effective. But he was not in a hurry to explode it. In my opinion, it was ready in 1952 but my father waited till Stalin died before deciding to test it, in July 1953. He knew very well that Stalin wanted to have the H-bomb before the Americans so as to be able to start a war with them.

Stalin began to harass my father and Kurchatov, demanding that they speed up manufacture to the utmost. (It had begun while we were still working on the two previous bombs.) When they both explained to him that at least three or four years would have to pass before the project was complete, he suspected that Kurchatov was hand in glove with my father. Stalin had begun involving himself in the affairs of the atomic committee in 1946, at the time of Malenkov's disgrace, which also marked a weakening of my father's position. It was then that he started to send for scientists.

(Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, pp. 227-228) (IMG)

Beria thus sabotaged the Soviet nuclear program as well. Beria most likely had the bomb ready by 1952. However, he hid it to delay the Soviet nuclear program and to prevent Stalin from purging him, given that the bomb was needed for preventing an Anglo-American imperialist invasion. The early finishing off of the hydrogen bomb would have meant that the defense of the USSR would have been secured insofar as nuclear retaliation capability was concerned, and the USSR could duly focus on the conventional weapons, to wage the Cold War against the Anglo-Americans, as opposed to engaging in a hot war. Developing those nuclear weapons would have given the USSR the deterrence capability that would allow it to stockpile conventional arms for exporting the socialist and progressive bourgeois-democratic revolutions in the areas surrounding the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies. Stalin was not fooled by Beria's 'Hydrogen Bomb' card. He obviously put pressure on the Beria gang although Stalin did not have enough agents to have the capability to pressure Beria to behave properly with respect to the nuclear weapons. Only in 1946, as stated above, did Stalin have such capabilities.

Such measures by Beria were of course supported by the CIA. The CIA promoted the view that consumer goods must be prioritized over producer goods. In other words, the CIA propagated the thesis that heavy industry – the sector that assisted the growth of the military and the consumer goods – shall be de-emphasized. Concerning the civilians of the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies, the US intelligence high command, the National Security Council (NSC), set as its plan:

To stimulate their desire for more consumer's goods by bringing them to realize how rich are the fruits of free labor and how much they themselves could gain from a government which primarily sought their well-being and not conquest. (104. National Security Council Report, Washington, June 29, 1956., NSC 5607, STATEMENT OF POLICY ON EAST-WEST EXCHANGES) (IMG)

The citizens' 'well-being' is a euphemism for consumer goods whereas 'conquest' is a euphemism for military-industrial backbone strengthened through investments into producer goods or heavy industry. The enemies of the freedom forces promoted the reduction in emphasis over producer goods in the Soviet-led camp so to undermine the latter's productive forces. The emphasis over the consumer goods was a demagogical measure in itself, for it did not account for the fact that investment into producer goods actually helps multiply consumer goods, that investments into heavy industry boosts light industry, and that establishing {the means of the production of the means of production} multiplies the rate of expansion of the means of production. In 'The Economic Problems', Stalin famously attacked this view that favoured the consumer goods over the producer goods, light industry over heavy industry. Furthermore, the comprador classes which pushed for the reduction in military-industrial investments in the socialist countries did so as a way of reducing the means of violence available to the agents of the proletariat, so to roll back the influence of the proletariat over the means of violence and hence over the state in general. Such a rollback of the agents of the proletariat would have allowed the expanded influence of the comprador classes, such as the corrupt bureaucrats, over the means of violence and thus over the state in general. Upon gaining influence over the state as a whole, the comprador classes would worked to directly sabotage not only the producer goods and military but also the very consumer goods for which they preached. Remember Sergo Beria's words regarding the Beriaite drive to sabotage food industry: 'Vannikov thought of a stratagem which he proudly explained to my father. The industries controlled by him published production figures that fell short of reality, so that we could freely dispose of the surpluses that did not appear in the official data. Many people knew of this subterfuge, but nobody brought it to Stalin's attention. Unfortunately, it was impossible to apply this system to foodstuffs, a domain in which it was harder to fiddle the figures.'

C19S7.1. Some Purges Prior to the 19th CPSU Congress in 1952

Abakumov's replacement was none other than [Semyon] Ignat'ev, the former associate of the Zhdanov group whom Beria and Malenkov had managed to remove from the Belorussian Secretariat in 1949. (Beria: Stalin's First Lieutenant, Amy Knight, p. 158) (IMG)

Her remarks are true, but in a more complicated manner than would appear. As has been mentioned before, Malenkov and Beria were covertly allies while being 'enemies' on the overt level. Covertly, Ignatiyev was an agent of Malenkov and hence also an agent of Beria. However, on a more overt level, Ignatiyev was an ally of Malenkov and an 'enemy' of Beria. Therefore, on the covert level, Malenkov and Beria did indeed oppose Ignatiyev's rise because Ignatiyev could help in the anti-Beria purges, but on a somewhat more overt level, only Beria opposed the rise of Ignatiyev whereas Malenkov supported Ignatiyev's rise.

Ignatiyev, although a Malenkov agent, was nonetheless useful to the Stalin faction precisely because Ignatiyev was weak, had few connections, and was more susceptible to becoming a docile yes-man of the Stalin faction of the Central Committee in carrying out the anti-Titoist purges against the Beria faction:

When he was made head of State Security in July 1951 Ignat'ev behaved as a docile tool of the Central Committee. (Beria: Stalin's First Lieutenant, Amy Knight, p. 217) (IMG)

During this period, Malenkov, coopted by the communist faction, was compelled to pursue anti-Beria purges.

Stalin coopted Malenkov to undermine Vlasik and Poskrebyshev who were indeed traitors. Malenkov too tried to use his overt-level 'alliance' with Stalin as a channel for intelligence penetration into Stalin's entourage but Stalin prevented this. Sergo Beria recalled:

Doubtless at Stalin's instigation, Malenkov undertook to discredit Vlasik and Poskrebyshev, though they were fanatically devoted to their master. He wanted to replace them with his own men and ordered Ignat'ev to compile a compromising dossier that would show them to be corrupt. It appeared that they used Stalin's name to enrich themselves. Poskrebyshev rushed to my father to seek his help (this man often came to our house and my father put up with him). He proclaimed his innocence, certainly lying. My father replied that he could do nothing, as he was in a much worse situation. 'Have you ever lifted your little finger for me? You can only rely on the wisdom of Iosif Vissarionovich.' Poor Poskrebyshev was ready to climb up to the ceiling. Eventually he was made to retire. Nevertheless Malenkov succeeded only partly in gaining control of Stalin's immediate entourage. He did not manage to infiltrate the Secretariat completely. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 247) (IMG)

For his treason, Vlasik was further demoted to the point of being arrested and sent to the corrective labour example. Timashuk experienced a rise in prestige as well as greater responsibility, while a Soviet intelligence official named Riyumin was promoted:

Because the contents of the report supported facts involving physicians who were attending a number of members of the government, Shtsherbakov [i.e. Shcherbakov] among others, Timashuk's report got into the hands of Vlasik, who was at that time chief of the guard protecting the members of the government. Vlasik wrote on the report the remark "yurunda" (Baloney) and put it on the shelf. This "yurunda" soon made the rounds at the Ministry as a sort of joke. In 1952 one of the operational bosses going over the old reports happened to pick up the Timashuk report. It just happened a campaign against Jewish elements in the Ministry was on at that time. This colleague again submitted this "overt" report to his superiors and from here it went on up to Stalin. Vlasik was punished for negligence. From house arrest he was transferred to a concentration camp, since at that time he was already on the way out, and replaced by Col Rakov. By order of Stalin himself a "hot time" came for Timashuk. She wrote voluminous "uncovering" material on the Jewish element among the doctors. Investigation of the case was entrusted to a certain Ryumin, promoted after the arrest of Abakumov, and Ryumin handed it to the Central Committee and the former Deputy Minister Ignatiev. Ignatiev held this post when the anti-Jewish campaign started. Ryumin knew how to exploit the case with the whole technical know how of the MVD. ('Committee of State Security / The Doctors' Plot and Its Reversal', CIA, September 24, 1954, pp. 1-2) (IMG)

Some individuals would object by stating that Vlasik was 'framed'. These individuals harbour an erroneous view. Surely, some innocent individuals at the lower ranks of the Soviet government and whom Stalin was not very familiar with could have been framed in Stalin's name and without Stalin's consent. However, Vlasik was very familiar to Stalin. And so, had Vlasik been innocent, Stalin would have gone ahead to support him against the frame-up. Some would object that Stalin might have 'known' that Vlasik was 'innocent', but that he had so little power. This too is incorrect. Stalin had much less power in those years than in the prewar years, but he still had enough power to be able to pursue much of his agenda in the postwar years. Stalin had enough power that even after Stalin's own death, the faction that Stalin had headed managed to purge Malenkov and Beria even though that same Stalin faction also lost to Khrushchev, for historical-material reasons that will be explained later. It follows that while Stalin was relatively weaker, he was not a mere figurehead. Had he been a mere figurehead, he would have been assassinated much earlier, because his enemies could not have tolerated the physical existence of Stalin even as a politically powerless man. Stalin had enough surveillance and intelligence capability to have his faction's intelligence agents to watch out for frame-up of powerful officials around him. And he could save Vlasik. However, Stalin did not save Vlasik from the purge because Vlasik was a vicious traitor to the USSR.

Some would ask the question: why would Stalin not be so vigilant as to prevent his enemies from being in charge of his physical protection in the first place? The question is wrong. Placing one's enemy agents ostensibly 'in charge' of one's own physical protection is often used as a means of demoting those enemy agents from much more sensitive positions such as the heights of the intelligence service and the command of the military down to becoming a semi-figurehead 'in charge' of one's own physical protection. Such a demotion allows for the more sensitive intelligence positions to be filled with one's trusted agents who in turn could more easily surveil the demoted person and semi-figurehead 'in charge' of one's own physical protection. This was the case of Vlasik, who from the top ranks of the Cheka and OGPU was demoted in the 1930s down to the person ostensibly 'heading' the physical protection force guarding Stalin. That such a demotion occurred in the 1930s is clear evidence that Vlasik was an old enemy of Stalin, not an old friend. The real on-the-ground physical protection of Stalin was done by Stalin's trusted and trustworthy guards, the honorable fighters who risked their lives to protect the CPSU General-Secretary; the protection was not done by the crooked Vlasik. Of course, even having such a disloyal element as Vlasik ostensibly 'in charge' of one's personal guards was still risky and was too much, which is why it was high time that Vlasik would be purged. Demoting renegades to being ostensibly 'in command' of those genuinely providing one's physical protection is not unique to Stalin by the way. I know for a fact that it is an intelligence technique used in other countries as well. Of course, one has to ensure that the traitor demoted to being the ostensible commander of the personal protection units really becomes as much of a figurehead as possible, or else there will be room for abuse and assassination.

Purges of the associates of Vlasik, Poskrebyshev, and Abakumov occurred by mid-1952. Purges against suspects encircling Stalin occurred:

- Personal chief of staff and aide in directing MGB activities: position vacant since Poskrebyshev's removal in April 1952.
- Minister of State Security: the inexperienced Ignatyev since April 1952.
- Chief of the Guards Directorate: none since April 1952.
- Personal bodyguards: reduced by half in mid-1952.
- Chief of personal bodyguards: replaced in mid-1952 by a colonel lacking command experience in this specialty.
- Personal chauffeurs and bodyguards: also replaced in mid-1952.
- Personal servants at the dacha in Kuntsevo: cut back in mid-1952.

('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, pp. 120-121) (IMG)

The cut in the guards personnel was of course risky because it reduced the troop size for defending Stalin's life; however, even more dangerous was enemy infiltration into Stalin's guards personnel. Hence, the policy of reducing the guards personnel made sense in this context. Many of the guards and officers 'protecting' Stalin were actually unreliable elements and so Stalin decided to reduce the number of his guards:

Up to May 1952 this guard numbered more than 400 persons, actual guards and household attendants. When the commission for re-examining the guard directorate was established in May 1952, Stalin declared that 200 people were enough for his personal guard, and therefore ordered it to be cut in half. However, the actual number who remained from June 1952 until Stalin's death was 250. Of these 250 persons, probably only 60 to 70 were actual physical guards. The rest were chauffeurs, cooks, barbers, gardeners, household servants, and so forth. (CHIEF GUARD DIRECTORATE, CIA, February 25, 1955, p. 7) (IMG)

C19S7.2. The 19th CPSU Congress in 1952 & the Ascendancy of the Titoists to Dominance / The Physical Elimination of Stalin and the Suspicious Deaths of Red Army Commanders

After the Great Patriotic War, Khrushchev formed a closer relationship with MI6 agent Lavrenti Beria:

He thought Khrushchev was crafty and perfidious, extremely dangerous despite his illiteracy. After the war he made a show of passionate friendship for my father, who thought this funny, but eventually let himself be taken by it. Khrushchev never contradicted him openly.

(Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 166) (IMG)

Khrushchev himself had had long-standing friendly relations with British intelligence. He admitted this in his own memoirs:

I will add here only one incident having to do with a left-wing British Labourite. I forget his name. He died three years ago. I was well acquainted with him. He was our good friend, a man of Finnish extraction. He was so devoted to the Soviet Union that the Labourites expelled him from their party. He wanted to come visit us. Stalin who was already ill suddenly took it into his head that this man was an agent, a foreign spy (and during the war he actually had served in the military intelligence). He didn't deny that he had served in British intelligence. And so he was not granted a visa to visit the Soviet Union, although at the time he had been speaking publicly in our favor. Later I met with him, and he said to me: "Comrade Khrushchev, people didn't understand me correctly. I was always your friend. It was wrong to treat me like that. I will be your friend till the day I die." ('Memoirs of Nikita Khrushchev, Volume 3: Statesman, 1953-1964', Watson Institute, Nikita Khrushchev, p. 89) (IMG)

The man whom Khrushchev was describing was a very famous Titoist military-political intelligence officer for the MI6, named Konni Zilliacus. Stephen Shenfield, who translated to English the memoirs of Khrushchev, confirmed that Khrushchev was speaking of the anti-Soviet warrior and MI6 operative Zilliacus:

Khrushchev is referring to the left-wing Labour Party politician Konni Zilliacus (1894–1971). Although Zilliacus served as an intelligence officer for the British interventionary force in the Russian Far East in early 1918, he was opposed to the foreign intervention and undermined it by leaking information about the situation in Siberia to the press. In the interwar period he worked for the League of Nations. Elected to parliament in 1945, he was one of six Labour members who in 1949 voted against Britain joining the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), leading to his expulsion from the Labour Party and the loss of his seat in 1950. He was readmitted to the Labour Party in 1952 and reelected to Parliament in 1955. He continued to pursue a left-wing line in foreign and defense policy, supporting the movement for unilateral nuclear disarmament and later protesting against the American intervention in Vietnam. See Biographies. [SS] (N. S. Khrushchev, Memoirs of Nikita Khrushchev, Volume 3: Statesman, 1953-1964, Watson Institute, p. 90) (IMG)

Konni Zilliacus featured prominently during the Slansky trials in Czechoslovakia:

In 1947, Fierlinger copied Slansky on two letters from Zilliacus, which security later found in Slansky's files. Marginal notes made it clear that Slansky had read them. Slansky had also received some letters through diplomatic means. From 1946 to 1948 he met with Zilliacus three times in the presence of others. (Report on the Murder of the General Secretary, Karel Kaplan, 1990, p. 183) (IMG)

During the Slansky trials (see C15S8), it was alleged by the Czechoslovak government that the MI6-Mossad agent Slansky was working for Konni Zilliacus and had contacts of an intelligence character with him. Regardless of whether or not this specific allegation against Slansky was correct, it was very well-known by the officials of the USSR and the Peoples' Democracy that Zilliacus was a prominent MI6 official. He was regarded as unofficially an MI6 spy-master. For some information on what the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies stated regarding Zilliacus, the reader can refer to the transcript of the trials, the English-language translation of which is available online on archive.org at the time of writing.

Thus Khrushchev, Malenkov, and Beria began to gossip among each other against Stalin:

After our arrival in Moscow some members of the Politburo, such as Malenkov [and] Khrushchev ... who wanted to win my father's approval, started to read to him some disagreeable remarks that Stalin had [allegedly] made about him. Khrushchev said that one day when he was boasting to Stalin about his successes in Ukrainian agriculture the latter had barked: 'Stop boring me with your plantations, like Beria with his rubbish about citrus fruits!' Now my father's citrus fruits were like his own children to him. In cultivating them he had sought a means of consoling himself... My father took the blow. Khrushchev was quite pleased, I thought. When he had left my mother said: 'Don't take that to heart, Lavrenti. He may have made up that story.'

'No, Nina,' my father replied. 'That was no lie. Khrushchev told the truth.'

(Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 145) (IMG)

As was detailed in C9S3, long before 1951, as early as the 1930s, Khrushchev, Malenkov, Beria, Bulganin, and Mikoyan were agents of the same faction, together constituted a network of anti-communist activity, and were closely allied. However, outwardly, they pretended to contradict each other, with some members of the group adopting left-deviationist lines and the other members adopting right-deviationist lines as their outwardly appearance. In 1951, these agents decided to reduce the level of their outwardly contradictions and to mobilize into a more direct and joint confrontation against the Stalin faction. In 1951, Khrushchev, Malenkov, Beria, Bulganin, and Mikoyan consolidated their Titoist bloc to fight against Stalin in the Politburo:

In 1951 the members of the Politburo, Bulganin, Malenkov, Khrushchev and my father began to appreciate that they were all in the same boat and it mattered little whether one of them was thrown overboard a few days before the others. They felt a sense of solidarity once they had faced the fact that none of them would be Stalin's successor.... They therefore agreed among themselves not to allow Stalin to set one against another, and that they would immediately inform each other of anything Stalin said about them, so as to frustrate his manipulations. They recalled their former intrigues and buried their old grievances. Khrushchev told my father that Stalin had asked him for reports on the national question when he was in the Ukraine, though in principle, policy on that matter was still a preserve of the NKVD. This solidarity among the members of the Politburo increased as time went by. They also confided in Mikoyan, who understood the situation. But Stalin's intrigues left traces which were not completely wiped out. It must be said that Stalin constructed his provocations around an element of truth.

After about six months Stalin guessed what was going on and unceremoniously demanded of the members of the Politburo: 'Tell me, are you forming a bloc against me?' He took the steps he thought appropriate and began to meet Ignatiev, the head of the State Security without going through the Politburo.

(Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 239) (IMG)

Malenkov, Khrushchev, and Bulganin were doubtless not so direct with Stalin as my father was, but [Stalin] could have no doubt that my father enjoyed their support. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 247) (IMG)

The consolidation of this bloc, it is worth noting, was also corroborated by Enver Hoxha:

Mikoyan ... plotted with Nikita Khrushchev against Stalin, whom they had decided to murder. He admitted this with his own mouth to Mehmet and me in February 1960. After the putsch they linked up with American imperialism, and set about the destruction to its foundations of the great work of Lenin and Stalin, socialism in the Soviet Union. (The Khrushchevites, Chapter 3, Enver Hoxha)

The alliance between Khrushchev and Beria was completely covert. At the overt level, they were still 'enemies' and Stalin utilized such an overt-level 'hostility' as a means of undermining them. Even during this time, when Khrushchev was completely a covert ally of Lavrenti Beria, Khrushchev, having been coopted by the Stalin faction, was waging the secret service conflict against one of Beria's most important henchmen, Abakumov:

Stalin had appointed Politburo Member Nikita Khrushchev as secretary of the Moscow Party Organization in 1949. Two years later Khrushchev chose to come to the MGB Officers' Club and address several hundred of us Party activists from State Security in the windowless auditorium. Such a visit was without precedent. Not by chance, Khrushchev's subject was our responsibility to the Party. His underlying purpose apparently was to invigorate CPSU discipline—for which read "loyalty to the aftermath of the arrests of the MGB chiefs in August 1951, the month before Khrushchev spoke. He mentioned our former minister only once during his 45 minutes on the podium. He said that Abakumov had failed to detect "the nationalistic-Trotskyite tendencies" of the Leningrad Party Organization. (...). Khrushchev thus implied that, for this reason, Abakumov, his deputies, and many other MGB officers were being sent to prison. Later the CPSUI Central Committee repeated the charge about Abakumov's "lack of vigilance" regarding the Leningrad Party Organization. This and additional accusations appeared in a secret Central Committee letter that was read aloud to us MGB Party activists a month or two after Khrushchev's speech. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 58) (IMG)

The key political battle that resulted in the decline of the Stalin faction was the 19th CPSU Congress, the Congress in which the white collar elements in the Party held the largest percentage though not yet the above-50% majority, whereas the blue-collar elements in the Party held a minority. Surely the kolkhoz peasantry bore characteristics very similar to the proletarians and played a role strongly favourable to socialism but it would obviously be an exaggeration to state that the kolkhoz peasantry in behaviour were as 'proletarian' as the proletariat itself. All of these years of emphasis on theoretical work, during the post-war period, all these years of Zhdanovschina, not only was significant for the entire communist movement, but also served as a tool against the political influence of the liberal intelligentsia, who comprised the bulk of the CPSU. It was aimed at discrediting the intelligentsia. However, ultimately, such efforts to cut the intelligentsia to size did not succeed to the level desired, and the intelligentsia continued to dominate the Party. Regarding the dominant role of the intellectuals in the Party Congress, the CIA's Office of Current Intelligence (OCI) acknowledged:

Preliminary analysis of the composition of the delegation and comparison with previous congresses shows that the importance of the intelligentsia in Party affairs is greatly increasing. (Developments in the Soviet Party Congress, Office of Current Intelligence, CIA, October 9, 1952, p. 3) (IMG)

Another report, this time by the CIA's Office of National Estimates (ONE) corroborated:

The base of the Party has been broadened, thereby depriving the industrial proletariat of its membership monopoly. The duties of the members have been increased, but instead of being professional revolutionists, they are now predominantly informers and propagandists. (The Changes in the 1952 Statutes of the CPSU, Staff Memorandum No. 298, Office of National Estimates, CIA, December 19, 1952, p. 1) (IMG)

By the time of the 19th Party Congress, the Stalin faction of the Party was so weak that Stalin was compelled to resign from his position as the General Secretary of the CPSU:

I remember hearing all four of them refer to a statement Stalin had made after the 19th Congress, when he spoke of withdrawing from public life. They recalled that he had already, several years earlier, hinted at retirement, but concluded that, this time, they should call his bluff. ... They toyed with the idea of offering him an honorary position which would allow him to end his days in tranquillity haloed with glory but without real power. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 247) (IMG)

Resignation has always had a twofold character. At times, resignation by a top official can be a means of provoking a revolt against the other officials; in those situations, resignation could help Stalin in specific situations. However, in 1952, the circumstances were different. During the 19th Party Congress, Stalin was encircled by the white collar elements in the Party, which generated the strength of the Titoist faction. For this, and for a number of other reasons, Stalin's resignation was not some kind of a tactic for combatting the Titoists per se, but was an unmistakeable evidence of the sharp demotion of Stalin. As such, Stalin lost:

his positions as CPSU general secretary and de facto chief of State Security. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 119) (IMG)

Furthermore,:

it is generally agreed that Malenkov dominated the XIX Party Congress. (Politics and the Soviet Army, Office of Current Intelligence, CIA, March 12, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

Malenkov, by then the real General Secretary of the CPSU, gave the report of the Central Committee, a report which had been given by the former General Secretary Stalin in the previous congresses:

The increased importance accorded to the regional Party secretaries, as demonstrated in their election to the leading Party organs, reemphasized Malenkov's key position. Since the basis of their selection appears to have been more their personal qualifications and connections than the significance of the geographical areas which they represented, it is highly probable that they owed their advancement to Malenkov. ... The Congress itself was apparently dominated, at least indirectly, by Malenkov since it was he who delivered the keynote address, i.e., the "report" of the Central Committee, which at past congresses had been given by Stalin. (INDECISION AND STRESS 1950-1952, CAESAR – 8, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), August 21, 1953) (IMG)

To put it simply, Stalin had no real official position in the USSR from October 1952 onwards. He was simply broadly 'the leader of the Soviet Union' but there was no government position he held. As Sergo Beria stated in the above quote, the Beria-Malenkov-Khrushchev-Bulganin-Mikoyan bloc 'toyed with the idea of offering [Stalin] an honorary position which would allow him to end his days in tranquillity haloed with glory but without real power.' Stalin's leadership of the Soviet Union from late 1952 onwards was merely an informal leadership through an informal network of friends and agents who fought the secret service conflict on his side against the Beria-led bloc.

Malenkov, an agent of Beria, was by then the real leader of the USSR. The new Party composition indeed would have generated someone like Malenkov as the new head of the CPSU. The white-collar elements in the Party were the largest minority – hence promoting Titoism – but they were not a majority, let alone an overwhelming majority, meaning that the communists of the Stalin faction still had some influence. And Malenkov – being covertly a Beria agent, but overtly an 'ally' of Stalin – reflected precisely the condition of the Party composition. Overall, through Malenkov, Titoist influence over the high level of the Party leadership increased. Crucially, as a result of the loss of his position as the General Secretary of the CPSU, Stalin no longer had control over the Soviet counter-intelligence apparatus. And a leader without a counterintelligence service resembles a head without eyes. Nor were the unofficial network that he had through his comrades in the armed forces able to help him much, because this unofficial network had been severely damaged as a result of the Great Patriotic War. Indeed,:

Stalin ... would have liked to get rid of the other four [Beria, Malenkov, Khrushchev, and Bulganin], but he was no longer in control of all the levers of power. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 243) (IMG)

Without such 'Eyes', without a powerful network of intelligence agents, Stalin was soon to lose his life as well, and the communists in the high ranks of the Soviet military were to undergo a period of demotion. Already, as a result of the 19th Party Congress, Leonid Govorov, a well-known ally of Zhdanov, was omitted from the list through a supposed 'oversight':

The first of a series of peculiar events involving military personalities occurred two weeks after the publication of the list of Central Committee members at the close of the Party Congress. On 30 October 1952, a special announcement was made by the Party Secretariat to the effect that Marshal L. A. Govorov had been elected a candidate member but had been omitted from the list through an oversight. Such an error is almost unheard of in the USSR, in view of the importance of these listings, so that the explanation given can scarcely be accepted. It has been suggested that Govorov's belated appointment indicates that he represented a faction which had been side-tracked at the Congress but had begun a strong fight to regain its position immediately afterwards. Govorov, Inspector General of the Soviet Army since January 1947 ... was closely associated with Zhdanov in the defense of Leningrad during World War II and was one of four chief orators at Zhdanov's funeral in September 1948, speaking on behalf of the Ministry of Armed Forces. (Politics and the Soviet Army, Office of Current Intelligence, CIA, March 12, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

If Govorov, as a remnant of the Zhdanov group was passed over at the Congress, he must have had exceedingly powerful backers to have had his name added to the list. (Politics and the Soviet Army, Office of Current Intelligence, CIA, March 12, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

Pay attention to the following part of the above quote: 'It has been suggested that Govorov's belated appointment indicates that he represented a faction which had been side-tracked at the Congress but had begun a strong fight to regain its position immediately afterwards'. Again, this very much reflects the conditions of the 19th Party Congress, because the white-collar elements held the upper hand as a dominant minority, but there was still hope for the blue-collar elements in the Party. This is also why Stalin was able to go ahead with some of his plans after the Party Congress, but he succeeded only partially:

Stalin ... had important plans for the 19th Party Congress, which was held in October 1952, but he was unable to complete them fully. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 242) (IMG)

One move initiated by the Stalin faction during the 19th Party Congress was the enlargement of the Presidium. Stalin, Sergo Beria recalled, had to be satisfied with creating an enlarged Presidium of 25 members and 11 deputies, which was to provide him with support for the coming purges. In order to intimidate the Politburo and the Central Committee, he started to talk about 'strengthening the Cheka,' and bringing Chekists into the Central Committee. He praised 'Cheka methods' and so on. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 242) (IMG)

Titoist agents Malenkov, Bulganin, Khrushchev, Mikoyan, and Beria together constituted 5 out of the 9 members of the Politburo. More members in the Politburo would have helped Stalin put the Titoist Bloc members in a minority position, thereby helping him to carry out the purges against the Titoist conspirators. Stalin particularly promoted communist and communist-coopted elements. Stalin's plan was to promote Malenkov against Beria, Khrushchev against Malenkov, and Brezhnev against Khrushchev. That Khrushchev, Malenkov and Beria were covertly allies, and that Brezhnev was an agent of Khrushchev, was a definitive fact. However, on the overt level, they opposed each other, and they could be used against each other. That is why Stalin brought Brezhnev to the high ranks:

In August 1951, after Ignat'ev's appointment, several new men, all associated with Khrushchev, suddenly appeared in the MGB: A. A. Epishev, a party secretary in Ukraine, and I. T. Savchenko, also from the Ukrainian party apparatus, became deputy ministers of State Security; V. E. Makarev, a former Moscow party official during Khrushchev's tenure there in the 1930s, became chief of the MGB Personnel Department. In addition, a lesser official named N. R. Mironov, who had served in the Ukrainian party apparatus under Khrushchev's protégé Leonid Brezhnev was brought to Moscow to work for the MGB. (Beria: Stalin's First Lieutenant, Amy Knight, p. 158) (IMG)

The next stage was to unfold a few months later, with ... Khrushchev suffering the same fate. No great problem there. Stalin would have left no witness in place. He would have got rid of the old Politburo and promoted new people, idiots like Brezhnev. After winning the Third World War he was determined to correct all the 'mistaken' interpretations of historical events which had been current in the West. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 243) (IMG)

Many people make the mistake that Brezhnev himself was a 'great communist' and a staunch anti-Titoist. Actually, the facts show that Brezhnev was a Khrushchev agent, but on the overt level, the line that Brezhnev was promoting was very favorable for the Stalin faction against Khrushchev, Malenkov, Beria, Bulganin, and Mikoyan. This is why Stalin himself during his lifetime, and the remnants of the Stalin faction after Stalin died (e.g. Vasilevsky and Shtemenko and people close to them) promoted Brezhnev in the overt-level struggles.

Stalin also resisted against revisionist pressures by encouraging communists outside the USSR to pursue global revolutionary class struggle against imperialist reaction:

It is not impossible that Stalin's speech at the 19th Party Congress, directed to the foreign Communist parties, was designed to supply to non-Soviet Communists what the new CPSU constitution fails to offer: the spirit of world revolution and the assurance that the Communist Party of the Soviet Union will remain the source of world revolutionary strength and inspiration. (The Changes in the 1952 Statutes of the CPSU, Staff Memorandum No. 298, Office of National Estimates, CIA, December 19, 1952, p. 2) (IMG)

As in the past, Stalin wanted to expand the Soviet military in order to wage the covert war against the imperialists through the anti-imperialist anti-colonial liberation movement. His enemies – Sergo Beria included – slandered such a campaign of his as to mean that Stalin wanted to launch a Third World War, even though the CIA confirms that he did not. Opposition to the Soviet military and Stalin's line regarding the expansion of the Soviet military in the covert conflict against the Anglo-Americans, was more powerful than ever by 1952. Sergo said:

I must emphasise that opposition was very much stronger in 1952 than it had been in 1945. If Stalin had decided at that time to conquer all Europe my father could not have stopped him, whereas in 1952 the group opposed to war was much more numerous, organized, and more resolute. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 247) (IMG)

Stalin had, in 1952, a plan of action for the years ahead. He had defined his objectives and the means to obtain them. He was perhaps less interested in current affairs precisely because he was concentrating all his efforts on his grand design. He was neither senile nor mad. Until the last months of his life Stalin was in good physical condition and his mind and will were intact. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 242) (IMG)

There indeed existed the obvious correlation between the anti-Stalin opposition, the plot to demote and murder the Soviet Red Army generals, and the plot to undermine the Soviet armed forces. Referring to Stalin's attempt to build up Soviet military, the former head of KGB archives Mikhail Poltoranin said:

This actually has to do with why they killed Stalin. (Churchill Had Stalin Killed, US Bombed Russian Far East in 50s - Top Russian Official (Video - Mikhail Poltoranin), Russia Insider, May 17, 2018. I watched the video I which Poltoranin made this remark. The video is available online. However, the screenshot of the transcripts from a 'pro-Russia' website has been provided) (IMG)

Whereas Stalin had lost much influence over the Soviet counter-intelligence and did not have a powerful unofficial intelligence network, Beria held the upper hand in this respect:

In 1952, my father felt able to face up to Stalin. (...). Although my father did not control the security organs he had men in place who kept him informed of whatever was happening. All, and above all, he had his own intelligence network which was not dependent on any existing structure. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 246) (IMG)

The coming of the doctors' plot was no coincidence. The same network of doctors that had operated against Zhdanov, was now to target the generals Govorov, Shtemenko, Vasilevsky, Konev, and Stalin. All of these generals and Stalin were allied to each other and were at odds with the Beria faction. Referring to Vasilevsky, Shtemenko, and Konev, a working paper of the CIA staff noted that:

all three had been close associates in the military ministry at Moscow after 1948. (Politics and the Soviet Army, Office of Current Intelligence, CIA, March 12, 1954, p. 5) (IMG)

Furthermore, it is well-known that Vasilevsky had been a close comrade of Stalin:

Marshal Vasilevsky, Minister of War prior to the 1953 reorganization ... served in the Stavka under Zhukov during World War II and therefore had been quite close to Stalin. (Politics and the Soviet Army, Office of Current Intelligence, CIA, March 12, 1954, p. 5) (IMG)

Konev and Shtemenko are actually well-documented to have been foes of Beria, and comrades of Stalin. This has also been documented by Deriabin who wrote:

Deputy Minister of Defense Konev and Armed Forces Chief of Staff Shtemenko – were enemies of Beria. He had tried to undercut them with Stalin by relaying rumors about their disloyalty. Beria's failed effort irked Stalin in the case of Shtemenko, who was his favorite military officer. When the German Army marched to the outskirts of Moscow in 1941, Stalin and Shtemenko bunkered together two levels below ground in the Kirovskaya subway station; the rest of the General Staff stayed in a command post one level below ground in the Byelorussian metro station. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, pp. 104-105) (IMG)

As such, Shtemenko, Konev, and Vasilevsky formed a network of Soviet generals who sided with Stalin against Beria. To them was added the top Zhdanov protégé, Govorov. The 'accidental' omission of Govorov from the Party's electoral list was no coincidence. Regarding Govorov and Konev, the CIA further reported:

Govorov and Konev ... both are believed to have enjoyed the full confidence and trust of Stalin. (CAESAR 12: RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN POLITICAL STATUS OF SOVIET ARMED FORCES, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), September 20, 1955, September 20, 1955, p. A-2) (IMG)

The 19th Party Congress, through the reduction of Stalin's influence over the Soviet counter-intelligence afforded the Beria faction the excellent opportunity with which to reduce the security of the communist generals in the Red Army and then pave the way for their deaths. A CIA report stated: doctor-plot ... made top military leaders its chief target. (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 14) (IMG)

Referring to the killer-doctors arrested, Deriabin wrote:

the accused and Beria seemingly cooperated. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 104) (IMG)

The following excerpt of the book by Sergo Beria confirms that the Doctor's Plot case was directed against Beria. In the section headlined, the "The Doctors' Plot," Sergo Beria confirmed this. He wrote:

The Doctors' Plot

My father was at bay. Our second alert came at the end of 1952. 'This time, you know, it's irreparable,' he said to me. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 243) (IMG)

Almost at the same time, the purge of the Beria agents in the Mingrelian clan in Georgia was taking place. Sergo Beria continued:

While in Moscow they were denouncing ... the doctors, in Georgia a parallel campaign was being waged against the Mingrelians. One day my father came in with a stack of newspapers and said to me: 'Here, read. You'll gain from it for your study of Soviet politics. Don't forget one thing: these two affairs are aimed at me and therefore at our family' He was not expressly named as the guilty man, but he knew from his contacts that every accused person was interrogated regarding his relations with my father and about any orders received from him. Stalin was assembling a dossier and waiting for the right moment to bring it into play. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 244) (IMG)

Sergo added:

The doctors concerned were divided into two categories, the British spies and the American spies. All the Jewish doctors, described as British spies, were alleged to be Beria's men. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 243) (IMG)

Sergo Beria was expressing the matter in a somewhat distorted matter. Not all of those doctors were Jewish; many were so-called 'gentiles' if we may use that term. The killer-doctors did work for so-called 'Jewish' intelligence services – the Weizmann network, the JDC, the Mossad – but they also worked for so-called 'gentile' intelligence services such as the CIA, MI6, as well as the Abakumov network in the MGB. Simply put, the 'Jewish' and 'non-Jewish' killer-doctors worked for 'Jewish' and 'non-Jewish' intelligence agents. What feature of the purge of the killer-doctors, then, resulted in the CIA-MI6-Mossad media to highlight the 'Jewish' aspects of those doctors, and to loudly denounce the purge as 'anti-Semitic'? Equivalently, in most of the previous anti-CIA anti-MI6 purges too, the purges against the 'pan-Islamists' were condemned as 'oppression of Muslims', the purges against Tsarist priests were condemned as 'oppression of Christians', the purges against the Ukrainian fascists were condemned as 'Great-Russian Chauvinism', etc. Whereas in the other cases, Islamists, Ukrainian bourgeois-nationalists, Georgian bourgeois-nationalists, etc. were used by the CIA and MI6, in this case, the CIA-MI6 used Zionist and Bundist networks to carry out such hostile anti-Soviet activity. The Soviet media this time mentioned the 'Jewish' anti-Soviet intelligence networks, hence why the purge of the killer-doctors was condemned as 'anti-Semitic'. As far as are concerned the accurate allegations of the Beria-MI6 connections pointed out by Sergo Beria, Sergo was not wrong – on this issue, the CIA agent Deriabin backed up Sergo Beria's remarks:

The alleged involvement of British intelligence pointed toward sharpening another nail for Beria's coffin. Before he joined the CPSU, and before the Soviets overthrew the Mussavat government ruling Azerbaijan in 1920, Beria was an employee of the Mussavat police. Separately, Pravda claimed that the Mussavat government "operated under the control of British intelligence organs." ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 105) (IMG) case against the "saboteur-doctors" was Stalin's last stand. If the case mushroomed into a purge that destroyed rivals, Stalin would have been restored to his positions as CPSU general secretary and de facto chief of State Security. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 119) (IMG)

The launching of the Doctors' Plot Case was the means by which the communists in the Red Army sought to launch a resistance against Beria. During the period of the media campaign regarding the Doctors' Plot,:

Konev ... wrote a denunciation accusing some doctors of wanting to send him to the other world. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 243) (IMG)

Such a campaign of denunciations was a part of a broader vigilance campaign aimed at keeping the communist personnel of the Soviet state on high alert and ready for mobilization against the Titoist faction. Stalin had a habit of using such vigilance-raising measures.

It was clear that the Doctors' Plot was a prelude to a Great Purge, if such a thing would have been possible again. Sergo recalled:

To [the Doctors' Plot Case] was added the Slansky affair in Czechoslovakia. I was with Vannikov when we heard the news on the radio, on 22 November 1952. He commented 'It's set out like in 1937'. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 243) (IMG)

In 1952, Stalin began to purge 'Beria's men' so to eventually get to purge Beria. Sergo recalled:

'But why didn't he dismiss you along with ... Mikoyan?' I asked. 'That was a tactical maneuver,' my father replied. 'He fears to confront me openly because he fears that I might resist. (...)' (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 243) (IMG)

The rise of the Eisenhower Administration in the United States resulted in the further deterioration of the international situation. Like Eisenhower, Truman was a staunch supporter of international fascism as well. However, Truman also had no choice but to be partially accountable to the Democratic Party. The Democratic Party had in it many individuals belonging to the Truman faction, but a significant segment of the Democratic Party was made up of the remnants of the Roosevelt faction, which drew its support directly from the working class 'Democrat' voters. As such, Truman had no choice but to be accountable to these Roosevelt faction agents to some extent. With the successful ouster of Truman and the rise of Eisenhower, the pro-fascist elements in the United States gained greater strength. Like Truman, the Truman-era CIA leaders were also pro-fascist but they too were accountable to the agents of the Roosevelt faction from the Democratic Party. With the ouster of Truman, these CIA leaders were replaced by Allen Dulles, a pro-fascist CIA boss who was less accountable to the Roosevelt faction. In any case, with the rise of the Eisenhower-Dulles group, US imperialism was able to operate more aggressively on a global scale.

In this midst, some may ask: would it not have been better, for the sake of the Soviet Union and all the oppressed masses, to assassinate Beria so that the freedom movements would be saved? Such a question has idealist presuppositions, and emphasizes the role of Beria as an individual and fails to account for the great mountain of agents upon whom Beria relied. Such a question therefore is devoid of a historical materialist analysis. No, Stalin should not have tried to assassinate Lavrenti Beria because (1) Beria would be replaced merely by another Beria agent, (2) assassination plots, under the risk of being discovered, would have brought Stalin and the USSR into disrepute as 'state terrorist', and (3) assassinating Beria was extremely difficult to carry out in the first place, for Beria had numerous agents that would have informed him of the terror plot, thus allowing him to foil it. Even the assassination of not just Beria but also Malenkov, Mikoyan, Khrushchev and Bulganin would have merely replaced them with other Titoist renegades who had countless agents in the Soviet state and had the support of the white collar elements in the Party, the elements with the greatest percentage in Party membership composition. The best avenue and the only possible avenue was to undercut the material base of these renegades in the Party and state apparatus, and then to go after those renegades and purge those renegades legally.

Sergo Beria wrote:

I asked my father if we should wait like sheep going to be slaughtered. 'Things won't go that far,' he replied. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 244) (IMG)

Beria prepared himself and his family for a fight and flight respectively:

My father had learnt to foresee Stalin's actions and reactions, in small matters and great, with infallible precision, because he had studied his behaviour in detail and knew what his aims were. In small matters as in great, Stalin's tactic was the same. My father told me that the operations against himself that had started some time earlier had entered a new phase and a direct attack was becoming possible: 'Now it is not just me anymore,' he added. 'Your mother and you are also targeted. I know that statements against me have been collected, showing me as an enemy and a wrecker. I will take the necessary measures so far as I am concerned. As for you, I suggest that you make friends with the crews of the test aircraft. In case of necessity, when I give you the signal, take with your mother and your family. Otherwise he will destroy you all.' (...) I was in a state of shock. It stunned me to learn that Stalin was preparing to get rid of my father. 'Doesn't he realise that you are devoted to him?' I stammered. 'Where did you get the idea that I was devoted to him?' he replied. 'The age of vassals and suzerains is past. Many times I have had to act under constraint. Now, though, he has gone too far. One is devoted to someone because one loves him or because one shares his ideas. How can you think that I am devoted to Stalin? No question of that.' (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 238) (IMG)

In the meantime, Stalin himself was far more careful:

Stalin was now in greater isolation than ever in his Kremlin office. Bodyguards noticed that after Pravda printed the saboteur-doctors story on January 13, Stalin behaved more cautiously than ever before. He ceased entertaining leaders at his dacha in Kuntsevo, he had Guards officers employ more stringent security measures for his trips by limousine between Kuntsevo and the Kremlin, and he received Politburo members only in his Kremlin office, never seeing Beria alone. Stalin, it seemed, feared that revealing his intentions about the purge intensified his opponents' incentives to assassinate him. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 121) (IMG)

The fact that Stalin was really careful not to show up much in public during those last weeks of his life was because he was being extremely cautious to protect his life.

Behind Stalin's back, Lavrenti Beria began a campaign of 'violently criticizing' the line of Stalin. Sergo wrote:

I have the very clear impression that in 1952 my father acted so to make Stalin realise that he would not let himself go like a lamb to the slaughter but was ready to declare open war on him should Stalin decide on his liquidation. (...). Previously he had been extremely cautious ... but now he began violently criticizing Stalin's policy.... (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 245) (IMG)

Of course, the goal of such 'violent criticizing' was to rally the high-ranking officials of the Soviet state against Stalin. At the same time:

They led us in the MGB to believe that in the Politburo as well as in State Security, Stalin had lost the struggle with Beria. (...). I imagine Beria putting forward two arguments to persuade a majority of Politburo members to join him in a rebellion against Stalin. The first argument would have been this: Stalin intended the purge to envelop the entire Politburo old guard – Malenkov, Khrushchev, Bulganin, Voroshilov, Mikoyan, Kaganovich, and Molotov besides Beria. After that, and following his pattern of the past, it was only a matter of time before Stalin purged some or all of the 16 new members whom he appointed in October 1952. To cancel the purge, the eight old guard members (including Beria) needed five new members for a majority of 13 votes to 12 (including Stalin's). Assuming a democratic process at work in the Politburo, Beria won a majority over to his side, against Stalin."

Second, Politburo members needed no persuasion that Stalin should not repeat the pattern of past purges. Where Politburo members needed persuasion was on the point that Stalin could not repeat the pattern. Beria may have argued that Stalin had lost the capability to conduct a purge because he no longer controlled the MGB – Beria did.

By February, the tide in the political struggle turned fully in the favour of Lavrenti Beria. Indeed:

From late January through February 1953 the indications of a drastic shift in power accumulated. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 119) (IMG)

Red Army commanders close to Stalin were politically (and most likely, physically) eliminated one after another:

Beria's foe and Stalin's favorite general, Armed Forces Chief of Staff Colonel General Sergey Shtemenko, also lost his job in February. The Politburo took this action at the insistence of Beria, after consultation with former Defense Minister Bulganin. Only later did Stalin learn of it. In addition, the Politburo fired Minister of Public Health Dr. Yefim Smirnov, who had been serving simultaneously as Stalin's personal physician.

Lieutenant General Nikolay ("Fat Kolya") Spiridonov and Major General Petr Kosynkin had been commandant and deputy commandant, respectively, of the Kremlin Kommandatura since 1939. Of the two, General Kosynkin was on more intimate terms with Stalin. He spent less time supervising Kommandatura subordinates than standing at Stalin's elbow and fulfilling his requests for personal services.

The obituary for Kosynkin said that he died "unexpectedly" of a heart attack, in the line of duty, on February 17.3 On the next Saturday I happened to see Colonel Nosarev's deputy for Kommandatura Personnel-Security as we left the main MGB headquarters building. Hailing this lieutenant colonel, I caught up with him, and we walked together for a block or two.

"Too bad about Comrade Kosynkin," I said.

"Yeah, too bad. It hit Colonel Nosarev and me pretty hard."

"Well, it's a severe blow to the Big Chief too, I often saw Comrade Kosynkin opening the car door when the Big Chiefs limousine drove up to the Council of Ministers building.

"Yeah, Comrade Kosynkin was always there," said the lieutenant colonel.

"And almost always the Big Chief would smile at him and say a few words. By the way, was it known that Comrade Kosynkin had a heart condition?"

('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 118) (IMG)

Deriabin added:

Kommandatura Deputy Kosynkin, who died in mid-February, had been a Stalin loyalist.... ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 120) (IMG)

Shtemenko was demoted in 1952:

Of the 5 military officers (Shtemenko, Konev, Vasilevski, Levchenko, and Govorov) who figured in the doctors' plot, ... Shtemenko seems to have suffered a definite decline in position. As he was removed from his post as Chief of Staff of the Army in the autumn of 1952.... He was elected an alternate member of the Central Committee in October 1952. He was reported in East Germany from roughly October 1952 to April 1953, and was last seen at the May Day celebration in Moscow in 1953. (CAESAR 12: RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN POLITICAL STATUS OF SOVIET ARMED FORCES, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), September 20, 1955, pp. A-1 to A-2) (IMG)

Konev too was demoted:

Govorov in 1946 had become inspector general of the armed forces, which position was taken over by Marshal Konev from 1950 to 1952. Konev was sent from Moscow in 1952 to the Carpathian Military District, and it is not known whether Govorov regained his former position of inspector general at that time. (CAESAR 12: RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN POLITICAL STATUS OF SOVIET ARMED FORCES, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), September 20, 1955, p. A-2) (IMG)

It should be obvious enough that the demotion of a military general is a step for making them be considered as less important and hence reducing a lower allocation of guards for personal defense – hence a step to assassination. Beria managed to promote one of his agents in the Red Army Artemiyev:

In 1952, my father ... had not sat with folded arms but had put his men into key posts. He had appointed one such to head Moscow Military District, Artemiev, who had previously commanded the frontier guards. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 246) (IMG)

Although Stalin was healthy enough to continue leadership, the killer-doctor Vinogradov, an agent of Beria, advised Stalin to desert his post for 'health' reasons:

[Stalin's] personal physician, Professor V. N. Vinogradov had advised that Stalin step down as head of the government for health reasons. (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

Beria of course ultimately sought to eliminate Stalin. However, Beria and his bloc could not officially unseat Stalin due to his overwhelming popularity throughout the USSR:

Explaining the removal of "the beloved leader" to the Party and to the public at large presented grave difficulties. The Politburo had to be prudent in letting it be known that Stalin had been unseated—to disclose the mutiny clumsily might stir up violence and cause the shedding of Politburo blood. Telling the truth was not feasible—to declare at this time that the doctors' plot was a fabrication by Stalin might open Pandora's box. Not only would the truth raise questions about the legitimacy of the post-Stalin regime, the truth could spark a counterrevolution against everyone in the Kremlin, including Stalin, or a counterrevolution led by Stalin against his successors. While it sought a solution, the Politburo had no choice but to keep Stalin on as the titular head of the Party and government. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 120) (IMG)

Thus, the only realistic way remaining for Beria was to assassinate Stalin under the cover of 'natural' death. As the plot against Stalin was being hatched, it was necessary for Beria to maintain grip on the medical staff. Hence, the influence of Beria in the medical staff of the Kremlin and the armed forces increased:

Tretyakov succeeded Smirnov as minister in February 1953. Under Beria's auspices, Kuperin replaced the imprisoned Yegorov as head of LSUIK prior to March of that year; until then he had been chief of the MGB's own medical office. The names of the "best medical personnel" attending Stalin didn't include those of his personal physician Smirnov nor his predecessor, Vinogradov, who had been jailed with Yegorov. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 232. The book by Deriabin was published by his son Petr Deriabin Jr. This quote is from the 'Notes' section of the book, written by Deriabin but added to the book by Deriabin Jr. in the final version of Deriabin's book.) (IMG)

Stalin's personal physician and the chief of the Armed Forces General Staff were both dismissed in February 1953. Also, during that 21-month period the number of Stalin's bodyguards was cut in half, many of his personal staffers were reassigned, and the inexperienced Ignatyev took charge of the Guards Directorate. Gradually the means for protecting Stalin's life had withered.

In the 30 years since Stalin had been named CPSU general secretary, the quality of MGB protection for his life was never worse than toward the end of February 1953. The stripping of Stalin's personal security and his increased vulnerability were apparent. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, pp. 120-121) (IMG)

Deriabin further remarked:

Stalin could not be permitted to live, I believe, due to the risk that he would attempt a counter coup. The Politburo, therefore, overthrew Stalin in February 1953 to avert a purge. Stalin's timely death was the solution – Beria's, Malenkov's and possibly others' – to the problem of disposing of the deposed Stalin. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 131) (IMG)

Corroborating Deriabin, Sergo recalls that his father Lavrenti Beria specifically said the following in reference to Stalin:

It will be better for him to die. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 249) (IMG)

Khrushchev confessed a very important piece of information about Saturday, February 28, 1953. That night, Stalin was a guest at a dinner party; and that dinner party was hosted by the members of the Titoist-Terrorist Bloc: Beria, Khrushchev, Malenkov, and Bulganin. Subsequently Stalin's good health radically deteriorated.

On the evening and night of Saturday, Feb. 28, to Sunday, March 1, he [Khrushchev], Malenkov, Beria and Bulganin were in Stalin's company. They saw a movie at the Kremlin, then went to the Blizhny dacha and drank until 5 or 6 in the morning. (THE DAYS OF STALIN'S DEATH, New York Times, Harrison E. Salisbury, April 17, 1983) (IMG)

The CIA spy Petr Deriabin remarked:

According to Khrushchev, on Saturday night Stalin was host to Beria, Malenkov, Khrushchev, and Bulganin at a late dinner party in Stalin's dacha, and his illness began following the dinner party. (Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Petr Deriabin, pp. 126-127) (IMG)

The British Empire's naval intelligence officer Ian Grey wrote:

Death came suddenly. On the evening of Saturday, February 28, 1953, Malenkov, Beria, Bulganin, and Khrushchev had dined at Kuntsevo. Stalin had been in a good humor, and the evening had been jovial. When Sunday, March 1, passed without his usual call, summoning them or discussing business by telephone, all were surprised.

(...). Later Sunday night, the duty officer of the guard telephoned Malenkov, Beria, Bulganin, and Khrushchev at their dachas. Stalin had not rung for his dinner. He feared that something had happened, but the guards did not dare to go into his room. All four rushed from their dachas to Kuntsevo. Voroshilov and Kaganovich were summoned. When they gained entrance to his room, they found Stalin lying fully dressed on a rug. He was in a coma.

Stalin was poisoned with cyanide. That was when his conditions began to deteriorate, leading to his death.

This is confirmed by Mikhail Poltoranin, the former head of the KGB archives during the Yeltsin Era, who had studied the archives on the conditions of Stalin's death. Below is an excerpt of the transcript of his interview:

INTERVIEWER: Was Stalin poisoned?

POLTORANIN: Yes he was

INTERVIEWER: Are you making an official statement, as the person who used to head the committee on declassifying KGB archives, under Yeltsin?

POLTORANIN: Yes

-Joseph Stalin was poisoned?

POLTORANIN: Joseph Stalin died an unnatural death.... (...).

INTERVIEWER: So who was it that killed Stalin?

POLTORANIN: So listen... (...). Then there were the statements of various officials – there was Enver Hoxha, when Mikoyan came to visit a Hoxha congress – [Hoxha] made a statement that the leadership of the USSR are 'cynical conspirators'

So the likes of Mikoyan traveled the world and bragged about the way they killed Stalin. When I went to look into it myself, what actually happened...

INTERVIEWER: The archives themselves?

POLTORANIN: Yes, the materials themselves...

INTERVIEWER: So what's being hidden from us? What's being hidden from us is that Stalin was poisoned. That it was special operation, which was prepared over a long time.

POLTORANIN: Because by then, a new number of people from Stalin's close circle had already been removed; Poskrebyshev, Vlasik, the Kremlin commandant [Kosynkin] strangely died - who was very close to Stalin. Then (Lavrentiy) Beria appointed a new head of the Kremlin clinic [Kuperin], responsible for all medicines.

In February, 1953 – Stalin began to feel unwell at his holiday home. [Maybe] from a drink of water, or he used to wet his finger when he turned pages – he used to read a lot – maybe that's how it got in... we don't know...

But we do know what the blood and urine samples showed. Well, firstly there was an enlarged liver – this shows toxicity. His leucocytes were four times the norm. This is the white blood cell that fights against toxins.

He experienced vomiting with blood in it, and his skin was a bright pink color with dark patches under the arms, etc...

INTERVIEWER: Was it cyanide? What was the medicine he was given?

POLTORANIN: We looked through his medical log, all his checkups were in it. He was a healthy guy – he had mild first stage hypertension and some rheumatism in his knees.

INTERVIEWER: And nothing else?

POLTORANIN: And nothing else...

And all of the sudden these symptoms are documented. But a conclusion whether he's poisoned – it wasn't written. But there was one person, professor Ruskov, who carried out the anatomical examination of Stalin's body – and he wrote a report to [Kuperin,] the new head of the Kremlin clinic. The new one, that Beria had appointed. He wrote that Stalin was poisoned. Poisoned by cyanide, cyanic acid. All the symptoms pointed to that – and when the body was examined, his airways and mucus membranes were damaged with dots of cyanic acid. Three days after the report – this person died.

INTERVIEWER: Professor Ruskov?

POLTORANIN: Yes. But not only did he die – his house was searched and all the documents in it were destroyed. But, through insufficient diligence, although the majority of his documents on Stalin were destroyed, Ruskov had another copy of the report.

INTERVIEWER: So a copy remained intact elsewhere? And you've had that in your own hands?

POLTORANIN: Yes, I read it with my own eyes. So there you go....

Faria published an article based on the findings of Russian author and researcher Edvard Radzinsky. Tukov, Starostin, Lozgachev, and Khrustalev were three of Stalin's bodyguards in his dacha. Radzinsky interviewed or asked questions from Starostin and Lozgachev, who were still alive.

According to Starostin's testimony:

Stalin gave an order [to the guards] he had never given before.... Stalin told his servants and guardsmen in the words of Tukov, "I'm going to bed. I shouldn't be wanting you. You can go to bed too." (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

However, Lozgachev testified in an interview with Radzinsky:

it was not Stalin who gave that unusual order but another guardsman, attachment Khrustalev, who had left the dacha at 10:00 a.m. on March 1. Only then was Khrustalev relieved by the aforementioned guards, Starostin, Tukov, and Lozgachev. (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

More specifically, according to Lozgachev:

Before leaving [the guards] that morning, Khrustalev told them: "Well, guys, here is an order we've never been given before. The Boss said, 'Go to bed, all of you, I don't need anything. I am going to bed myself. I shouldn't need you today.'" To Radzinsky, there was more here than meets the eye, and he clarifies the situation, "To be precise, [Lozgachev] heard it not from the Boss but from the attachment Khrustalev, who passed down the order, and left the dacha the next morning." (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

Khrustalev was a Beria agent:

Radzinsky posited that after Nikolai Vlasik, Stalin's ... longtime bodyguard, had been arrested and implicated in the contrived Doctors' Plot as well as the developing purge of the MGB, Beria, in an act of personal survival, recruited Khrustalev, a bodyguard strategically placed in Stalin's current personal attachment. (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

The guards noticed a suspicious silence from Stalin, as Lozgachev said:

The next day was Sunday. At ten, as usual, we were gathered in the kitchen, just about to plan things for the day. At ten there was no movement that was the phrase we used when he was sleeping. And then it struck eleven — and still no movement. At twelve — still none. That was already strange: usually he got up between 11 and 12, but sometimes he was awake as early as 10. Soon it was one — still no movement. His telephones may have rung, but when he was asleep they were normally switched through to other rooms.

‘Starostin and I were sitting together and Starostin said: ‘There's something wrong. What shall we do?’

And indeed, what were we to do — go in to [help] him? But he had always told us categorically: if there was ‘no movement’, we were not to go in. Or else we’d be severely punished. So there we were, sitting in our lodge (connected with his rooms by a 25-meter corridor), it was already six in the evening, and we had no clue what to do. Suddenly the guard outside rang us: ‘I can see the light in the small dining room.’ Well, we thought, thank God, everything was OK. We were all at our posts, on full alert, ready to go, and then, again... nothing. At eight — nothing. We did not know what to do. At nine — no movement. We did not know what to do. At nine — no movement. At ten — none.

(Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

Then, the guards decided to enter the room, with Lozgachev leading the way:

I [Lozgachev] said to Starostin: ‘Go on, you go, you are the chief guard, it's your responsibility.’ He said: ‘I am afraid.’ I said: ‘Fine, you’re afraid, but I’m not about to play the hero.’

At that moment some mail was delivered — a package from the Central Committee. And it was usually our duty to hand over the mail. Mine, to be more exact. ‘All right, then,’ I said. ‘Wish me luck, boys’. (...).

Well, I opened the door, walked loudly down the corridor. The room where we put documents was right next to the small dining room.

(Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

Then:

I [Lozgachev] went into that room and looked through the open door into the small dining room and saw the Boss lying on the floor, his right hand out-stretched...like this [here Lozgachev stretched out his half-bent arm]. I froze. My arms and legs refused to obey me. He had not yet lost consciousness, but he couldn’t speak. He had good hearing, he’d obviously heard my footsteps and seemed to be trying to summon me to help him. I hurried to him and asked: ‘Comrade Stalin, what's wrong?’ He’d wet himself and he wanted to pull something up with his left hand. I said to him: ‘Should I call a doctor?’ He made some incoherent noise — like ‘Dz...Dz...’ (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

Lozgachev recalled:

On the floor there was a pocket-watch and a copy of Pravda. And the watch showed, when I looked at it, half past six. So this had happened to him at half past six. On the table, I remember, there was a bottle of Narzan mineral water. He must have been going to get it when the light went on. While I was talking to him, which must have been for two or three minutes, suddenly he snored quietly... I heard this quiet snoring, as if he was sleeping. (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

The guards phoned ‘everybody’:

I picked up the receiver of the house phone. I was trembling and sweat beading on my forehead, and phoned Starostin: ‘Come to the house, quick.’ Starostin came in, and stood dumbstruck. The Boss had lost consciousness. I said: ‘Let's lay him on the sofa, he's not comfortable on the floor.’ Tukov and Motia Butusova came in behind Starostin. Together, we put him on the sofa. I said to Starostin: ‘Go and phone everybody, and I mean everybody.’ He went off to phone, but I did not leave the Master. He lay motionless, except for snoring. Starostin phoned Ignatiev at the KGB, but he panicked and told Starostin to try Beria and Malenkov. While he was phoning, we got an idea — to move him to the big sofa in the large dining room. There was more air there. Together, we lifted him and laid him down on the sofa, then covered him with a blanket — he was shivering from the cold. Butusova unrolled his sleeves. (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

Beria, in particular, responded very late.

At that point Starostin got through to Malenkov. About half an hour had gone by when Malenkov phoned us back and said: ‘I can’t find Beria.’ (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

Beria deliberately let Stalin die, for Beria himself had been the engineer of the assassination of the former General Secretary, as will be shown later.

While knowing that Stalin was deeply ill, Beria pretended that nothing had happened and that Stalin was ‘only’ sleeping:

Another half hour passed, Beria phoned: ‘Don’t tell anybody about Comrade Stalin's illness’. At 3 o’clock in the morning, I heard a car approaching.”

At this point, Radzinsky notes that it had now been four hours since the first phone call and many more hours since Stalin had been struck down by the sudden illness, and he had been lying there without medical assistance all that time. Malenkov and Beria finally arrived without Khrushchev.

(...). Malenkov's shoes creaked. And I remember how he took them off and stuck them under his arm. He came in: ‘What's up with the Boss?’ He was lying there, snoring gently... Beria swore at me, and said, ‘What are you panicking for? The Boss is sound asleep. Let's go, Malenkov!’ I explained everything to him, how he’d been lying on the floor and how he could only make inarticulate noises. Beria said to me: ‘Don’t panic, and don’t bother us. And don’t disturb Comrade Stalin.’ And they left.

(Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria. Bold added.) (IMG)

L. Beria confidently told his son Sergo that Stalin would soon cease to be, according to Sergo himself:

My father had plans which he had formed years earlier. I did not see him during those days. (...). Two or three days later he came to lunch and told me that Stalin would never return to political activity, even if he recovered. (Beria: Inside Stalin’s Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 249) (IMG)

The doctors arrived:

And again, I was left alone. I thought I should call Starostin again and have him alert everybody again. I said: 'If you don't, he'll die, and our heads will roll. Phone them and tell them to come.' (...). The doctors arrived between 8:30 and 9:00 A.M."

(Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

By then, Faria adds:

Thirteen hours had now passed without Stalin receiving any medical assistance. (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

The official conclusion by the Titoist doctors was that Stalin had hemorrhage:

The doctors were all scared stiff... They stared at him and shook. They had to examine him, but their hands were too shaky. To make it worse, the dentist took out his dentures, and dropped them by accident. He was so frightened. Professor Lukomsky said, 'We must get his shirt off and take his pressure.' I tore his shirt off and they started taking his blood pressure. Then everybody examined him and asked us who was there when he collapsed. We thought, that was it, the end. They'll just put us in the car and it's goodbye. But no, thank God, the doctors came to the conclusion that he'd had a hemorrhage. Then there were lots of people, and, actually, from that moment we did not have anything to do with it. I stood in the door. People — the newly arrived — crowded around behind me. I remembered [MGB] Minister Ignatiev was too scared to come in. I said, 'Come on in, there is no need to be shy.' That day, the second of March, they brought Svetlana." (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

Deriabin, who had his own theory on the way that Stalin was murdered, concluded in definitive sentence form:

I conclude that Beria was responsible for the death of Stalin, Malenkov was his accomplice, and Khrushchev and Bulganin were accessories after the fact. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 131) (IMG)

The evidence presented above – how Beria sought to delay the treatment of Stalin, Beria's desire that Stalin dies, the actions of the Beria agent Khrustalev, the changes in the Kremlin clinic, etc. – all leave no doubt as to Beria's role in the murder of Stalin.

Sergo Beria himself explicitly states that he does not rule out the likelihood of L. Beria assassinating Stalin, since L. Beria had nothing to lose:

But my father knew that he no longer had anything to lose. It was possible only to sacrifice oneself in assassinating Stalin. My father being neither a coward nor a sheep walking submissively to the slaughterhouse, I do not rule out the possibility that he may have thought of doing something like that. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 246) (IMG)

As early as 1949, the relations between Stalin and Beria got 'colder' and Stalin expected terrorist attacks from Beria:

I don't think the relations between them [Stalin and Beria] worsened as the result of a particular episode. It was a slow process which remained for a long time hidden from third parties. Stalin became more and more polite and formal with him, which was a clear sign of increasing alienation. Beginning in 1949, he allowed his hostility to show in a wider circle, while my father began to express himself more frankly about Stalin in conversation with me. He was irritated that he could no longer contain himself. His nerves were frayed. (...). I think there is only one word that described what my father felt in those days: hatred. Stalin was hateful to him because he expected a death-blow to come from that quarter at any moment.

(Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 237) (IMG)

Molotov recalled that Beria dropped the following hint about killing Stalin:

While on the rostrum of the Mausoleum [where Stalin and Lenin were buried] with him on May 1, 1953, he did drop hints. (...). He said, "I did him in!" – as if this had benefited me. Of course he wanted to ingratiate himself with me: "I saved all of you!" (Molotov Remembers, Feliks Chuev, p. 237) (IMG)

According to Enver Hoxha, shortly prior to his death, Stalin had said straight to their faces that they 'will sell the Soviet Union' once he dies:

Such elements as Khrushchev, Mikoyan, Beria and their apparatchiki hid the truth from Stalin. In one way or another, they misled and deceived Stalin. He did not trust them, therefore he had told them to their faces, ". . . when I am gone you will sell the Soviet Union."

Khrushchev himself admitted this. And it turned out just as Stalin foresaw. (The Khrushchevites, Enver Hoxha, Chapter 1)

When Stalin died, Beria made sure that all the incriminating documents were eliminated.

Between March 2 and 5, when Stalin died, members of his inner circle were dividing the spoils of power. Beria had already gone through the Kremlin vault and removed incriminating documents. (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

This was hinted at by Poltoranin as well:

Beria appointed a new head of the Kremlin clinic, responsible for all medicines. (...). But there was one person, professor Rusakov, who carried out the anatomical examination of Stalin's body – and he wrote a report to the new head of the Kremlin clinic. The new one, that Beria had appointed. He wrote that Stalin was poisoned. Poisoned by cyanide, cyanic acid. All the symptoms pointed to that – and when the body was examined, his airways and mucus membranes were damaged with dots of cyanic acid. Three days after the report – this person died. Three days after the report – this person [Rusakov] died. (...). But not only did he die, his house was searched and all the documents in it were destroyed. But, through insufficient diligence, although the majority of his documents on Stalin were destroyed, Rusakov had another copy of the report. (Churchill Had Stalin Killed, US Bombed Russian Far East in 50s - Top Russian Official (Video - Mikhail Poltoranin), Russia Insider, May 17, 2018) (IMG)

Beria destroyed almost all documents that incriminated him and his Titoist clique for killing Stalin. Immediately after the murder of Stalin, the guards and officers protecting him and all of those around him who could provide more details on the circumstances of the death of Stalin were dispersed throughout the Soviet Union. The CIA reported:

Following the death of Stalin, the Guard [protecting him] was cut down to some extent again and personnel engaged in guarding Stalin were either dismissed or transferred to the provinces. (...). Guard Directorate No. 1 [the Guard Directorate responsible for the physical defense of Stalin] was liquidated after Stalin died. (...). After Stalin's death the Central Committee of the Communist Party issued instructions to the effect that all members of Stalin's personal guard were to be given other jobs but that none of them was to remain in the MVD in Moscow. [T]he reason for this order was that the Politburo and especially Malenkov were glad that Stalin died and they wanted his memory to die with him. Therefore, they did not want any rumors or legends about the details of Stalin's personal life circulating in Moscow.

Ordinary workers, such as gardeners, were simply given their work-books and released. All officers and persons who had had access to Stalin were given jobs in the provinces. A very few, however, managed to stay in Moscow but not in the MVD.

(CHIEF GUARD DIRECTORATE, CIA, February 25, 1955, pp. 6-7) (IMG)

Beria's agent, Khrustalev, died mysteriously:

'They got rid of everybody. They'd summon you and send you away from Moscow, 'leave the city immediately and take the family with you'. Starostin, Orlov, and Tukov decided to go and see Beria. To ask him not to send them away. So they went into his office, and he said: 'If you don't want to be out there, you will be down there.' And he pointed down to the ground. So away they went. (...). Khrustalev fell ill and died soon after... Orlov and Starostin were given jobs in Vladimir, and I stayed at 'the facility' — the facility was empty, with me as superintendent. It was handed over to the Ministry of Health.... That was the end of the nearer dacha." (Surg Neurol Int. 2011; 2: 161., Published online 2011 Nov 14., Stalin's mysterious death, Miguel A. Faria) (IMG)

It is likely that Khrustalev died naturally, that Beria aimed to use Khrustalev well after Stalin's death. However, there is a small though significant probability that Khrustalev 'had' to die so that incriminating evidence on Stalin's death would be eliminated.

The doctors' plot case was quickly dropped and the Titoist General Zhukov had a rise in prestige:

In the days before Stalin's death top military leaders were drawn into the conflicting currents of Soviet politics, at least as symbols and probably more substantially, by the 13 January 1953 announcement of a thwarted assassination plot on the part of seven doctors. All the intended victims named in the "disclosure" of the plot were from the ranks of the top marshals, generals and admirals. Whatever the intended consequences of the doctor-plot for the military leadership, they were apparently nullified by Stalin's death. The doctors were exonerated on 4 April 1953, and in the following months some members of the military group whose prestige had been enhanced by the announcement of the plot seemed to decline in authority. Konev, one of the highest-ranking targets, dropped from public view. Zhukov, previously in disfavor, became a First Deputy Defense Minister; his name began appearing prominently at receptions in early April 1953, although during Stalin's reign the military had been represented chiefly by the inactive Budenny. C19S8. The Vigilance Campaign  IMG-All-{Democratization}

In the USSR, the importance of security and intelligence studies were frequently emphasized. A US intelligence document provides a useful summary of the vigilance campaign and intelligence studies in the USSR. As correctly stated by the CIA document, the entirety of the Soviet people – especially the inexperienced youth – were consistently encouraged to learn intelligence matters. Pravda reminded the Soviet people that the class struggles in the USSR had not ceased and that they were rather manifested in the form of struggles against saboteurs and enemy agents.

According to the CIA document, a Soviet media broadcast implied that the economically corrupt bureaucrats are a comprador bourgeois class serving the enemy, even if they may not be outright agents of the enemy. Other Soviet media documents that I personally read and were not mentioned in the CIA document also emphasized the fact that corrupt bureaucrats belong to the category of comprador bourgeoisie, not national bourgeoisie. While it would be slanderous to refer to all corrupt politicians as automatically and necessarily imperialist spies, there is no doubt that many of them were. Furthermore, all corrupt oligarchic bureaucrats in anti-imperialist countries belong to the category of the comprador bourgeoisie and feed off of espionage networks, even if they themselves would not be spies.

The Soviet media highlighted the absolutely crucial point that embezzlers and corrupt bureaucrats in anti-imperialist countries constitute a variant of the comprador bourgeoisie as opposed to the national bourgeoisie, even if they may appear as national bourgeoisie. Far too often, this critically important point is missed. Far too often, some half-backed 'anti-imperialists' start arguing that corruption concentrates wealth into the hands of a new class of oligarchs and thus a new 'national-bourgeois class' 'emerges' and so the corrupt oligarchs of the anti-imperialist country will supposedly seek to 'expand' this country's industrial production. Far too often, liberals and left-wing reactionaries attribute corruption to the anti-imperialist faction of anti-imperialist states and fail to acknowledge that corrupt politicians all without exception belong to the pro-imperialist fifth column in anti-imperialist states, even if some genuinely anti-imperialist politicians may appear superficially 'allied' to corrupt politicians, and even if some genuinely corrupt bureaucrats repeat the correct anti-imperialist narratives.

Another highlight of the excerpts of the CIA document is that it refers to a book by a prominent Soviet author on intelligence studies, Vladislav Minayev. The CIA presents some of the highlights of Minayev's work. The CIA document does not mention that Minayev's works also mentioned the intelligence activities of Tito's fascist group in favor of the Gestapo and Anglo-American intelligence.

Anyways, here are excerpts of the CIA document:

The vigilance campaign still gets heavy play on the [USSR's] home service, and is exploited indirectly in a variety of contexts ranging from agricultural shortcomings to embezzlement of state funds and immorality in private life. School teachers are enjoined to imbue their young students with a sense of "watchfulness," Komsomols and nonpartisan youths are urged to read available publications on "how to recognize the enemy within" and Party organisations throughout the country are advised to make screening of applicants for membership more thorough than has been the case heretofore. Political vigilance, like charity, begins at home, that is within the ranks of the Communist Party, according to ZARYA VOSTOKA of 3 February. The party is the most coveted organization in the Soviet structure; spies and diversionists "of every stripe" (vsekh mastei) would like to worm their way in for "espionage and sedition" purposes. (...).

In a double page PRAVDA article on revolutionary vigilance broadcast on 6 February, Kozhev declares that the "recently unmasked disgusting group of corrupt Jewish bourgeois-nationalists" provides additional proof, if any were needed, that intensified political vigilance must become second nature with every citizen of the Soviet Union. (...). Reminding the Soviet people that there can be no two views on the current international situation, Kozhev admits that different opinions on the subject have been voiced by "ill-starred politicians" ... "dogmatists and scholastics".... Some of them "even went so far as to say" ... that the USSR was no longer threatened by imperialism thereby implying that relaxation of vigilance was in order. Such "reasoning" ... is said [by the article] to be anti-Marxian and harmful since it betrays an underestimation of the potential danger residing in the politically-unstable elements of Soviet society and the enemies' capacity of exploiting it:

It would be wrong to believe that with the liquidation of the exploiter classes in the USSR international capital lost the opportunity of recruiting its agents within our country ... fragments of the broken exploiter classes still exist here and there; so do the disguised followers of the routed anti-Soviet groups – Mensheviks, Social Revolutionaries, Trotskyites, Bukharinites and bourgeois-nationalists.

(...). Referring to the class struggle ... Kozhev again implies that a certain section of Soviet opinion held that since class warfare was over in the Soviet Union it need no longer claim the concentrated attention of Party theoreticians. This contention is countered by the assertion that class struggle is a permanent feature of international and Soviet life and cannot therefore be ignored. For regardless of the forms it assumes – civil war, intervention, blockade or border incidents “engineered by the Anglo-American intelligence” – the class struggle has been, is and will remain a struggle between Socialism and capitalism on an international scale. (...). In other words, says Kozhev quoting Stalin, if one end of the class struggle is operative within the framework of the USSR the other end extends into the bourgeois states that surround us.

A broadcast from Dnepropetrovsk (4 February) quotes a ZARYA editorial as saying that there is no difference between the common variety of “thieves of socialist property” and political subversives: both are “a godsend to the enemy”....

(...). KRASNOYE ZNAMYA (6 February) warns against the popular pastime of “becoming intoxicated with success” for which there is no justification since the enemies' intrigues and anti-Soviet machinations tend to intensify in proportion to “our forward movement.” Too many officials are inclined to forget that we are still surrounded by hostile countries: “They forget that capitalist surrounding is not an empty phrase but a real and unpleasant phenomenon”.... An earlier broadcast from Stanislav (3 February) says there is no point in trying to define the difference between political and other offenses against the State since they all come under the same category and their common purpose is to undermine the country's economic foundation: “the thief who steals public property ... is also [typically] a spy and a traitor”....

Alien Influence on Youth. SOTSIALISTICHESKIY DONBAS (4 February) is concerned about the serious shortcomings and “low ideological level” of studies in the Komsomol education network. With the “most mortal” enemies of the Soviet people trying to infiltrate and undermine every phase of our life, the paper says, it is of particular importance to safeguard the Soviet youths from the wicked influences of reactionary bourgeois ideology. We must use “all forms and means” of propaganda activity and mass-political work to educate in the young Soviet people “... toward the criminal American imperialism” and expose the attempts of its agents, the [imperialist-backed] bourgeois nationalists of all species who are still to be found among us. (...). The Komsomols cannot afford to “forget for a single moment” that the remnants of the exploiting classes and “all sorts of scum” ... in our country are trying to make use of our unstable elements for their nefarious aims. It is therefore the sacred duty of a Komsomol ... always “to be vigilant, to stop all idle gaping, casting and chatter.” Pursuing the vigilance theme on the next day, the same paper urges every citizen of the USSR, Communist and nonpartisan, to read all available literature dealing with foreign intelligence and espionage so that he may learn to “recognize the enemy and his subversive methods.” Highly recommended in this connection is a recently-published book by V. Minayev, “The Secret Weapon of the Doomed” ... which “exposed” American hostile activities against the USSR in the past several decades. “It is necessary to read it. It is absolutely essential for each one of us to do so!”

The items quoted below are typical of the rest of the available material on the current vigilance campaign transmitted centrally and locally:

Smolensk, 4 February – the US Government has allocated 100 million dollars for subversive, terrorist and espionage work against our country.... The revelation of Party and State secrets is a crime against the Party and is incompatible with its membership (RABOCHIY PUT editorial);

Moscow, 6 February – Anybody who indulges in such vices in private life as drunkenness, grabbing and flippant passions cannot be a reliable fighter ... all this is used by the enemies to demoralize the Komsomol and thus deprave them politically.... It is time to put an end to the harmful, fallacious view that daily life is a private affair (KOM SOMOLSKAYA PRAVDA editorial);

Kurgan, 8 February – It is imperative to educate the Soviet people in the spirit of loyalty ... and to teach them to oppose any insidious tricks of foreign intelligence and to heighten the preparedness of the Soviet people to defend the interests and honor of our Socialist fatherland (KRASNY KURGAN editorial);

Minsk, 5 February – Another fault of propaganda work is that lectures do not assume a militant character and do not expose bourgeois ideology, and in particular that of United States imperialism (ZVYAZDA editorial).

No Thy Enemy. In a lengthy review of Minayev's book “The Secret Weapon of the Doomed” published in IZVESTIA on 8 February and quoted by the Moscow radio on the same day, Petrov makes the point that to know one's enemy one must study his underhand methods of operation. Minayev's book is therefore invaluable from that point of view: it “reveals the cruel methods” ... employed by the imperialist intelligence services. American subversive activities against the USSR, according to the book, pre-date the Second World War by a number of years when Trotskyites, Bukharinites and Zinovyevites had been employed to undermine the foundation of the young Soviet Republic. Such activities are said to have become intensified during the last war with the object of “establishing secret contact with the German-fascist intelligence and the Gestapo behind the back of the Soviet Union”.... Implicit also in Minayev's book, as quoted in Petrov's review, is the attempt to associate American wartime help to the USSR (presumably lend-lease) with subversive activities. The US, it is stated, had shipped to the Soviet Union 235,000 packages of carrot, salad, pea and other vegetable seeds – all of them labelled “to the brave people of the USSR,” but in addition to the vegetable seeds they all contained also seeds of poisonous weeds which are harmful to human beings and animals.

(...). The expansion of the American intelligence in the post-war years has been particularly rapid, Minayev tells his readers, and it now comprises “over 100 thousand employees and agents”.... Spies and diversionists are said to be trained “in most of the American universities” ... including numerous specialized schools. Similar cadres are being trained, under American sponsorship, in Western Germany and Austria, Yugoslavia and Turkey. Indeed there is hardly any sphere of human activity, including the foreign embassies in Moscow, according to Minayev, that has not been affected by the insidious machinations of US intelligence. Even such organizations as UNESCO and the International Children's Emergency Fund are “utilized for the purposes” ... of American espionage. Referring to the sources of aid at the disposal of the American intelligence service, Minayev declares that the most active aid to American intelligence is offered by the Vatican and the bourgeois-nationalist Zionist organizations.

(INDICATIONS OF PSYCHOLOGICAL VULNERABILITIES, CIA, Information from: Foreign Documents or Radio Broadcasts, Date of Information: February 3, 1953 to February 9, 1953. Date Distributed: March 16, 1953, pp. 2-6) (IMG)

The vigilance campaign, the campaign to further educate the Soviet population, was also a part of the campaign of the communist faction against revisionist intellectualism, to educate the populace against liberal anti-purge influences and to promote the mentality of a socialist counter-intelligence officer among Party members. Most importantly for the context of 1952-1953, the vigilance campaign was a tactic by the Stalin faction to mobilize much more of the Soviet state personnel against the Beria gang. Not every communist loyalist in the USSR was on high alert about the threat posed by the Beria group and the killer-doctors' terror plots. Raising vigilance could reinforce the tendency by the communist loyalists to take active measures against corruption throughout the Soviet Union, hence undermining the corrupt bureaucrats that formed the class base of the Titoist faction headed by Beria.

 IMG-All-{Titoist Coup}-{The Reign of Beria}

C19S9. The Rise of the Beriaite Titoists

With the death of Stalin and some of the communist Red Army generals, the influence of the communist agents of the proletariat over the means of violence somewhat decreased while the Titoist agents of finance capital and the corrupt bureaucrats in the Soviet state apparatus could advance their agenda of further undermining the influence of the proletariat in the military and intelligence bodies, so to transition the Soviet Union away from a socialist dictatorship of the proletariat onto an anti-Soviet dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie. Lavrenti Beria was the leader of the vast network of the corrupt bureaucrats allied to Anglo-American finance capital. Stalin's death was a cause for him to rejoice:

Once Stalin was buried, the Politburo members started to swagger around. 'Now we'll put the country on its feet again.' My father was pleased because he could now implement reforms that previously had been inconceivable. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 251) (IMG)

In his memoirs, Enver Hoxha recalled how only a day after Stalin's death, the Titoists had determined their official positions for themselves in the government:

One day after Stalin's death on March 6, 1953, the Central Committee of the party, the Council of Ministers and the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR were summoned to an urgent joint meeting. On occasions of great losses, such as the death of Stalin, urgent meetings are necessary and indispensable. However, the many important changes which were announced in the press one day later, showed that this urgent meeting had been held for no other reason but . . . the sharing out of posts! Stalin had only just died, his body had not yet been placed in the hall where the final homage was to be paid, the program for the organization of paying homage and the funeral ceremony was still not worked out, the Soviet communists and the Soviet people were weeping over their great loss, while the top Soviet leadership found the time to share out the portfolios! Malenkov became premier, [and] Beria became first deputy premier and minister of internal affairs. . . . (The Khrushchevites, Enver Hoxha, Chapter 1)

Long before the death of Stalin, the Titoists had planned which position each of them will get after their joint assassination of Stalin. Either way, according to Amy Knight:

Although Khrushchev claims they did not meet to make decisions until after Stalin died, in fact the bureau of the CC Presidium – consisting of Beria, Bulganin, Voroshilov, Kaganovich, Malenkov, Pervukhin, Saburov, and Khrushchev – met during the night of 4-5 March. They decided at this meeting to do away with the enlarged CC Presidium [which Stalin fought for] reverting to the earlier practice of having only a Presidium. (Beria: Stalin's First Lieutenant, Amy Knight, pp. 180-181)

Beria was restored to his position as the head of the Soviet intelligence service. Although Beria was not officially at the highest position in the Soviet government, through his agents Malenkov and Khrushchev, Beria was able to exercise enough influence so as to be the de facto leader of the Soviet state. One has to remember that the Politburo was to make the more immediate decisions. With the death of Stalin, the Politburo was firmly dominated by authoritarian-minded Titoist assassins, who felt no need to consult the Central Committee of the Party, let alone the rest of the Party. Hence the Central Committee and other members of the Party were not going to have as much influence over the policy-making procedures for quite some time. This fact gave Beria and other autocratic Titoist assassins ample time and room to unilaterally make significant changes to the situation in the Democratic Bloc for the first few months after the death of Stalin. The Party certainly had the power to check the policies of the Kremlin Titoists, but the Party membership already was dominated by the intelligentsia and bureaucrats and hence there was little motivation – but not zero motivation – on the side of the Party membership majority to combat the Titoist assassins' policies anyways. This fact too gave Beria and other Kremlin Titoists audacity to make steps in dismantling the socialist bloc.

In its quest to undermine socialism, the Titoist Beria faction in the USSR pursued the following three main concurrent courses of action:

- (1) To Weaken the Soviet Military. The Soviet military was not so directly involved in combat worldwide, but was covertly involved in the conventional/guerilla wars in East Asia, the Middle East, and Eastern Europe. Undermining the Soviet military's covert/proxy wars in the region would have rolled back the dominant tendency, the communist tendency, in the Red Army staff, while increasing the leverage of the Titoist generals in the Red Army in their factional conflict. That is, the communist faction in the Red Army would be bogged down in the conflicts, thus having less funds for waging the secret service conflict against the Titoist generals in the Red Army, hence allowing for increased influence by the Titoist elements in the Red Army. More Titoist influence in the Red Army would mean more Titoist influence in the Soviet intelligence bodies that relied on the Red Army for their operations in the first place. More Titoist influence in the Soviet intelligence service would assist the Beria gang in its campaign to elevate the positions of the Trotskyites and Titoists.
- (2) To Elevate the Position of the Corrupt Bureaucrats in the Soviet State. As the private sector was illegal and suppressed in the USSR, the main base for the agents of fascist reaction in the USSR was the corrupt bureaucrats. The decentralization of the Soviet state apparatus would have minimized economic coordination thus allowing the corrupt bureaucrats to profit and to rise in strength. The increased influence of the corrupt bureaucrats in the Soviet state would be a counter-weight to the influence of the proletariat in the workers' state. This would assist the Titoists in their efforts towards yielding a dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie.

(3) To Link up with Anglo-American Finance Capital. The corrupt bureaucrats in the USSR were the class allies of the Anglo-American finance capital, the pro-fascist type of finance capital. Linking up with the Anglo-American finance capital via the CIA and MI6 would assist the Titoists in their efforts to hit the Red Army and the communist foes of the Titoists while elevating the corrupt bureaucrats upon whom the Titoists relied. The Titoists in the USSR did not have a military force of their own. As such, they required alien armed forces, such as the Ukrainian fascists backed by the CIA and MI6, to hit the interests of the proletariat in the Soviet military. To the Anglo-American imperialist intelligence agencies, the Titoists would provide the intelligence materials on what to hit, whereas the terror armies fighting the proxy war for the Anglo-American intelligence agencies would do the hitting. In this process, the way would be paved on the one hand for the Anglo-American finance capital to more easily colonize the countries allied to the USSR (and to eventually go after colonizing the territory of the former USSR itself), and on the other hand, the corrupt bureaucrats in the USSR would be able to more easily profit out of undermining the communist agents of the proletariat in the armed forces.

To weaken the Soviet military,:

My father who was still in charge of the military-industrial complex, put a brake on the arms programme, reducing the mass-production of tanks, guns, and aircraft. . Here too he met with strong resistance, especially from Bulganin [who at the time was encircled and coopted by the agents of the Stalin faction]. The war party [i.e. referring to Stalin faction] in the Ministry of Defence, especially the commanders of the land army, howled that this was treason, and began to hate my father. This group continued to rage after his death, and Khrushchev had to use Zhukov to combat them. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 261) (IMG)

As assistance to the CIA-MI6-backed terrorists such as the UPA, AK, Nazis, etc. Beria also sought to withdraw the Soviet Red Army forces from Eastern Europe altogether:

My father told us that he was now going to succeed in applying the policy which he had wanted to apply after the war and which Stalin had prevented: to go back to governments of coalition with the socialists [social democrats] and to withdraw our troops from Central Europe. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 264) (IMG)

Together with the plan to partition the Soviet Union, Lavrenti Beria went ahead and promoted the establishment of a Titoist-dominated 'autonomous' army for each of the Soviet Socialist Republics, so that these Titoist-dominated local armies would serve as a counter-weight to the Red Army and could duly pave the road for the partition of that country. Zhukov sympathized with Beria every single step of the way, but because Zhukov was surrounded more by the communists in the Red Army, Zhukov felt no choice but to oppose Lavrenti Beria on some questions. In any case, Beria tried to aggressively pursue his agenda:

Zhukov and my father had a dispute about territorial formations and national armies. My father thought them necessary. Zhukov replied, saying that admitting this principle would lead to the destruction of the Soviet Union. There must be only one army [in Zhukov's opinion]. At most one might tolerate a regiment that carried a Ukrainian flag, comparable to the Ukraine's Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Even that, though, he thought went too far. My father saw nothing inexpedient in authorising the creation of national guards. They would look grand at receptions for foreign heads of state. He could very well picture a Ukrainian national guard dressed in Cossack costume and carrying sabres. The police, too, he thought, should be autochthonous. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 261) (IMG)

Lavrenti Beria sought to pave the way for the partition of the USSR:

He merely wanted to move the centre of gravity from Moscow to the republics ... because he thought that the economic prosperity of the USSR would be the quickest way to independence for the republics. The Soviet federation had to be decentralized. Only defence, transport and foreign policy should remain the responsibility of the central administrations, while everything else would fall within the competence of the local authorities. The various territorial units which had been delimited arbitrarily by the Soviet power should be redrawn in conformity with ethnic criteria, but without harming economic connections. He discussed these questions fairly frankly with Khrushchev and Malenkov. Those two rascals were not so foolish as to contradict him. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 295) (IMG)

While Beria did argue that the military should remain centralized, he argued such only to make his program of decentralization appear more reasonable, because as stated above, Beria supported the decentralization of the military as well. The Ukrainian fascist separatists were the weapons of Beria in the fight against the Soviet state, the dictatorship of the proletariat. Leonid Kravchuk was the first President of Ukraine since the 1991 collapse. A staunch Ukrainian fascist separatist, he rose to power in the early 1990s 'thanks to' Gorbachev. Kravchuk was also the man whom Beria sought to put in charge of Ukraine. In fact, Beria sought to free the Ukrainian nationalist-separatists from prison, put them in charge of Ukraine, and help them 'pursue the well-being of [their] people' by separating from Titoist Russia.

The former president of the Ukraine, Kravchuk, was one of a group of young men from western Ukraine whom my father had wanted to bring forward. The machinery of repression had destroyed them, Kravchuk escaping by a miracle. In Poland, I met Ukrainian nationalists who had spent fifteen or twenty years in the camps. Our ambassador was much afraid that my meeting with these men might turn sour on me. He warned me: 'I know what you're like. Try to control yourself this time.' These Ukrainians were older than I was. Imagine elephants advancing towards one another! But these men fell into my arms. 'These people know nothing,' they told me. 'In 1953 your father summoned us to Moscow with other leaders of the nationalist movements and told us "I consider that your criticisms of the Soviet regime are fundamentally correct. Every people has the right to defend its interests within the Soviet state. I propose that you enter the government and put together a policy for the well-being of your people."' And when that happened to him which you know about, we were tortured for three months to get us to tell what he had said. But we held out, and collected fifteen extra years.' My father had spoken also of bringing back the emigres, without obliging them to become Communists. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 261) (IMG)

As can be seen, the Beria faction, whose primary base was the corrupt bureaucrats, was aiming to infiltrate the Ukrainian fascist agents of the kulaks into the socialist state.

During the Stalin era, the influence of the proletariat over the state increased, while the influence of the corrupt bureaucrats decreased. This was seen in the demotion of the corrupt bureaucrats to lower ranks of the industrial apparatus. Beria was seeking to reverse that trend:

My father thought that the middle echelon of the industrial apparatus supported him, and this was true. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 270) (IMG)

Decentralization itself not only inherently promoted bureaucracy, but also gave greater power to the middle-echelon bureaucrats – who had previously been demoted to such a lower position thanks to the constant pressures of the dictatorship of the proletariat – so that they may have their own local independent kingdoms within the industries, kingdoms engaged in mafia competition among each other rather than coordinating for the betterment of the industrial production.

Beria also wanted to privatize the USSR's light industry and construction sectors:

This time, my father was supported by [Titoist agents in the] Gosplan, by the energy-producing complex and by the arms industry. Together with Saburov he advocated releasing light industry and building work from state control. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 227) (IMG)

Concurrent with the push for the weakening of the Soviet military, the demotion of the communist generals from the Stalin faction after Stalin's death, and the elevation of corrupt bureaucrats, Beria and his Titoist henchmen actively pursued the project for a coup d'états against the Soviet state. Beria was in a rush because he knew that just less than 50% of the CPSU was made up of the blue-collar workers and the kolkhozniks, which served as an obstacle to the Titoists reliant on the intelligentsia and the bureaucrats in the CPSU. The proletarians and kolkhoz peasants served as a class base in the Party, upon whom the communists in the Red Army and intelligence bodies could rely. The anti-Soviet actions of Beria were raising the vigilance of the communists in the Soviet state, which could lead to more active measures that would slow down the pace of inevitable Titoization, a slow-down which could come with Beria's execution as well. Hence:

My father ... was in a hurry because he realized that the time he had in which to act freely was limited. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 265) (IMG)

The CIA stated:

The preparations for Beriya's usurpation of authority began immediately after the death of Stalin. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 2) (IMG)

Beria wanted to stage a military coup. He thus began his large-scale sabotage of the Soviet intelligence service, dramatically cutting down its personnel, planting his Titoist agents at the helm of the intelligence service especially regarding domestic affairs, and withdrawing Soviet intelligence agents abroad to undermine Soviet extraterritorial intelligence and special operations:

When L. P. Beriya became Minister of Internal Affairs of the Soviet Union after the merger of the MVD and MGB in 1953, he began, in accordance with resolution of the new administration to reorganize the State machinery, to cut down sharply (about 50 percent) the personnel of the Ministry of Internal Affairs (both the central administration and the provincial organs), supposedly dismissing principally old and experienced workers. Simultaneously, Beriya ordered the recall of most of the residents [resident agents] and more experienced workers from the MVD offices abroad, with the exception of the Tokyo office because of its special position. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 1) (IMG)

Sergio Beria, the son of Lavrenti Beria, confirmed:

My father counted on shaking off the MVD before the congress met, or at any rate he voiced that hope to my mother. He wanted to pass the following measures without delay: to attach intelligence and the frontier guards to the Ministry of Defence, at the head of which he would have put Zhukov, and to abolish the MVD's own armed forces. He dreamt of being able to devote himself to administering the economy, thanks to his good relations with Zhukov. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 265) (IMG)

Those whom Beria placed in power were corrupt bourgeois-nationalists and traitors to the dictatorship of the proletariat:

Many of these replacements had been arrested previously or had been removed from responsible positions because of excessive drinking, as had been the case with Pavel Yakovlevich Meshik in Ukraine. Another example was Vladimir Georgiyevich Dekanovoz, who had been released by Molotov for immoral behavior and subsequently had held a minor position in Moscow as Chief of Supplies in either VOKS [USSR's commission for inter-cultural understanding and cultural relations with foreign countries] or the World Peace Council. (...). However, Beria's replacements were either his former supporters or persons who ... could be counted upon to follow his orders.... Fadeykin ... was unsuited to his job and incapable of handling a large staff. Further dissatisfaction among the MVD workers stemmed from the fact that when the [Caucasian bourgeois-nationalist] Colonel General Bogdan Zakharovich Kobulov became First Deputy Minister, he showed preference towards the Georgians, Armenians, and other national minorities. For instance, he appointed Lieutenant General L. B. Vlodimirskiy, who had spent some time in prison, and another named Shlyuger ... who had been imprisoned for dereliction of duty. Lieutenant General Belkin was a further example of an appointee whose nationality was other than Russian. All of them were appointed to high positions and their appointments created misunderstandings and unnecessary rumours.

(The Beriya Purge, CIA, June 8, 1954, pp. 1-2) (IMG)

Beria's understanding was that because:

these replacements had been offended by their treatment under the Stalin regime [i.e. when they were purged under Stalin], they would be faithful to Beriya upon their reinstatement in positions of authority. (The Beriya Purge, CIA, June 8, 1954, pp. 1-2) (IMG)

In order to transform the Soviet intelligence service, the Titoists needed to criminalize the socialist agents responsible for the purges and to rehabilitate and decriminalize the 'victims' of the Stalin-era purges. Indeed, Beria initiated the project for which Khrushchev and Gorbachev later took credit. Beria, not Khrushchev, was the supreme rehabilitator of Trotskyism. Regarding the Stalin-era purges, including the anti-Trotskyite purges of the 1930s,:

Some time [after Stalin's death] my father drew up the instructions for the committee charged with rehabilitations. He recommended that all the trials be reviewed, including the pre-war ones, and that Trotskyism be treated as a political tendency and not as spying. Malenkov, Saburov and Pervukhin sided with him, but ... Kaganovich opposed, presenting a resolution to the effect that this would be premature. This was a problem that called for a special study. Rehabilitation commissions had to be set up, the people had to be prepared, saved from shock, and we must avoid harming the international Communist movement. On that last point my father, irritated at being blamed for 'hastiness,' replied drily that the Party and everything to gain in taking the initiative in exposing past crimes, if it wanted to be respected world-wide. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 259. Bold added) (IMG{Factional Conflict & Great Purge})

For the plot to overthrow the Soviet state in collaboration with Lavrenti Beria:
Zhukov thought that only a military coup d'état could get things going. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 267) (IMG)

Another commander associated to Beria was the notorious Pavel Artemiyev:

Besides Beriya, the following persons took part in the plot: the Commander-in-Chief of the Moscow Military District, Colonel General Pavel Artemevich Artemyev (at one time he was employed by the MVD)... Goglidze, Kobulov, Dekanozov, and Merkulov were arrested later. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 2) (IMG)

Clearly, Beria was trying to practically destroy the MVD, and install his agents at the helm, and one of his many agents was the fake 'hero' of Stalingrad, General Zhukov, the treasonous general who did nothing good for the USSR and who stole the credit for the Stalingrad victory from Vasilevsky. Ukrainian Nazis continue foolishly regard Zhukov as their enemy when in fact Zhukov was on their side.

Lavrenti Beria, as Sergo Beria recalled, wanted also 'to abolish the MVD's own armed forces.' Beria simply wanted to weaken the MVD as much as possible. Beria targeted MVD counter-intelligence, which was one of the most sensitive sectors of the security apparatus as it was the body responsible for the purges.

The CIA document also reported:

To the general surprise of the officers of the Second Chief Directorate, the former chief of Beriya's secretariat when Beriya was People's Commissar for Internal Affairs of the USSR, Lieutenant General Stefan Solomonovich Mamulov, was appointed to the post of Chief of the Second Chief Directorate of the MVD. General Mamulov belongs to the category of administrative workers; he does not have much practical experience in counterespionage or, especially, in espionage work. Mamulov's lack of practical experience reflected in a certain measure of the work of resident offices of the MVD abroad. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 2) (IMG)

While the agency of Kobulov, Kruglov, Merkulov, Dekanozov, etc. for Beria is voluminously well-documented, I have no information that Mamulov was a Beria agent per se. Perhaps that is the point. Beria faced a formidable resistance from the MVD counter-intelligence and found it difficult to plant his own agents there, and so he likely went for the second best option he had, namely the planting of less experienced enemy agents such as Mamulov so that of MVD counter-intelligence would have a weaker command.

On the other hand, Beria targeted the Malenkov agents in the Soviet intelligence. The thing that characterized Malenkov and his agents was that although they belonged to Beria's Titoist network, they were encircled by the agents of the Stalin faction; and so for the sake of their political survival, they had to cooperate with Stalin faction agents. At the same time, they had enough lobbying power not to be fully purged by Stalin faction, since the existence of Beria's agents and the fact that they pretended to oppose Beria's faction caused the Stalin faction to genuinely need them for sowing division in Beria's camp. Such a characteristic of Malenkov and his agents was the result of the campaign launched by the SMERSH and Zhdanov against Malenkov and his agents, causing the latter category to be hit so hard that they were compelled and coopted to cooperate with Stalin faction. Beria and Malenkov were close friends. However, since Malenkov was more encircled by communist or pro-communist intelligence agents than Beria was, Malenkov had to take the side of the communists on many issues. Hence, there came rumours of ideological differences between Beria and Malenkov, rumours that were technically incorrect but partially based on facts nonetheless. The CIA document again reported on this:

The preparations for Beriya's usurpation of authority began immediately after the death of Stalin. At that time there were rumors in Moscow among persons close to governmental circles, and especially among the administrative personnel of the MVD, about differences of opinion on questions of state politics which had arisen between Beriya and Malenkov. These rumors seem somewhat paradoxical because of the long and close friendly relations of these two men. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 2) (IMG)

Ignatyev, an agent of Malenkov, had cooperated with the Stalin faction's agents too much for Beria to accept. Although belonging to the Titoist network, Ignatyev was too encircled and too compromised by Stalin faction agents around him and so Beria could not rely on him. As replacement, Goglidze and Kobulov, two well-known agents of Beria who were purged by Stalin faction, were reinstated in top positions:

Beriyia reinstated in the positions of the central administration of the Ministry persons close to him, such as the Colonel General Bogdan Zakharovich Kobulov (who had been removed from the post of Deputy Minister of the MGB USSR in 1946), and others with whom he had worked in the past, including those persons who had been working with him lately in the organization of the Council of Ministers [the Committee of Information]. The chief of the MGB administration for Khabarovsk Kray, Colonel General Sergey Arsenyevich Goglidze, was ordered to Moscow and was appointed one of Beriya's deputies shortly before the removal of Semen Denisovich Ignatyev. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 1) (IMG)

the methods of work of these auditing commissions were often biased. After the arrest of Abakumov, Goglidze's authority was strengthened again. Shortly afterwards he was appointed Deputy Minister of State Security and stayed in this post after the merger of the MVD and MGB. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 6) (IMG)

Abakumov, a corrupt official and an agent of Beria, was also encircled by Stalin faction agents and thus had been compromised enough to be compelled to cooperate with Stalin faction. Again, Sergo Beria recalled:

After Stalin's death Abakumov told my father what had happened. He claimed that he had only been obeying formal orders from Stalin to complete a dossier against my father. Abakumov protested his devotion to my father and claimed to have done nothing about it. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 217) (IMG)

Beriyia removed many of these communist faction agents encircling Abakumov so that Abakumov would have a freer hand in pursuing a pro-Beriyia campaign. Beriyia also removed many of the agents encircling Ignatyev. The US intelligence document stated:

There were many changes among the personnel who remained after the dismissals in the central apparatus of the MVD. Most of the workers who occupied administrative posts under Colonel General Viktor Semenovich Abakumov and Ignatyev were dismissed. Some who were close to Abakumov and Ignatyev, especially those in the Investigation Section and in the then Second Chief Directorate (counterintelligence) of the former Ministry of State Security, were arrested. Conditions at that time in the ministry of internal affairs were reminiscent of the years of the "big purge". Responsible workers had to go through the terrible times twice – the purge carried out by Beriyia, and more severe purge organized by Malenkov after Beriyia's arrest. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 1) (IMG)

Indeed, some of the anti-Beria intelligence agents within the Soviet counter-intelligence were arrested. Beria's reign over the Soviet intelligence in 1953 boosted the torturers in the Soviet intelligence:

It frequently happened that Beriya questions personally some prisoner who was not giving the desired testimony, and in such cases he applied refined tortures, in comparison with which the horrors of the Spanish Inquisition are understood to be child's play. In confirmation of these facts, the bill of indictment stated that the investigating organs had material evidence in the form of the instruments of torture used by Beriya and found during the search of his personal belongings. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

Beria also tried to purge Molotov:

Seeing how stupidly obstinate Molotov was, my father proposed that he be replaced by Maisky at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. 'If you don't agree, you can resign. Times have changed and the spirit of the Council of Ministers must also evolve,' he told Molotov. Maisky would clear up our position in relation to the Western powers. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 265) (IMG)

Maisky had met Mossad representatives in London and had expressed sympathies with the Zionist cause in the past. Stalin is known to have maximized efforts to demote Maisky, There is nothing surprising about Maisky being a Beria agent and pro-Anglo-American.

Knowing that there were anti-Titoist plans by the communist faction, Beria tried to do in 1953 what Khrushchev succeeded in doing in 1956: to give a Titoization speech. Beria therefore decided to call for a Party congress in Georgia in order to make 'revelations' against the Stalin-era Soviet state, to purge his enemies, and to pursue his Titoization 'reforms':

My father ... was in a hurry because he realized that the time he had in which to act freely was limited. I think that he certainly had hidden motives when he proposed the calling of a congress. He wanted to get rid of his colleagues because he knew that something was being hatched against him. He foresaw that the test of strength would take place at that congress, and he prepared actively for that. He could count on the support from the leading personnel in the economy, from the scientists, from some diplomats, from the military and from the heads of the republics. (...). He intended to set forth before the delegates in the name of the country's leadership a coherent program of reforms in domestic and foreign policy. He thought that, when they had learnt the truth about past events, the congress majority would rally to him and give him their support. I remain convinced that he was not mistaken. Once his colleagues had retired he would be able to proceed legitimately with reforms. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 265) (IMG)

Beria, who had saved the Zionist agents of the American secret service, was planning to give a speech on Stalin-era 'anti-Semitism'. In that congress,:

My father ... did perhaps intend to make certain revelations. I have only indirect signs of this: some of his collaborators mentioned to me dossiers that he had entrusted to them. Before he died, my father's secretary Lyudvigov, a man of Polish origin, was able to tell me that my father had ordered him to compose a report on anti-Semitism in Russia and the world. Clearly, my father was preparing to write an article or deliver a speech on the harmfulness of anti-Semitism. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 265) (IMG)

Somewhat related to the above remark by Sergo Beria is the following quote from a CIA document:

when Beria came to power he wanted to show the people that Stalin's bloody regime had come to an end and, since he himself was half-Jewish, the policy regarding the Jews was changed. ('Committee of State Security / The Doctors' Plot and Its Reversal', CIA, September 24, 1954, p. 2) (IMG)

The Stalin-era USSR had liberated countless Yiddish people from extermination prior to, during, and after the Great Patriotic War, was waging a war against the Home Army terrorists responsible for the anti-Semitic pogroms in Poland, and was a true friend of the people of Israel. Allegations of 'anti-Semitism' are baseless slanders spread by the Jewish bourgeois-nationalist agents of the Anglo-American secret services, such as the CIA-backed or MI6-backed Zionist or Bundist currents. It was obvious that the 'anti-Semitism' label was being used by the MI6 agent Beria and his gang against the USSR, due to the communist stance against the anti-communist Zionist subversion campaign sponsored by the CIA-MI6 network. However,:

the members of the Presidium forestalled him. They knew that my father was more intelligent and stronger than they were. If he managed to carry through the reorganisation he had begun, they would become redundant. My father's mistake was to have revealed some things too soon. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 265) (IMG)

Indeed, as Sergo implied above, the pace of Titoization by Beria was so quick that Beria's true face was exposed to the MVD. This had a vigilance-raising effect in the MVD. Prior to his purge of the MVD personnel, among the MVD workers:

Beriya had enjoyed a high reputation prior to his taking over the MVD. (The Beriya Purge, CIA, June 8, 1954, p. 2) (IMG)

In fact:

When Beriya was re-appointed Minister of Internal Affairs [MVD], after Stalin's death, all MVD workers thought that the system within the MVD would be much improved. (The Beriya Purge, CIA, June 8, 1954, p. 1) (IMG)

However:

when Beriya began to remove leading officials who had served under previous ministers and to replace them with his old cronies, the opinion among MVD employees was that the best men were being released and replaced by irresponsible persons whom Beriya was drawing from the archives. (The Beriya Purge, CIA, June 8, 1954, p. 1) (IMG)

The rapid pace of the Titoization efforts by Beria had a vigilance-raising effect in the MVD, resulting in the MVD to spearhead the purges against the Beria group, with Khrushchev opportunistically joining in. Deriabin wrote:

In regard to the attempted coup, the two volumes of Khrushchev's memoirs contain nothing about Kruglov, the MVD, and their forewarning of Beria's intentions; nothing about Beria positioning MGB troops preparatory to the seizure of power; nothing about the Politburo counter-positioning Army units; nothing about the arrests of Beria's six henchmen; nothing about the intensive investigations of possible complicity by the Moscow Military District. Khrushchev would have his readers think that he was first to divine Beria's motives and that he based his suspicions on recommendations Beria made to Politburo members. The memoirs do describe Beria's arrest, but that is the most to be said for the Khrushchev version of the showdown. ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin, p. 159) (IMG)

The Beria group pursued its counter-revolutionary program with knowledge of the historical materialist fact that the benefits (for the Titoist faction) of causing material damages to the Soviet state would outweigh the costs of the ruin of the Beria group's reputation, for reputation is a lesser-material factor whereas damage to the Red Army, a colour revolution in Germany, a CIA-MI6 coup in Iran, etc. are all material factors.

It is true that lesser-material factors such as popularity can help agitate one's followers towards inflicting material damages against the enemy. However, so is it also true that popularity is best gained through material dominance (i.e. dominance over the economy, military, intelligence, etc.) and the translation of the material dominance to the ideational sector (i.e. the media, the 'popularity contest', etc.). The material strength can not only help assure dominance in the material sector, in the economy and the military, but also help to reduce the costs of financing a media and public relations (PR) campaign to rehabilitate much of one's negative public image and to make one either more popular or not so hated as to cause a popular uprising against oneself. In the context of the Titoist-communist conflict, causing material damages upon the Soviet state would reduce the backlash capabilities of the anti-Beria elements; the policies of the reactionary classes against the proletariat could never be popular among those proletarians affected by such policies but surely gaining control over the military and intelligence and then translating such control over the military and intelligence bodies towards gaining control over the media, could help mislead enough of the Soviet public to erode the strength of an anti-Beria backlash. In that respect, in pursuing the counter-revolutionary action against the Soviet state with utmost speed, Beria was pursuing a correct strategy from a Titoist viewpoint, for he was materially devastating the Soviet state at the low cost of having a negative reputation among the Soviet state personnel. That aspect of Beria's strategy was not flawed.

What, then, went strategically/tactically wrong? Why was the Beria group purged? The most important factor is that the communist faction, despite facing material damages inflicted upon them by the Beria group, still had enough material factors, such as enough of the means of violence, under its influence in order to wage a backlash against the Beria group. Beria and his team knew of plots against them by the communist faction but were kept in the dark concerning the tactical details planned by the communist faction against them. Even then, the communist tide against Beria could be countered by the Beria group not through the Beria group keeping their own reputation 'clean', but by inflicting even more material damage on the communist faction. Given that the communist faction in the Soviet Union had enough material strength to be able to purge large segments of the Beria group, what was needed was the unity and general mobilization of the communist forces in the Soviet state apparatus towards an anti-Titoist and anti-Beriaite purge. This general mobilization was brought about because the quick counter-revolutionary measures of Beria raised the alarm and vigilance among the communists. The increased vigilance allowed the communists to quickly take action, amass more anti-Beriaite agents, and to use the material capabilities under their influence to hunt down Beria and his team. Note that had the communist faction in the Soviet state not had much of the material factors under its influence, the high vigilance and the will to hunt-down Beria would not have been enough to yield an anti-Beriaite purge; from this, once again one can reaffirm that the Beriaite policy of quickly inflicting maximum damage on the Soviet state was a correct policy (from a Titoist viewpoint) even though it raised the vigilance of the Beria gang's foes. The Beria group did not really make any strategic mistakes in confrontation with the communist faction. Beria even pursued the correct strategy of preparing for an escape from the Soviet Union. The classic tactic for escaping is to set up ratlines for escape and to spread false rumours of one's death. Indeed, take for example the purge against the Slansky ring during which Jan Bojko, a prominent agent of the Slansky faction, aimed to escape to Yugoslavia by exploiting the false rumours of his 'death':

Bojko was a close collaborator of Gen. Bredich Reicin, executed during the purge of the Slansky group. Bojko, a Slovak, generally believed dead, had actually been concealed by Slansky's followers and was detected trying to reach Austria on the way to Yugoslavia with important documents.

His capture revealed a conspiracy involving the highest circles of Communist leadership and increased Soviet suspicion with regard to Czechoslovak unwillingness to purge unreliable elements. Soviet authorities have placed the responsibility on Dr. Stefan Reiss, a former Minister of Justice, a Hungarian Jew by birth, but considered a Slovak. He is a protégé of President Zapotocky. (Investigation of Czechoslovak leaders, CIA, February 15, 1954, p. 1) (IMG)

During the July attempt at hunting down Beria, the Titoist faction in the Soviet Union spread the lies about Beria's 'death' back then:

At the same time a rumour of [Lavrenti Beria's] death was put about, without official confirmation. Many people believed it. Khrushchev and his clique ... spread this rumour deliberately. . ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 271) (IMG)

Hence, there was every indication that the Titoists led by Beria had readied themselves not just for a coup against the Soviet state but also for avenues of escape in case they were to be arrested. If you cannot beat them, join them and rise to lead them so that you may mislead them. Two of Beria's own agents, Khrushchev and Malenkov, were deployed to lead – and hence mislead – the communist efforts towards a purge against the Beria faction, and to ensure the continuity of Titoist influence in case the anti-Beriaite purge succeeds. After all, Beria knew well that a plot was hatched against him:

My father ... was in a hurry because he realized that the time he had in which to act freely was limited. (...). He wanted to get rid of his colleagues because he knew that something was being hatched against him. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 265) (IMG)

It was just the case though that, naturally, Beria and his team did not know about all the tactical details of the communist plot to purge them, and thus failed to counter such a move. Beria was lured into a meeting of the Central Committee and thereupon he was arrested.

At the same time, the deployment of Khrushchev and Malenkov into the leadership of the communist camp did not just mean Beriaite influence over the communist network but also meant communist cooptation of Malenkov and Khrushchev, since infiltration into the communist camp could only come through adopting most of the aspects of the policy line pursued by the communist faction in the Soviet Union. Hence, Malenkov, with utmost reluctance, participated in the anti-Beria coup.

Anyways, the CIA document stated:

One of the variations of Malenkov's plan called for Beria's arrest at a meeting of the Central Committee of the CPSU, which was scheduled for the end of June 1953 (approximately the 26th or 27th). Malenkov, however, was not quite sure that Beria would be present at the meeting of the members of the Central Committee because he had previously several times failed to appear at such meetings and had begun to disregard Malenkov in general. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 2) (IMG)

To this end,:

All the preparations for the arrest of Beria and his accomplices were carried out [by a communist team ostensibly headed] by Malenkov in complete secrecy. Among the persons who took part in these preparations were members of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, whom Malenkov trusted completely; they were issued arms. The officers from the Chief Guard Directorate of the MVD who were on duty in the buildings of the Central Committee, the Council of Ministers, and the Kremlin were totally isolated and had no way of even guessing of the plans for the arrest of Beriya, let alone the members of the central apparatus of the MVD in general. For their part, Konev and Zhukov selected the generals and senior officers whom they trusted most and who could be relied upon in case of need. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 2) (IMG)

However, the tide had turned far too strongly against Beria for Zhukov to collaborate with Beria. Hence, Zhukov actually opportunistically joined Konev in the fight against Beria:

Marshal Konev, Zhukov and Bulganin, two guards divisions were ordered to Moscow on an urgent basis from their quarters in the Urals. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 2) (IMG)

It was expected that Malenkov would put up an armed resistance because the army leaders were on Malenkov's side. Therefore, General Aremyev ordered two divisions from the Moscow Military District to Moscow in time for the coup d'état. One of the divisions was armored. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 2) (IMG)

Some people would argue that after having eliminated Stalin, Malenkov and Khrushchev had genuinely turned against Beria, out of greed for personal power. According to this narrative, Beria, Malenkov, and Khrushchev had all allied with each other to get rid of Stalin, but turned against each other after having eliminated Stalin. This narrative, untenable empirically, is nonsense dialectically. It is contradicted empirically by the fact that in the past too, long before the death of Stalin, Khrushchev was acting against Beria even when Khrushchev was establishing closer covert bonds with Beria. Recall from C19S2 and C19S7.2 that Khrushchev had entrenched his alliance with Beria in 1951, and yet, even then, Khrushchev, having been coopted by the Stalin faction, was pursuing the purge of the Abakumov group, the henchmen of Beria in the Soviet intelligence service. Clearly, just as how well before Stalin's death, Khrushchev was an agent of Beria while pretending to be 'against' Beria, Khrushchev behaved the same way after Stalin's death. The exact same goes for the Malenkov group, which, well before Stalin's death, had been coopted by the Stalin faction against the Beria group – the Malenkov network was coopted to spearhead the Mingrelian Purge and the Leningrad Purge, both anti-Beriaite purges – even when the Malenkov group was deepening its bonds with the Beria network; and the same was done by the Malenkov group after Stalin's death. Notice, by the way, that even well after the death of Stalin, Zhukov was allied to Lavrenti Beria as Sergo Beria rightly recalled; and yet, Zhukov too opportunistically joined the anti-Beriaite tide in order to save himself from communist-led anti-Beriaite purges. The case of Malenkov's and Khrushchev's 'hostility' to their covert ally Lavrenti Beria was no different. Hence, the narrative that 'suddenly', Malenkov and Khrushchev turned 'against' Beria, out of an opportunistic greed for power, or because Stalin had died, is empirically contradicted.

Yet, it is also nonsense, dialectically. The ally of my ally is my ally. Khrushchev was allied to the Anglo-American imperialists. Beria was allied to the Anglo-American imperialists. No need to mention their long history of mutual collaboration. They represented the same class forces and were backed by the same class forces. To believe that Beria and Khrushchev would be genuinely opposed to each other is to believe in anti-dialectical superstition. Malenkov had misgivings about Beria attending the meeting of the Central Committee; such a misgiving was natural as Malenkov – coopted, closely surveiled, and compelled into anti-Beriaism by the communists – was making a move against Beria reluctantly. Thus, reported the CIA,:

In spite of Malenkov's misgivings, Beriya came to this meeting of the Central Committee. By the time Malenkov was ready to speak, all the entrances and exits of the building where the meeting was held were blocked by armed members of the Central Committee, and the MVD guards were removed from their posts. (...). During the meeting Beriya felt that something was not right and tried to leave the meeting hall, but was not permitted to do so. After Malenkov had charged Beriya with criminal anti-State activities, Zhukov and Konev personally arrested him. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

There came:

Beriya's angry protests at Malenkov's infamous injustice, then his tearful pleas for freedom, and so on. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

As the reader may recall from Molotov's memoirs, when Beria got arrested, Beria got into his begging mode. The CIA document partially corroborates this by noting the:

picture of the transformation of this man, who only a few minutes ago was a haughty and self-assured statesman, into a flabby distraught creature begging for mercy was tragic and left a very unpleasant feeling with all those who were present. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

The person leading the trial of Beria was Konev, the old comrade of Stalin:

It is characteristic that the special legal board for the trial of Beriya and his accomplices consisted basically of responsible workers of the Central Committee of the CPSU and the representatives of the armed forces. The trial was held under conditions of great secrecy, and very few persons, even from among the leaders of the MVD of the USSR, actually knew about what happened at this trial. Marshal Ivan Stepanovich Konev was appointed chairman of the trial of Beriya and his accomplices. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

Thence,:

After Beriya's arrest a thorough purge was made of the personnel of the central apparatus of the MVD, its oblast and kray administrations, and also the Ministries of Internal Affairs of the union republics, especially in Georgia and Armenia. Many of the leading workers were arrested. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 4) (IMG)

The purge of Beria indeed partially entailed the backlash of the MVD intelligence agents who belonged to the Stalin faction, against Beria and the agents whom he had planted in charge of the MVD. Indeed, after the arrest of Beria, there came about the purge of many Beria agents throughout the MVD:

The same evening the employees of the central apparatus of the MVD were ordered to destroy all pictures of Beriya. Shortly afterwards began the arrest of the leading personnel of the MVD. Malenkov appointed the special commission of the Central Committee under the chairmanship of Nikolai Nikolayevich Shatalin with the task of carrying out the general purge among the personnel of the Ministry of Internal Affairs (central administration as well as provincial branches). In other words, there began the hunting for and the destruction of Beriya's partisans – large and small. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 4) (IMG)

Many of the corrupt officials in the Soviet counter-intelligence apparatus were purged, thus allowing for a spirit of democracy within the Soviet intelligence:

as a result of the measures taken and the liquidation of the remains of “Beriyaism”, [the] system of the State Security organs became incomparably more democratic, and that the struggle against bureaucratism, bad organization, and arrogance of individual chiefs was carried on decisively, especially in the Second Chief Directorate. For example, Colonel A. M. Korotkov, who was noted for his rudeness and his contemptuous attitude toward his subordinates, became [so kind in his outwardly behaviour that he began to appear as] almost a saint as a result of these measures. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 4) (IMG)

Of course, the spirit of democracy in the Soviet counter-intelligence is not to imply the establishment of some absurd application of the ‘worker self-management’ model in the counter-intelligence. Rather, it is to mean less bureaucratic terror inside the counter-intelligence sector. Through the purge of Beria, General Konev, as the head of the remnants of the Stalin faction, also gained some increased strength in the USSR:

Marshal Konev's status has definitely risen; he has advanced from a military district commander to a deputy defense minister as revealed in April 1955 to the commander of the Soviet-Satellite combined staff in May 1955. (CAESAR 12: RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN POLITICAL STATUS OF SOVIET ARMED FORCES, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), September 20, 1955, p. A-1) (IMG{Titoist Coup})

After the purge of Beria, the Malenkov group was further weakened since the Malenkov group had extensively collaborated with Beria’s group. On the overt level, Khrushchev opposed Malenkov. The best thing about Nikita Khrushchev was that he was the stupidest one among the original clique of Titoist assassins in the Soviet leadership. A dumb renegade is always easier to contain than a smart renegade. The Stalin faction headed by Konev supported Nikita Khrushchev’s overt-level ‘opposition’ against Malenkov and thereby assisted in the demotion of Malenkov in 1954. Led by Konev, the communists in the Soviet security and purging apparatus found it easier to manage Khrushchev and thus supported his rise. Later on in 1957, Malenkov pretended to be a ‘Stalinist’ and started to oppose Nikita Khrushchev on the overt level; that was when the sympathies of the communists went towards an overt-level alliance with Malenkov’s group against the Khrushchev group.

The Beria agents had already been betraying the USSR long before their defection to the territories of the US-led bloc. However, The defection of the Beria agents

Beria was accused of being an MI6 agent, a rapist, a torturer, and a terrorist:

The crimes of Beriya and his accomplices against the State forms the main part of the bill of indictment. This part described at length the espionage Beriya did for foreign intelligence organisations and his anti-Soviet subversive activity in the sphere of Socialist construction. The statement was simply a paper with greater detail than the official announcement of the Soviet Government about the arrest of Beriya and his accomplices. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 4) (IMG)

Further, Beriya was accused of complete moral and personal corruption. In confirmation, the bill of indictment cited the fact that during the time which Beriya had lived in Moscow (since 1938) he had seduced a great number of Moscow girls (the statement indicated “over two hundred”). Many pages of the indictment were devoted to Beriya’s romantic adventures; (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

After the sentence of Beriya and his group had been carried out, the main headquarters of the MVD had read at closed Party meetings the bill of indictment of Beriya’s group. From the time spent in reading this bill of indictment (about five hours), one can judge the quantity of sins which these persons were accused. In particular, Beriya was accused of inhuman cruelties and animal sadism with regard to individual persons arrested by State Security organs. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

The above excerpts do not mention that Beria was accused of being an MI6 agent but the reader can research for themselves on this; it is well-known that Beria was officially accused of being an MI6 agent, a supporter of separatist terror groups, and a supporter of MI6 satellite states.

One of the other henchmen of Lavrenti Beria purged was Viktor Abakumov. However, as a part of the communist faction's compromise with the Khrushchev-Malenkov group, one of the official 'reasons' given for the execution of Abakumov was that he caused the Leningrad purge. That is, the officially stated argument and 'reason' for the purge of Abakumov was partially wrong, but the real behind-the-scene reason, which was Abakumov's service to Beria, was correct. The same goes for some of the accusations against Beria for the latter supposedly being the willing enforcer of every ‘murderous’ policy line of Stalin. The real reason for the purge was concerning his treasonous intelligence activities for Anglo-American intelligence services, but he was blamed by the Khrushchev group for some of the correct policies of the Stalin era anyways.

C19S10. Deepening Links with the CIA-MI6  IMG-All-{The Reign of Beria}

Knowing that the MI6 agent Beria and his Titoist henchmen had conquered the pinnacles of power, Churchill took initiative in expanding relations with the USSR, as a channel for extended intelligence penetration, which could assist the Beria faction further in its Titoization efforts. The Americans too were acutely aware of the Titoization in the USSR and the changes coming about, although not as aware as the British. Christian Ostermann, a leading intelligence official from the CIA front think tank Wilson Center, wrote:

Delicately balancing hardline skepticism with a more conciliatory approach toward the post-Stalin leadership in Moscow, Eisenhower’s “Chance for Peace” speech of April 16, 1953 cautiously made any détente in U.S.-Soviet relations contingent upon Kremlin concessions such as free elections in Eastern Europe or the signing of an Austrian peace treaty.

It was British Prime Minister Winston Churchill, who, though initially rather dubious about a Soviet change of heart, was more willing to explore potential opportunities which seemed possible with the change of leadership, thus breaking with the skeptical and reserved reception which Moscow’s peace offensive had met in the West. On April 20, Churchill not only backed the U.S. “initiative” but also indicated that he favored high-level talks with the new Soviet leadership. Following the Pravda article of April 25, which had signaled Russian willingness for talks on Germany, the British Prime Minister, in a speech in Parliament on May 16, boldly called for a “conference on the highest level [...] between the leading powers without delay,” holding out the possibility of “a generation of peace.” In going well beyond Eisenhower’s “deeds, not words” approach, Churchill was primarily motivated by his belief that a negotiated settlement was necessary to prevent nuclear war and that the new Soviet leadership was amenable to personal diplomacy. Moreover, the prime minister felt that the West could now negotiate from a position of strength and that Eisenhower was thus also ready for negotiations.

(‘The United States and the East German Uprising of 1953, and the Limits of Rollback’, Wilson Center, Christian F. Ostermann (Director), December 1994, p. 12) (IMG)

After the arrest and purge of Beria, Beria's agents fled to the countries dominated by the imperialist camp and they provided plenty of intelligence to the Anglo-Americans. A US intelligence official admitted:

Much CIA information, direct from Moscow, comes from Russians who served under the liquidated Beria and defect to our side, pouring out secrets [to us] (THE MYSTERIOUS DOINGS OF THE CIA: America's Secret Agents: Part Two, The Saturday Evening Post, Richard Harkness, Gladys Harkness, November 6, 1954, p. 66. In: CIA archives) (IMG{GDR})

C19S11. Deepening Ties with the UDB  IMG-All-{The Reign of Beria}

Beria aimed to force the USSR to bow to Titoist Yugoslavia:

My father's second project in the sphere of foreign policy was to bring about reconciliation with Tito's Yugoslavia. He pointed out to his colleagues that Tito had not joined the Atlantic alliance in spite of the extremely difficult situation his country was in. He had held out. The USSR ought, therefore, as soon as possible, to admit the wrong it and the Cominform had done, and reveal the whole truth on that affair. (Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 263) (IMG)

He sent a letter to Rankovic, offering him the chance for a secret meeting:

Beria's second effort focused on Yugoslavia. He was about to send a secret emissary to Belgrade to offer Yugoslav Prime Minister Alexander Rankovic a secret meeting, and, ultimately, the restoration of friendly relations. Again, this step, if taken, would have meant a major revision of the Stalin-Molotov line in foreign policy. Earlier in the spring, the Presidium (on Beria's initiative?) had quietly decided to stop the "hate-Tito" campaign.... (The Cold War: Cold War Espionage and Spying, Vol. 4, Lori Lyn Bogle, p. 22) (IMG)

In the letter to Rankovic, Beria requested:

a secret meeting with Rankovich and Tito to normalize relations between the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia. (Beria: Stalin's First Lieutenant, Amy Knight, p. 206) (IMG)

The person who was to carry that letter to Rankovic and Tito on Beria's behalf was Colonel Fedoseyev who was later arrested for the same reason:

Several days after Beriya's arrest, Party meetings were held in each administration of the Ministry of Internal Affairs on orders from the Central Committee. These meetings bore the usual character expressions of indignation towards the "enemy of the people" and self-flagellation for the lack of the required political and "Chekist" alertness. Usually at such meetings some scapegoats are found for sins which until then have been known to no one, and secret enemies of the Soviet regime are "denounced". This is what also happened at the meeting of the workers of the Second Chief Directorate. One of the speakers declared as the chief of a department, a specialist in intelligence, Colonel Fedoseyev, was a partisan of Beriya and that he should be handed over to the investigating organs. According to the speaker, Beriya personally was training Colonel Fedoseyev for a trip to Yugoslavia, where he was to conduct some kind of very important negotiations on state affairs with Marshall Tito. In proof of his words, the speaker added that a personal letter addressed to Tito was found in Beriya's private safe, and that it was this letter that Colonel Fedoseyev was to deliver to Tito. Fedoseyev most categorically denied the accusations; however, he was later arrested. (BERIYA PURGE, CIA, May 28, 1954, p. 4) (IMG)

However,:

This initiative was never undertaken. Beria was arrested on 26 June and the question of his undercover approach to Tito was one of the many charges brought against him. At the 2-7 July Plenum of the Soviet Communist Party Molotov made clear that ... Beria had gone too far by referring to 'Comrade Tito and Comrade Rankovic; dropping talk of Yugoslavia as a fascist state and restoring 'bourgeois' relations was all that was being sought. Faithful to the rhetoric of the past, Molotov referred to 'Tito and his band', and he even hinted that Beria had been interested in following Tito's path by creating some sort of popular front organisation within the Soviet Union which would have operated alongside the Communist Party. (Tito: A Biography, Geoffrey Swain, p. 110) (IMG)

Beria's letter was:

held as proof that Beria was, in Molotov's words, an "agent of the class enemy." (Beria: Stalin's First Lieutenant, Amy Knight, p. 206) (IMG)

Although the improvement of relations with Tito's Regime was not a good idea, Molotov, as a remnant of the communist faction, at least to sought to block the Titoization of the Soviet Union.

The CIA spy Deriabin wrote:

Beria offered assurances to Czechoslovakia that the USSR would not continue to interfere in Czech internal affairs, and he wrote a personal letter to Marshal Tito apologizing for the manner in which Stalin had treated him. The MGB officer who would carry the letter to Tito showed it to me. The final sentence said, "Let us cast the past aside and look ahead to the resumption of diplomatic relations between our two nations." ('Inside Stalin's Kremlin: an eyewitness account of brutality, duplicity, and intrigue', Petr Deriabin) (IMG)

C19S12. Zionists Rehabilitated – 1953

The Anglo-American Zionist agents and killer-doctors involved in the deaths of Zhdanov and Shcherbakov were rehabilitated by Beria:

In a memorandum to the Presidium dated 1 April 1953, Beria detailed to his colleagues the falsifications and tortures in the 'Doctors' Plot' arguing that it was necessary to 'fully rehabilitate and immediately release all detained doctors and members of their families'. Thus on 4 April 1953, Pravda published a decree from the Ministry of Interior announcing that the defendants were 'fully rehabilitated as to the accusations of sabotage, terrorism and espionage brought against them, and ... released from detention'. With these words, 'rehabilitation' made its appearance in the Soviet public parlance. (De-Stalinizing Eastern Europe, Kevin McDermott, Matthew Stibbe, Marc Elie, p. 28) (IMG)

At that time a statement was published to the effect that the Jews had been acquitted. Of course Ryumin and Timashuk were blamed for everything. ('Committee of State Security / The Doctors' Plot and Its Reversal', CIA, September 24, 1954, p. 2) (IMG)

The Stalin-era USSR pursued the correct policy of seeking friendship with the people of Israel, but the Ben-Gurion regime, a terror state in service to Anglo-American imperialism, agitated anti-Soviet propaganda deliberately for the purpose of terror incitement against the Soviets. This terror incitement culminated in the bombing of the Soviet Embassy in Tel Aviv by Shabak-backed 'Kingdom of Israel' terrorists, consequently the breaking of Soviet diplomatic relations with the regime of Israel, despite the Soviet state's continued rightful recognition of Israel as a state. As a stab in the back of the Soviet diplomatic corps, the Beria group re-established diplomatic relations between the USSR and Israel:

The 20 July announcement that the USSR and Israel have agreed to resume diplomatic relations, broken off 12 February after the bombing of the Soviet legation in Tel Aviv, is the logical culmination of Moscow's reversal of the anti-Zionist campaign which was vigorously pressed during the last months of Stalin's life. Chapter 20

C20S1. The Colour Revolution in East Germany – June 1953  IMG-All-{GDR }

As previously demonstrated in C15S9, the German Democratic Republic, faced with the problems of agriculture, embarked upon a program of gradually collectivizing its agriculture, emphasizing the voluntary process of joining kolkhoz, and actually demonstrated success in this regard. Nonetheless, the East Germans were not so fortunate by the end of 1952, since unfavorable weather conditions yet again hit East Germany, alongside Poland and Czechoslovakia. The following is an excerpt of a document by the CIA's Office of Research and Reports regarding this matter:

A. Northern Area (Poland, East Germany, and Czechoslovakia)

In the northern area of the European Satellites the fall of 1952 was characterized by above-normal precipitation, with the result that fall plowing and sowing of grains for harvest in 1953 were considerably hampered. Despite the fact that spring plowing and sowing were aided by favorable weather over most of the area, it is believed that the over-all acreage of bread grain will be less than prewar, because of failure to fulfill the fall sowing plans for winter wheat and rye.

Available weather information and reports from the American Embassy in Moscow indicate that cold and lack of rain characterized the spring much of Poland, although more abundant rainfall appears to have occurred in June. Favorable conditions for spring work were reported in East Germany and Czechoslovakia. Rainfall appears to have been gradually adequate to abundant in the late spring and summer months, and in July heavy rains were reported to have caused harvesting difficulties for grain and cultivation difficulties for root and vegetable crops.

(‘CROP CONDITIONS IN THE SOVIET BLOC, 1953 (RR IM-379)’, CIA, Office of Research and Reports, September 23, 1953, p. 4) (IMG)

Another CIA document, while spreading the usual propaganda against the communists, nonetheless acknowledged that there was a poor crop year in Germany at the time:

The "new course" in East Germany, first outlined on 9 June 1953, followed a 12-month period of intense effort to communize the country rapidly. On top of an overly ambitious 5 -year plan (goals of which had been advanced one to two years in many cases) and a high level of reparations, was imposed a rapid remilitarization program and a poor crop year. The impossibility of fulfilling these combined tasks was obvious.... Through the end of May, Party leaders, in vituperative and uncompromising speeches, emphasized rapid socialization of the GDR, describing this as the means by which German unity would be accomplished. (Economic Characteristics of the New Course in the USSR and East Europe, CIA, September 29, 1953, p. 7) (IMG)

The unfavorable weather caused food shortages in East Germany, which was something that gave the Moscow Titoists an opportunity to pursue their pro-Nazi agenda against the German Democratic Republic. As confirmed by Lavrenti's son Sergo Beria, Lavrenti Beria had a pro-imperialist agenda on Germany:

My father [Beria] would have liked to form two blocs, uniting the neutral countries of Central and Eastern Europe – one around Poland, the other around Dimitrov's Bulgaria and Tito's Yugoslavia. In his mind this arrangement should be completed by a unified and non-socialist Germany. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 196) (IMG)

Hence in late December of 1952, when the agriculture of East Germany was already being damaged by the unfavorable weather, Beria met with some of Nazi Germany's officials, including Erwin Respondek and Joseph Wirth. This fact was reported to the CIA by Wirth:

Dr. Joseph Wirth, a former German chancellor, claims that he saw Lavrenti Beria in Berlin-Karlshorst in December 1952. The arrangements for the meeting were made by Dr. Erwin Respondek, formerly of the German Foreign Service, who was also present at the interview.

Wirth alleges that he has been asked to take over an important post in a new East German government which, he was told, will be established soon. He was told by Beria that the Russians are planning a new policy toward Germany, and was asked to collaborate in it. (Meeting between Wirth and Beria, CIA, July 7, 1953, p. 1) (IMG)

Erwin Respondek had been a high-ranking Nazi German official who had spied for the Americans, as shown in C10S4. With Respondek was Wirth. As a leading member of the German 'Centre Party', Joseph Wirth had officially supported the Enabling Act, the act which was to give the Nazi leaders the tyrannical powers they obtained after the Reichstag Fire. Wirth and others voted along the Nazis in its favor:

What little resistance there remained among Center Party parliamentarians to the Enabling Act dissipated, leading even Bruning and like-minded Catholic politicians such as Joseph Wirth to fall into line and vote with the Hitler government. (Soldier of Christ: The Life of Pope Pius XII, Robert A. Ventresca, p. 79) (IMG)

As can be seen, a new policy by Beria had begun with regards to East Germany. The conquest of power and the assassination of Stalin by Beria and the Titoist faction created new opportunities for Beria in the plot to overthrow the government of East Germany. Upon seizing power in March 1953, the Titoist faction in the Soviet Union drafted new documents dictating for the reversal of socialization. Against the pressure of the Titoist faction in Moscow, the SED refused to pursue the reversal of the socialization, but inevitably unable to confront the Moscow-based Titoists with utmost vigour, the SED drafted a document that called for a slowdown of socialization and some reforms. The Moscow-based Titoists were furious and Beria began to insult Ulbricht for drafting a document of mere slowdown reforms in response, as opposed to the complete reversal of the socialization course undertaken. Christian Ostermann, a leading official and scholar of the CIA's front think tank Wilson Center, wrote:

According to the memoirs of SED Politburo member Rudolf Herrnstadt, the editor of the party organ Neues Deutschland, the SED leaders had to take quite a beating as all of the Soviet comrades rejected the superficial draft. Beria displayed particular aggressiveness, allegedly throwing the documents at Ulbricht across the table with the words: "This is a bad remake of our document!"

The Soviet leaders acknowledged that "we all have made mistakes" and that the recommendations were not meant as "accusations," but insisted that "everything has to be based on a change in the conditions in the G.D.R." Demanding that the SED leaders should "not worry about [their] prestige," Malenkov warned that "if we don't correct [the political line] now, a catastrophe will happen." The Soviet leaders appealed to the Germans to "correct fast and vigorously."

("This Is Not A Politburo, But A Madhouse": The Post-Stalin Succession Struggle, Soviet Deutschlandpolitik and the SED: New Evidence from Russian, German, and Hungarian Archives, COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT, Bulletin 10, Christian F. Ostermann, p. 66) (IMG)

Had the communist faction maintained dominance over the Politburo, the USSR would have rendered generous assistance to the East Germans against the poor agricultural conditions, much as how the USSR did this to Czechoslovakia in 1949-1951 (see C15S8). However, the Titoist bullies were in power, and hence aid to communists was not coming. The East Germans were, in the words of a book published by the Harvard University Press,:

Unable to obtain aid from the Soviet Union.... (From Nazism to Communism: German Schoolteachers Under Two Dictatorships, Harvard University Press, Charles B. Lansing, 2010, p. 207) (IMG)

On the one hand, the communist workers' faction of the SED, headed by Ulbricht, was isolated by the Kremlin Titoists, and the East German People's Democracy was defunded. On the other hand, the Kremlin Titoists continued to assist the Titoist and Kautskyite elements of the SED. Indeed, one of Beria's top agents in East Germany was Zaisser, who supported the handing over of East Germany to West Germany:

In so far as Beria is concerned, there is evidence that Stalin's erstwhile henchman strongly advocated a moderate economic policy for all of Eastern Europe in order to stabilize Central Europe and head off West German rearmament. He supported a group within the East German leadership led by Minister for State Security Zaisser. Zaisser ... called for a remodeling of the Socialist Unity Party into an all-German labor party and for negotiations on reunification, on the assumption that it was impossible to build Socialism in a divided country. (SOVIET POLICY TOWARD GERMANY, 1952-1954, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 31, 1963, p. 6) (IMG)

The call for the reversal of socialization and the westward strategic reorientation of Germany by the Moscow Titoists also helped the Kautskyite SPD grouping in the SED, which during the Stalin era had been reduced to a minority dominated by the communist workers' faction. In the newly arising conditions, the Kautskyites gained the upper hand and the power of Grotewohl – the representative of the German SPD contingent of the SED – and the SPD contingent in general was boosted against the communist workers' faction within the SED led by Ulbricht:

In East Germany, US officials were quick to notice in the days following Stalin's death that Walter Ulbricht was taking special pains to straighten out his record. His 8 March policy statement, published in the East German press prior to Malenkov's funeral oration, attributed to Stalin's guidance policies that Ulbricht had long espoused. At the same time at a late March meeting of the Soviet Control Commission [headed by Semenev] Grotewohl had criticized the SED Central Committee and, indirectly, Ulbricht for failure to meet successfully the problems of reparations, refugees and consumer goods shortages. The relative mildness of East German reaction to West German Bundestag ratification of the EDC and the contractual agreements was taken at the time as a possible indication that Ulbricht's strong policies were less acceptable than they had been previously. (GERMANY, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), July 16, 1953, p. 1) (IMG)

Beria's goal with regards to all of the Peoples' Democracies was to promote the Kautskyite ('socialist') elements in some of the popular fronts at the expense of the communists:

My father told us that he was now going to succeed in applying the policy which he had wanted to apply after the war and which Stalin had prevented: to go back to governments of coalition with the socialists and to withdraw our troops from Central Europe. (Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 264) (IMG)

When the Grotewohl faction's influence increased,:

The East Germans recently invited the West German Socialist Party to send a commission to East Germany to cooperate with the Socialist Unity Party. (CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), March 20, 1953, p. 6) (IMG)

Thus, West German imperialist agents who called themselves "social democrats" were invited into East Germany. Against this set-up, later on,:

On 5 May Ulbricht continued his hard line when he bitterly denounced the West German Socialists as traitors to the working class despite their opposition to the Bonn and Paris treaties. Ulbricht's propaganda tactic of basing the unity campaign on the ... thesis that an increasingly communized East Germany would become more attractive to West Germans demonstrated an inflexibility inconsistent with the emphasis being given to the German unity campaign in statements emanating from Moscow. (GERMANY, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), July 16, 1953, p. 2) (IMG)

In the meantime, in the absence of Soviet aid, and the constant lobbying of the Kremlin Titoists, the best response for East Germany was to strengthen itself against imperialists on the one hand and Titoist stabs in the back on the other hand. East Germany needed its economy improved so to alleviate the economic problems resultant from a lack of Soviet aid on the one hand and the poor harvest and natural weather problems, and to strengthen the influence of communists over the state in the face of imperialist and Titoist pressures. Thus, it was necessary to end the artificially low work norms which had reduced productivity. As such, the norms were increased by 10%. A book published by the Harvard University Press stated:

Aware that previous attempts at raising the traditionally low work norms by means of collective work agreements had failed, East German officials unleashed a massive campaign to introduce what they called "technically determined work norms," culminating in May 1953 with the state decreeing a 10 percent increase in the workers' quotas. Since many workers relied on the bonuses that came with the regular overfulfillment of artificially low work norms, the announced increase represented a potential 25 to 30 percent cut in real wages. (From Nazism to Communism: German Schoolteachers Under Two Dictatorships, Harvard University Press, Charles B. Lansing, 2010, p. 207) (IMG)

As confirmed by Helene Seppain of the CIA's Wilson Center, Semenev was a Beria agent:

A Malenkov-Beria man, Semyonov saw his task as keeping a reunified Germany disarmed. (Contrasting US and German Attitudes to Soviet Trade, 1917-91: Politics by Economic Means, Helene Seppain (former Wilson Center scholar), 1992, p. 108) (IMG)

As a top representative of the Moscow Titoists, Semenev was a key agent bringing the Titoist 'New Course' and conspiring to undermine Ulbricht and his communist workers' faction in the SED:

We now know that Semenev returned to East Berlin with a "new course." Moscow was prepared to sacrifice Ulbricht, or at least downgrade him.... ('SOVIET POLICY TOWARD GERMANY, 1952-1954', CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 31, 1963, p. 5) (IMG)

The stab in the back of the East German communists by the Kremlin Titoists helped the renegades in the SED to step up their comprador bourgeois 'criticism' of the socialization and collectivization policies of East Germany, while blaming these matters on Ulbricht's supposed 'dictatorial style':

Grotewohl's notes of the June 2-4 Kremlin meetings do not reflect any personal criticism of Ulbricht, who had stood for the accelerated socialization program. Following their return to Berlin on June 5, however, discussion within the SED Politburo of how and when to publicize the New Course document quickly turned into criticism of Ulbricht's dictatorial leadership style. During SED Politburo meetings on June 6 and 9, fellow Politburo members vented their dissatisfaction with Ulbricht's personality cult and management of the Secretariat. ('"This Is Not A Politburo, But A Madhouse": The Post-Stalin Succession Struggle, Soviet Deutschlandpolitik and the SED: New Evidence from Russian, German, and Hungarian Archives', COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT, Bulletin 10, Christian F. Ostermann, p. 66) (IMG)

Now to be sure, the right to criticize and express opinions is something that all communists should support, and so, the fact that these renegades had the legal right to criticize in the democratic centralism manner is a good thing, but their 'criticism' itself was baseless and anti-scientific.

In this counter-revolutionary ritual of advancing Kremlin Titoist interests through 'criticism':

Semenev, who had returned with the SED delegation from Moscow and participated in the sessions, seemed increasingly inclined to support Ulbricht's critics. ('"This Is Not A Politburo, But A Madhouse": The Post-Stalin Succession Struggle, Soviet Deutschlandpolitik and the SED: New Evidence from Russian, German, and Hungarian Archives', COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT, Bulletin 10, Christian F. Ostermann, p. 66) (IMG)

Finally:

The Politburo finally decided to draw up a comprehensive statement on "the self-criticism of the work of the Politburo and the Secretariat" which would be presented to the CPSU Central Committee Presidium. It also resolved to set up a commission, composed of Ulbricht, State Security chief Wilhelm Zaisser, Oelßner, Herrstadt, and Berlin SED boss Hans Jendretzky, to "prepare an organizational reform of the working methods of the Politburo and Secretariat." ('"This Is Not A Politburo, But A Madhouse": The Post-Stalin Succession Struggle, Soviet Deutschlandpolitik and the SED: New Evidence from Russian, German, and Hungarian Archives', COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT, Bulletin 10, Christian F. Ostermann, p. 66) (IMG)

So much for the supposedly 'democratic' mindset of the Titoist assassins at the helm of the CPSU, the East German leaders were ordered to reverse course, and to swiftly impose this New Course on the rest of the Party from above. The communists in SED leadership opposed such a dictatorial behavior but there was so little they could do in the face of the much-mightier Moscow-based Titoist bullies who held many more strings than they did:

Most Politburo members agreed that the announcement of the New Course program warranted careful preparation of the party and the population at large, but Semenev urged speedy implementation of Moscow's instructions. When, on the evening of June 10, Herrstadt pleaded with Semenev to give the SED two week's time to prepare the policy change, the High Commissioner insisted that "the communiqué has to be in the paper tomorrow, warning the Neues Deutschland editor that "you may not have a state for much longer." Heeding Semenev's order, the Politburo announced the "New Course" liberalization program in Neues Deutschland on June 11. As expected by Herrstadt and others, the communiqué with its frank admission of past mistakes came as a surprise to many in and out of the party. Reports from local party organizations, carefully monitored by the SED headquarters in Berlin indicated with great candor the widespread disappointment, disbelief, confusion and shock within party ranks as well as the populace. To many, the communiqué signaled the SED's final bankruptcy and the beginning of its demise. Party members felt betrayed and "panicky".... ('"This Is Not A Politburo, But A Madhouse": The Post-Stalin Succession Struggle, Soviet Deutschlandpolitik and the SED: New Evidence from Russian, German, and Hungarian Archives', COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT, Bulletin 10, Christian F. Ostermann, p. 67) (IMG)

The Kremlin Titoists were forcing this Titoist New Course, as a means of capitulating to the US-led bloc of Atlantic powers:

The decisions of the Political Bureau of the SED and the government order of 11 June 1953, in which the change of course was made definite, unquestionably followed as a result of Semenev's directions. Semenev wanted to get rid of the obstacles to an understanding with the West, which obstacles were, in his opinion, obvious enough. (CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 5) (IMG)

Crucially, the New Course imposed by Kremlin Titoists was to sabotage East German industrial reconstruction and rearmament efforts through the shift of emphasis away from heavy industry onto light industry, and hence through the de-emphasis of the development of the industrial backbone to the society and military. This new policy line would have of course also prevented the expansion of the working class base in East Germany, hence weakening communist influence there. According to Ostermann, an intelligence report to the Kruglov (a Beria agent) stated that almost everyone in the SED Politburo, foremost among them Ulbricht himself, opposed the shift away from heavy industry to the consumer goods sector:

A recently declassified report to the USSR Minister of Internal Affairs [and Beria agent] S. Kruglov by the KGB deputy resident in Berlin, Ivan Fadeikin, throws new light on the events within the SED Politburo. In a June 30 conversation with Soviet officials, the GDR Minister of Trade and Supply Curt Wach reported on the opposition which the New Course instructions from Moscow, particularly the shift of resources from the heavy to consumer goods industries, had encountered within the SED Politburo on June 9. Just about everybody seemed to oppose a plan tabled by the Minister of Machine Construction, Hermann Rau according to which 1.3 billion marks would be reallocated to light industries. Key members of the SED leadership — Rau himself, Wilhelm Leuschner, Chairman of the State Planning Commission, Fritz Selbmann, Minister for the Ore-Mining Industry, Fred Oelßner, Anton Ackermann — opposed the plan to cut back on heavy industry. According to Wach, Ulbricht most vehemently spoke out against the plan, arguing that "[w]e cannot free up such resources. Rau's plan disorganizes the national economy, and our economy is already disorganized as it is." ('"This Is Not A Politburo, But A Madhouse": The Post-Stalin Succession Struggle, Soviet Deutschlandpolitik and the SED: New Evidence from Russian, German, and Hungarian Archives', COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT, Bulletin 10, Christian F. Ostermann, p. 66) (IMG)

Nonetheless, with the pressure of Semenev and other Kremlin Titoists, this policy was enforced for the time being:

If the 9 June SED course of action is implemented, as indicated by Grotewohl on 21 June, the East German quest for economic self-sufficiency, premised on build-up heavy industry at expense consumer goods production, in effect has been scrapped. This bound to shift weight of importance from industrial proletariat to farmers and consumer goods producers entailing serious weakening SED influence in its role as vanguard industrial proletariat. This in turn tends weaken Soviet hold over east zone populace. (CIA BERLIN ANALYSIS OF UPRISING IN EAST GERMANY, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), No. 4511, July 8, 1953, p. 3) (IMG)

With the blessing of the Moscow Titoists, the Kautskyite renegade from the Second International, Grotewohl, took steps to promote the Evangelical Church, the infamously CIA-backed church that promoted an anti-Semitic neoconservative Christian Zionist messianist vision of the world:

On 10 June 1953 there was a statement by the representatives of the Soviet Zone, with Prime Minister Grotewohl at their head, during the course of a conversation with Bishop Dibelius and five bishops from the Soviet Zone of the Evangelical Church, that all measures hostile to the church in the Soviet Zone Republic would be adjusted, they declared themselves ready to guarantee the independence of church affairs according to the provisions of the constitution. (...). The agreement with the Evangelical bishops of the Soviet Zone, looking to the abandonment of the attack on the churches which had taken place the day before, was expressly confirmed. (CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 3) (IMG)

Then,:

The "new course" which Semenov had commenced was put into effect by a series of further measures by the Soviet administration. (CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 4) (IMG)

In order to undermine East Germany's military defenses, one of the first measures undertaken by the Moscow Titoist agents in East Germany was to impose the end of the paramilitary training in the 'Society for Sport and Technique', as part of the program to capitulate to the West:

The paramilitary GST-training (GST = Gesellschaft für Sport und Technik) was stopped at once. On 17 June 1953 it was arranged that, when resumed, this training was to proceed only in accord with certain special measures. The decision not to continue the GST-training, in the form hitherto used, was announced in instructions for agitators on 8 and 11 June 1953. It was further stated that the relaxation of tension now appearing in the realm of higher politics must not be disturbed by any false steps of a militant-political nature. This decision was emphasized in the report of a dissolution at the district headquarters of the GST on 12 June 1953. (CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 4) (IMG)

And:

All work in the construction project at Ruegen harbor was stopped on 11 June 1953, on orders of the Ministerial Council of the Soviet Zone. The continuation of security work at the projects under construction was to be closed down until 31 August 1953. Only a temporary halt in the work seemed to be involved, however. (CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 4) (IMG)

The KVP, which was a military force recruiting predominantly out of the Nazi German POWs in the USSR, was an unreliable institution but could nonetheless be useful in the transfer of military knowledge and expertise to the communists in East Germany. Under the New Course, however, the transfer of military knowledge to East German communists from these former Nazi German POWs ceased:

The change in course by the Soviet Zone administration in the first half of June 1953 ... also affected the Volkspolizei in various ways:

a) Limitation of the buildings of the KVP.

b) Breaking off of the military training of 18 to 30 year old members of the SED and FDJ, already being carried out by the KVP.

(CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 21) (IMG)

While the defense, security apparatus, and economy of East Germany was being systematically undermined by the Beria agent Semenev and other Moscow Titoist agents assisting him, the SED also lost prestige as a result of the New Course. Thus, some SED members:

called for Ulbricht's resignation. Many thought the SED retreat from crash socialization resulted from pressure by the West German government under Konrad Adenauer and the Western powers, evidenced by such reports as the one from the small town of Seehausen where "the entire village is in the bar, drinking to the health of Adenauer." To make matters worse, the only segment of the population which seemed to have been excluded from the New Course liberalization were — paradoxically — the workers: the raised work norms arbitrarily imposed on May 28 remained in force. Labor dissatisfaction was further fueled when the SED regime, groping to maintain its authority, confirmed the controversial norm increases on June 13. ("This Is Not A Politburo, But A Madhouse": The Post-Stalin Succession Struggle, Soviet Deutschlandpolitik and the SED: New Evidence from Russian, German, and Hungarian Archives', COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT, Bulletin 10, Christian F. Ostermann, p. 67) (IMG)

In terms of the psychological warfare, therefore, on the one hand the SED had retreated in the face of the comprador bourgeois ideology, and on the other hand, the workers were to work for higher norms, norms which surely were justified economically, but which were used as excuse for launching a colour revolution.

The American intelligence service definitely had a hand in promoting this colour revolution. Colour revolutions are launched obviously not through paying every single protester to come into the streets, but rather through constant propaganda work and psychological warfare, which serves as the arousal factor driving some of the ordinary individuals into the streets to clash with the People's Democracy.

The economic situation in the neighbouring Peoples' Democracies was not so dissimilar to that of East Germany. Poland and Czechoslovakia faced trouble in their agriculture due to the unfavorable weather conditions, as noted by the CIA. Yet, in spite of this fact, the colour revolution occurred in East Germany, but not in other People's Democracies at the time. Indeed, the CIA admitted that the belief that large-scale protests were simultaneously occurring in other Peoples' Democracies is groundless:

Western reports of large-scale demonstrations in Poland as an aftermath of the East German riots are denied by US embassy officials in Warsaw. They report that the situation is calm in Warsaw, and they noted no evidence of demonstrations or increased security precautions during the trips through, central, northern and southwestern Poland in late June.

Similarly, reports of strikes and demonstrations throughout the other Satellites are unconfirmed and probably untrue.

(NSC Briefing: EAST GERMANY, CIA/NSC, July 8, 1953, p. 10) (IMG)

While there were rumours that in Poland there was unrest as well,:

US embassy in Warsaw denied unrest and martial law in Poland. (CHRONOLOGY OF RECENT EVENTS IN THE SOVIET ORBIT, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), July 14, 1953, p. 4) (IMG)

Why did the protests happen in East Germany at the time and not in other places?

It is indeed the case that in East Germany, a large percentage of the German workers had a high level of respect for communism. Indeed, on the esteem for communism among the German workers, the US intelligence had reported:

The esteem for Communism among the German workers rose considerably during the Spanish Civil War – a crucial period in Europe; it declined sharply during the German-Russian non-aggression pact, and climbed steeply with the decline of Germany's military fortunes on her Eastern Front. (THE FREE GERMANY MANIFESTO AND THE GERMAN PEOPLE, Office of Strategic Services (OSS), Branch of Research and Analysis (R&A#1033), Europe-Africa Division, Psychological Warfare Subdivision, Central European Section, August 6, 1943, p. 19) (IMG{Soviet Intelligence in Nazi Germany})

The 'Hitlerite majority' in Germany was primarily concentrated in and emanating from the agrarian petit-bourgeois areas, located mainly in southern Germany, unlike in north German, which was industrialized, proletarianized, and historically a zone of anti-Hitlerite uprisings such as the Stennes rebellion (see C10S7). Hitler's lieutenant, Hermann Rauschning, recalled:

Hitler's nature was incomprehensible to the North German. (Hitler Speaks, Hermann Rauschning, 1939, p. 165) (IMG{Soviet Intelligence in Nazi Germany})

East Germany, located to the northeast of Germany, was proletarian-populated territory alien to Hitlerism. Furthermore, the German proletarians were immensely satisfied with the conditions in which they lived, as late as November 12, 1952 in East Germany:

There is much satisfaction with improvement in living standards, the greater range of goods offered, and the somewhat easier work tempo. A great number of special privileges are given to the working intellectuals, to labor heroes and master peasants, and the prizes or orders these person get are accompanied by material, cultural, and educational privileges. The great number of vacation homes for these elite and their children were mentioned most approvingly, and the division of the population into the followers of the regime, enjoying these privileges, and the others, the loafers and idlers has been very well adapted to German mentality. A point of pride is the new housing projects in East Berlin, especially the Stalinalle. All new apartments will be reserved for the elite, and this is an attractive form of social pressure. (SED and East German Communist Views on Unification, CIA, November 12, 1952, p. 2) (IMG)

All of this then begs the question: why the colour revolution in East Germany at the time? Had the colour revolution encompassed the entirety, majority, or even just slightly less than 50% of the East German working class, the colour revolution would have been far more widespread, far mightier, and far more difficult to put an end to. The colour revolution clearly was not such, and, considering the pro-communist attitudes of a significantly large percentage of the German proletarians, it is clear that the colour revolutionary uprising did not recruit as large of a mass of the German proletarians as the Anglo-American media has claimed. Nonetheless, inevitably, a certain percentage of the German workers, immensely influenced by the propaganda of the Hitlerian years, continued to retain their militantly anti-Soviet views and were very easy to agitate into colour revolutionary action against the People's Democratic state of East Germany. Any kind of a shock, be it economic or political, had the potential for sparking protests by them, although naturally, the economic shocks were more effective for agitation among the workers. The sudden decline of the East German economy in the year 1953 as a result of the poor weather conditions coupled with the backstabbing of the Moscow Titoists severely deteriorated the German economy enough to spark some protests.

The protests would not have expanded into major riots, unless with the propaganda and agitation of the CIA-MI6 media outlets. Several documents prove that the colour revolution was instigated by the propaganda and intelligence apparatus of the Anglo-American imperialists. A major CIA document confirmed that the colour revolutionary workers were 'summoned by the West' into the streets, The US intelligence document stated:

The main factor was the body of workers of the Soviet Zone, free from bourgeois struggles for security but driven to the limit. Summoned by the West and emerging for the first time from their eight-year submission to a system of organized isolation, they became aware of their revolutionary strength, though occasionally overestimating the real possibilities in changed mood. (CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 23) (IMG)

The psychological and media warfare operation for spreading the riots to outside of Berlin so to bog down Red Army troops outside Berlin, was done by the 'Radio in the American Sector' (Rundfunk im Amerikanischen Sektor – RIAS). Describing the establishment of the RIAS, the US State Department stated:

RIAS, the official radio station of the Office of the United States High Commissioner for Germany, was established to provide a mass medium of expression for the democratic West in Berlin and the Soviet Zone.

In the fall of 1945, when it became apparent at the outset of quadripartite relations that the Soviets would not relinquish unilateral control of Radio Berlin, the Americans decided to establish their own radio service. This service went into operation on February 7, 1946....

(RIAS [Radio in American Sector] Berlin, US State Department, 1953, p. 2) (IMG)

US intelligence agent and prominent Wilson Center scholar Christian Osterman admitted that the RIAS was instrumental on spreading the riots:

RIAS' broadcasts were instrumental in quickly spreading the riots from Berlin to more remote areas of the GDR.... ("Keeping the Pot Simmering": The United States and the East German Uprising of 1953', Christian F. Ostermann (National Security Archive, Washington), German Studies Review, Vol. 19, No. 1 (February 1996), Published By: The Johns Hopkins University Press, p. 66) (IMG)

RIAS was located in West Germany and West Berlin. The Anglo-American intelligence presence in Berlin no doubt assisted the propaganda process. In an abbreviated report, the CIA/NSC reported that West Berlin served as a secure base of Anglo-American and West German intelligence services, provided a safe haven for anti-GDR elements, and kept up the 'resistance' spirit of the populations:

Spontaneity [of the] uprising [is] not detracting from essential role played by West Berlin, symbol free society, offering sanctuary to persecuted, secure base [of] allied and German information and cold war agencies. Uprisings vindicate US and British policy hold on to Berlin even at risk [of] World War III and tribute to foresightedness [of] those who persisted [in] keeping alive resistance spirit [of the] east zone populace by all methods short of direct intervention. (CIA BERLIN ANALYSIS OF UPRISING IN EAST GERMANY, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), No. 4511, July 8, 1953, p. 4) (IMG)

All of these points made in the above CIA/NSC quote would seem too trivial to need to be mentioned, since Anglo-American intelligence and propaganda presence and activity against East Germany was a constant factor anyways. However, there is more to the story behind the above quote, than may at first appear. The other US intelligence document provided more precise details as to how West Berlin kept up the 'resistance spirit' and provided a hub for counter-revolutionaries. The intelligence document not only reaffirmed the crucial role played by RIAS in fomenting the colour revolution, but also stated that 'strike commandos' moved to Berlin to gain access to the riot's leadership center:

Spread of the Revolt in the Zone:

[N]ews of the beginning of the disturbances in East Berlin had already reached all cities in the Soviet Zone on 16 June 1953. On one side they were quickly spread everywhere by RIAS and other Western Zone radio stations, on the other side by railroad men, chauffeurs, and travelers. In many cities, the news from East Berlin led to immediate preparations for strikes and demonstrations, on 17 June 1953. In the Leuna-Werke, strike commandos decided to go to Berlin and share the demonstrations there. They supposed – as did many other demonstrating groups – that there was a central direction in Berlin guiding the revolt in the whole zone. The Leuna workers wanted to get in touch with this center. On 17 June 1953, however, they were prevented from going farther on their way through the Soviet troops. (CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 12) (IMG)

There was indeed leadership shown by CIA operatives in carrying out further labour unrest and sabotaging East German industry. One of the most important American mainstream news media outlets was 'The Saturday Evening Post', journalists of which interviewed anonymous top CIA officials and congressional intelligence committee staff. A US intelligence official interviewed made a very important remark in 1954 regarding the intelligence activity of the CIA:

Q[uestion]: Does CIA co-operate with anti-communist resistance and freedom movements in the satellite countries and in nations threatened by Red subversion?

A[nsWER]: Besides its spy network and the open CIA function of research, the agency operates a superclandestine third force – the top-secret activity of aiding and abetting freedom forces where the patriotism of captive peoples may be fanned from a spark into action.

In one satellite, where factory workers were grousing about Red pay cuts and stepped-up norms, an agent trained in the technique of labor organizations promoted work slowdowns.

(THE MYSTERIOUS DOINGS OF THE CIA: America's Secret Agents: Part Two, The Saturday Evening Post, Richard Harkness, Gladys Harkness, November 6, 1954, p. 67. In: CIA archives) (IMG{GDR})

Until November 1954, at least, there was clearly only one so-called 'satellite' that had an uprising by 'factory workers' against 'Red pay cuts and stepped-up norms', and that was the German Democratic Republic. Without naming East Germany, the CIA official above is admitting that the CIA 'promoted work slowdowns' in East Germany, which shows that the high level of organization in the June 1953 colour revolution was no coincidence, but was the work of the US intelligence.

The uprising furthermore was admitted by the CIA's Office of Current Intelligence (OCI) to have seemingly had good leadership by experienced tacticians:

local uprising in some instances said to have shown remarkable degree organization, suggesting ad hoc leadership by experienced tacticians and good mass discipline. (CIA BERLIN ANALYSIS OF UPRISING IN EAST GERMANY, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), No. 4511, July 8, 1953, p. 2) (IMG)

The above pieces of evidence fully confirm the role played by RIAS in fomenting the colour revolution, and the Atlantic camp in 'summoning' the colour revolutionaries into the streets. The documents almost confirm - but not fully confirm - that there were operatives on the ground, in the field, in East Germany leading the sabotage and worker unrest.

While the reader may be tempted to assume that the colour revolution was launched directly for the purpose of the immediate collapse of the East German government, this assumption is not correct. This colour revolution in fact was launched for the purpose not of immediately yielding the full and thorough collapse of the incumbent government, but for the purpose of gathering the mass force which rolls back the dominant faction, the progressive faction, of the Red Army and the East German government while elevating the Titoist agents fascism inside the German government so that these Titoist agents would be able to more smoothly pursue their Titoization agenda. The American intelligence and propaganda apparatus, through fomenting such a colour revolutionary uprising was creating the required 'pressure from below' with which to give the Titoists in the USSR and East Germany greater leverage in forcing upon the communist faction the advancement of even more Titoist reforms. This is why the Kremlin Titoists, recognizing the importance of the CIA colour revolution objectives, supported the colour revolutionary protests. The class interests of the Titoists representing the bureaucrats, the kulaks, and the comprador mercantile capital were fully aligned with the class interests of Anglo-American finance capital, for they all were waging a class war against the proletariat and the kolkhoz peasantry.

No doubt the right to criticize is a democratic right to be cherished by communists, but Semenev's 'Soviet High Commission' was trying to utilize the criticism in the form of demonstrations as a pressure from below with which to undermine the previous 'course of the government and the SED', hence to promote the revisionist New Course. Referring to the attitude of Semenev's 'Soviet High Commission' towards the demonstrations, the CIA confirmed:

the Soviet High Commission ... was inclined to a demonstrative criticism of the previous course of the government and the SED, which was to be reoriented on the "people's opinion." (CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 11) (IMG)

Semenev was of course an agent of Beria and Beria was an agent of Britain and Israel, hence it being natural for them to support a CIA colour revolution that could impose from below the Titoist 'New Course' on SED.

To provoke violent riots, it was also strategically necessary for the Titoists to give the colour revolution the martyrs it needed for the latter to gain the excuse for violence of epic proportions. The savagery and liberality shown by the KVP, a military and security institution controlled by the Beria agent Zaisser was in line with this objective. The KVP, which was formed by the Nazi German POWs in Soviet camps and was under the direct legal and political control of Zaisser's Interior Ministry, was naturally a highly unreliable institute filled with diversionaries. David Childs – the fellow at the Royal Society of Art and the history scholar who won awards from the German foreign ministry for his research on East Germany – wrote:

the KVP was under the command of ... Wilhelm Zaisser and Heinz Hoffmann. Both had served in the International Brigades in Spain....

('The GDR (RLE: German Politics): Moscow's German Ally', David Childs, 2015, p. 271) (IMG)

The diversionary and pro-imperialist saboteurial character of Zaisser's KVP is exposed in the fact that on the one hand, Zaisser's KVP terrorized protesters 'recklessly', thereby provoking more riots, and on the other hand, showed huge leniency towards the riots through outright desertions once the riots were provoked into existence. The CIA reported:

Information regarding [the KVP] runs all the way from desertion to reckless firing. The reports that have come in strongly suggest that the KVP could not be relied upon in case of internal trouble, at least not to the degree of the Soviet authorities. (CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 23) (IMG)

The pincer assault of the KVP's rogues against the socialist forces was a reflection of the Beria-Zaisser network's strategy of combat against People's Democratic Germany. The policy of simultaneously (1) sowing terror for provoking colour revolutions and (2) liberality towards colour revolutions in East Germany was the strategy masterminded in this case by Beria. On the one hand, Beria, through Semenev, was imposing upon the East Germans liberality towards reaction. He used Zaisser to this end:

In so far as Beria is concerned, there is evidence that Stalin's erstwhile henchman strongly advocated a moderate economic policy for all of Eastern Europe in order to stabilize Central Europe and head off West German rearmament. He supported a group within the East German leadership led by Minister for State Security Zaisser. Zaisser ... called for a remodeling of the Socialist Unity Party into an all-German labor party and for negotiations on reunification, on the assumption that it was impossible to build Socialism in a divided country. ('SOVIET POLICY TOWARD GERMANY, 1952-1954', CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 31, 1963, p. 6) (IMG)

On the other hand, that same 'liberal' Beria was promoting an extremely vicious 'crackdown' on the protesters, so to provoke more riots. Molotov recalled in his memoirs:

Let the Germans rise up against us?! Everything would have turned shaky, the imperialists would have taken action. There would have been a total collapse.

As soon as reports of the events in the GDR started to come in, Beria was among the first to say, "We must act! Unhesitatingly! Ruthlessly! Most urgently!"

(Molotov Remembers, Interviewer: Feliks Chuev, Interviewee: V. Molotov, p. 380) (IMG)

In these conditions, the violent riots quickly spread, with terror attacks targeting and shaking the foundation of East Germany's security. The following are only some of the many examples provided by US intelligence regarding violent riots in different East German cities:

f) Goerlitz: Prison seized by demonstrators. Prisoners freed. Burgomaster thrown out of his office.

g) Jena: The building of the SSD was demolished by rioters and attacked by the crowd. Political prisoners were freed, documents burned.

h) Quedlinburg: Demonstrations began as early as 6 a.m. on 17 June 1953. SSD building in Breitscheidstrasse seized, documents destroyed. District police station occupied. Police commandos disarmed and locked in the cellars. House of the DFB (Demokratischer Frauenbund) and the House of Freedom taken. One Soviet officer and two Soviet soldiers disarmed by the crowd and thrown out of the windows. All three probably killed. Soviet measures of retaliation and numerous arrests.

i) Rathenow: Starting point of demonstrations on 17 June 1953 was the Optical Works. The SED offices were occupied by rioters, documents burned. SSD official Hagedorn killed by the mob.

j) Rosslau: Assault on the prison by demonstrators. One hundred eighty prisoners freed.

k) Rostock-Warnemunde: Revolt of the workmen in Rostock in the Dieselmotor Works (VEB) in Rostock on 17 June 1953. Numerous machines rendered useless, fire in several workshops. Damage to equipment about 500,000 DM, according to estimate. Resumption of production will not be possible for three to four weeks. VoPo assault units stoned.

(CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 16) (IMG)

In some cities there were encounters quite as serious as those in East Berlin. The demonstrators did not confine themselves to processions and fights with the SED and the VoPo, but stormed administration buildings, SED-Centrals, police stations, prisons, and jails. In many places houses and documents were burned. In several cases VoPos and SED members, especially officials of the SSD, were killed.

(CHRONOLOGY AND ORDER OF BATTLE IN SOVIET ZONE/JUNE 1953 UPRISING, CIA, December 14, 1953, p. 13) (IMG)

Through the launching of these terrorist attacks on the East German military, security, intelligence, police, etc. units, the rioters furthered the agenda of the Kremlin Titoists, namely to weaken the East German defenses and security to render it easier to be devoured by West Germany. The colour revolutionary stab from the front against East Germany was to accompany the Moscow Titoist stab from the back.

The vast series of the counter-revolutionary policies pursued by the Beria group had a vigilance-raising effect on the Soviet counter-intelligence and military personnel. Beria, who had a positive reputation among many Soviet state personnel, was by then despised by many of the same personnel, as mentioned before. Hence, the vigilance-raising effect led to the quick counter-measures by the communist faction in the Soviet intelligence and military bodies. In response to the disaster in East Germany,:

the Soviet leaders allied themselves against Beria in Moscow. Beria's "radical notions" evidently were made known to the Communist bloc elite soon after his fall. ('SOVIET POLICY TOWARD GERMANY, 1952-1954', CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 31, 1963, p. 6) (IMG)

Had Beria's ally Khrushchev sided with Beria at this point, Khrushchev would have fallen with Beria soon. Knowing this, Khrushchev decided to overtly take a stance against his covert friend. Thus:

Khrushchev and Ulbricht have since accused Beria and Malenkov of advocating in early 1953 a policy which they charge would have led to abandonment of East Germany. ('SOVIET POLICY TOWARD GERMANY, 1952-1954', CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 31, 1963, p. 6) (IMG)

In this new situation, in East Germany, some of the Beriaites were cracked down upon:

After Beria's downfall the remaining Soviet leaders moved to restore Ulbricht's primacy in East Germany. Ulbricht pounced on Beria's proteges in his party, accusing them of treachery to the party and its program. At the 15th SED central committee plenum in July 1953, he publicly linked Beria with Zaisser and his clique; The Soviet leadership renewed its endorsement of Ulbricht during an August 1953 visit to Moscow. ('SOVIET POLICY TOWARD GERMANY, 1952-1954', CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 31, 1963, p. 6) (IMG)

Facing the new Titoist tide in the bloc, and the defunding done by the Kremlin Titoists, Walter Ulbricht decided to lobby for the reduction in East German reparations payments. Already, when the June 1953 debates were going on, Ulbricht advocated the reduction in reparations, but was not able to go very far with reducing the reparations payment:

With the GDR lacking sufficient resources, Ulbricht instead favored a different approach. Shifting the burden to the Soviets, who after all, had decreed the policy shift, he argued that “we should turn to the Soviet government with the request that they lower the reparations payments.” A fellow Politburo member succinctly pointed to the thought that must have been on everybody’s mind: the only way “to get out of this catastrophic situation and improve our position” was for the Soviet Union to “[render] us the same help that the USA is giving Western Germany through the Marshall Plan.” As Wach recounted, “[n]o one reacted to this statement.” (““This Is Not A Politburo, But A Madhouse””: The Post-Stalin Succession Struggle, Soviet Deutschlandpolitik and the SED: New Evidence from Russian, German, and Hungarian Archives’, COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT, Bulletin 10, Christian F. Ostermann, pp. 66-67) (IMG)

However, with the downfall of Beria and his group, the East German communists were able to lobby for aid. Walter Ulbricht knew how to counter-bully the Titoist assassins in the Kremlin into a less incorrect line, and into partially supporting East Germany. As confirmed by the CIA, Ulbricht in particular knew:

much about lobbying in Moscow to frustrate undesirable developments. (THE IMPLICATIONS OF ULBRICHT'S RETIREMENT FOR EAST GERMANY: INTELLIGENCE MEMORANDUM, No. 1687/71, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, May 4, 1971, p. 3) (IMG)

Enver Hoxha described Ulbricht as a ‘haughty stiff-necked German’ who knew how to counter-bully the Moscow Titoist bullies into assisting East Germany against the Anglo-American imperialists:

Ulbricht ... was a haughty, stiff-necked German, not only with small parties like ours, but also with the others. He had this opinion about relations with the Soviets: “You have occupied us, you have stripped us of industry, but now you must supply us with big credits and food, so that Democratic Germany will build up and reach the level of the German Federal Republic.” He demanded such credits arrogantly and he got them. He forced Khrushchev to say in a joint meeting: “We must assist Germany so that it becomes our show-case to the West.” And Ulbricht did not hesitate to tell the Soviets in our presence: “You must speed up your aid because there is bureaucracy.” “Where is the bureaucracy,” asked Mikoyan “in your country?” “No, not at all in our country but in yours,” replied Ulbricht. (The Khrushchevites, Enver Hoxha)

C20S2. Austria  IMG-All-{GDR}{Hungary}

It was necessary that the US-aligned Nazi-friendly Austrian regime would be deprived as much as possible from the useful industrial equipment. As such, the Soviets duly deprived Austria from the equipment. According to the Hague Convention and according to the Yalta agreement, the USSR had a right to seize Nazi Germany’s military-industrial assets as part of reparations and war booty. The Soviets had two main strategies for the assets seized: (1) develop those industrial assets and use them to generate goods and services to be imported into the USSR as part of reparations, and then, upon receiving the reparations, hand over those assets back to the respective countries in which those assets had existed; (2) strip the industrial assets and take them into the USSR. The Stalin-era USSR pursued strategy 1 for the countries in which popular-democratic order had greater potential for establishment or in which People’s Democratic system had already been established, since by eventually turning over those assets to the Peoples’ Democracies, the USSR could help in the industrial development of those states; the Stalin-era USSR pursued strategy 2 for the countries in which, owing to high Anglo-American intelligence and military presence, there was little chance for People’s Democratic development at the time, and so much the better if those countries get deprived of their industrial assets. Referring to Stalin-era Soviet policy in Austria, the CIA referred to the case:

of Soviet plants in Austria where USIA plants had been almost completely stripped of all useful equipment following World War II. (SOVIET ECONOMIC ENTERPRISES IN HUNGARY, CIA, May 27, 1955 / June 21, 1955, p. 4) (IMG)

By depriving Austria from those industrial plants, the Soviet Union was not conducting economic terrorism against the Austrian proletarians, and was not ruining their lives. The plants which the Austrian reactionaries had under their control were used for producing armaments to sponsor terrorists who cross-border infiltrated and had the blood of many proletarians on their hands. Better deprive the Austrian regime from such plants; better to deprive the state sponsor of terror from the industrial means of exporting terror.

With the rise of the Titoist faction onto power, Soviet policy changed, and there came about an effort to promote the military-industrial development of countries under Anglo-American intelligence and military influence. The USIA (abbreviation for ‘Directorate of Soviet Assets in Austria’) as such never regained its prewar capacity, and only after the treasonous Titoist gang of Khrushchev seized power in the Kremlin in March 1953 did some physical capital arrive, as part of the Moscow Titoists’ efforts to fund to the CIA-backed pro-Nazi Austrian terror regime:

This dismantled equipment had been shipped by the USSR and USIA plants never regained their prewar capacity even though the USSR did install some modern equipment and started a belated drive to rebuild these plants in 1954. (SOVIET ECONOMIC ENTERPRISES IN HUNGARY, CIA, May 27, 1955 / June 21, 1955, p. 4) (IMG)

East Germany and the other Peoples’ democracies had their heavy industries de-funded by the Kremlin Titoists, whereas Austrian industry was to grow.

C20S3. Hungary – 1953  IMG-All-{GDR}{Hungary}

Christian F. Ostermann, a prominent official in the US intelligence front think tank Wilson Center, wrote:

The June 2-4 talks with the East German leaders have to be viewed against the background of a larger effort by the post-Stalin Soviet leadership to halt and mitigate some of the worst excesses of Stalinist rule in East Central Europe. Similar talks, which, in each case, resulted in the announcement of a “New Course” program were held with the Hungarian leadership (13-16 June 1953) and the Albanian leader Enver Hoxha later that month. The transcript of the Soviet-Hungarian talks on June 13-16, are instructive for several reasons: Much fuller than the fragmentary Grotewohl notes, the transcript of the Soviet-Hungarian meeting is striking for its similarities: as in the German case, the discussion focused on the “audacious” industrialization and socialization drive and the abuses of power (especially by the security police), though cadre questions received considerable attention, too. As before with the East Germans, the Soviet leaders “urgently” demanded changes and warned that “a catastrophe will occur if we do not improve the situation.” Once again, Malenkov and Beria were harshest and most “passionate” in their criticism, though Molotov and Bulganin did not lag behind. Unlike the earlier talks with the German leaders, however, Soviet criticism was vented primarily at premier and party chief Matyas Rakosi, the leading proponent of Stalinist rule in Hungary. Criticism of Rakosi’s rule, his personal involvement in most political issues, and his “personality cult” quickly produced changes within the leadership: within days of their return from Moscow, Rakosi resigned from the premiership which was given to the agrarian specialist Imre Nagy (though Rakosi stayed on as party leader). (“‘This Is Not A Politburo, But A Madhouse’: The Post-Stalin Succession Struggle, Soviet Deutschlandpolitik and the SED: New Evidence from Russian, German, and Hungarian Archives’, COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT, Bulletin 10, Christian F. Ostermann, p. 66) (IMG)

Sergo Beria confirmed that Lavrenti Beria despised Matyas Rakosi:

Another he could not endure was [PCF leader] Jacques Duclos, who reminded him of Rakosi: ‘reptiles,’ he called them. (Beria: Inside Stalin’s Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 196) (IMG)

Liquidationist in line, Beria called for the dissolution of the Party within the Popular Front and the resignation of Rakosi:

my father told Rakosi that the Party must no longer interfere in the economy and that domination of the Council of Ministers by the Party ought long ago to have been ended in the Soviet Union and, a fortiori, in the People’s Democracies. ‘Busy yourselves with ideology and the education of the masses if you want to stay in politics in spite of your health problems. But you would do better to resign,’ he said. (Beria: Inside Stalin’s Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 264) (IMG)

The Titoist faction in the Soviet Union led by the gang of Lavrenti Beria elevated the Nagy faction:

‘You were wrong, there are no irreplaceable people,’ my father had shot back. Rakosi therefore had to submit to the decision of the Presidium by which he was to devote himself to ideology, leaving the government to Imre Nagy. (Beria: Inside Stalin’s Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 264) (IMG)

Imre Nagy, the MI6 agent and official leader of the Hungarian colour revolution of 1956, was also a Beria agent:

I well remember the Hungarians Nagy, Kadar and Rajk. They were Communists but they understood that Communism could not sit on bayonets in their country. Some agreed with the idea of a coalition with the Social Democrats, which would have allowed them to get close to Austria. My father was very friendly with Imre Nagy. He had been evacuated to Georgia during the war and had enjoyed his stay! It is said that he had behaved badly when he was in the Comintern. I never heard my father say anything about that. He simply told me that Nagy was one of the people on whom he could rely in carrying out his plans. (‘Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin’s Kremlin’, Sergo Beria, p. 197) (IMG)

Beria indeed installed Nagy as the leader of Hungary in 1953. He was able to do so because in Hungary, the communists had not been able to consolidate influence and there had not been enough purges of counter-revolutionaries. The blue-collar elements did not have as much state control, and Hungary’s economy remained largely agrarian, meaning that there did not exist a large class of proletariat. In countries with a large peasant population and a small blue-collar worker population, it was usually easier to oust the ‘Stalinist’ leaders.

In 1953, Hungary began the ‘New Course’ which involved economic liberalization and the release of CIA-backed fascists including Janos Kadar, about whom more details will be provided later:

The proclamation of the New Course with Imre Nagy as premier in the summer of 1953 brought new personalities to the fore and instituted liberalized policies in agriculture and industry at the expense of doctrinaire Communists who had profited from earlier economic policies. Violent opposition from these elements was silenced by Rakosi; apparently on Moscow’s orders, and the new policies enforced. During the summer of 1954, Nagy emerged as a genuine leader backed by the majority of the central committee. But Nagy’s resort to extraparty mechanisms to gain popular and his encouragement of unrestrained criticism of regime policies drove Rakosi to seek the support of the Kremlin against Nagy. Meanwhile, the liberation of Janos Kadar and other imprisoned Communists strengthened party moderate forces against the former leadership. (FACTIONALISM IN THE HUNGARIAN WORKERS (COMMUNIST) PARTY (1945-1956), CIA, January 28, 1957, p. II) (IMG)

By helping Titoist agent Imre Nagy to rise to power, Beria got Hungary on the road to the fascist terror that was to come about in 1956.

C20S4. Beriaite Conspiracies in Poland  IMG-All-{Poland}

The effects of the Beria gang’s Titoist New Course were to be seen in People’s Democratic Poland too. The brutal Beria gang placed heavy pressure on People’s Democratic Poland to prevent the purge of Spychalski, the former Gestapo spy, who had become an American-Israeli agent by 1946 and a British agent by 1947, and who had sought to launch an MI6-backed Titoist military coup in Poland to install Gomulka onto power. The CIA reported:

Bierut was in Moscow prior to Beria’s arrest and Beria instructed the Poles to keep the case of Bishop Kaczmarek in suspension and not to conduct a public trial. Beria wanted Kaczmarek released from jail pending further developments. Beria was also of the opinion that the Spychalski trial should also be delayed but that Spychalski was to be kept in prison. Bierut was called to Moscow approximately three to four days before the publication of the information that Beria was under arrest. (...). Bierut returned to Moscow after the arrest of Beria and at this time Malenkov and other Soviet officials told Bierut that Beria’s plans concerning Polish trials were not realistic. Bierut received instructions that the trial of Bishop Kaczmarek should be conducted as soon as possible and that preparations should be made for the trial of Spychalski. C20S5. Khrushchev and Moscow Titoists Rehabilitate Nazi German Troops – 1954-1956  IMG-All-{Gulag}

Why does the Western media hail Nikita Khrushchev as a ‘liberator’? It is because he and his Titoist henchmen ‘liberated’ Axis troops and fascist gangs from the corrective labour camps, allowing them to commit their savage crimes within Soviet territory.

From 1953 onwards, the guards were allowed to fraternize with the pro-American fascist criminals, which, not surprisingly, emboldened these criminals:

The guards escorting the prisoners often would strike up a conversation and chat with the prisoners, and tried to maintain an almost friendly relationship. From that time on the prisoners often went as far as to be rude to the guards.... The criminals would shout: “Wait until the Americans come – we’ll hang you all!” (‘1. FORCED LABOR CAMPS IN THE USSR 2. TRANSFER OF PRISONERS BETWEEN CAMPS 3. DECREES ON RELEASE FROM FORCED LABOR 4. ATTITUDE OF SOVIET PRISON OFFICIALS TOWARD SUSPECTS 1945 TO THE END OF 1955’, CIA, February 11, 1957, p. 3) (IMG)

Worse yet, numerous pro-American fascist criminals were released by the MI6 agent Khrushchev's Titoist gang, allowing them to commit more crimes in the USSR. The US intelligence reported:

The 1953 amnesty was for ordinary criminals. Approximately one-half per cent of the prisoners in Ozerlag were released. Up to 70% of the prisoners in Angarlag were released. They were released in one grand sweep, in approximately one week. Within the next three months the majority of them were rearrested for crimes which they had newly committed and returned to Angarlag. ('1. FORCED LABOR CAMPS IN THE USSR 2. TRANSFER OF PRISONERS BETWEEN CAMPS 3. DECREES ON RELEASE FROM FORCED LABOR 4. ATTITUDE OF SOVIET PRISON OFFICIALS TOWARD SUSPECTS 1945 TO THE END OF 1955', CIA, February 11, 1957, p. 2) (IMG)

The Titoist faction led by the Beria-Malenkov-Khrushchev group brought about the freedom of criminals, who were by then able to re-commit criminals out in the open. This, however, was by no means the worst of it. In fact, British agent Khrushchev and his Titoist gang released from jail 1.5 million Nazi/Axis troops.

Within the context of international agreements and Soviet laws, many Axis / Nazi German POWs were repatriated by the USSR back to their respective countries. This implementation of this policy well preceded the assassination of Stalin, and well preceded the 19th CPSU congress. The repatriation policy of the USSR, however, did not mean that the Axis troops that had committed crimes were not to be tried. Indeed, they were tried to terms of corrective labour for between 5 to 10 years. The Titoist ruling clique in the Kremlin presented a fundamentally revisionist and pro-fascist misinterpretation of the repatriation policy, taking it to mean that Nazi German troops in general have to be released from jail as swiftly as possible. The CIA reported:

Following World War II, a large but unknown number of foreign nationals became prisoners of war in the USSR. These prisoners came from virtually every country of Europe, the Middle East, and the Far East, and estimates of their total have ranged from a few hundred thousand to several million: It has also been estimated that "anything up to 10 percent" of all prisoners in about 1950 were foreign nationals. As noted previously, beginning about 1950, large numbers of these prisoners of war (particularly Germans) were tried under Soviet criminal laws and sentenced to terms of corrective labor, usually of 5 to 10 years, for various crimes against the state. Although substantial numbers of prisoners of war had been released before the death of Stalin, the USSR has been pursuing since 1953 a systematic policy of freeing foreign nationals from the prison camps. Numerous returned prisoners report evidence of this policy.... According to these returnees, a concerted effort was made beginning in 1953-54 to collect prisoners of a given nationality in special camps preparatory to repatriation, a process which took many months in most cases and even several years in some instances. (FORCED LABOR IN THE USSR 1953-57, CIA, Office of Research and Reports, September 12, 1958, pp. 22-23. Bold added) (IMG)

The CIA also noted that Kudriatsev, a major official at the time, admitted that massive swathes of those jailed were released since March 1953:

The Soviet Deputy Procurator General, P.I. Kudriatsev, intimated that about 3 million persons had been under detention in the USSR in March 1953, almost half of whom were political prisoners, but that at that time (May 1957) only about 800,000 or 900,000 persons were imprisoned, of whom about 18,000 were political prisoners. Kudriatsev also stated that the number of prisoners had been reduced by 70 percent since the death of Stalin, that 52 percent of those detained at that time were released as a result of the amnesty of 27 March 1953, that more than half of those then (presumably in May 1957) serving sentences had been sentenced after March 1953, and that the number of prisoners then was less than in the 1920's and less than one-third of the number in prerevolutionary Russia. These are the first figures ever released by Soviet officials concerning the prison population and, in light of current agitation among Soviet jurists for the release of crime statistics, suggest that the USSR may be preparing to issue official statistics concerning crime rates and the criminal population. (FORCED LABOR IN THE USSR 1953-57, CIA, Office of Research and Reports, September 12, 1958, p. 22) (IMG)

The CIA specifically pointed out that the Nazi collaborators were forgiven, with their sentences halved and many of them outright freed from jail:

A decree of 17 September 1955 permitted the immediate release of persons sentenced up to 10 years for collaborating with the Germans during World War II, and sentences of 10 years or more for such crimes were halved. The decree also released, regardless of length of sentence, those persons who were imprisoned for serving in the German army and police or in "special German units." (FORCED LABOR IN THE USSR 1953-57, CIA, Office of Research and Reports, September 12, 1958, p. 8) (IMG)

The total number released is unknown. In 1953, all Japanese war criminals and, allegedly, 9,000 Germans were released. In late 1955 and early 1956, 9,652 German prisoners were repatriated as a result of an agreement reached between West Germany and the USSR in October 1955. The Soviet Red Cross denied that any German prisoners of war remained in the USSR in 1957. All remaining Japanese prisoners allegedly have been freed as a result of the special amnesty for such persons issued in December 1956. (...). During 1953-56 the USSR released numerous Hungarians, Rumanians, ... Iranians, and other foreign prisoners of many nationalities. (FORCED LABOR IN THE USSR 1953-57, CIA, Office of Research and Reports, September 12, 1958, p. 23) (IMG)

The Titoist Regime freed tens of thousands of Nazis, Nazi Collaborators, and Japanese Fascists:

Tens of thousands of others were also set free on the basis of a September 1955 amnesty for "wartime collaborators." (Gulag Survivor, Nancy Adler, p. 22)

Stalin's successor Khrushchev took a more conciliatory course and found the German POWs — the Soviet Union called them war criminals, which many of them were — to be a useful bargaining chip. At the Berlin four-power conference preceding the Paris Treaties, for example, Khrushchev hinted about their release to improve his negotiating position. In January 1955 it was rumored that Khrushchev was negotiating the release with the leftist opposition parties in Bonn in an attempt to weaken Adenauer's government. The West German government was falling victim to its own overinflated POW propaganda, which made the issue appear much more important than it was: in April 1953 Adenauer gave the official number as 300,000 POWs; in August West Germany told a United Nations commission on POWs that there were 102,958; by early 1955 Adenauer only spoke of 40—50,000 men, and finally, right before the Moscow trip, the Bonn Foreign Office admitted that there were actually only "about 9,000" men still being held. (Legacies of Dachau: The Uses and Abuses of a Concentration Camp, 1933-2001, Harold Marcuse, p. 125) (IMG)

Certain prisoners of war indeed do have a right to be freed and repatriated according to the Geneva Convention. However, there are conditions and exceptions to this especially regarding the war criminals. The sentences were reduced and many war criminals were released. This was the problem of Khrushchev's Titoist group.

And as an agent of the Anglo-American Imperialists, this move by him produced:

a favorable reaction in the West at no cost to the USSR. (Probability of Soviet Release of Some World War II Prisoners, May 5, 1953, CIA, p. 1)

The media of the US-led bloc praises Nikita Khrushchev and the Titoists for ending the corrective labour system and freeing those jailed in it; this is not surprising since the Western intelligence services were not only in cahoots with the Axis forces, they were mostly established by the Axis forces. Khrushchev's release of those jailed, an act which was hailed by the West, was the release of the fascist bandits, the Nazi-collaborationists, and the criminals who re-committed their crimes on Soviet soil. There is no reason to doubt nor is there reason to regard as imperialist propaganda, the CIA's claim that Nikita Khrushchev's group was responsible for the release of countless Axis troops, since it is already documented that those arrested during the Stalin-era were Axis troops, fascist thugs, and common criminals, and it is also well-known that Khrushchev released the prisoners thereby ending the Gulag system. Plus, the CIA propagandists were on Khrushchev's side anyways.

C20S6. The Promotion of Idealistic Military Theories as Pretext for Military Sabotage

Why did the British secret service, the Anglo-American media, and Nikita Khrushchev keep emphasizing that Stalin was not aware that the Great Patriotic War was coming, that Stalin did not expect Hitler to invade after the Molotov-Ribbentrop negotiations? There are many reasons for this, but all of these reasons originate from at least two key reasons.

The first key reason is that they sought to make Stalin appear as though he regarded Nazi Germany as his ally, and so did not expect a war with them in the first place. This is a part of the conspiracy to rehabilitate the British media, the Nazi secret service, and the Trotskyites for stating that the USSR had betrayed the anti-Nazi struggle.

The second key reason for this however was that by promoting such a narrative, they were seeking to exaggerate the importance of surprise attacks while playing down the importance of the historical-material factors of war.

The historical materialist and dialectical approach to warfare takes into account the importance of surprise attacks and emphasizes utmost vigilance against any potential enemy strikes, but it does not exaggerate the importance of strategic surprise to the point that the historical-material factors of warfare are ignored. This is actually basic common sense. Assuming all else constant, if an army of swordsmen launched a surprise invasion against an army of advanced tanks, artillery, etc., the surprise of the attack can only get the army of swordsmen so far – and not very far. On the other hand, imagine if two armies are of completely equal military strength in every sense except that one of the armies has the advantage of launching a surprise assault on the other army. Obviously, if all else constant, the army launching the surprise attack will have relative victory if not absolute victory. The case of the Great Patriotic War was somewhere in between these two extremes of spectrum. The Soviet and Nazi militaries had a comparable strength but obviously not equal strength. This meant that while the surprise attack was one of the important factors, it was not necessarily the only decisive factor. This is why on the one hand:

Stalin did not deny that strategic surprise could determine the outcome of war and even seemed to admit the possibility that Germany's surprise attack might have been decisive. (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 12) (IMG)

And on the other hand:

Stalin ... asserted .. that ... "the momentum of unexpectedness and suddenness which constituted the reserve strength of the German fascist troops has been fully spent." Stalin ... did not depreciate the factor of surprise.... (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 12) (IMG)

More specifically,:

Stalin ... in his Order of the Day on Army Day, 23 February 1942, during the Soviet winter offensive which followed the German failure to capture Moscow in the first months of the war [said]:

Now ... the issue of the war will not be decided by such a fortuitous ... factor as suddenness, but by such constantly operating factors as the strength of the rear, the morale of the army, the quantity and quality of the divisions, the armament of the army, and the organizational abilities of the army commanders.

(POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 12) (IMG)

The 'constantly operating factors' to which Stalin refers are what I like to refer to as the historical-material factors of warfare, since the concept of the 'constantly operating factors' is actually a translation of historical materialism into the realm of the military affairs. The 'strength of the rear' and the 'the quantity and quality of the divisions, the armament of the army' are all different parts and aspects of the military-industrial backbone and hence of the productive forces. Closely related to the concept of the productive forces in warfare is the material factor of geography, especially insofar as the control over and exploitation of the strategic natural resources (e.g. the oil in the Soviet Caucasus) are concerned. The 'morale of the army' relates the less-material factors such as culture and individual psyche. I will mention the applicability of other historical materialist concepts into the military field later in this section. However, by now, it should be clear to the reader as to why the fortuitous factor of surprise can hardly be as significant a factor as the more material factors such as geography and productive forces with regards to military affairs.

To summarize with regards to the relationship of surprise to factors that are more material: (1) surprise is not as material a factor as the 'the strength of the rear, the morale of the army, the quantity and quality of the divisions, the armament of the army', and any other more material factors; (2) surprise can be the decisive factor if two armies are equally strong in all the material factors except for the element of surprise itself; (3) Surprise could be a major factor if two armies are comparable – but not equal – in strength in terms of the other material factors of war, but in that situation, surprise cannot necessarily be the only decisive factor.

It takes no genius to understand this point with regards to the relative importance of the fortuitous factor of surprise. However, unfortunately, the revisionists seriously had the audacity to challenge even such a basic fact, causing debates in the USSR and significant policy implications, and knowing that many people would not pay enough attention, would not be vigilance, and would not challenge them.

Playing up the importance of surprise attacks to the point that the advancement of the historical-material factors of warfare are ignored is a blatantly infantile idealistic approach to military affairs. All this media hype about Stalin allegedly – and it is a false allegation as documented in C10S4_– being surprised by the Nazi invasion was a means of exaggerating the significance of the surprise attack and its impact on the war, hence to gain the excuse to downplay the importance of heavy industry and the development of the military-industrial backbone. The latter in turn was a means of stagnating and sabotaging the development of the Soviet military-industrial backbone.

The Moscow Titoists and their agents promoted the idealist view on the military. It should come as no surprise that:

Soviet discussions of the relative significance of surprise and the constant factors in war have almost invariably invoked the authority of Stalin... (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 11) (IMG)

After the Great Patriotic War and persisting until mid-1953, the recognition of the critical importance of historical-material factors of war – also known as the constantly operating factors of war – was integrated into Soviet defense 'doctrines' as Soviet military science common-sense:

After the war ... it evolved into a tenet of Soviet "military science" which by constant repetition tended to imply a general strategic depreciation of the surprise factor. Thus the LARGE SOVIET ENCYCLOPEDIA (1954) contended that "surprise and other accidental features of the situation can only yield temporary successes." Marshal Malinovsky, writing in RED STAR on Army Day 1952, even came close to interpreting Stalin's remark as meaning that strategic surprise could not be decisive and that Soviet military strategy should be based only on the constant factors. After quoting Stalin, he asserted:

The Stalinist formulation of permanently operating factors provides the key to the understanding of the decisive conditions of victory in a modern war. The profound scientific analysis (sic) of these factors made by Stalin is of enormous theoretical and practical significance. In military and organizational work, the consideration of correct utilization of these factors make it possible to concentrate the chief attention on the solution of basic problems determining the fate of the war.

A similar passage appears in the 1950 edition of Stalin's official biography and thus certainly had Stalin's personal approval.

(POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 12) (IMG)

And:

In the weeks before [Stalin's] death, Chuikov [not to be confused with Zhukov] said that Stalin's strategy at Stalingrad comprise "the use of active defense to exhaust the enemy, grind down his manpower and material, and then launch a counteroffensive" (2 February 1953) and Sokolovsky discussed active defense strategy in World War II (PRAVDA, 23 February 1953); (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 14) (IMG)

After the death of Stalin, the communist loyalists in the Red Army, a prominent figure among whom was Vasilevsky, continued to promote the scientific historical materialist view regarding war, and promoted the narrative on constantly operating or historical-material factors of war:

References to the thesis on constantly operative as against fortuitous factors continued after Stalin's death, when its place in postwar Soviet military doctrine was no longer dependent on his personal influence. It was affirmed by Vasilevsky after Stalin's death (9 March 1953) and by Lieutenant General Kozlov (16 February 1954). Although indications of increased respect for strategic surprise were evident in early 1954, the strongest depreciation of the surprise factor, and apparently the only explicit elite denial that strategic surprise could be decisive, came more than a year after Stalin's death, in an article by the second ranking professional soldier of the USSR, Vasilevsky, on 9 May 1954, ten months before Marshal Rotmistrov was to attack underestimation of the surprise factor and declare that it could be decisive in war. (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 12) (IMG)

With regards to the specific material conditions of the USSR in the face of the Nazi assault during the Great Patriotic War, and the Anglo-American assault on the Caucasus for World War III, the USSR had promoted the concept of active defense, which entailed that the historical-material factors in the USSR would be used to deprive the relatively less material factor of a surprise attack from its momentum and its effectiveness; then, the historical-material factors of war would be used to push back against the imperialist-fascist aggressors. Therefore, it is important to note that the notion of active defense was the strategic application of the historical materialist notion of the constantly operative factors of warfare into the military historical-material conditions of the USSR. Here is an excerpt of the CIA document on this:

2. Active Defense

While strategic surprise and the constant factors are correlative and usually discussed together, the concept of "active defense" is infrequently related to them explicitly. The connection is firmly established, however, by Sokolovsky's PRAVDA article on Army Day 1953, which contends that an active defense strategy relies on the constant factors in war:

The key to the understanding of this regularity [in war] is the thesis worked out by Stalin on the permanently operating surprise factors which determine the outcome of war. This thesis makes possible a genuine scientific approach to the preparation of the country and the army for active defense and the eve solution of most important strategic problems in the course of the war itself on the basis of a thorough assessment of the economic, moral and military potential of the fighting countries.

(...). The general concept of active defense has served as a political doctrine and propaganda slogan as well as a military doctrine. Sokolovsky's 1953 Army Day article declared that,:

preparing the country for active defense goes far beyond the framework of purely military problems. These preparations comprise an economic, political, ideological, scientific, technical and actual military approach affecting the whole sphere of life and work of both State and people.

a. Active Defense as a Military Doctrine: Active defense has been used to characterize the strategy of assuming a defensive posture in order to exhaust the enemy before launching the counteroffensive. It was applied by Stalin to the early stages of World War II:

It is a well-known fact that following the temporary withdrawal caused by the German imperialists' perfidious attack, the Red Army turned the tide of war and went over from active defense to a successful offensive against enemy troops.

(...). Bulganin [stated in 1949:]

Stalin's outstanding service as a military theoretician is his solution of the questions of active defense and the counteroffensive. It is difficult to overestimate the importance of the Stalin theory on these questions and the Stalin art of its application for the victory of the Soviet armed forces in the Great Fatherland War. To realize that importance, suffice it to recall the part in the war played by the Moscow, Stalingrad and Kursk battles which were classic examples of active defense and counteroffensive.

It is possible that Bulganin in this statement was not expressing his own views and was merely seeking to please Stalin.

(POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, pp. 12-14) (IMG)

The idealist emphasis on the surprise factor was denounced as adventurist:

The concept of active defense based on the prime importance of constantly operative factors, was after the war repeatedly set against the "adventurist" strategy of reliance on such a fortuitous factor as strategic surprise with the goal of achieving a "blitzkrieg" victory. Pronouncements on Soviet political-military strategy stressed "preparations for active defense" and ability to mobilize rapidly if required. According to Bulganin at the XIX Party Congress, the Soviet people made "no secret of the fact that our economy can in the shortest possible time be switched to a war footing." Vasilevsky made the same point as late as V-E Day 1945, when he claimed that "the socialist structure made it possible to transform the whole economy of the country onto a war basis in the shortest time...." (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 15) (IMG)

Beside geography and productive forces, another important historical-material factor is the class orientation of the army staff. By that, what is meant here is not whether the army commanders are from working class backgrounds or not, nor is it about the anarchist concept of worker unions directly democratically electing the military commanders. These are imperialist-sponsored, petit-bourgeois, left-deviationist, idealist 'workerist' ideas with a superficially 'proletarian' coloring. Rather, by the term 'class orientation', what is meant is simply is: loyalty. It answers the question: to what side of history are the staff in the military and industry loyal? To the imperialist-fascist finance capital and their secret services, or to the anti-imperialist and anti-fascist side of history combatting the enemy secret services and confronting finance capital? The agents of the enemy in the military use diversionary/saboteurial tactics such as: (1) attack the enemy where it is strong and refuse to attack the enemy where it is weak; (2) launch military provocations to hand the enemy the excuse for invasion and then once the enemy invades, move the defense troops away so that the front would be opened for the enemy; etc. These elements existed in the military of the USSR and they were duly purged. The purge of the agents of the imperialist-fascist secret services and those loyal to finance capital was a purge that was necessary for preparations for active defense during the Great Patriotic War and anti-imperialist struggles before, during, and after the War. The reorientation of the military and industrial staff away from the class forces loyal to finance capital towards the class forces hostile to finance capital marked the work of the USSR with regards to the historical-material factor, the class orientation of the military.

During the period of the doctors' plot case and during the 19th CPSU congress, the importance of class orientation as a historical-material factor to account for was emphasized by communists such as Stalin, Molotov, Govorov as well as by Malenkov, the crypto-Titoist who pretended to side with the communist faction:

Active Defense as a Political Doctrine: In its more general meaning, as a way of describing those elements in national policy which are directed toward maintaining the security of the Soviet State, active defense received special prominence at the XIX Party Congress in October 1952, when it was introduced into the Party Statutes: One of "the chief tasks of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union now [is] to strengthen in every respect the active defense of the Soviet country against aggressive actions of its enemies." This provision was cited, along with other calls for strengthening active defense, by professional military leaders and by Bulganin at the Party Congress and in the following months, most notably on Army Day 1953.

The Congress' emphasis on the task of active defense was particularly noted by Marshal of the Soviet Union Govorov, who mentioned the doctor-plot in his 23 February RED STAR article and was himself allegedly one of its intended victims. The Report to the Congress by Malenkov, in surveying the decade of "preparation for active defense" before the war, cited the purge of the thirties as one of these preparations. It seems possible that the political activation of the doctrine in the Warsaw fall of 1952 and winter of 1953 was related to the doctor-plot which made top military leaders its chief target.

(POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 14) (IMG)

Additionally, according to the CIA,:

One of the targets, Marshal Govorov, writing in RED STAR on 23 February 1953, referred to the plot, recalled the purges of the thirties in discussing Soviet defense capabilities, and called for one-man leadership in the Army -- a rare injunction from a top marshal. Govorov's involvement in Soviet politics was explicitly acknowledged at his funeral (22 March 1955) by the Moscow Party Secretary Kapitanov: "Govorov...devoted much attention to political work and took an active part in the Moscow Party organization of the capital." Sokolovsky, who was not among the alleged targets of the doctor-plot, did not mention it in a PRAVDA article appearing at the same time as Govorov's. (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 1) (IMG)

Naturally, since the purges were denounced after the assassination of Stalin, the concept of the class orientation of the military staff was simply ignored. Referring to the purges of the military as the 'political meaning' of the 'the concept of active defense', the CIA stated:

Shortly after Stalin's death the concept of active defense lost its political meaning, just as it tended to lose its military meaning as a description of the first stage in World War II. It was used retrospectively to characterize the economic preparations for the war and in general calls for strengthening the country. Even with this diffused meaning, the concept was apparently no longer acceptable after February 1955, since no allusions to it have been noted since that date. (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 15) (IMG)

After the death of Stalin, Vasilevsky was at the forefront of the theoretical struggle to preserve Stalin's historical materialist line on warfare:

Vasilevsky is the only top marshal who persisted after Stalin's death in propagating the most distinctive of the Stalinist views on Soviet military doctrine and World War II. In his 1954 Army Day article he spoke of the "period of active defense" at the beginning of the war and described the operations of the Soviet Army in this period as "the implementation" of active defense. In the same article he depreciated the factor of surprise by contrasting the views of Soviet and bourgeois military science on its importance: "Soviet military science, unlike bourgeois military [pseudo-]science, does not exaggerate the significance of such for gratuitous elements as the element of surprise." (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 22) (IMG)

The historical materialist elevation of the historical-material factors of war and relative depreciation of the fortuitous factor of surprise by Vasilevsky did not mean that he depreciated the importance of vigilance:

In his RED STAR article on [August 1953] Vasilevsky, while stressing the constant factors in war and denying the decisiveness of strategic surprise, amplified the call for vigilance. (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, pp. 15) (IMG)

In spite of the struggles of the communist faction, however, the Moscow Titoists – already possessing a strong socio-economic base in the CPSU membership thanks to the white-collar worker element – were able to easily bulldoze their way through and pursue their agenda of weakening the historical materialist conceptions of warfare, despite the resistance of Vasilevsky:

Since Stalin's death, professional military leaders have rarely characterized the early surge of World War II as one of active defense. (...). Vasilevsky, in a commemorative article immediately afterwards, put ... stress on Stalin's application of active defense.... But the only subsequent known instance is another article by Vasilevsky almost a year later, on Armed Forces Day 1954 (RED STAR):

Already in the first period of the Great Fatherland War – the period of active defense – the Soviet Army showed in the great battle of Moscow that it was capable of beating the vaunted Hitlerite troops. Implementing the active defense, the Soviet Armed Forces frustrated Hitler's plan of blitzkrieg war....

Here again, as in his depreciation of the surprise factor on 9 May 1954, Vasilevsky persisted in affirming Stalinist military doctrine until midway in the interval between Stalin's death and the current revision of doctrine, well after other top leaders had discarded it.

(POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 14) (IMG)

The composition of the CPSU had the white-collar elements as half of the membership, which was enough to pursue a revisionist counter-revolutionary line, but not large enough to pursue a swift dismantlement of everything that the communists had built in the USSR. Khrushchev embodied the membership composition of the Party and the tendency of the Party to pursue counter-revolutionary changes in a gradual – as opposed to swift, Beria-style – manner. Thus, unlike the speedy Titoist Beria and the somewhat speedy Titoist Malenkov, the position of the relatively slow-motion Titoist Khrushchev at the helm of the CPSU was well-entrenched. This meant that the Titoists in the Red Army could cautiously pursue their counter-revolutionary Titoist line. This is the reason that:

Chuikov, the first marshal of the Soviet Union to accept publicly the enhanced significance of surprise, did so immediately following the January session of the Central Committee which confirmed Khrushchev's victory over Malenkov. (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 25) (IMG)

Hence:

Soviet military doctrine in the past half year has been radically altered by a reappraisal of the decisiveness of surprise attack in modern war, particularly in view of developments in nuclear weapons and the means of their delivery. Indications of this change occur in recent pronouncements of the top soviet marshals, but the only extended discussions of it to date are by a professional military man, Marshal Rotmistrov (in the 24 March RED STAR) and by a Party-military official, Lieutenant General Shatilov (in the 28 May LITERARY GAZETTE). (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 11) (IMG)

According to the CIA, other Red Army commanders followed, in challenging Stalin's and Vasilevsky's common-sense historical materialist views on military science:

The correlation among the three concepts is also evident in the fact that Rotmistrov's and Shatilov's recent articles revising upward the significance of the surprise element also depreciated the concept of active defense. (...). Shatilov, in his 28 May 1955 article revising Soviet military doctrine, strongly criticized active defense[:]

(...). It must be pointed out that our literature on the Great Fatherland War often portrays and idealizes the initial stages of the war as a classic form of defense – so-called "active defense" – and that in addition authors are trying, in contradiction to reality, to portray the events themselves as if "active defense" had been planned ahead of time and was included in the consideration of our command; in fact the initial stages of the war, constituting a sudden enemy invasion with numerical superiority in tanks and planes, were unfavorable for our country and its Army which ... experienced the bitterness of withdrawal. A primitive interpretation of the initial period of the war, perverting living reality in any sector, be it in fiction, or scientific works cannot be tolerated.

(POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 13) (IMG)

Those Kremlin Titoists who promoted this idealist notion regarding the surprise attack were the same Kremlin Titoists who, in a flagrantly hypocritical self-contradiction, denied that there was any potential for enemy attack in general, again to gain the excuse for stagnating the military-industrial backbone. The same Khrushchev who denounced Stalin for not preparing for war also claimed that there is no need to prepare for war. Surely the imperialists were not going to launch a total war on nuclear-armed USSR but they did launch numerous proxy wars against the pro-Soviet forces, such as the Arabs during the Arab-Israeli war of 1948, the Koreans during the Korean War, and the wars against the Ukrainian fascists inside the USSR itself. In the case of the Korean War, the USA also 'mistakenly' and temporarily invaded the USSR in 1950 during the Korean War, by bombing Soviet air bases, but then apologized for it. To fail to build up the Soviet Union's conventional weapons sector constituted a godsend to the sworn enemies of socialism.

C20S7. Titoists Expand Influence over Red Army, De-Fund Soviet Military, Capitulate to American Imperialism / CIA Coup against Mosaddeq 'Thanks' to Stalin Death

Importantly, to weaken the leverage of the communist elements with influence in the Red Army, to prevent the funding of anti-colonial movements, and to pave the way for the partition of the territory of the former Soviet Union, the Khrushchev group drastically de-funded the Red Army. In the words of the prominent CIA and RAND Corporation official Myron Rush:

Khrushchev cut back on the growth of military spending and sharply reduced the size of the armed forces, at a time when the United States had a large and widening margin of military superiority.... (The Soviet Military Build-up and the Coming Succession: A Review Essay. Reviewed Work: 'Stalin's Successors: Leadership, Stability, and Change in the Soviet Union' by Seweryn Bialer. Review by: Myron Rush. Source: International Security, Spring, 1981, Vol. 5, No. 4 (Spring, 1981), p. 183. Published by: The MIT Press) (IMG{Khrushchev – Political})

The decline of the communist forces in the USSR allowed for the CIA to more aggressively pursue its agenda around the world. Allen Dulles, the real head of the Eisenhower Administration, overthrew the communist-friendly governments of Iran and Guatemala. The United States could by then shift away from focusing on the defense of the US heartland and could instead aggressively pursue the overthrow of the pro-communist forces. An anonymous CIA official interviewed, stated:

Evidence points to a shifting of emphasis from a “dollar-defense” line based solely on developing and stockpiling more and more military weapons [for World War III against the Soviet Union] to a strategy of countering the communists underground.... This was the strategy in Guatemala, where we alerted “freedom forces” who were then able to drive the Reds to the surface and hand them a sound defeat. (THE MYSTERIOUS DOINGS OF THE CIA: America’s Secret Agents: Part One, The Saturday Evening Post, Richard Harkness, Gladys Harkness, October 30, 1954, p. 22. In: CIA archives) (IMG{GDR})

The so-called ‘freedom forces’ is yet another term that the CIA has hijacked for its reactionary agenda, and which deserves to be reclaimed by the actual freedom forces.

Anyways, Guatemala’s situation was repeated in Iran as well, in which the Mosaddeq Administration, which was backed by the Soviets and the Tudeh Party, was overthrown and a monarcho-fascist regime was installed. Mosaddeq wrote in his memoirs:

The death of Stalin on March 5 created the suitable conditions for the overthrow of my government. (Memoirs and Pains of Mohammad Mosaddeq, Mohammad Mosaddeq, p. 189) (IMG{Iran})

And the other one was [Anthony] Eden, the Foreign Minister of Britain’s Conservative Government, who after a while of waiting, as soon as Stalin died and thus the setting for the oppressive behavior of the colonial regimes was created, made a trip to America and convinced the President Eisenhower to trade the freedom of a nation with a 40% share of stock [from Iran’s oil].... (Memoirs and Pains of Mohammad Mosaddeq, Mohammad Mosaddeq, pp. 395-396, underline added) (IMG{Iran})

Indeed, the death of Stalin, ‘created the suitable conditions for the overthrow’ of the Mosaddeqist bourgeois-democratic government. The bourgeois-democratic anti-colonial state is a state controlled by the anti-colonial national-bourgeoisie. As the national-bourgeoisie of the colonial countries is weak in its confrontation towards the colonial imperial bourgeoisie, the anti-colonial national bourgeoisie aims to increase its influence over the state and the economy through an alliance with the proletariat. As such, the anti-colonial national bourgeoisie elevates the proletariat into the bourgeois state apparatus, giving the bourgeois state some of the characteristics of the dictatorship of the proletariat; this adoption of elements of the dictatorship of the proletariat by the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie yields bourgeois-democracy. Not in every government does this proletarian alliance with the national-bourgeoisie take the form of communist party support for the progressive bourgeois state but in the case of Iran, it did. The communist-led popular front party, the Tudeh Party, supported Mosaddeq. So did the USSR itself. The coup against Stalin and some of the other Red Army generals led to the withdrawal of communist influence in Iran, thus causing the 1953 coup.

The facts mentioned here are also corroborated by the prominent Titoist Third Force officials. Masoud Hejazi, a founder of the Titoist Third Force, recalled that Mohammad-Ali Khonji, another Titoist ‘Third Force’ founder, had analyzed that the elimination of Joseph Stalin and the rise of the Titoist circle meant that Mosaddeq could no longer rely on Soviet assistance against the coup. In his memoirs, referring to Mosaddeq’s view that Stalin’s death led to the coup, Hejazi recalled:

The interesting thing is that Dr. Mohammad-Ali Khonji, as stated before, had reached the same conclusion [as Mosaddeq on the role of Stalin’s elimination on the AJAX coup]. In one of the meetings of the Joint Executive Committee and the Central Committee of the Toilers’ Party of the Iranian Nation (Third Force), he spent a number of hours to analyze the international political situation concerning Iran, and concluded that due to the death of Joseph Stalin, the Soviet government has moved away from its aggressive [confrontational] approach in the Cold War and is now busy caring about its own domestic affairs, and Dr. Mosaddeq can no longer utilize the existing contradictions between the Eastern Bloc on the one side and the Western Bloc on the other, and as such, Western colonial policy, through England and America having reached common understanding, will pursue the necessary measures for bringing about the collapse of Dr. Mosaddeq’s government. (“Events and Judgements, 1950-1960: The Memoirs of Masoud Hejazi”, Masoud Hejazi, p. 316) (IMG{Iran})

As a result of the de-funding and de-budgeting of the Soviet Red Army, the Titoists were able to expand influence over the means of violence, thus taking another major step in transition the USSR from a dictatorship of the proletariat to the dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie. The middle of 1955 was a critical moment in Soviet history, for it was then that the Titoist faction gained enough power to be able to more aggressively pursue its counter-revolutionary agenda. The increased strength of the Titoist faction arose out of the fact that Govorov, one of the most important communist agents at the high command of the Red Army, died under mysterious circumstances. Eventually, and conveniently for the Kremlin Titoists who had opposed the ‘Zhdanovite’ commander, Govorov died at the age of 58, and:

The detailed medical bulletin issued 20 March 1955 on the illness and death of Marshal Govorov may have been intended to silence any suspicions that his death might have been due to unnatural causes. In the ceremony surrounding his funeral, coming as it did so shortly after the removal of Malenkov, great efforts were made to show the unity of party and government with the military leaders. Virtually all leading party and government officials stood for a short time at his bier, and all subsequently attended his funeral on Red Square. This tribute was in marked contrast to that accorded to Marshal Tolbukhi, who died in 1949, when only Bulganin and Shvernik stood by the bier and only six Politburo. (CAESAR 12: RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN POLITICAL STATUS OF SOVIET ARMED FORCES, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), September 20, 1955, pp. A-1 to A-2) (IMG{Titoist Coup})

Konev whose position had become weaker did not rise against Khrushchev while Zhukov, the traitor in the Battle of Stalingrad, spoke out in favor of the Gestapo agent Tito:

Konev was cautious and restrained in discussing the Yugoslav question, but Zhukov (on 1 May) gave an accolade to the Yugoslavs and to Tito for their wartime roles and appealed personally for a rapprochement. This statement was apparently designed either to support Khrushchev's Belgrade visit or to establish a claim for credit for the rapprochement. (POLITICS AND DOCTRINAL DIFFERENCES AMONG THE SOVIET MILITARY ELITE, CIA, The Research Series of the 'Foreign Broadcast Information Service', Propaganda Report, July 27, 1955, p. 9) (IMG{Titoist Coup})

By expanding influence over the Soviet military, the Titoist faction could then more easily pursue its Titoization agenda well before the 20th CPSU Congress. The Red Army and the intelligence bodies closely cooperating with it served as the guards of the CPSU against the increased membership of the corrupt bureaucrats in the CPSU. By reducing communist influence in the Red Army, the Titoists led by Khrushchev could then increase the membership percentage of the bureaucrats in the CPSU. A SAVAK spy with extensive contacts to the international communist movement and the Warsaw Pact countries stated that the leadership of the CPSU had become a band of corrupt bureaucrats:

All of this has a material origin and is a sign that the particular stratum that governs the government as well as the leadership of the Communist Party in the Soviet Union has grown too bureaucratic and prosperous, and this is the basis for the growth of capitalism in the Soviet Union and can lead to the ... transition to capitalism. (The Interrogation session of Mr. Parviz Nikkhah [Jalaseh Bazjuyi az Aqaye Mohandes Parviz Nikkhah], SAVAK, Parviz Nikkhah, June 1965. Source: 'Parviz Nikkhah According to SAVAK Documents' [Parviz Nikkhah be Revayat e Asnad e SAVAK] book, page 187. In: The Center of Historical Documents Survey) (IMG{Khrushchev – Political})

Indeed, by the time of the 20th CPSU Congress and for a long time beyond it, the intelligentsia and the bureaucrats – the white-collar elements – gained the majority in the percentage membership composition thus being able to vote for the Titoization program initiated by the Khrushchev group. The Titoization Speech, the so-called 'Secret' Speech, was the vigilance-reducing speech through which Khrushchev was to gain the support of the white-collar majority in the Party in the struggle against communism in the Soviet Union. It was to assist the Titoists led by Khrushchev in the struggle to criminalize the Soviet intelligence service and to decriminalize the 'victims' of the Soviet intelligence service, hence allowing the Titoists to take over the Soviet security bodies, ensuring the transition of the USSR from a dictatorship of the proletariat to the dictatorship of the Titoist comprador bourgeoisie, particularly the dictatorship of the corrupt bureaucratic oligarchic bourgeoisie.

The real meaning of the phrase 'the Stalin era' is the era during which the industrial blue-collar workers held numerical dominance over a democratic centralist Party that dominated the government apparatus of the Soviet Union, and during which the communist agents backed by the CPSU held a dominant position over the USSR's means of violence, the armed forces and the intelligence bodies. The practical meaning of the phrase 'the Khrushchev era' in turn is the era during which the white-collar elements – i.e. the intelligentsia, the bureaucrats, and so-called 'technocrats' – held numerical dominance over the Party and factional dominance over the Red Army command. Even the personality of Stalin naturally rose to leadership due to the hold of the industrial blue-collar workers over the Party whereas the personality of Khrushchev naturally rose to the top due to the numerical dominance of the white-collar workers over the Party. Contrary to the idealist belief, the tip of the iceberg does not stand on air and then generate the rest of the iceberg and mountain underneath it; rather, in accordance with the historical materialist science, the tip of the iceberg is the culmination of the rise of the massive mountain that elevated the tip of the iceberg to such a high position. Personally, I disagree with the use of such phrases as 'the Soviet Union under Stalin' or the 'USSR under Khrushchev' because such phrases cultivate the idealist notion that the 'tip of the iceberg' – Stalin or Khrushchev – generated the rest of the system which they led. It is incontrovertibly true that Stalin and Khrushchev were leaders that greatly influenced the course of events in the system 'under' their leadership and many of the Soviet policies were "Stalin's policies", but the class composition of the system 'under' their leadership had a greater impact on whom – Stalin or Khrushchev? – would be the leader, than the one leader on the class composition of the system.

In this specific context, when the intelligentsia and the bureaucrats thinly dominated, how do we distinguish between a dictatorship of the proletariat and the dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie? How do we know which one was running the state? We know this not only on the basis that the white-collar elements slightly dominated the Party but also on the basis that the general policy direction of the state became one of further and further economic decentralization in order to strengthen the bureaucrats and the general foreign policy direction of the state was one of undermining the peoples' democracies and the anti-imperialist states from Hungary to Albania to North Korea to Egypt. The general policy direction in the favour of the reactionary forces demonstrated that the domination of the CPSU by the white-collar elements and the domination of the means of violence by the Titoist agents reliant upon the white-collar elements did have the effect of resulting in reactionary policies being pursued.

The corrupt bureaucrats that upheld Khrushchev were, as a comprador class, allied to the Anglo-American finance capital. This was directly reflected in the fact that Khrushchev, the man representing them, was an agent of the MI6. Before 1953, Khrushchev's track record was one of close relations with the MI6 spymaster Konni Zilliacus (see C19S7.2), knowing that Zilliacus was an MI6 spy, and with the MI6 agent Beria, knowing that Beria was definitely a traitor. After 1953, everywhere in Khrushchev's track record, one can see activities for the MI6, the foremost among them being his full-on collaboration with the UDB regime in Yugoslavia in all spheres, and the UDB was a CIA-MI6- BND front. Khrushchev's extensive collaboration with the Tito-Rankovic gang is incontrovertible proof of his collaboration with the British intelligence service. Khrushchev's open ties to Zilliacus, an MI6 official Khrushchev knew to be an MI6 official, served to reinforce the contacts with the MI6.

From hereon, the comprador bourgeois government of the territory of the former Soviet Union after the 1955-1956 overthrow of the dictatorship of the proletariat will be referred to in this book as 'Eurasia', so to distinguish it from the socialist Soviet Union. Socialism was temporarily restored in that country in the late 1970s and the early 1980s (more on this later) and for that time period, the term used in this book to refer to the government of that territory is again the 'Soviet Union' or 'USSR'.

C20S8. A Reply to the '1991 Capitalist Restoration' Argument

Some of those who argue that the socialism was overthrown in December 1991, harbour the anti-dialectical stance that until a state is 'suddenly' torn apart, the way it was 'suddenly' torn apart in 1917 or in 1991, a state cannot undergo a change its class character. A gradual change of the class character of a state is impossible, they argue. This view is anti-dialectical, for it ignores the law of the 'leap from quantity to quality'. The law of the 'leap from quantity to quality', explained in depth by Engels in Anti-Duhring, is one of the fundamental concepts of dialectics largely ignored by the proponents of the 'suddenness' theory. Actually, the key to determining the class character of a state is not whether such a state was established or overthrown suddenly or gradually. Rather, the key to determining the class character of a state is the issue of classes' control over the means of violence. Control over the means of violence is the sole characteristic that determines the class character of a state, and taking control over the means of violence can be done gradually or suddenly.

The question of the control over the means of violence is the alpha and the omega of the communist stance against Kautskyism. Kautskyism is a treacherous tendency for it promotes the thesis that merely electing the 'good politicians' into office will be enough for the establishment of a progressive state; the communists on the other hand argue that the 'good politicians' must be supported through increasing their faction's control over the means of violence. The Kautskyites argue that some legislations for reforms are enough; the communists on the other hand argue that real reforms can only be enforced through control over the means of violence. The Kautskyites refuse to support military operations aimed at inflicting material costs upon the dominant anti-proletarian faction of the anti-proletarian armies; the communists call for 'revolutionary defeatism' against such reactionary armies in order to inflict enough material costs to reduce the leverage of the dominant faction of the reactionary army, so that the minority faction in the army, representing the intelligence agents of the proletariat, can take over the rest of the army and thus control the means of violence and yield real effective change. There are a number of other problems with Kautskyism, but the essence of the matter boils down to this question of the means of violence.

The transition to socialism requires the proletariat to conquer the command of the means of violence. Such a conquest of the command of the means of violence can be gradual, sudden, or a combination of gradual and sudden, but it must, of necessity, be an armed conquest. That is the key feature that sets apart a socialist from the Kautskyite illusory. It is no Kautskyite deviation to argue that the class character of a state can be changed gradually, so long as the argument notes that the gradual change has come through an armed conquest of the means of violence by a certain faction representing certain class interests. Recall that most of the Peoples' Democracies, Czechoslovakia being the main exception, were at first officially established and declared as communist-led bourgeois states and they were to transition towards socialist statehood and dictatorship of the proletariat, not through a sudden ripping apart the state as a whole and launching a revolt from below to demolish the troops, but through a leap from quantity to quality, a revolutionary change involving the proletariat masses from below and the armed vanguard of the working class from the top. Similarly, there is no reason to believe that a socialist state cannot transition to a dictatorship of the bourgeoisie without a 1991-style demolition of the state; on the contrary, the overthrow of socialism can occur through the leap from quantity to quality, which certainly was greatly helped by the fact that the Axis invasion exterminated so many blue-collar elements in the CPSU.

C20S9. The Secret Speech  IMG-All-{Khrushchev – Political}

The Titoization speech was a Trotskyite-fascist propaganda work not written by Khrushchev alone, but by a web of Titoist elements inside and outside the CPSU. There was a commission behind the selection of the lies to be stated:

his "Secret Speech" [was] a document in fact composed by a commission headed by veteran party ideologue Piotr Pospelov.... (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 13) (IMG{Romania})

Informing his SAVAK chiefs, a SAVAK spy with extensive contacts to the international communist movement and the Warsaw Pact countries remarked:

Khrushchev had neither the spiritual ability nor the necessary communist understanding....

The SAVAK spy further stated:

Regarding the knowledge of Marxism, I have not seen anyone among the Soviet leaders who has been able to deal with major world issues based on Marxism-Leninism and materialism, and dialectics and historical materialism.

Suslov, who is apparently the current theorist of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, not only does not seem to be a communist, but he has such characteristics of the petty bourgeoisie that his theories are more similar to those of the petty bourgeois ideology.

From the point of view of having Marxist political knowledge, I do not see much value in the current Soviet leaders.

(The Interrogation session of Mr. Parviz Nikkhah [Jalaseh Bazjuyi az Aqaye Mohandes Parviz Nikkhah], SAVAK, Parviz Nikkhah, Khordad 22, 1344 / June 12, 1965. Expressing their extreme satisfaction, a memorandum of the US Government noted:

The denigration of Stalin and Moscow's acceptance of Titoism have created difficulties in Soviet relations with the satellites; (...). This fluid situation in the satellites has increased the previously limited U.S. capabilities to influence a basic change in ... the satellites. (...).

There is a possibility that an internal relaxation might result in the long run in the development of forces and pressures leading to fundamental changes of the satellite system in the direction of national independence [read: colonial dependence on Washington]

(NOTE BY THE EXECUTIVE SECRETARY TO THE NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL ON U.S. POLICY TOWARD THE SOVIET SATELLITES IN EASTERN EUROPE, NSC-5608, 73. National Security Council Report, Washington, July 3, 1956. In: FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES, 1955-1957, EASTERN EUROPE, VOLUME XXV) (IMG)

I need not mention that the regime in Washington cared little for the 'national independence', 'individual freedom and security' or 'popular will' of Eastern European countries; these were merely euphemisms serving as cover for American plans to install their social-fascist neo-colonies in Eastern Europe. The thesis of the existence of a third camp in between the anti-imperialist camp and the pro-imperialist camp is a thesis in favor of deception for the purpose of intelligence penetration; The 'third' force between the pro-imperialist forces and the anti-imperialist forces would either be a pro-imperialist force disguised as 'neutral' (e.g. Tito and his fascist gang) or an anti-imperialist force disguised as 'neutral' (e.g. Nehru-era India, Mosaddeq-era Iran, Quwwatli-era Syria). Khrushchev made it clear that he sided with the former category – the pro-imperialist 'neutrality' headed by Tito's group.

The Titoization speech was a huge service to the MI6. Referring to the clandestine propaganda activity of the MI6 in Eastern Europe, the anti-Soviet British military intelligence officer Michael Smith remarked:

Copies of the speech were run off in their thousands and were distributed clandestinely throughout eastern Europe, fuelling demands for reform, particularly in Poland and Hungary. ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith. p. 123) (IMG)

Pro-MI6 reforms were on the way:

As details of the secret speech became more widely known, the clamour for reforms began to grow. ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith. p. 123) (IMG)

The notes prepared by US intelligence for the meeting of the National Security Council (NSC) are especially instructive. Not only do they state that the attack on the Stalin-era USSR was an excellent opportunity for the US-led camp, they also somewhat implied that Stalin's books must be removed and burnt, which is actually something that the Khrushchevians indeed implemented since that time. Another remarkable thing stated was that the degradation of Stalin could help Mao seize Stalin's spot. The following are excerpts of the notes:

1. Attempt to destroy Stalin tradition presents grave problems for Soviet Union and real opportunity for Western World attack – overt and covert.
 2. If Stalin degraded then Mao [i.e. Chinese Chairman Mao] takes his place along side of Lenin.
 3. For 25 years Stalin not only Soviet dictator but also leading theoretician and great war hero. They, therefore, have three-fold task of destruction.
 - a) Tens of millions of copies of his works are scattered throughout the Soviet Union, Stalin on Leninism, Short History of Communist Party, etc., etc. Can they remove and burn these?
 - b) Every history book filled with Stalin eulogies. Also Encyclopedia Britannicas....
 - c) If Stalin a gangster, what is position of other members of the gang? Molotov worked with him for 40 years; Khrushchev held key job under him for 18 [years], Bulganin, 21 [years], Mikoyan 30 [years], Kaganovich 28 [years] and Malenkov 27 years. (...).
- ('NSC BRIEFING - 22 MARCH 1956', NSC, March 22, 1956, p. 1) (IMG)

The NSC document also stated:

5. Stalin was artisan of Soviet foreign policy for 25 years. These should now be repudiated. Example: Korea, Berlin, Rejection of Marshall Plan, etc. And do Tehran, Yalta ad Potsdam agreements still stand? ('NSC BRIEFING - 22 MARCH 1956', NSC, March 22, 1956, p. 2) (IMG)
8. Name of Stalingrad should be changed; Stalinalee in Berlin and all places bearing his name; his body removed from mausoleum next to Lenin, statues and other mementoes destroyed. ('NSC BRIEFING - 22 MARCH 1956', NSC, March 22, 1956, p. 3) (IMG)

Word by word, Khrushchev was implementing these.

C20S10. Criminalizing the Soviet Intelligence Service  IMG-All-{Khrushchev – Political}

One of the major objectives of the 1956 Titoization Speech was to criminalize the Soviet intelligence service while decriminalizing the reactionary agents 'victimized' by the Soviet intelligence service. The document by the National Security Council (NSC) of the United States stated:

7. (...). If Stalin is as bad as they say, should not Army move in and liquidate his long time henchmen who still run government? Should not all of Stalin's appointments through Soviet Union be reviewed and replaced? ('NSC BRIEFING - 22 MARCH 1956', NSC, March 22, 1956, p. 2) (IMG)

The 'henchmen' referred to the counter-intelligence officers in the USSR who had combated imperialist-fascist secret service infiltrators and comprador agents in the USSR, in an affair that reached its climax during the Great Purge. It is important to note that the rehabilitation of the imperialist-fascist agents purged during the Stalin era was not just an attack on Stalin and socialism, but was also an assault upon the communist and progressive elements in the Soviet counter-intelligence sector, who had combatted the fifth column. The decriminalization of the Trotskyite/Bukharinite fifth columnists would have criminalized the communists and progressives who purged the fifth column; the denunciation of the accusations against the fifth column as 'frame-up' would have served to actually frame up the communist and progressive elements in the counter-intelligence. In other words, the Moscow Titoists' 'rehabilitation' efforts was not just a war for a revisionist re-writing of history, but was also a war on the counter-intelligence service, so to allow the infiltration of Titoists in the counter-intelligence. And upon conquering the counter-intelligence sector, there would be little room for filtering out agents who would take over the extraterritorial intelligence, the military, the economy, and the cultural affairs. In a letter to the 'Japanese Communist Party' published in TASS and archived by the CIA, Nikita Khrushchev stated:

Espionage is needed by those who prepare for aggression. The Soviet Union is deeply dedicated to the cause of peace. It does not intend to attack anybody. Therefore, the Soviet Union has no intention of engaging in espionage against other states.... (KHRUSHCHEV: TEST-BAN PACT POSSIBLE NOW, Khrushchev Letter to Nozaka, Text of Khrushchev's reply to a letter from Japanese Communist Party Chairman Sanzo Nozaka., Moscow Tass in English to Europe 2013 GMT, June 28, 1962. In; Daily Report, Foreign Radio Broadcasts, Issues No. 126, CIA, BB-2 to BB-3) (IMG)

Ladislav Bittman, a former Czechoslovak intelligence officer who defected to the Atlantic intelligence services, quoted Nikita Khrushchev on this as well:

As late as 1962, Nikita Khrushchev claimed that "espionage is needed by those who prepare for aggression. The Soviet Union is deeply dedicated to the cause of peace. It does not intend to attack anybody. Therefore, the Soviet Union has no intention of engaging in espionage." (The KGB and Soviet Disinformation, International Defense Publishers, Ladislav Bittman, 1983, p. 19) (IMG)

Denying the existence of the extraterritorial intelligence by Party chief would have not only given imperialist-fascist secret services the excuse to denounce communists as blatant liars, but also would have served a revisionist rhetoric that would have set the ideological basis for Khrushchev to go ahead with his words and to destroy the extraterritorial intelligence service. The denunciation of Stalin by Khrushchev was a part of Khrushchev's plot towards opening up the USSR for foreign intelligence services. A SAVAK spy with extensive contacts to the international communist movement and with the Warsaw Pact countries, stated:

When Khrushchev became head of the Soviet Party and government, he sought to wash away all the mistakes that had been made in the Soviet Party and government by accusing Stalin, in order to establish better relations with the Western world, and to present himself to the world as a philanthropist and a capable communist. (The Interrogation session of Mr. Parviz Nikkhah [Jalaseh Bazjuyi az Aqaye Mohandes Parviz Nikkhah], SAVAK, Parviz Nikkhah, June 1965. Source: 'Parviz Nikkhah According to SAVAK Documents' [Parviz Nikkhah be Revayat e Asnad e SAVAK] book, page 187. In: The Center of Historical Documents Survey) (IMG)

Under very suspicious circumstances, the Soviet intelligence agents that had penetrated the pro-fascist camp suddenly were easy prey to hunt down. In Israel for example, as was mentioned in much greater detail in C16S6, there was a powerful intelligence service taking the form of a communist-led 'Socialist Zionist' popular-front party, Mapam. Via the Mapam, many luminaries infiltrated the ranks of the Israeli military and intelligence apparatus. Ze'ev Avni, through the Mapam, rose to become a leading official in the Mossad and the Israeli Foreign Ministry. However,;

Avni was caught early in 1956 and sentenced to fourteen years' imprisonment. (The Mitrokhin Archive II: The KGB in the World, Christopher Andrew, 2005, p. 194) (IMG{Mapam})

The precise date of Avni's arrest was in April, only one month after the 20th CPSU Congress. The 20th CPSU Congress was the onset of a course of 'de-Stalinizing' the Soviet intelligence service. 'De-Stalinizing' the Soviet intelligence service really meant destroying the Soviet intelligence service, elevating MI6 operatives at its high ranks, and most importantly for Avni's case, eliminating the agents of the Stalin faction in the Soviet intelligence. One of those Stalin faction loyalists reportedly was Avni:

Avni ... told his interrogator that Stalin had been a 'genius' and initially refused to believe that Khrushchev's 'Secret Speech' of 1956 denouncing Stalin was genuine. (The Mitrokhin Archive II: The KGB in the World, Christopher Andrew, 2005, p. 193) (IMG{Mapam})

The 'De-Stalinization' of the Israel branch of the Soviet intelligence service probably came about in the form of the betrayal of Avni to the Shin-Bet chief, Isser Harel. 1956 was also the year in which the 'Cambridge Five', who were described as the Stalin-era Soviet spies in the high ranks of the MI6, were publicly exposed.

Levi Levi, an alleged Soviet spy in Israel, was captured in 1957:

Zeev Avni, who worked in the Foreign Ministry and carried out special missions for the Mossad, was caught, convicted and sentenced to a lengthy prison term in 1956. Levi (Lucian) Levi worked for the Operations Unit (today the Operations Branch), of the Shin Bet, which as part of its mission, according to foreign reports from Poland, broke into the embassies of the communist countries, in order to photograph documents and install listening devices. He was arrested and sentenced to prison in 1957. (In Depth: The KGB's long history of running agents in Israel, The Jerusalem Post, Yossi Melman, October 27, 2016) (IMG{Mapam})

Another case in point of how Khrushchev further undermined the extraterritorial intelligence is with regards to Orthodox Christianity. It must be remembered that during the Stalin era, the Orthodox Church was utilized by Soviet intelligence as a tool of extraterritorial influence (see C15S7), with which to reduce the influence of the MI6-backed fascist Vatican mafia. Knowing this, the British agent Khrushchev scored points in favor of the MI6-backed fascist Vatican mafia by attacking its rival, Orthodox Christianity. The MI6 operative Richard West wrote:

Khrushchev's denunciations of Stalin, his friendship with Tito and his boisterous clowning manner led the West to believe that he was a 'liberal', new-style Communist of the Yugoslav kind. However, in some respects, Khrushchev was even more despotic and cruel than Stalin [who was neither despotic nor cruel], particularly in his persecution of Christian believers. In a major offensive against the Russian orthodox Church, Khrushchev imprisoned scores of bishops, priests and nuns.... He reduced the number of churches to 7,000, representing a loss of two-thirds. The seminaries were reduced from eight to three, and the number of functioning monasteries from sixty-seven to twenty-one. (Tito: and the Rise and Fall of Yugoslavia, Richard West, p. 268) (IMG)

Again, none of this is to defend the reactionary content of Orthodox Christianity. The point rather is that it was a useful weapon of extraterritorial soft power and intelligence, which Khrushchev seriously undermined.

Note also Richard West's contrasting of Khrushchev with Stalin. Too often in Anglo-American media, Stalin is slandered as having been more cruel towards those who believed in religion, whereas Khrushchev is praised as kinder towards the religious. This myth, however, is debunked by the MI6 operative Richard West who admitted that the opposite was true. While communists should indeed campaign against religion, such a campaign must not be via terroristic means. Lenin and Stalin opposed forceful campaigns against religion (see the relevant previous chapters and sections), and instead advocated persuasion and anti-religious propaganda. Forcing irreligiosity was not only anti-democratic, but also would have stirred up religious uprisings against communism, while driving a wedge between the Party and the predominantly religious proletarian/peasant masses – and that is what the Trotskyite-Titoist agent of the MI6 and UDB, Khrushchev, intended.

C20S11. The Further Decline of the Economy Since 1956  IMG-All-{Khrushchev – Political}

The CIA's Office of Research and Reports (ORR) provided a detailed report on the decline of the Soviet-People's Democratic camp economy from the highest rate of growth to an economy on the decline:

The confidence in the economic strength and solidarity of the Sino- Soviet Bloc which was expressed so firmly at the Twentieth Party Congress of the Communist Party of the USSR in early 1956 weakened by the end of 1956. Strength is still there, but the solidarity has been proved not so strong as had been thought, and the internal economic problems of the various countries loom larger than expected. To the critics of the Communist system, events have been encouraging, to the Communists, sobering. Bloc countries are now in a period of transition and of unstable relationships -- a period of reorganization, of re-planning, of renegotiation, and of regrouping.

By early 1956 the Sino-Soviet Bloc had become an impressive aggregation of economic power. Its population was 900 million. Its total gross national product (GNP) was 38 percent that of the NATO countries, almost 70 percent that of the US. Its rate of economic growth was significantly more rapid than the present growth of the NATO powers or of the US.

Despite the confidence expressed in early 1956, deep economic problems lurk under the surface today.

(Survey of the Economies of the Sino-Soviet Bloc, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), September 13, 1957, p. 1) (IMG)

A big reason for the economic decline and disintegration of the Eastern Bloc was the Khrushchev faction's attempt to make each country invest less in its industrialization and more in its consumer goods.

Today it is no longer necessary for each socialist country to develop all branches of heavy industry, as had to be done by the Soviet Union, which for a long time was the only socialist country, and existed in a capitalist encirclement. Now, when there is a powerful community of socialist countries whose defence potential and security is based on the industrial might of the entire socialist camp, each European people's democracy can specialise in developing those industries and producing those goods for which it has the most favourable natural and economic conditions. This at the same time creates the necessary prerequisites for releasing considerable resources to develop agriculture and the light industries, and on this basis to satisfy more and more fully the material and cultural requirements of the peoples. (Report of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (Bolshevik), Twentieth CPSU Congress, Nikita Khrushchev, p. 10)

Prioritizing heavy industry was needed for establishing the means of production that would produce the means of production, hence growing the economy, The Khrushchev group was aiming to prevent this from happening.

C20S12. Regarding Criticism of Stalin and Stalin-era USSR

The USSR was a massive country with vast amounts of resources not only natural but also human. The USSR possessed a powerful intelligence apparatus, both for extraterritorial intelligence and for domestic intelligence. It also had a massive body of experts and advisors in all fields. The communists in the USSR were, furthermore, able to at least identify who the top wreckers and counter-revolutionaries were and were able to stay vigilant against their deceptions.

The General-Secretary of the CPSU, in leading the Party of the proletariat, had access to all this body of expertise, intelligence, resources, advisory, etc. As such, the General-Secretary of the CPSU had access to massive loads of information upon which to make decisions. Failure to account for the General-Secretary's access to such extensive and deep amount of information would be a failure to take into account the historical-material realities of the USSR and hence would be a failure to make a historical materialist scientific analysis. Stalin was armed with a strong understanding of dialectics and the historical materialist science. This meant that he could analyze the information that reached him scientifically. Thus, in terms of policy making and strategic assessments, he could make informed, scientific, and strategically correct decisions regarding any aspect of Soviet life towards which he was responsible. It would be rare for someone so well-armed with dialectical and historical materialist vision on the one hand, and such a large access to information and data on the other hand, to make errors in policy making and strategic decisions. Where Stalin as the head of the Soviet Union did make mistakes on policy-making and strategic issues was when there was a failure of or insufficient level of intelligence and information provided, such as with regards to the exact timing of the Nazi invasion, or perhaps when he was compelled to resign from the position of General Secretary of the CPSU in 1952 thus having less access to intelligence materials. However, it would not be fair to blame Stalin for that since he was not personally responsible for going out there and gathering military intelligence. It was not his fault that people failed to provide a good quantity or quality of information to him. So that 'error' of not being able to prophesy what would happen or what is happening is obviously not a real error in the field of policy-making and strategic decision-making. An analyst who says that Stalin made errors in the realm of policy-making and strategic decisions will have to take into account the massive load of information and expertise to which any General Secretary of the CPSU would have had and with which the General Secretary could make well-informed decisions. And by taking into account the fact that the General Secretary could make well-informed decisions, an analyst who states that Stalin made mistakes in the macro-level and mid-level issues could minimize misjudgement of Stalin, and perhaps even arrive at the conclusion that Stalin did not err at the macro-level and mid-level which the analyst initially believed Stalin made.

A similar kind of statement can be made about Gorbachev; as the chief of the Titoist 'CPSU', Gorbachev made well-informed decisions based on the historical materialist science and dialectics – the difference though was that Gorbachev was on the opposing side of history, the side of comprador reaction. Insofar as is concerned the pursuit of his comprador and pro-imperialist objectives, I am not aware of any strategic error committed by Gorbachev at the macro- and medium levels. Similarly, Khrushchev, while relatively unintelligent, had excellent advisors knowledgeable about methods of counter-revolutionary activity, and thus he pursued his comprador objectives systematically with low amounts of strategic error. Tito, the evil genius leader of Yugoslavia's fascist resistance against Soviet power, made few grand-strategic and medium-scale errors insofar as serving the fascist cause is concerned. The strategic correctness of Tito's policy line (from a reactionary fascist viewpoint) was reinforced by the flooding of Tito with the intelligence materials provided to him. However, Tito himself had a good understanding of dialectics, hence his ability to perform well from a fascist standpoint. Whenever I hear the yellow journalist media state that so-and-so major leader with so much access to information made a strategic mistake at the grand level or at the medium level, I go on alert and doubt such claims. Major leaders with plenty of access to information have indeed made some mistakes on the medium-level policy matters but almost never in the grand strategic level. Hitler did not make a strategic mistake to invade the Soviet Union, although he made mistakes in some of the medium-level planning details in addition to some of the tactical details. Dyck Cheney did not make a strategic mistake to invade Iraq, and the 2003 invasion of Iraq did not benefit Iran. Such narratives that grand strategic moves are dependent upon the mistakes, or lack thereof, of individual leaders are yellow journalistic idealistic narratives. Such massive military and intelligence bodies do not so easily allow such grand-strategic mistakes to be made. The same goes for Stalin. Insofar as the grand strategies are concerned, CPSU General-Secretary Stalin and the Stalin-era USSR never did anything wrong from the viewpoint of someone who seeks the advancement of the cause of the proletariat. From collectivization to the Great Purge, from the Nazi-Soviet commercial relations to the friendship with the people of Israel, policies after policies of the USSR were each shining in more glory than the other despite appearing 'evil'.

The medium-level policy matters were largely a matter of experience and knowledge of dialectics and historical materialism. The less the experience, the more the mistakes; the more the experience, the less the mistakes. Take for example the following remark by Stalin:

Marx and Engels believed that we needed a militia-based army. In our first years, we also thought that only a militia-based army was needed. Life has taught us that that was incorrect. Today, in order to defend the country, we need a modern army with various specialists. A militia-based army is good only in the situation where war is decided with the rifle. Today we should discard this old militia-based army. Today the army is not the manufacture army, but the machine army. Therefore, we need people in the army who know machines. ('Conversation between Joseph V. Stalin and SED leadership', Wilson Center, April 07, 1952, p. 3. Conversation between Joseph V. Stalin and SED leadership, History and Public Policy Program Digital Archive, Library of Congress, Dmitri Volkogonov Collection; according to Mikhail Narinsky, April 07, 1952. A copy can be found in Arkhiv Prezidenta Rossiiskoi Federatsii, Moscow (AP RF), fond (f.) 45, opis' (op.) 1, delo (d.) 303, list (l.) 179.) (IMG)

As time went by, experience piled up. In the beginning phase of the October Revolution and the Civil War, many Soviet officials, despite having positive intentions, had low experience and therefore made mistakes in the medium-level policy matters, Stalin's error on the militia-based army being a case in point. Later on, over time, they learned from such errors, did not repeat them, and tried to fix them. Stalin, due to being well-versed in historical materialism and dialectics, was a careful, cautious observer, quickly learning from experience. He managed to learn from his errors quicker than most of his colleagues, which was a factor that gave rise to his leadership of the CPSU in the first place.

I sometimes get accused of fostering this cult of personality and refusing to accept that Stalin made mistakes, treating him as a demigod. Such accusations are baseless. My counter-argument against such accusations is that these accusers do not judge political leaders from a historical materialist perspective. Such accusers do not look at the fact that the political leaders being judged had access to plenty of information, were battle-hardened, and intuitively dialectical and historical materialist even if fighting for the reactionary side of history. From the viewpoint of American imperialism, Allen Dulles, Moshe Dayan, and Robert McFarlane made no mistakes in the grand-strategic and very few mistakes in the medium-level policy matters. They almost never erred against the interests of the finance capital which they served. In the same way, at that macro- and medium levels of decision-making, Stalin almost never erred against the interests of the proletariat which he served. At the scale of the small details of life and in the tactics of political struggle, everyone makes many small mistakes and Stalin could not have been an exception.

C20S13. The Nazi Rebellion in Hungary / Yugoslavia supports Nazi rebels / The Role of the Intelligentsia in the Rebellion / Yuri Andropov was a Trotskyist-Titoist agent of the MI6, UDB, and Horthyite Rebels  IMG-All-{Hungary}

The Titoization Speech of 1956 greatly emboldened the Hungarian intelligentsia and agitated them with the anti-communist speech needed for a colour revolutionary action against the Hungarian state:

After the 20th Party Congress in the USSR, a completely different mood came into being. Among the writers and other intellectuals, so-called isolated groups came into existence; these groups organized debating evenings, with their main motive being that Hungary must again become master of its own house and that the interests of the Hungarian people should again be put first. A writers' newspaper was again published, originally once per month, later weekly. In this paper the government was strongly criticized and mistakes were traced. (...). The writers' newspapers came to be read more and more by industrial workers in Budapest and Csepel, and the newspaper boys who for the sake of security always hid these newspapers under the official newspapers, made three or four times the price for the writers' newspapers. ('PRE-REVOLT CONDITIONS 2. HUNGARIAN REVOLT IN OCTOBER 1956 3. ADVANCED EDUCATION', February 7, 1958, pp. C-6 to C-7) (IMG)

As the MI6 officer Michael Smith recalled, once the American intelligence obtained a copy of Khrushchev's full speech,:

Copies of the speech were run off in their thousands and were distributed clandestinely throughout eastern Europe, fuelling demands for reform, particularly in Poland and Hungary. ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith, 1996. p. 123) (IMG)

The result of spreading such 'information' was greater colour revolutionary unrest by the liberal intelligentsia:

As details of the secret speech became more widely known, the clamour for reforms began to grow. ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith. p. 123) (IMG)

Titoist Yugoslavia utilized the Khrushchev group's Titoization drive to agitate the Hungarian intelligentsia into a Titoist colour revolutionary movement:

In April 1956 a Hungarian, rather Communist transmitter came on the air; this transmitter was on Yugoslavian soil. The chief doctrine of this radio station was that Hungary should build up its own [Titoist] [pseudo-]socialist state. The official Yugoslavian transmitters were hindered from 1948 until the beginning of 1956 by jammers. ('PRE-REVOLT CONDITIONS 2. HUNGARIAN REVOLT IN OCTOBER 1956 3. ADVANCED EDUCATION', February 7, 1958, p. G-4) (IMG)

At the same time, the Moscow Titoists, in collusion with the Belgrade Titoists, worked to install the Hungarian Titoists onto power:

conferences were being carried on between the Russian leaders and Tito. Tito had demanded that the reparation payments, among others those from Hungary, which had been stopped by Stalin in 1948, should be resumed, and that the relationships with Hungary should be improved. His great enemy in Hungary, RAKOSI, immediately fell along with his supporters as a victim of the de-Stalinization and was succeeded by GERO. ('PRE-REVOLT CONDITIONS 2. HUNGARIAN REVOLT IN OCTOBER 1956 3. ADVANCED EDUCATION', February 7, 1958, p. C-7) (IMG)

Khrushchev and Mikoyan personally were involved in ousting Rakosi and promoting the Titoist foes of Rakosi. As the CIA stated:

The extreme de-Stalinization pronouncements of Khrushchev and Mikoyan at the 20th congress of the Soviet Communist Party dealt a drastic blow to the Rakosi regime and encouraged his opponents into renewed efforts to oust him and institute liberalized policies. (FACTIONALISM IN THE HUNGARIAN WORKERS (COMMUNIST) PARTY (1945-1956), CIA, January, 28, 1957, p. III) (IMG)

The party was shattered as the result of a series of Soviet policy moves culminating in the de-Stalinization pronouncements of Khrushchev and Mikoyan at the 20th congress of the Soviet Communist Party. These measures split the party into hostile factions and precipitated dissension in the organization from top to bottom. (FACTIONALISM IN THE HUNGARIAN WORKERS (COMMUNIST) PARTY (1945-1956), CIA, January, 28, 1957, p. I) (IMG)

Mikoyan reportedly arrived on 14 July, rejected Rakosi's proposal for the arrest of some 400 persons, including some forty writers and ... Imre Nagy, and apparently was sustained in his verdict by Khrushchev. It strongly appears that Rakosi was forced to resign as party chief when his plans for coping with the opposition were rejected. Rakosi's subsequent references to his guilt of "cult of personality" suggests that Mikoyan may have lectured him on the subject during his visit to Budapest. (FACTIONALISM IN THE HUNGARIAN WORKERS (COMMUNIST) PARTY (1945-1956), CIA, January, 28, 1957, p. 72) (IMG)

Gero was Hungary's Malenkov equivalent; in other words, he was a Titoist but of the kind that was somewhat more coopted by the communists, unlike Nagy who was not really coopted by the communists much. Nonetheless, during the Gero era, the,:

the rehabilitation of [Yugoslav-backed Nazi anti-Semite] RAJK with complete restoration of honor took place.... ('PRE-REVOLT CONDITIONS 2. HUNGARIAN REVOLT IN OCTOBER 1956 3. ADVANCED EDUCATION', February 7, 1958, p. C-6) (IMG)

The rise of the Titoist faction in Hungary led to the elevation of the fascist agents into the Hungarian military and intelligence apparatus, an elevation that was reinforced morally by the criminalization of the Hungarian counter-intelligence service which had hunted the Nazi agent Rajk down. As the CIA document had stated, RAKOSI, immediately fell along with his supporters as a victim of the de-Stalinization'. At the same time, this gave the pro-Nazi elements the operational freedom they needed for counter-revolutionary action against the people of Hungary. Then,:

In October 1956 GERO and some of his close fellow workers made the trip to Belgrade [just when a rebellion had started in Hungary].

Meanwhile revolt had started in Hungary also.... ('PRE-REVOLT CONDITIONS 2. HUNGARIAN REVOLT IN OCTOBER 1956 3. ADVANCED EDUCATION', February 7, 1958, p. C-7) (IMG)

With the planned absence of Gero, Hungary's Malenkov equivalent, the non-coopted Titoists gained much greater operational freedom and engaged in a colour revolution. With the support of Hungary's Titoist leadership, the Hungarian intelligentsia first staged rallies, which – very importantly – were supported by the counter-revolutionary elements of the AVH. This is important because it shows that the Titoist elements had indeed risen in the ranks of the Hungarian security apparatus. The colour revolutionary intelligentsia moved towards Hungary's radio station in order to be able to further agitate the intelligentsia. However, the doors were locked. The reactionary elements in the Hungarian security, AVH, intervened, shot the guards, and allowed the colour revolutionary students to continue their measures. The CIA reported:

a movement of sympathy with the Poles arose; this was supported by the [the Titoist] Hungarian leaders for reasons of opportunism. A mass meeting was to be held by Hungarian youth at the Joseph Behm Square, where the statue of this Polish freedom hero stands. A great many people got time off to attend the this meeting and rather small Behm Square could not contain this mass of people. Meanwhile GERO, who was just returning from Belgrade, had ordered that the meeting could not be held, but shortly thereafter permission was given. The meeting took place on 23 October in the afternoon. Before that, the Petofi club had called upon the Disz (Communist Youth Organization) to close ranks with it on a number of points containing the demands of the Hungarian youth for more democracy. The crowd met in the square by the Parliament building. The Budapest students had decided on this, and the leadership of the Disz had joined them. Here it was demanded that the program of the Hungarian youth should be made known over the radio, for which purpose the mass moved to the radio station in Budapest. When this building appeared to be completely locked, people tried by force to get access to the station. Some young officers tried to intervene but were shot down by AVH troops who had arrived in the meantime. ('PRE-REVOLT CONDITIONS 2. HUNGARIAN REVOLT IN OCTOBER 1956 3. ADVANCED EDUCATION', February 7, 1958, p. C-7 to C-8. Bold added) (IMG)

The colour revolutionary uprising of the intelligentsia, timed with the arrival of Gero to Belgrade and the opportune time for Nagy to launch the rebellion, was far from spontaneous, especially considering how supported it was by the Titoist elements in the AVH and the Hungarian military. And furthermore, as reported by The Independent, the MI6 officer Michael Smith said:

The [British intelligence] officers I spoke to said there was an intention to cause an uprising in Hungary. (MI6 trained Rebels to fight Soviets in Hungarian Revolt, The Independent, Christopher Bellamy, October 22, 1996) (IMG)

Hence came the colour revolution. The colour revolution created the pressure from below with which the Nagy gang were able to conquer power and purge the communist faction:

Confronted with this crisis, the party central committee and politburo were called into hasty session on the night of 23-24 October. (...).

During the stormy all-night session several Stalinists were thrown out of the political committee ... and replaced by two moderates (Szanto and Kobol) and one Nagyist, Losonczy. In the early morning hours, Nagy was chosen premier. The following day – 25 October – with the fighting mounting in violence, Erno Gero was deposed as party first secretary and Janos Kadar elected in his place.

(FACTIONALISM IN THE HUNGARIAN WORKERS (COMMUNIST) PARTY (1945-1956), CIA, January, 28, 1957, p. 79) (IMG)

Contrary to what is often claimed, there is no evidence of a major involvement of the Hungarian proletarians in the colour revolution. Certain segments of the Hungarian workers surely did involve in the colour revolution, of course.

The 1953 Titoist New Course de-emphasized heavy industry and producer goods, and promoted economic decentralization. The effects of this were clearly reflected in the situation in Hungary. The Titoization agenda and the New Course, caused an economic disaster in Hungary. Hungary was seeing steady and high level of economic growth until 1953, but the growth began to slow down after the 1953 introduction of the Titoist 'New Course'. With the purge of the Beriaites and the rise of the Gero group, which was coopted by the Rakosi faction in 1954, growth partially resumed, but by 1955, when the Khrushchev faction reasserted influence, growth in Hungary ceased and in fact the economy began to sharply decline. Unrest, therefore, began to grow. However, even then, the discontent did not grow into the active participation of the workers, unlike what the Trotskyites often claim. Recall from C10S7, that even those proletarians who had become enthusiastic members of the Nazi Party ended up serving as a major communist fifth column, a pool of spies for the KPD and the USSR, as well as Strasserite rebels waging a shadow war against the Hitler gang. If even those 'Nazified' proletarians ended up serving as a de facto anti-Nazi fifth column inside the Nazi Party, what reason is there to believe that the Hungarian proletariat would become a horde of diehard Titoist fascist counter-revolutionaries? There is no reason to believe such, nor is there any evidence that such a thing occurred. Despite the slight involvement of Hungarian workers, the core of the so called 'proletarian revolution' was not at all by the proletariat but by the Hungarian intelligentsia. Some workers' councils were reportedly established but even then, the workers in such councils did not engage as much in the colour revolution. The core of the 'revolution' was by the intelligentsia and was mainly based not in the factories but in the universities:

the leaders of the revolution at the universities were the following, among others: Ladislaus POSZNAR, Alex PERGEL, Johann VINCE, Johann VARGA, Edith MOLNAR, Eduard NEMETHY, Alex SAL, and Zoltan MEREY, all of whom were taken prisoner by the KADAR regime. Bela JANKO, and Ladislaus GRUBER were in this central leadership. these people were representatives of the various faculties of the Budapest University and the Technical High School. There was also a group of intellectuals occupied with the complete reconstruction of Hungary. Leading figures among them were Georg ADAM, a writer; Ladislaus KARDOS and Georg MARKOS, professors. The revolutionary council of the Medical University consisted of representatives of the professors, lecturers, and assistants and students. The first one was represented by Dr. Stephan PATAKY and Dr. Zoltan ZSEBLK.... ('PRE-REVOLT CONDITIONS 2. HUNGARIAN REVOLT IN OCTOBER 1956 3. ADVANCED EDUCATION', February 7, 1958, p. C-9) (IMG)

Then events followed very fast. People quit work everywhere, and in the shortest possible time, in all offices, places of work, plants, and so forth workers' councils were chosen by free and secret written ballot. In the meantime the fighting groups had gotten a great number of weapons from the Kilian barracks, where a young Captain had taken over the leadership and opened up the stores of weapons. Also supplies of weapons came freely from the factory militias of the large plants in and around Budapest. Then government had lost its power and shortly before his resignation GERO, on the basis of the Warsaw Pact, called in the help of the Russian troops. In the meantime the leaders of the revolution at the universities kept themselves busy trying to create a nucleus out of the writers to form a coordinating organ between the various revolutionary councils, which at first worked completely independently. This was, of course, a result of the great spontaneity of the revolution. Couriers instituted communications between the various councils and after some days, there really was coordination. Also, close contact was maintained with the NAGY government. At the urging of the coordinating organ NAGY reported that as quickly as possible discussions would be opened with the Russians concerning the withdrawal of the Russian troops. ('PRE-REVOLT CONDITIONS 2. HUNGARIAN REVOLT IN OCTOBER 1956 3. ADVANCED EDUCATION', February 7, 1958, pp. C-8 to C-9. Bold added.) (IMG)

The above CIA report itself contained a number of anti-Soviet and anti-communist biases, of course, presenting the fascist war in Hungary as a 'pro-democracy' uprising. However, even in that biased CIA report, no evidence was provided of an active 'proletarian' involvement in the 'revolutionary' efforts of the Hungarian intelligentsia. The maximum amount of 'evidence' was that 'People quite work' – which could easily be due to the feeling of unsafety as a result of the 'revolution' – and that "workers' councils" were formed in the factories. The formation of workers' councils and the self-management of factories would reduce economic discipline but could hardly be the active 'proletarian revolution' which the Trotskyites describe. The 'revolution' in Hungary was mainly done by the intelligentsia, and the involvement of the pro-'revolution' elements among the proletarians was at best conservative and limited to mere formation of 'councils' in factories. Again, when even the Nazi-minded among the German proletarians served as a crypto-anti-fascist fifth column in the Nazi movement, what reason is there to believe that Hungary's proletarians would suddenly become active pro-Horthyite warriors? Historical experience has shown many a time that those proletarian masses indoctrinated with reactionary pro-fascist anti-communist propaganda end up not fighting as much the progressive and communist forces and direct their hawkish rhetoric towards the imperialists, accusing the latter of allegedly not being anti-communist and chauvinist 'enough'. In the United States, this fake 'anti-communism' of the proletarians is concentrated in the Trump's electoral base, which preaches American supremacy while actually accusing the American corporations and American intelligence of being run by 'Marxists'. In Israel, the post-2005 pro-Putinist 'far-right' movements, which receive the support of the Hebrew proletarians, are anti-Arab and anti-communist in rhetoric but have struck the IDF, CIA, Mossad, and private banks tens of times more than they have struck the Arab civilians and the communist cause. In short, some individual proletarians, many from parasitic class backgrounds such as kulaks, would be serious anti-communists, but the bulk of those proletarians influenced by anti-communist or pro-fascist ideas tend to direct their energy towards combat against the actual fascists and anti-communists, all the while being soft on the real communists and real anti-fascists. It follows that the fascist 'revolution' in Hungary could not possibly be anything close to an 'uprising of the proletarians' and that the formation of councils was the maximum level of 'proletarian defiance against the regime'.

Another noteworthy member of the Nagy regime was Georgi Lukacs, the Titoist 'philosopher' and 'sociologist' whose elevation was clearly indicative of the elevation of the liberal intelligentsia in the Hungarian regime apparatus and the inherent links of the intelligentsia with the MI6-backed Nazis:

Lukacs returned to Hungary in 1945 and though his record with non-Party intellectuals during the Cold War is not emblemished, he did in 1956 become a minister of the brief communist revolutionary government of Imre Nagy, which opposed the Soviet Union. (Moscow, the Fourth Rome, Katerina Clark. p. 347. No Image)

Nagy undertook the radical Titoization of the Hungarian system:

Nagy from the outset took a more extreme position than the moderates. On 28 October [four days since the start of the rebellion] he declared that the bloody fighting between revolutionaries and Soviet and AVH forces was due to "mistakes and crimes" of the past ten years, and denied that counterrevolutionary elements were behind the insurrection. (...). He assented to the suspension of collectivization (28 October) and abolition of the crop collection system (30 October). (FACTIONALISM IN THE HUNGARIAN WORKERS (COMMUNIST) PARTY (1945-1956), CIA, January, 28, 1957, p. 81) (IMG)

With the high level of influence over the military and intelligence bodies by the Titoists elevated by Khrushchev, Mikoyan, and Tito, the resources of the Hungarian military were being diverted by rogue Hungarian military officials directly to the colour revolutionaries as stated previously. The Titoist colour revolutionary intelligentsia were armed by the CIA and MI6 via Austria. The vehemently anti-Soviet MI6 official Michael Smith wrote:

On 23 October 1956 a student demonstration calling for free elections, the withdrawal of Russian troops and the return of Nagy brought a quarter of a million people on to the streets of Budapest. Large numbers of weapons began to appear in the crowd. Some came from the American arms caches in Austria and other almost certainly were British. Fighting broke out with security forces. In an attempt to placate the demonstrators, Nagy was reappointed Prime Minister. There was sporadic fighting for several days, followed by a series of reforms introduced by Nagy, including the disbandment of AVH secret police.... ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith, pp. 123-124) (IMG)

Long before the colour revolution, the CIA and MI6 had been preparing for such a day:

American intelligence had stepped up its covert operations in Eastern Europe in the twelve-month period leading to the Hungarian uprising, training the 'Red Sox' teams of Polish, Hungarian, Czech and Romanian emigres for covert action inside their home countries. Allen Dulles, the head of the CIA, told the National Security Council that 'developments in the satellites present the greatest opportunity for the last ten years both covertly and overtly to exploit the situation'. ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith. p. 122) (IMG)

Prior to the uprising:

MI6 had been active behind the scenes for some time providing covert assistance to potential Hungarian rebels and was aware that they were planning an uprising. (New Cloak, Old Dagger. Michael Smith. p. 123) (IMG)

The British had been in close contact with dissident elements inside Hungary for some time, spiriting them across the border into the British zone of Austria for resistance training preparation for a future uprising. ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith. p. 123) (IMG)

In fact:

Certainly MI6 planned to support resistance fighters in both Hungary and Czechoslovakia. The SIS representatives in Prague and Budapest went out into the woods burying stay-behind packs like those that were being hidden in the Austrian Alps by Preston and Giles. ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith. p. 123) (IMG)

Describing the details of the MI6 involvement, Smith stated:

But dissidents appear to have made their own way across the border rendezvousing with their contact in true Cold War fashion, often quite literally under a certain lamp-post in a backstreet of a border town. A military officer working for MI6 would then take them up into the mountains for a four-day crash course in a variety of military skills before they were infiltrated back into Hungary. ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith. p. 123) (IMG)

British intelligence had stumbled on a startlingly easy way of getting people out of Hungary and into Austria. An illegal frontier crosser admitted that her nephew, a driver on one of the trains taking Soviet staff officers from Hungary to their HQ in Austria, had smuggled her across the border in the cab. ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith. p. 123) (IMG)

As The Independent reported,:

the weapons used were American, and others almost certainly British. (MI6 trained Rebels to fight Soviets in Hungarian Revolt, The Independent, Christopher Bellamy, October 22, 1996) (IMG)

Smith further stated that the:

MI6 and the CIA had buried arms caches in the woods around Prague and Budapest for use by "stay-behind" parties or fifth columnists in case of war. (MI6 trained Rebels to fight Soviets in Hungarian Revolt, The Independent, Christopher Bellamy, October 22, 1996) (IMG)

A British intelligence officer interviewed by Smith recalled:

We were taking them up into the mountains and giving them a sort of ... crash course. I would be told to pick somebody up from a street corner at a certain time of night in the pouring rain. Graz was our staging point. Then, after we'd trained them - explosives, weapons training - I used to take them back ... We were training the agents for the uprising. (MI6 trained Rebels to fight Soviets in Hungarian Revolt, The Independent, Christopher Bellamy, October 22, 1996) (IMG)

Meanwhile, the Anglo-American imperialist press propagated the myth that the Hungarian 'revolution' was completely spontaneous, that the 'revolutionaries' got virtually no assistance from the Anglo-American intelligence organizations supposedly because the Anglo-Americans could only focus on the Suez Crisis at the time and not on Hungary, and that the 'revolution' was by the proletarians. The Anglo-Americans kept on denying involvement in the events in Hungary in order to present it as spontaneous, so that more Hungarians participate in it without fear of foreign schemes – and this too was a part of the media work. The colour revolution that Nikita Khrushchev and other Kremlin Titoists had helped ignite also gave them the excuse to 'be busy' with Hungary so to not come to the aid of the Masriyin in the face of the Anglo-Israeli invasion of Egypt. Yet, it was not just the CIA and MI6 which had a role in the colour revolution. Recall that Yugoslavia had set up a radio to agitate the intelligentsia towards a colour revolution. Yugoslav involvement did not end there.

The Nazi German Panzerwaffe troops harbored by Titoist Yugoslavia were then deployed to Budapest to launch the massive anti-communist terror operations and anti-Semitic pogroms:

two trucks with panzer troops had been on the way from Yugoslavia to Budapest. This would have been after 4 November, and it is said that the trucks with the panzer troops, which had surrounded Budapest, were taken prisoner. ('PRE-REVOLT CONDITIONS 2. HUNGARIAN REVOLT IN OCTOBER 1956 3. ADVANCED EDUCATION', February 7, 1958, p. G-3) (IMG)

The role of the Yugoslav regime in instigating the colour revolution had also been confirmed by the Warsaw Pact media at the time, by the Red Army officials, as well as by the memoirs of Enver Hoxha. The gang of the Gestapo agent Tito went farther than mere incitement and even served as the harbourer of the Nazi Wehrmacht's Panzerwaffe troops deployed to Hungary for fighting supposedly on behalf of the Hungarian people.

Numerous Nazi-aligned Horthyites participated in the colour revolution along with the UDB-backed Panzerwaffe troops. The CIA reported:

Of course, some individuals who took an active part in the revolution have a background in the days of the [pro-Nazi] Horthy regime: for instance, army officers who joined the freedom fighters or provided them with weapons, have been officers in Horthy's army.... (Some Lessons of the Hungarian Revolution, CIA, p. 5) (IMG)

Fierce nationalism, as the CIA pointed out, played a prominent role in the rebellion:

These events [in Hungary] encouraged the fierce nationalism which had characterized all of Hungary's history. (...). Nationalist symbols (the flag, the anthem, the coat of arms) played a significant role throughout the recent events. (Some Lessons of the Hungarian Revolution, CIA, p. 2) (IMG)

Specifically providing the defining characteristics of the kind of fierce nationalism spoken of, the CIA stated:

Hungarian nationalism is anti-Slav, anti-Rumanian, anti-Czechoslovakian, anti-Semitic, and anti-Communist. On the positive side it is Christian, pro-German ... and pro-Western, consisting of a deeply ingrained sense of the historic role of Hungary as a Christian nation and an outpost of Western civilization and culture. The establishment of Roman Catholicism as Hungary's national religion in 1000 A.D. oriented not only religious feeling but also the nation's culture and political development toward the West.... (Resistance Factors and Special Forces Areas Hungary, CIA, August, 1957, p. 4. Bold added) (IMG)

The kind of 'fierce nationalism' manifest in those protests was an anti-Semitic one:

rejection of Hungarian [territorial] revisionist ambitions, [and] the disproportionate number of Jews in high official positions, ... are forceful illustrations that Communism is the very antithesis of Hungarian nationalism. (Resistance Factors and Special Forces Areas Hungary, CIA, August, 1957, p. 4) (IMG)

The CIA confirmed that the vast majority of Hungary's Yiddish population had an extremely low counter-revolutionary potential and that the Yiddish-Hungarians supported the Red Army intervention and the communist-coopted Kadar group. The US intelligence also confirmed that the Hungarian 'revolutionaries' launched many pogroms. As always, a large minority of the Yiddish, some of the Yiddish intelligentsia and most Yiddish bureaucrats, were collaborating with the Nazis against the proletarian majority of Hungary's Yiddish population. Jewish pro-Nazi organizations subservient to American imperialism credibly claimed that a large minority of the Yiddish population in Hungary actively supported the 'revolutionaries' (Yugoslav-harboured Panzerwaffe troops). The following is an excerpt of the CIA document:

One U.S. Jewish spokesman, apparently well-informed, has claimed that some 25,000 Jews in Hungary joined in the revolt against Communism. Another source, also well-informed, claims that 16,000 Jews were among the great tide of Hungarian refugees which crossed the frontier and found haven in Austria. Granted these allegations are true, the question remains as to what part was taken in the rebellion by the remaining 100,000 or more Jews in Hungary. No conclusive answer is possible, but the available information suggests that while many of these Jews took no action either for or against the government, a large percentage actively supported the Kadar regime and the Soviet intervention. In this connection it may be noted that the ... Hungarian secret police (AVH), which [mostly] remained loyal to the Communist Party throughout the rebellion and was the principal target of revolutionary fury, is believed to have been staffed in considerable measure by Jewish [proletarian] personnel.

Under present conditions existing in Hungary, both the resistance potential of the Hungarian Jews and their possible utility to Special Forces appear to be exceptionally poor. A large proportion, possibly the majority, of the Jewish population is apparently loyal to the Kadar regime either through conviction or desire to live in peace. Of the Jews who sympathized with or aided the recent revolt, it seems likely that many have been badly shaken by the anti-Semitic outbursts of the revolutionaries and now ask themselves whether the position of the Jews in a liberated Hungary would be any better than under a Communist government.

(Resistance Factors and Special Forces Areas Hungary, CIA, August, 1957, pp. 97-98. Bold added.) (IMG)

The Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA) too confirmed that pogroms throughout Hungary were taking place during the 'revolution', although, ever the propaganda weapon of the Anglo-American imperialist agencies, the JTA claimed that the attacks were 'sporadic' rather than pervasive and systematic:

The revolution saw sporadic attacks on Jews in small towns across the country, with some targeted as representatives of the regime and others simply for being Jews. In Budapest, a few soap-box orators raged against "the Jews," and some elderly Jews say they feared the revolution would turn against them. All told, some 200,000 Hungarians, or some 2 percent of the population, fled the country, including an estimated 20,000 Jews, or one-fifth of the Jewish population. (1956 crises decimated two Jewish communities, in Hungary and Egypt, Michael Jordan, October 25, 2006. Bold added.) (IMG)

For the Gestapo agent Tito and his Nazi terror band, the Holocaust was not enough. Tito and his gang felt thirst for the blood of a seventh million. For them, the quota of the seventh million was a measure of career success. Nowhere and never did they miss the chance to directly and materially support the pogromists, be they the Gestapo torturers in Yugoslavia, the Nazi Wehrmacht's Panzerwaffe troops in Hungary, the infamous Nazi spy General Marian Spychalski in Poland, the Gestapo agent Anwar Sadat in Egypt, the PLO terrorists in Lebanon, and the Saddamite Iraqi regime. So correctly the Stalin-era Soviet Foreign Ministry describe Tito, that proud Nazi in the closet, as Hitler's successor:

The Tito fascist clique is an abominable product of the darkest forces of international reaction. The imperialists rightly regard Tito as Hitler's successor. It is no accident that when the fascists captured power in Germany the Tito-Rankovic clique was in the service of the Hitlerite Gestapo which later turned over the Yugoslav traitors to the secret services of other imperialist powers. (Tito-Rankovic Clique Has Established Fascist Regime in Yugoslavia, A. Kalinin, April 14, 1950. In: Information Bulletin, Soviet Union. Posol'stvo (U.S.), p. 221) (IMG{Titoist Yugoslavia})

The Yugoslav regime staffed its UDB fascist secret service with Gestapo cadres. The Titoist-Nazi Yugoslav regime agitated for such an anti-Semitic pogromist 'revolution' and harboured the Panzerwaffe troops that carried out the anti-Semitic terror as part of the systematic annihilation campaign against Hungary's pro-communist loyalist Yiddish population. All this time, the CIA-funded media propagated the myth that Titoist Yugoslavia, the dictatorship that picked up the mantle of Himmler and Eichmann, was Eastern Europe's 'most philo-Semitic' 'socialist' state under the 'benevolent' reign of which the Semitic communities culturally 'flourished'.

A prominent Nazi anti-Semitic commander of the CIA-backed MI6-backed Hungarian fascist rebels was Bela Kiraly. Nagy released Bela Kiraly and made him the leader of the Hungarian rebel armed forces and planted other counter-revolutionary fascist agents to become prominent leaders of the Hungarian government:

He permitted the revolutionary reorganization of the Defense Ministry and the appointment of revolutionaries (Maleter and Kovacs) and ex-prisoners (e.g., Bela Kiraly) to top military posts. (FACTIONALISM IN THE HUNGARIAN WORKERS (COMMUNIST) PARTY (1945-1956), CIA, January, 28, 1957, p. 81) (IMG)

Bela Kiraly was a former Nazi commander in Hungary. According to 'The Independent',:

Kiraly stayed with the army when Hungary's leader, Miklos Horthy, was removed from power by the pro-Nazi Arrow Cross movement in October 1944 after he had ordered Hungarian forces to cease fighting. On Hitler's orders the Arrow Cross were determined to continue the war to the end. Days before that end came for Hungary, in March 1945, Kiraly was put in charge of defending the town of Koeszeg on the Austrian border. (Bela Kiraly: Soldier who led Hungarian resistance against the Soviet Union during the 1956 uprising, The Independent, Gabriel Patros, Saturday 11 July 2009, underline added) (IMG)

For his Nazi activities, he was:

a victim of the old Stalinist regime.... (Bela Kiraly: Soldier who led Hungarian resistance against the Soviet Union during the 1956 uprising, The Independent, Gabriel Patros, Saturday 11 July 2009) (IMG)

Kiraly attended:

Kiraly was released weeks before the 1956 Revolution, and was in hospital recovering from an operation when fighting erupted in Budapest on 23 October. Five days later he was smuggled out of hospital, against doctors' orders, to attend a national gathering of armed revolutionary groups. Such was his reputation both in military terms and as a victim of the old Stalinist regime, that he was almost immediately elected Commander-in-Chief of the newly formed National Guard which brought together the various revolutionary groups with sympathetic units from the established security forces. (Bela Kiraly: Soldier who led Hungarian resistance against the Soviet Union during the 1956 uprising, The Independent, Gabriel Patros, Saturday 11 July 2009) (IMG)

True, the USSR had collapsed in early 1956 and Eurasia was a dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie, but the membership composition of the Titoist 'CPSU' was such that the Titoist white-collar elements only had a slight margin over the non-white-collar elements, the proletarians and kolkhozniks. They were in the weaker position, but had power enough so as to raise vigilance against the fatal dangers of Titoization and to coopt some of the Titoist agents in the 'CPSU' against Titoization, if Khrushchev showed an unacceptably poor a performance. The communist loyalists that operated within the Eurasian state apparatus and the 'CPSU' could persuade enough ordinary elements in the Party, even them who would have normally sided with Khrushchev, and to coopt enough the Titoists under the pressure of the proletarians to temporarily 'cross the floor' and side with the communist faction, and thereby form the majority with which to compel Khrushchev to take proper action. Indeed, a memorandum from the US National Security Council (NSC) stated:

Following this development there had been a flood of intelligence material alleging new and serious rifts over the Yugoslav problem among the Soviet leaders. It was the burden of many of these reports that Khrushchev was now completely isolated in support of the new and more liberal approach to Yugoslavia. Certain Yugoslav sources were insisting that Khrushchev's opponents are arguing that Tito's policies are dangerously weakening the control of the USSR over its satellites. Whatever the precise truth of all these rumors, General Cabell said that the CIA believed that recently Soviet policy toward the satellites had given rise to concern and that the Soviet leaders believed they will now have to shift their course and again tighten their controls. On the other hand, General Cabell pointed out that Bulganin and Mikoyan had been at least as closely associated with the new policy of liberalism toward the satellites as Khrushchev himself. (Memorandum of Discussion at the 298th Meeting of the National Security Council, Washington, September 27, 1956. In: 'Foreign Relations of the United States, 1955-1957', Vol. 26, Central and Southeastern Europe, US Department of State, p. 747) (IMG)

As such, Khrushchev was eventually, and with much reluctance and delay, compelled to engage against the Hungarian colour revolutionaries by sending the Red Army. In late October 1956, there was:

full-scale fighting between AVH troops and the rioters (24 October), Soviet troops intervened. (FACTIONALISM IN THE HUNGARIAN WORKERS (COMMUNIST) PARTY (1945-1956), CIA, January, 28, 1957, p. IV) (IMG)

On November 1, 1956, Nagy officially announced the withdrawal of Hungary from the Warsaw Pact and appealed to the US-led camp for support:

On 1 November, presumably under the influence of extreme revolutionaries and faced with the build-up of Soviet armies, Nagy took the extreme step of proclaiming Hungary's withdrawal from the Warsaw pact and asking for the neutralization of Hungary under the protection of the United Nations. (FACTIONALISM IN THE HUNGARIAN WORKERS (COMMUNIST) PARTY (1945-1956), CIA, January, 28, 1957, p. 81) (IMG)

Red Army troops entered Hungary and obliterated many of the fascist forces led by Nagy. Fearing execution by the superior Red Army troops,:

Nagy and most of his ministers sought refuge at the Yugoslav embassy. With no one left to take orders from, Kiraly led several thousand members of the National Guard out of his headquarters in the centre of Budapest, first to the outskirts of the city and then to the Bakony mountains in western Hungary. (Bela Kiraly: Soldier who led Hungarian resistance against the Soviet Union during the 1956 uprising, The Independent, Gabriel Patros, Saturday 11 July 2009, underline added) (IMG)

Tito's gang gave refuge to Nagy. The communist forces in Eurasia later compelled Tito's gang to release Nagy from the Yugoslav embassy, upon promise of not hurting Nagy. Nagy was subsequently executed.

The Yugoslav regime continued to insist that the Red Army must leave Hungary. According to the research wing of the CIA's RFE/RL:

The Yugoslav delegate UN, Jozhe BRILEY, sprung a last night by joining the growing demand from the non-Communist world that Soviet troops be withdrawn from Hungary and the Hungarians be permitted to manage their own affairs.

BRILEY told an emergency session of the General Assembly that his government was opposed to intervention of foreign forces in any country. "The less interference, from whatever source, the better for the Hungarian people."

(YUGOSLAV REACTION TO HUNGARY, Evaluation and Research Section, Radio Free Europe / Radio Liberty Research Institute, November 9, 1956, p. 1. In: Open Society Archives, Budapest, Hungary) (IMG)

Although the Red Army rightly intervened in Hungary, once again the slight margin which the Titoists had over the communists in the struggle for control over the Red Army was manifest, this time in the choice of who was to lead the new Hungary. Janos Kadar, a former deputy and ally of Laszlo Rajk with ties to the Horthyite intelligence service during the Great Patriotic War, was the deputy to Imre Nagy during the 'Hungarian Revolution'. While Nagy's chances of political survival had ceased, the Marshal of the Renegades Tito decided to go ahead with supporting the next 'best' Titoist candidate in Hungary at the time, Janos Kadar. Importantly, Yuri Andropov, a pro-Nazi MI6 agent and the Eurasian ambassador to Hungary at the time, supported the Nazi Hungarian rebels led by Imre Nagy, an assisted Tito in the efforts to install Kadar. Such facts are well-documented.

To document Andropov's treasonous activities, let us start with an excerpt of the Sergo Beria biography of Lavrenti Beria. Sergio Beria recalled that many years later, when Andropov had emerged as the chief of the KGB, Andropov had told Sergo Beria:

'I have closely studied your father's proposals on economic and foreign policy fields. Many of them are absolutely correct.' ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 277) (IMG)

Note that Lavrenti Beria had been the top supporter of the Imre Nagy faction. That Yuri Andropov would hail 'Many' of the economic and foreign policy lines of Lavrenti Beria was strongly indicative of what was to come. Vyacheslav Matuzov, among the most prominent KGB officials in the 1970s and the 1980s, confirmed that Yuri Andropov's intelligence roots can be traced to Leon Trotsky, and that Andropov was one of the leaders of Gorbachev's 'Perestroika':

The mechanism of "perestroika" was carried out by Primakov's supporters outside the KGB, partially attracting from there the personnel that Andropov personally created. After all, Andropov also came to the KGB and the Central Committee not from scratch. And here it is interesting to consider the roots of Andropov himself. (...). Andropov was the first secretary of the Central Committee of the Komsomol of the Karelo-Finnish SSR. Otto Kuusinen stood behind him. Who was Kuusinen associated with? With Lieutenant General of State Security Yevgeny Pitovranov. This is the "father" of all the Andropovs, Primakovs and other leaders of "perestroika". (...). The thread runs from the Comintern and Leon Trotsky. The "red thread" in this story is the struggle of Joseph Stalin against Trotskyism in the ranks of the law enforcement agencies. In my opinion, all this was created on the basis of the special services. ('Vyacheslav Matuzov:

Mikhail Gorbachev was a pawn in the plan for the collapse of the USSR', EurAsia Daily, interviewer: Sarkis Tsaturyan, March 11, 2019) (IMG)

Enver Hoxha recalled in his memoirs that Yuri Andropov supported the Nagy faction and the Nazi terrorist insurgents in 1956:

The Soviet ambassador in Hungary was a certain Andropov, a KGB man, who was elevated to power later and played a dirty role against us. This agent, with the label of ambassador, found himself surrounded by the counter-revolution which broke out. Even when the counter-revolutionary events were taking place openly, when Nagy came to the head of the government, the Soviets still continued to support him, apparently hoping that they could keep him under control. During those days, after the first half-hearted intervention of the Soviet army, Andropov told our ambassador in Budapest:

“We cannot call the insurgents counter-revolutionaries because there are honest people among them. The new government is good and it is necessary to support it in order to stabilize the situation.”

“What do you think of Nagy’s speeches?” our ambassador asked him.

“They are not bad,” replied Andropov, and when our comrade pointed out that what was being said about the Soviet Union did not seem to be correct, he replied:

“There is anti-Sovietism, but Nagy’s recent speech was not bad, it was not anti-Soviet. He wants to maintain links with the masses. The Political Bureau is good and has credit.

The counter-revolutionaries acted with such arrogance that they forced Andropov, together with all his staff, out into the street and left them there for hours on end. We instructed our ambassador in Budapest to take measures for the defence of the embassy and its staff, and to place a machine-gun at the top of the stairs. If the counter-revolutionaries dared to attack the embassy he was to open fire without hesitation. But when our ambassador asked Andropov for weapons to ensure the defence of our embassy, he refused:

“We have diplomatic immunity, therefore no one will touch you.”

“What diplomatic immunity?!” said our ambassador. “They threw you out into the street.”

“No, no,” said Andropov, “if we give you arms, some incident might be created.”

“Very well,” said our representative. “I am making you an official request on behalf of the Albanian government.”

“I shall ask Moscow,” said Andropov, and when the request was refused our ambassador declared:

“All right, only I am letting you know that we shall defend ourselves with the pistol and shotguns we have.”

The Soviet ambassador had shut himself up in the embassy and did not dare to stick his head out. A responsible functionary of the Foreign Ministry of Hungary, who was being chased by the bandits, sought refuge in our embassy and we admitted him. He told our comrades that he had gone to the Soviet embassy but they had turned him away.

The New York Times – having interviewed several Hungarians and ‘Westerners’ in Budapest, Geneva, and elsewhere, who knew Yuri Andropov during his years in Hungary – reported that Yuri Andropov sought to prevent the intervention of the Red Army against the Nagy faction:

On Nov. 1, 1956, with the streets of Budapest blackened from battle, with Soviet forces pouring into the country despite their agreed withdrawal from the capital, Imre Nagy, the leader of the Government, who sought to bring about change, found himself under pressure from all sides. He called Mr. Andropov to his office and denounced the troop movements.

The Soviet Ambassador said he knew nothing of this but promised to find out. Some time later, after what Hungarians close to the situation have described as a heated telephone conversation, he gave his word that the influx of Soviet troops would be halted. (...) The next day, the new commander of the national guard, Gen. Bela Kiraly, was sent to the Soviet Embassy to look into the Ambassador's complaints that Hungarians were sacking it. Mr. Kiraly, who now teaches at Brooklyn College, remembers that Mr. Andropov assured him, "Believe me, general, the Soviet people are Hungary's best friends." He offered immediate negotiations to discuss a new withdrawal of the Soviet troops.

(SOME INSIGHTS INTO ANDROPOV GLEANED FROM BUDAPEST ROLE, The New York Times, R. W. Apple Jr., December 28, 1982. “The writer of the following article [R. W. Apple Jr.] interviewed Hungarians and Westerners in Budapest, Geneva and elsewhere who knew Yuri V. Andropov during his years in Hungary on their expectations for the new Soviet leader.”) (IMG)

Upon finding out that Red Army intervention into Hungary had grow inevitable, Yuri Andropov found that the next ‘best’ candidate, from a Titoist perspective, was the deputy leader of the Hungarian Nazi rebel regime, Janos Kadar. Andropov persuaded Kadar, a Nagy faction loyalist, to pretend to oppose the Nagy faction and to deploy himself onto the camp of the Red Army:

According to several Hungarian sources, Mr. Andropov had already begun to make his plans for the country's future. On Nov. 1, Mr. Kadar, First Secretary of the party, and Ferenc Munnich, the Minister of the Interior in the Nagy Government, stopped at the Soviet Embassy and talked for some time, apparently to the Ambassador. Miklos Vasarhelyi, Mr. Nagy's press aide, who later spent four years in prison, said, "It was Andropov who talked to him first, and it was Andropov who persuaded Kadar to go over to the Soviet viewpoint."

(SOME INSIGHTS INTO ANDROPOV GLEANED FROM BUDAPEST ROLE, The New York Times, R. W. Apple Jr., December 28, 1982. “The writer of the following article [R. W. Apple Jr.] interviewed Hungarians and Westerners in Budapest, Geneva and elsewhere who knew Yuri V. Andropov during his years in Hungary on their expectations for the new Soviet leader.”) (IMG)

Through the MI6-backed Horthyite rebel and Titoist leader Janos Kadar, Andropov aimed to ensure the continuity of the Nagy faction’s project in Hungary after the overthrow of Imre Nagy’s immediate entourage. In other words, Kadar was to be a stay-behind agent of the Nagy faction, a Nagy loyalist who infiltrated the camp of the anti-Nagy forces so that the anti-Nagy opposition may be led, and misled, by an agent of the Nagy faction. Yuri Andropov decided to promote Janos Kadar at the behest of Tito himself:

It is widely believed in Budapest that Mr. Andropov was one of the key figures in persuading Nikita S. Khrushchev to install Mr. Kadar as Mr. Nagy's replacement. Khrushchev himself preferred Mr. Munnich, who had fought in the Russian Revolution and in the Red Army in World War II.

On the night of Nov. 2-3, however, Khrushchev was meeting President Tito of Yugoslavia at the latter's island retreat of Brijuni in the Adriatic Sea. According to the diary of a Yugoslav diplomat who was present, Tito argued strongly that Mr. Kadar would be more likely to attract a genuine popular following in Hungary, not least because he had served time in jail under the Stalinist Government of Matyas Rakosi.

"Andropov knew the opinion of Hungarian party leaders better than anyone else, and he knew the mood of the people," a close associate of Mr. Kadar said. "When Tito opted for Kadar, Andropov was in position to support him."

(SOME INSIGHTS INTO ANDROPOV GLEANED FROM BUDAPEST ROLE, The New York Times, R. W. Apple Jr., December 28, 1982. "The writer of the following article [R. W. Apple Jr.] interviewed Hungarians and Westerners in Budapest, Geneva and elsewhere who knew Yuri V. Andropov during his years in Hungary on their expectations for the new Soviet leader.") (IMG)

The CIA too confirmed that Janos Kadar, an agent of Nagy faction not really committed to cracking down on the Titoization efforts of the Nagy regime, was undertaking the pro-communist measures because he had been encircled by the communist intelligence agents who were planted around him under the guise of 'Soviet advisors':

the NAGY government had matters completely in hand on 3 November 1956 and without the support of the Russian troops, which in the meantime had been completely rotated, KADAR would not have gotten his foot in the door. Even during the first period of the KADAR regime, everything which had been changed and democratized by the revolutionary councils remained. People at the universities acted as though nothing had happened, tried to get things back on the rails as fast as possible and quietly to maintain the rights they had gained. KADAR, however, was completely surrounded by Russian advisors and is now a puppet of the Russian regime, a prisoner in his own Parliament building. Even after 4 November 1956 some people went ahead with the publishing of pamphlets, including a stenciled student newspaper which was read by the Hungarian population. ('PRE-REVOLT CONDITIONS 2. HUNGARIAN REVOLT IN OCTOBER 1956 3. ADVANCED EDUCATION', February 7, 1958, p. C-10) (IMG)

In other words, the anti-communist Kadar behaved like a 'communist', for he was coopted by the communist faction of the Soviet intelligence service. Nevertheless, the influence of the communists in the Soviet Red Army on Hungary was never sufficient so as to yield the replacement of the communist-coopted Titoist agent Janos Kadar with a communist loyalist anti-Titoist statesman. Kadar therefore served as the compromise candidate, the 'lesser Titoist'. Indeed, the 'lesser Titoist' 'lesser Nazi' Kadar group continued many of the Titoist policies lines albeit at a slower pace and to a lesser extent. The infamous American spymaster Noel Field, who had been released from Hungarian jail by Imre Nagy still roamed and operated freely in Hungary till the end of his life. Referring to the Noel Field family, Karel Kaplan, a West German intelligence agent, wrote in 1990:

All three Fields were released in October 1954. (The Report on the Murder of the General Secretary, Karel Kaplan, 1990, p. 25) (IMG)

The New York Times reported:

And after Soviet forces in 1956 toppled the Hungarian Government of Imre Nagy, which had released him, Noel Field upheld the new Hungarian regime of Premier Janos Kadar as having saved Hungary from "white terror." (Noel Field, Self-Exiled US Aide, is Dead, New York Times, September 14, 1970) (IMG)

Noel Field's condemnation of the 'White Terror' was obviously demagogical and was for fostering his cover as a fake 'communist'.

Noel Field died in Budapest, the Hungarian capital, in 1970 when Kadar was in power:

Noel Field, the former United States State Department official ... obtained asylum in Hungary with his wife, Herta, in 1954, died yesterday in a Budapest hospital. He was 66 years old and had long been suffering from cancer. (Noel Field, Self-Exiled US Aide, is Dead, New York Times, September 14, 1970) (IMG)

Regarding the influence of the Mossad in Hungary, the conditions also reflected the balance of forces. On the one hand, the Anglo-Yugoslav secret services had installed their agent Kadar at the helm and thus the UDB and MI6 had influence in Hungary. On the other hand, there was the Eurasian Red Army influence which countered the MI6-UDB influence in Hungary. This is reflected in the compromise situation with regards to the Zionist migration, involving the denial of passports to young people but permission for older people to leave:

Summary

Touval, on his own initiative, met with Hungarian Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs Szarka in order to express his gratitude on the successful beginning of emigration from Hungary and to ask that the Hungarians make sure that their instructions for issue of passports for anyone intending to leave for Israel be followed regardless of that person's age. Szarka said that to the best of his knowledge 80 passports for Israel are issued daily and that altogether 2,000 have been approved since December. He pledged to take action to remedy the denial of passports to young people as well as to enable the emigration of people previously imprisoned for Zionist activity.

Note that the elderly Yiddish citizens of Hungary were not considered 'biologically valuable' for the Zionist state-building project. The Mossad was often reluctant to bring the elderly to Israel (see C16S2). Therefore, the Hungarian government's limitation of the Zionist migration to the elderly showed that the communist forces, backed by the Red Army presence, exercised an overall greater influence over Hungary than the forces of Titoist reaction.

A month prior, Israel had been promised by Hungary's deputy foreign minister that efforts would be maximized to assist in the channeling of the Yiddish citizens in Hungary through Yugoslavia so to eventually reach Israel:

Touval reports on his talk with Deputy Foreign Minister Sebes on the options for emigration from Hungary.

Sebes affirmed his government's readiness to allow emigration and said that he believes that in January approximately a thousand Jews would be able to leave for Israel. The age restrictions imposed on emigrants would not hold for those going to Israel. He requested that an effort be made to carry out the emigration quietly.

Touval pledged Israel's readiness to channel the emigrants through Yugoslavia or send them by air and said that the mere fact that substantial emigration has commenced would calm the Jews and they would await their turn. He expressed his readiness to recommend that in the agreement between Israel and Hungary, precedence would be given, as far as possible, to merchandise that they require.

The talk was held in a very friendly atmosphere. With the utmost caution, Touval is starting to envisage mass immigration from Hungary to Israel.

The fact that the Kadar gang was in charge of Hungary on behalf of the Nagy faction even after the Red Army intervention serves as excellent proof of the depth of the influence which the Titoist faction in Moscow exercised over the Red Army. It shows that while the communist faction did have a large stake over the Eurasian state apparatus, the Titoist faction still thinly dominated in the Party, in the intelligence service, and in the military, not to mention also in the economic bodies.

C20S14. Economic Revisionism in Hungary

The well-known Anglo-Israeli intelligence operative Robert Maxwell – who was the father of Ghislaine Maxwell, the partner in crime of Jeffrey Epstein – was a ‘good’ friend of the Kadar group in Hungary. So welcomed was Maxwell by the Hungarians that got to write the introduction of a book of selected speeches and interviews by Kadar, a book that was published by the Hungarian government-controlled academic media. In the introduction to the book, Maxwell heaped praise on Kadar, but in the midst of such praise, he also pointed out that New Economic Mechanism, the revisionist policy advocated by Kadar and his group, brought greater autonomy for enterprises, and that Hungary was a member of the IMF:

The New Economic Mechanism has brought about major changes in industry which even allow workers to use State factories out of normal hours to produce goods for their own profit at privately negotiated prices. Factory managers are given greater autonomy, and personal accountability for performance has been increased throughout the economy. This flexibility of approach has brought benefits. Hungary is a member of the IMF and has improved its balance of payments, but her foreign debts are still relatively high. This has meant that the continuous improvement in the standard of living of the Hungarian people has halted over the last couple of years, although a modest resumption of economic growth is expected in 1985.

Kadar’s number one priority is the welfare and future of Hungary and her people, to which he has dedicated his whole life. Every problem, every situation, is tackled from the standpoint of Hungary and her place in the world. In this he is a fearless and formidable protagonist.

(Introduction, By: Robert Maxwell (General Editor of the ‘Leaders of the World’ Series), January 1985. In: ‘János Kádár: Selected Speeches and Interviews’, Akademiai Kiado, Budapest, 1985, pp. IX-X) (IMG)

In his speech to the Central Committee, Kadar emphasized that economic decentralization of management was "essential" "Marxist" "socialist reform":

The elements of the reform concerning the decentralization of distribution and management are also essential. Summing up, I believe I can say that the reform is a Marxist reform, a socialist reform. (Address to the Session of the Central Committee, Janos Kadar, November 24, 1967. In: ‘János Kádár: Selected Speeches and Interviews’, Akademiai Kiado, Budapest, 1985, p. 296) (IMG)

The CIA confirmed that the economic decentralization systematically decimated the Hungarian economy, for decentralization by nature drastically reduced coordination between the various economic bodies and empowered the local enterprises to engage in corrupt activities without any accountability to central bodies. Note that under a centralized economy, there would be no major problem regarding coordination. The centralization of the economic decision-making bodies away from many bureaus onto a few central bureaus would allow easier monitoring of the economy by the counter-intelligence agencies, for surveillance of a few central bureaus is easier than the surveillance of many scattered bureaus. Yet, decentralization did the precise opposite and empowered local enterprises to suck the budget while damaging production. Detailing the results of the New Economic Mechanism in Hungary, the CIA reported:

11. Under the NEM, the Hungarians hoped to cope with the investment problems by modernizing the construction and building materials industries and by decentralizing investment decision making. Beginning in 1969, substantial funds were earmarked for expanding output of cement, bricks, and other materials, and the construction industry was given a larger share of investment. Little payoff has been achieved so far or, in fact, was expected by the leadership in the short run.

12. A more immediate impact came from decentralization but in the direction opposite to that expected. Enterprises and state banks were given significant investment authority at the expense of the often politically motivated ministries. In theory, only firms that were profitable would be able to invest. The profits of an enterprise were to be divided into a profit sharing fund, a reserve fund, and a development fund. Development funds - the source of an enterprise's own investment - could be either invested or placed on deposit with the banks to earn interest, although interest rates are too low to offer an attractive alternative to investment. Enterprise funds also could be supplemented by state credits or grants or by bank credit. Bank and state credit would be parceled out according to three criteria: the size of the development fund of the enterprise applying for credit; the expected profitability of the project; and, for large projects, the contribution of the intended investment to national economic objectives. Under the new system, nearly all investment would be initiated by enterprises.

13. The reformers' expectations were not realized. The now relatively unfettered enterprises refused to play by the new rules. Even while the NEM was being devised, enterprises deliberately underreported their profit position in the hope of retaining more profits or obtaining higher subsidies. As a result, enterprise profits in the early stages of the reform were 50% larger than the government had expected. Development funds and self-initiated investment swelled excessively. Above-plan investment by enterprises amounted to 3.2 billion forints in 1969, and rose to 10 billion forints in 1971. The inflationary rise in investment put considerable pressure on prices of building materials, which, although heavily controlled, still increased by 4% in 1971. (...).

15. As might be expected, enterprises frequently initiated projects without the required financial backing. For example, the Tisza chemical combine began a $25 million development program in 1971 with financial backing for about one-half of its program. The coal mining enterprises in Borsod placed orders for various installations even though their application for credit had not been finally approved. According to Deputy Premier Matyas Timar, the "motto" of enterprises was, "What is important is to get the work going; the state will give the missing money from its budget." A government audit in 1970 discovered that 32 enterprises did not have development funds to cover 3 billion forints in committed investment; the state financed about 70% of the difference, creating a substantial budget deficit. Meanwhile, the banks, which had been expected to play a major role in rationing investment, were simply sidestepped by enterprises.

16. Even the major projects that remained in state hands were too numerous and not effectively controlled. The responsibility for various stages of these projects - from blueprint to construction - was scattered among enterprises and ministries, leading to breakdowns in coordination and cost overruns. The Ministry of Finance and the National Planning Office, which had been expected to coordinate and control major investments, had neither adequate information about nor effective veto over the projects being promoted by other ministries.

(HUNGARY: THE FIRST TEST OF THE NEW ECONOMIC MECHANISM: Intelligence Memorandum, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, May 1972, pp. 5-6. Bold and underline added.) (IMG)

Note that to this day, the CIA-funded media presents Hungary as the economic success model in the CMEA countries, calling Hungary “the happiest barracks” in the ‘Second World’ countries. The Kadar gang and their CIA backers hailed the decentralization measures in Hungary as ‘Goulash Communism’, the kind of a ‘socialism’ that allegedly brings plenty of food.

By the 1980s, the majority of the Party was white collar intelligentsia:

Three-quarters of the party members were originally industrial and agricultural workers; now, only one-third of them are. (Introductory Biography by L. Gyurko. In: ‘János Kádár: Selected Speeches and Interviews’, Akademiai Kiado, Budapest, 1985, p. 146) (IMG)

Twenty-nine per cent of the party’s members are industrial workers, 6 per cent are in agriculture, 41 per cent are intellectuals and white-collar workers, 16 per cent are pensioners, and 8 per cent work in other jobs. (Introductory Biography by L. Gyurko. In: ‘János Kádár: Selected Speeches and Interviews’, Akademiai Kiado, Budapest, 1985, p. 145) (IMG)

The Party was, furthermore, a "mass Party" as opposed to a vanguard democratic centralism Party:

The Hungarian Socialist Workers’ Party is at once a mass party, and the leader of society, as the Constitution specifies. (Introductory Biography by L. Gyurko. In: ‘János Kádár: Selected Speeches and Interviews’, Akademiai Kiado, Budapest, 1985, p. 145) (IMG)

Hungarian Titoist leader Janos Kadar was of course a well-known Khrushchev supporter. Gyurko, a journalist and the official introduced of the book of the selected speeches, wrote:

It is well known that he liked Khrushchev; their relationship was built on the common struggle. I remember well what a shock it was to many Hungarians when Khrushchev was dismissed. The Stalinist period was still too close and the fear was very real that the change could mean a return to the old policy, to the old methods.

Kadar was in Poland that day. When he got back, the whole country waited to hear what he would say. I was there when he got off the special train at the railway station. he did not wait until he got his office, did not wait to consult and to be informed. He spoke to the country as soon as he got back. Calmly and frankly.

“A great variety of events have occurred in the past week. There was some news that we were very happy to hear, and some that was a source of surprise. I want to tell you this frankly and honestly. As you know, there have been personal change sin the top leadership of the Soviet Union. Comrade Khrushchev, who asked to be relieved of his post on grounds of his age and poor health, has been relieved of his post, and Comrades Brezhnev and Kosygin have been elected to take his place. In every country and in every party a matter of this nature is up to the party and the country to decide on. For my own part, I think that Comrade Khrushchev deserves a great deal of credit for his fight against the Stalinist personality cult, and for the fact that there is still peace. He worked for peace. (...).”

C20S15. Economic Titoization in Poland / Bierut’s Suspicious Death / On Gierek’s Views / The Gestapo agents Spsychalski and Kaczorowska Rise to Power in Gomulka Era  IMG-All-Poland}

Gross National Product: Poland

The following table shows the CIA estimates of Poland's level of growth in all economic sectors industry, agriculture, transport and communication, trade and services from 1950 to 1953 and from 1953 to 1955. Until 1953, according to the CIA estimates, industry, construction, transportation, and communication saw immense growth, but the agricultural sector suffered. The suffering of the agricultural sector was natural because forget not that Poland, just like East Germany and Czechoslovakia, had been affected by bad weather/climate conditions during those years:

	1950	1953	1954	1955
A. Billion 1955 Dollars
Gross National Product	16.7	19.2	20.7	22.1

A. Northern Area (Poland, East Germany, and Czechoslovakia)

(‘EASTERN EUROPEAN GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT, 1950-1955’, CIA, September 27, 1956, p. 5) (IMG)

In the northern area of the European Satellites the fall of 1952 was characterized by above-normal precipitation, with the result that fall plowing and sowing of grains for harvest in 1953 were considerably hampered. Despite the fact that spring plowing and sowing were aided by favorable weather over most of the area, it is believed that the over-all acreage of bread grain will be less than prewar, because of failure to fulfill the fall sowing plans for winter wheat and rye.

Available weather information and reports from the American Embassy in Moscow indicate that cold and lack of rain characterized the spring much of Poland, although more abundant rainfall appears to have occurred in June. Favorable conditions for spring work were reported in East Germany and Czechoslovakia. Rainfall appears to have been gradually adequate to abundant in the late spring and summer months, and in July heavy rains were reported to have caused harvesting difficulties for grain and cultivation difficulties for root and vegetable crops.

(‘CROP CONDITIONS IN THE SOVIET BLOC, 1953 (RR IM-379)’, CIA, Office of Research and Reports, September 23, 1953, p. 4. Underline original) (IMG)

Had the policies of centralized industrialization and agricultural collectivization not been pursued, Polish agriculture would have been devastated far more as a result of the poor weather conditions, but thanks to the People's Democratic economic policies, agriculture did not suffer too badly. As in all of the Peoples' Democracies, Poland too probably suffered economically due to the treasonous activities of the Beria gang, but the restoration of communist influence during the Beria purge again improved the economy, and hence Poland saw an economic growth in all sectors until 1954 and a significant growth also until 1955. While negatively portraying the economic growth of Poland, the CIA did nonetheless make a number of confessions regarding the growth of industry. By the time the 1956 colour revolution and installation of the imperialist agent Gomulka occurred, the CIA reported:

Poland, although the largest European Satellite in area and population, ranks third in gross national product per capita. Largely an agricultural and mining economy at the end of World War II, Poland has subordinated agriculture and light industry in order to speed development of mining and heavy manufacturing. In tripling the output of the machine-building and defense industries during the Six Year Plan (1950-55), Poland outstripped even the expansion of its coal industry, which is its chief raw material asset, and became dependent on imports for other industrial raw materials and food. Although food availability per capita has returned to prewar levels, food distribution has not kept pace with rapid urbanization. The quality of the diet and of consumer goods has not improved commensurately with the growth of the economy or the effort extracted from the workers. (GOMULKA AND THE POLISH ECONOMY, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), November 7, 1956, p. 1) (IMG)

Shortly after Nikita Khrushchev's Titoization Speech, during the 20th CPSU Congress, on March 12, 1956, Boleslaw Bierut aged 64 died of 'natural' causes; hardly anyone in Poland ever believed the narrative that Bierut died of 'natural' causes. There have been many works speculating, not without basis, that martyr Bierut was murdered by the Khrushchev group because Bierut stood in the way of Titoization in Poland. Even an intelligence body as high as the US National Security Council (NSC) put quotation marks around the word "died" in describing the 'death' of Bierut:

What will leadership in those satellites now do? Bierut leader [of] Polish Communist Party "died" in Moscow. Rakosi must be trembling in Hungary and same [with] other satellite leaders to whom degradation [of] Stalin [was] incomprehensible. ('NSC BRIEFING - 22 MARCH 1956', NSC, March 22, 1956, p. 2) (IMG)

In 'The Khrushchevites', Enver Hoxha too hinted that Bierut's death was suspicious. After his tragic 'natural' death, Bierut was succeeded by Ochab. Ochab was to Poland what Malenkov was to the USSR and what Gero was to Hungary. Ochab was undoubtedly a Titoist but since he was encircled by communists around him, he was coopted into adopting a mostly-communist line on the overt level. With the endorsement of the Titoists dominating Moscow, a wave of Titoization began in Poland, resulting in economically neoliberal policies. This led to the spontaneous revolt of the Polish workers. It was known as the 'Poznan Riots':

Since the Polish press, has termed the rioting workers' complaints as "just demands," the government is likely to raise wages and improve working conditions in Poznan, thus probably inspiring demands for similar benefits elsewhere in Poland.

The embassy suggests that the apparently inept handling of the Poznan workers' demands prior to the demonstration may result in the removal of a number of officials.

(US EMBASSY VIEW ON CONSEQUENCES OF POZNAN RIOTS. In: Central Intelligence Bulletin, CIA, July 6, 1956, p. 5) (IMG)

The regime has implied in a party newspaper editorial of 29 June that the liberalization campaign will continue. However, the riots may result in a slowing of the process and a weakening of the position of liberal elements who were reportedly gaining strength in opposition to stricter [pro-communist] policies of party first secretary Ochab. (THE POZNAN RIOTS. In: Central Intelligence Bulletin, CIA, June 30, 1956, p. 3) (IMG)

The 'Poznan Riots' are often wrongly cited as a revolt 'for' liberalism when in fact the workers were protesting against the Titoization and economic liberalization pursued since the 1956 20th CPSU Congress. The CIA-funded mainstream media wrongly portrays the Polish communists as having condemned the worker protesters, when in fact the CIA archives prove that the Polish Party press termed the workers' complaints as just demands and that their voices were heard. To be sure, worker protests that are not led by a party or organization, particularly a progressive party or organization, are risky. While workers protesting peacefully against liberalization is good, proper organization of such protests helps to minimize the risks of such protests being exploited by the enemies of the proletariat.

To further strengthen the cause of the liberal intelligentsia,

Copies of the speech were run off in their thousands and were distributed clandestinely [by the MI6] throughout eastern Europe, fuelling demands for reform, particularly in Poland and Hungary. ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith. p. 123) (IMG)

At the same time, the Allen Dulles network had stepped up its operations against the Polish nation:

American intelligence had stepped up its covert operations in Eastern Europe in the twelve-month period leading to the Hungarian uprising, training the 'Red Sox' teams of Polish, Hungarian, Czech and Romanian emigres for covert action inside their home countries.

Allen Dulles, the head of the CIA, told the National Security Council that 'developments in the satellites present the greatest opportunity for the last ten years both covertly and overtly to exploit the situation'. ('New Cloak, Old Dagger', Michael Smith. p. 122) (IMG)

The course of Titoization pursued by the Moscow Titoists and the Polish Titoists gave Poland's reactionary intelligentsia the operational freedom for their colour revolutionary action against communism. As always, the intelligentsia chanted slogans for liberalism, Westernization, existentialism, etc. October 1956 was the infamous date in which the colour revolutionary intelligentsia mobilized, using such slogans, to install the Gestapo-Mossad spy Spychalski and his collaborator Gomulka. The US intelligence confirmed the important role of the intelligentsia in the October 1956 colour revolution:

The eruptions that took place in Poland and Hungary in 1956 saw the virtually complete disintegration of the regime controls over intellectual life. Writers, journalists, and artists led the way in taking over or disrupting government and party apparatuses of control. With the rise of Gomulka to power in Poland and the quelling of the Hungarian revolution, the new governments began to cast about for methods of re-establishing these controls. The Gomulka regime has relied in its efforts largely on persuasion, while the Kadar regime has vacillated between force and inducement. In both cases the resistance of the intellectuals has kept the regimes from achieving more than limited success. (...). When Gomulka returned to power in October 1956, the Polish Party's control over intellectual life was almost nonexistent. Writers were free from censorship; publishing houses were independent of effective State control. The main Party newspaper, Trybuna Ludu, did not necessarily present anything more than the views of its editors. (POSITION OF INTELLECTUALS

IN EASTERN EUROPE, IR No. 8005, Intelligence Report in OSS-INR Reports, Washington April 27, 1959. In: Foreign Relations of the United States, US State Department, p. 72) (IMG)

As a result of the colour revolution of the intelligentsia, the MI6's Home Army pogromists as well as the Nazis rose to the highest ranks of the Polish intelligence service. It was not just Spychalski and Gomulka who rose, but also many other Nazi agents, Home Army terrorists, etc. supported by the Gomulka-Spychalski group.

Before delving any further into this matter, it is important to introduce a political figure who was not so important at the time but later emerged as a key player. His name: Edward Gierek. He would later rise to become the General-Secretary of the Polish Party, succeeding Gomulka in the 1970s. Since his interview-memoirs will be cited extensively, it is worth providing some details about him.

Gierek was definitely a Titoist, not a communist. This became clear with regards to his positions on the Stalin-era USSR and on the 20th CPSU Congress. For start, he slandered the Stalin-era USSR as a tyrannical regime that brutally terrorized any and all critics of Stalin:

[Rolicki:] It is a pity that you did not put these thoughts into practice in the seventies.

[Gierek:] Sir, we will still have the opportunity to talk about the significant changes made to the party under my secretary. I can only say that I regret very much that in 1948 Gomulka's allies did not have enough strength to support his concept of delaying reunification. Unification, I would add with all responsibility, was imposed in Moscow. Stalin then acted like a man who has less and less time and has to unify all socialist countries, transform them into one fashion at a predetermined time. From the point of view of Stalinism, the unification of the party was a great success, while from the point of view of socialism, as it can be seen years later, it was a great failure. Its effects will be felt by a whole generation now. Unfortunately, I am making these considerations too late, but today I am fully aware that it was a great mistake.

[Rolicki:] I think Stalin would have crushed anyone who resisted his concept, and the PPS was undoubtedly doomed in one form or another to annihilation on the day the Yalta conference ended.

[Gierek:] I agree, but regret.... [latter ellipsis is by Gierek himself]

(The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, pp. 51-52) (IMG)

'Stalinism', Gierek said, was an 'original sin'. Indeed, Gierek stated:

Throughout the entire time of People's Poland, the party was also burdened with the original sin of Stalinism, which the communist movement did not want to get rid of at first and then could not very much. (The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, p. 49) (IMG)

Gierek also spoke in defense of the treasonous 'Polish Communist Party' (KPP), which had supported the MI6-backed pro-Nazi coup of Pilsudski, and had thus been thoroughly purged by the Soviets during the Great Purge. In slandering Stalin as 'murderous', Gierek said:

A year later, the Party was dissolved and its Central [Committee] activist was murdered on Stalin's orders. I believe that the KPP was one of the most severely experienced communist parties in history. (The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, p. 19) (IMG)

The Titoization speech and policy line of the 20th CPSU congress brought Gierek the hope, because new Titoization changes were going to come:

I was, like everyone else, shocked by the 20th Congress. But I never counted myself as an orphan after the genius of Stalin. After September 17, which made a tremendously negative impression on me years ago, I never really shook off. The sediment of distrust remained forever. It didn't have any political significance, of course, but it did matter to me. Therefore, I will confess that I read Khrushchev's speech at the 20th Congress not only with being grilled but also with hope. For I thought that this was not the end of the changes, but only the tip of the iceberg, and after the revelations, deeper changes must come. (The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, pp. 44-45) (IMG)

The 1956 colour revolution brought elevated him in the Polish Party as well:

[Rolicki:] Your further promotions are connected with the spring of 1956.

[Gierek:] Yes, I became the secretary of the Central Committee at the 6th Plenum, after the 20th Congress and the death of Bierut.

Unsurprisingly, Edward Gierek's social base lied in the white collar elements:

Edward Gierek ... draws his strength from his ... administration of Poland's major industrial center, the province of Katowice. Gierek has grouped around him discontented "technocrats," young party bureaucrats, and ideologically unassailable elements seeking economic and social reform. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 4) (IMG)

At the same time, his position in one of Poland's major industrial centers inevitably put upon him the pressure of the Polish proletarians living in that industrialized zone. In other words, this representative of the white collar elements was also significantly under the pressure of, and coopted by, the agents of the proletariat emanating from the Katowice zone. This led Gierek to adopt the line of a 'compromise candidate', the midpoint politician serving as the agent of the bureaucrats but also to a large extent coopted to serve the proletariat.

With the outbreak of the Titoist colour revolution in Poland, the Gestapo agent Gomulka rose to power and brought with him numerous fascist Home Army infiltrators such as Mieczyslaw Moczar, who gradually rose to become the head of Gomulka's intelligence service. Edward Gierek, who would later rise to become the General-Secretary of the Party, admitted the intelligence collaboration between Moczar and the MI6 front 'Home Army'. Gierek remarked:

on the wave of repairing the wrongs of the Home Army milieu, Moczar recruited several figures who were important in this circle....

(The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, pp. 65-66) (IMG)

It is worth reminding that there is a difference between recruiting enemy agents so that they stab the imperialist enemy in the back vs. recruiting enemy agents so that they can enter and hence infiltrate the Polish intelligence service more easily. Since we know that Moczar was one of the Titoist elements who rose to power through the 1956 colour revolution, it should be obvious that the collaboration with the Home Army was for pro-Home Army objectives. Gierek also stated:

Moczar ... tried to reach an agreement with representatives of the Home Army movement. In this way, he created a broad platform for the cooperation of the war generation. (The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, p. 65) (IMG)

As can be seen, Moczar was a collaborationist with the British secret service via the Home Army, the terrorist army that attack kolkhoz peasants, the terrorist army that closely allied with the Ukrainian fascist butchers of the Poles as early as 1946, the terrorist army that collaborated so extensively with the Gestapo and Japanese fascist secret services, the terrorist army that carried out pogroms against the Yiddish people so to expel them to Palestine so that they shall become the pawns of the Zionist settler-colonial project, the army that, without coordinating with the Soviets, launched the Warsaw Uprising ostensibly to 'fight' 'against' the Nazis but actually to help the Nazis break the spirit of the Polish nation, to wipe out the heroes of Warsaw, and to gain the political capital for extended MI6-AK-Gestapo presence in post-war Poland.

The CIA too confirmed:

The most vociferous of the two major groups of rightist challengers is the hard-line nationalistic, and anti-Semitic group led by former interior minister Mieczyslaw Moczar. Paradoxically, Moczar's faction has strong links to Gomulka. It derives from the "native" Communists or "partisans" who, under Gomulka's leadership, formed the core of the party in Poland during World War II. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 4) (IMG)

As late as 1968, the CIA reported:

Like the early Gomulka, Moczar prefers a nationalistic party and was an early opponent of the party's "Muscovite" wing. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 4) (IMG)

Furthermore, as shown previously in C13S4.6_(same quote repeated here), Moczar had risen to power during the 1940s with the assistance of Gomulka:

Gomulka ... had also built up a personal staff among the ... party leadership, who reflected his outlook completely. That group by this included Zenon Kliszko, Marian Spychalski, Wladyslaw Bienkowski, Alexander Kowalski, Ignacy Loga-Sowinski, Mieczyslaw Moczar, Marian Baryla, Ignacy Korczynski, and others. Several of them had charge of important spheres of activity in the party – Spychalski, for example, in the armed forces, Kliszko in party cadres, Kowalski in youth organizations, Moczar in the police and Bienkowski in the cultural sphere. (SOVIET STAFF STUDY – Gomulka and Polish Communist, Office of Current Intelligence, CIA, February 28, 1958, p. 23. Bold added.) (IMG{Poland})

As confirmed by Gierek, Moczar courted around himself the intelligentsia and mythologized himself as a 'great' wartime partisan leader:

Within a few years, [Moczar] created a legend around himself of a great partisan leader, and then the creator of the veterans' movement. (...). With the pen - as it was commonly believed - Żukrowski wrote "The Colors of the Fight", later filmed by Passendorfer. The book became reading and had a dozen or so editions, the film, although mediocre, did not leave the screens. Then, ... using quite cheap nationalist phrases, [Moczar] gained influence in artistic circles. Like a great patron of culture (and after March '68, while retaining his function in the ZBoWiD, he became the secretary of the Central Committee overseeing the army and the Ministry of the Interior), shining prizes and praise, flirting with smiles, gathered around him actors, significant writers, including Żukrowski, Bartelski and others. The spread of guerrilla "ideology" will someday hopefully be an interesting topic for historians.... (The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, pp. 65-66) (IMG)

The CIA too confirmed that Moczar was on the side of the intelligentsia and the white-collar elements:

Moreover, [Moczar] has courted and won some of the same elements that would be more naturally allied with Gierek if they were in Katowice, i.e., the "technocrats," managers, and even the youth and intellectuals. But his call for change is unaccompanied by a discernible program, and it appeals mainly to those who cannot see beyond their own frustrated ambitions. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 6) (IMG)
Moczar has led the way in appealing to Polish pride in wartime resistance, exploiting to the full his role in it. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 5) (IMG)

Historical phenomena do not suddenly pop out of nowhere. Considering the fact that Moczar was betraying the revolutionary forces after World War II, it is not at all improbable that he was betraying the revolutionary forces during World War II as well.

The Titoist colour revolution made the MI6 agent and AK-collaborationist Moczar the deputy chief of the Interior Ministry:

After his return to power, Gomulka forgave [Moczar] for this betrayal. Moczar appeared in the central arena a few years after October as the deputy minister of the Interior Ministry responsible for security. (The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, pp. 65-66) (IMG)

Numerous Gestapo spies, Home Army terrorists, American-Israeli intelligence agents, and MI6 operatives were catapulted into the high ranks of the Polish state, as a result of the MI6-backed 1956 Titoist colour revolution. They gained prominent positions in the intelligence service, the security apparatus, and vital economic sectors.

The British spy Konni Zilliacus freely travelled to Poland and was allowed by Gomulka to gather intelligence. His intelligence-gathering mission, his studies on the conditions in the Eastern European countries, allowed him to write a book titled 'A New Birth of Freedom?: World Communism after Stalin'. I did not spend the time to read the whole book, but I read parts of it. The book actually did not detail his entire intelligence assessments, but did, as the title suggests, happily conclude that Titoization was emerging victorious in much of Eastern Europe. The mere fact that Konni Zilliacus was welcomed by the Gomulka group in Poland is itself a strong evidence of the MI6 connections of the Gomulka group.

There was also for example a woman named Blanka Kaczorowska. As confessed by Witold Pronobis, the founder of a special research department of the CIA media Radio Free Europe, she was a Gestapo spy during World War II. Pronobis stated:

In Kalkstein's spying network, Blanka Kaczorowska, his fiancée and later wife (they got married in November 1942, i.e. at the time when they deliberately began their cooperation with the Gestapo), played a significant and particularly criminal role. Until the beginning of March 1944, she was active in the Second Department (information and intelligence) of the Home Army Headquarters and, unrecognized as a Gestapo agent, denounced more people. About twenty officers and soldiers in total. She withdrew from work in the underground on her own, justifying her decision with an increasingly visible pregnancy. It is known that she maintained close, friendly contacts with some of the Home Army officers handed over to the Gestapo! On her account, Lt. Col. Władysław Szczekowski "Leszczyca" and "Stanisław" from the 2nd Division of the Home Army Headquarters. A day later, his secretary Wanda Wóycicka "Dorotka" was captured on a Warsaw street, soon shot in the Pawiak prison.

Also in December 1943, due to the denunciation by Kaczorowska, a dozen or so employees of the Study Bureau of the Second Headquarters of the Home Army, including Irena and Janusz Wituski, Halina Skierska, Maria Dziubakowa, Maria Ike-Dunikowska, Natalia Rykowska, Eryk and Jadwiga Scharfenberg, were captured. It was Kaczorowska who denounced Karol Trojanowski "Radwan", the head of the Western Department of the offensive intelligence ("Stall"), who was her lead officer. This betrayal had further tragic consequences, as "Radwan" could not stand the brutal interrogations and revealed to the interrogators of the Gestapo other people involved in the work of the Polish underground.

The last victim of Kaczorowska was Dr. Jadwiga Krasicka from the Industrial and Economic Intelligence of the Home Army. Almost all of the people denounced by Kaczorowska died in torture rooms in Pawiak or in Szucha. After a cruel investigation, many took further victims ...

(Married to Betrayal: Blanka Kaczorowska and Ludwik Kalkstein, Focus Historia, Witold Pronobis, 2010) (IMG)

The charismatic head of the Home Army, General Stefan Grot-Rowecki, was handed over to Germany by the Poles: Eugeniusz Świerczewski, Blanka Kaczorowska and Ludwik Kalkstein. "The first was also liquidated by the Home Army, I talked to Kalkstein when he was lying on his deathbed, and fate took cruel revenge on Kaczorowska" - writes Witold Pronobis especially for "Focus Historia". Historian and former journalist of Radio Free Europe, and at the same time a relative of the general, he tracked his traitors for several dozen years. Here is his investigation report. (Married to Betrayal: Blanka Kaczorowska and Ludwik Kalkstein, Focus Historia, Witold Pronobis, 2010) (IMG)

Many genuinely anti-Nazi elements within the Polish Home Army were systematically exterminated so that the Polish Home Army would be sufficiently infiltrated and thus fully hijacked by the pro-Nazi terrorists loyal to the MI6, an intelligence service that was by then the ally of the Nazi secret service. During the Bierut era, the Gestapo spy Blanka Kaczorowska had been arrested for her crimes against Poland and was serving a prison sentence:

In 1945, Blanka Kaczorowska ... found her father in Łódź, Jan Kaczorowski, who was employed in the Łódź military judiciary. Through her father, she met a judge, then the owner of a private law firm, Roman Rawicz-Vogel. Although he was much older than her, after a few weeks she stayed with him and introduced her friends as her husband. In 1948, they moved to Warsaw and lived in a house purchased by her father at 15 Bachmacka Street. While still in Łódź, she began university studies at the Faculty of Humanities, which she graduated from in Warsaw. She joined the Polish Workers' Party (PPR) and was active in the "Życie" Academic Union of Young Struggle. After graduating, she found a job at the State Research Institute of Folk Art.

She was arrested when the management of the institute decided to send her to study doctoral studies in Prague. She was detained in December 1952 on charges of collaboration and agent collaboration with the Gestapo. Soon her trial was held, which ended with a life imprisonment.

(Married to Betrayal: Blanka Kaczorowska and Ludwik Kalkstein, Focus Historia, Witold Pronobis, 2010) (IMG)

The 1956 Titoist colour revolution brought the Gestapo spy Blanka Kaczorowska out of prison and allowed her to infiltrate into and earn income from the Polish intelligence service. Through the Polish secret service agencies, she was also able to install herself in charge of such critically sensitive economic sectors as the 'Import-Export Center for Chemicals', which even till today continues to be one of the top Polish conglomerates:

However, [Blanka Kaczorowska] only stayed for 5 years and left the walls of the prison in Fordon near Bydgoszcz in 1958.

She agreed to a close and loyal cooperation with the Security Service, proving her in her cell by eagerly reporting on her fellow prisoners. At the end of June 1959, she became a secret paid associate of Department II (responsible for counterintelligence) as agent "Katarzyna". Since her file was destroyed in 1982, I have not been able to recreate the exact nature of her collaboration, the people she denounced and the tasks she performed, also later in France. From 1949 to 1968 (with a break due to the arrest and imprisonment in 1953-1958), B. Kaczorowska and her son lived in Warsaw in the aforementioned house at ul. Bachmacka, together with the family of his brother Włodzimierz (he died in 1975). Later her daughter-in-law also moved in. Sister Irena, 8 years younger than Blanka, moved to Switzerland at the end of the 1960s and lived with her husband in Geneva.

Cooperation with the services also allowed Kaczorowska to find attractive jobs almost immediately after her release from prison. First, it was CIECh, i.e. Import-Export Center for Chemicals at the Powązkowska [zone] in Warsaw.

After a year she moved to the National Institute of Industrial Design (ul. Świętokrzyska 20), and a few months later to "Orbis". It was there, while working at the Foreign Tourist Service Department (ul. Krakowskie Przedmieście 40), that she became involved with the communist counterintelligence. Apparently, the type of tasks assigned to her changed over time, which in 1965 caused her to move to work as the main secretary at the "Foto-Kino-Film" Import and Export Headquarters (18 Foksal Street).

(Married to Betrayal: Blanka Kaczorowska and Ludwik Kalkstein, Focus Historia, Witold Pronobis, 2010) (IMG)

The rest of Moczar's team also was elevated in its positions. Referring to "Moczar and his allies," the CIA reported that in 1959,:

Gomulka, believing he could control them [Moczarists] on the basis of old loyalties, brought them into his regime to help with serious economic and administrative problems. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 4) (IMG)

With the installation of MI6 and Gestapo agents at the helm of the Polish intelligence, military, and economy, the way was opened for the front companies of American intelligence and US finance capital to 'invest' in Poland. Indeed, the US State Department emphasized the MI6 Titoist colour revolution in Poland created a new 'atmosphere in official United States-Polish relations' especially in 'informational ... fields' (i.e. intelligence sharing) and 'exchange of persons' (i.e. sending more American 'diplomatic' corps to Poland) so to 'keep open our channels of contact':

The events in Poland in October 1956 and the advent to power of the Gomulka regime afforded the United States opportunities to pursue policies designed to help sustain the Polish people in their struggle against the domination of the Soviet Union and world communism. In the past four years the United States has concluded with Poland a series of PL 480 sales agreements totaling $365.3 million. In addition, a total of $61 million in credits has been extended through the Export-Import Bank. The Polish people are aware of and appreciate this aid which has been of direct benefit to them. Of equal importance is the fact that our aid helps to create an atmosphere in official United States-Polish relations, such as those in the informational and exchange of persons fields, and thus to keep open our channels of contact with the Polish people. By and large our policy towards Poland and specially our aid to the Polish people enjoys the support of public and Congressional opinion, including the support of the Polish-American community in the United States. (SUBJECT:

Restoration of Trade Agreement Benefits to Imports from Poland: Memorandum From Secretary of State Herter to President Eisenhower, Washington, September 6, 1960. In: 'Foreign Relations of the United States, 1958-1960', Vol. 10, Part 2, US Department of State, p. 293) (IMG)

The 1956 Titoist colour revolution in Poland, having installed Mossad agents such as Spsychalski, also directly benefited the Mossad in the Zionist migration to Israel. An intelligence document from the Mossad station in Warsaw, dated February 19, 1957, confirms that the 'abolition of Stalinism' in Poland allowed for the Zionist mass migration to Israel:

Katz states that the facts about mass immigration from Poland can no longer be kept quiet, but the wording of the publicity should be carefully controlled. It should be stressed that after the abolition of Stalinism, the reunion of families, which was arbitrarily stopped seven years ago, once again became feasible. However people leaving Poland, where private property was abolished, leave penniless. Immigration must not be used as proof that Poland is antisemitic. Jews leave because they want to go to the Jewish State and live as Jews. They also fear that reactionary and antisemitic elements may again succeed in putting a stop to reunion of families. (Coded Tel. 165, Inc.: 130.09/2306/12, 'K. Katz (Warsaw) to the East European Division', February 19, 1957. C20S16. Economic Revisionist Policies in Poland  IMG-All-{Poland}

The MI6-installed Titoist government of Gomulka embarked upon a policy of de-emphasized the heavy industry:

The new government of Wladyslaw Gomulka promised modification of the system and changes in the development strategy. Consumer goods received a larger share of the national product, and some quantities of grain and food were imported from the West. State control was mitigated by giving limited policy input to enterprises, and the rate of investment was reduced. (Country Studies: Poland, Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress, Sponsored by US Department of the Army, Glenn E. Curtis, October 1992) (IMG)

Agriculture, furthermore, was decollectivized:

Among the reform measures of 1956, the ... significant lasting change was the decollectivization of agriculture. (Country Studies: Poland, Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress, Sponsored by US Department of the Army, Glenn E. Curtis, October 1992) (IMG)

And:

a lively debate occurred on so-called "market socialism"..... (Country Studies: Poland, Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress, Sponsored by US Department of the Army, Glenn E. Curtis, October 1992) (IMG)

Regarding the decentralization of the economy in Poland, the CIA reported:

The most extensive reorganization of the central governmental structure in the Satellites has occurred in the Polish government. Since the uprising of October 1956 a number of central staff offices have been dissolved, the State Planning Commission has been abolished, and a new and smaller commission with considerably reduced functions has been formed to take its place. The Council of Ministers was reorganized, special committees were established to handle special problems, and an Economic Council was set up. (REORGANIZATION OF ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT IN THE EUROPEAN SATELLITES 1956, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), October 14, 1957, p. 8) (IMG)

Further details of the decentralization are provided by US intelligence as follows:

In reorganizing the Polish Council of Ministers, bureaus as well as branch specialists of industry attached to the deputy premiers were eliminated. At the same time, 3 temporary organizations were created and attached to the Council, 1 for industrial production, 1 for building and transportation, and 1 for agricultural production and rural problems. In addition, special committees were established for investment plans, government housing, water economy, and plan technology.

Effective on 1 January 1957 an Economic Council was formed under the Polish Council of Ministers. The Economic Council is composed of 35 members (prominent economists and scientists) and will function as a temporary advisory body. The main task of the Economic Council is the preparation of a "Polish model of a socialist economy." It will deal with both current and long-range economic problems. According to one of the deputy chairmen, these problems will include such questions as the "autonomy and decentralization" of enterprises; a reform of the present system of prices, wages, and incentives; the comparative and appropriate rates of growth in the various branches of the national economy; and the possibilities of and limits to a rise in the standard of living. The first plenary meeting of the Economic Council took place on 9 February 1957.

The Polish government recently abolished the Ministry of State Control and established in its place a Supreme Control Chamber subordinated to the Sejm, or to its inner group when the Sejm is not in session, rather than to the Council of Ministers. The objective of this change is to broaden state control to include checking by the legislative branch (the Sejm) on administrative decisions and decrees as well as on the executive branch of government (the Council of Ministers).

The Polish Council of Ministers in the latter half of 1956 transferred some of its prerogatives to the individual ministries. Ministers may not exceed planned production costs and losses and make certain changes in the investment plan, within limits. Banks also were given additional responsibilities by the Council for controlling wage funds in order to prevent excessive expenditures attributed to "loosened wage discipline" on the part of some lower level supervisors.

(REORGANIZATION OF ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT IN THE EUROPEAN SATELLITES 1956, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), October 14, 1957, p. 9) (IMG)

A number of ministries in Poland, such as the Ministries of Forestry, the Food Industry, Internal Trade, and State Agricultural Farms, have undergone reorganization since mid-1956. In foreign trade, import-export companies such as Polimex (machinery) and Varimex (miscellaneous equipment and consumer goods) are being replaced by individual firms which will be "state controlled" but will have more operational freedom than their predecessors. In addition, the Ministry of Internal Trade has established local boards of trade in each of six cities to supervise local trade enterprises. In larger towns, municipal boards of trade will be established to handle local trade matters. Finally, a new draft law has been drawn up which provides for the merger of 10 economic ministries into 5 ministries.

The extensive reorganization of the Polish government illustrates the intention of present Polish leaders to focus the reorganization on their own specific needs rather than to follow automatically the Soviet pattern of development. In this manner, central bureaus attached to deputy premiers were abolished, the State Planning Commission was reduced in influence, and an Economic Council was set up to develop a Polish "model" of socialism.

C20S17. The 1956 Titoization Speech: The Effects on East Germany  IMG-All-{GDR}

The East German communists - including their leaders - opposed Khrushchev's Titoization agenda:

The instinctive response of the East German leaders therefore was to resist de-Stalinization. They experienced some initial confusion because some formal agreement with the Soviet denunciations of Stalin was required of them but quickly recovered and took the general line that the policies of the GDR were basically correct and that any tendency toward the "cult of personality" had been eliminated by 1953. This ... did not entirely satisfy the Party rank and file or the public, but, with only nominal steps to rehabilitate purged Communist leaders and political prisoners, the regime managed to keep unrest within manageable limits. ('TRENDS IN ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT IN EAST GERMANY 1945-57: ECONOMIC INTELLIGENCE REPORT', CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), May 15, 1958, pp. 24-25) (IMG)

The Titoization speech provided the psychological warfare and media warfare weapons required to launch the colour revolutions in Poland and Hungary. While East Germany did not experience a colour revolution, elements of colour revolutionary unrest could nonetheless be seen in it: unrest continued to be manifested by the ideological ferment among intellectuals and students..... ('TRENDS IN ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT IN EAST GERMANY 1945-57: ECONOMIC INTELLIGENCE REPORT', CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), May 15, 1958, p. 27) (IMG)

The colour revolutionary elements in East Germany created the pressure from below with which to impose the return of some purged Titoists back to power. It also brought to power some intellectuals who had ties to the Kautskyite Second International intelligence agents of West Germany, and who also had ties to the MI6 colour revolutions in Poland and Hungary:

The admission to the central committee of the East German Socialist Unity (Communist) Party (SED) of three former opponents of First Secretary Walter Ulbricht's policies may be designed to appease the restive intellectual element by giving it greater representation in high party circles. The most prominent of the three is Franz Dahlem, former politburo member who was once regarded as Ulbricht's principal opponent in the party. The other two are Hans Jendretzky, former Berlin party boss, and Alexander Abusch, leading East German intellectual. All three men were publicly criticized by the party in 1952-53.

These appointments do not necessarily presage any fundamental concessions to dissident elements demanding more freedom, as Dahlem, at least, appears to have been intimidated into supporting Ulbricht's policies. Ulbricht, in his speech to the central committee meeting last week, sharply rejected the concept of national Communism, once espoused by Dahlem, and declared that East Germany would not follow the Yugoslav pattern.

The ferment among intellectuals and students and their demands for more freedom are causing the regime serious concern. One group, led by a university professor who was arrested in late November 1956, reportedly had contacts with intellectuals in Hungary and Poland and with Social Democrats in German with a view toward encouraging changes in East Germany.

(FORMER OPPONENTS OF ULBRICHT ADMITTED TO EAST GERMAN PARTY CENTRAL COMMITTEE. In: Central Intelligence Bulletin, CIA, February 5, 1957, p. 6) (IMG)

All such Titoization changes were resisted by Ulbricht and his faction, as confirmed by the above documents. The fact that East Germany had a large industrial working class base made it easier for the communists to resist revisionism and Titoization. In the field of economics, there was a shift towards economic revisionism, decentralization in particular, but this too was met with a powerful resistance, thanks to the large industrial working class base that existed in East Germany. Decentralization occurred in this context through the setting up of the State Planning Commission as a separate bureaucratic body of its own, instead of a body subordinate to the Council of Ministers. Thus, a dual bureaucracy was established, and, as is well-known, bureaucratic proliferation is a means of sowing economic chaos, sabotage, and corruption. The CIA reported:

East Germany received first consideration. In May 1956 the State Planning Commission, which previously had functioned as an organ of the Council of Ministers, was set up as a separate legal entity. ('TRENDS IN ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT IN EAST GERMANY 1945-57: ECONOMIC INTELLIGENCE REPORT', CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), May 15, 1958, p. 25) (IMG)

State planning mechanisms were torn apart into smaller organizations and hence proliferating more bureaucracy:

Additional organizational measures specifically taken to long-term planning included the following: (a) the establishment of a Central Supply Commission for Mineral Resources (under a deputy chairman of the Council of Ministers) to check and coordinate assessments of the raw material potential of the GDR in order to provide a better basis for long-range economic planning and (b) the convening of an ad hoc commission of specialists by the Chairman of the State Planning Commission to oversee the utilization of economic reserves - that is, materials and production capacity. ('TRENDS IN ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT IN EAST GERMANY 1945-57: ECONOMIC INTELLIGENCE REPORT', CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), May 15, 1958, p. 25) (IMG)

However, as confirmed by the CIA, the GDR managed to slow down decentralization:

The East German regime postponed the delegation of additional responsibilities to enterprise management and justified the delay on the ground that thorough study of the operational problems of industry should precede further reform. In May 1956 an ad hoc commission was set up under Fritz Selbmann, Commissioner for Industry and Transport and Deputy Chairman of the Council of Ministers, to study supply and inventory problems in industry, particularly excessive stocks of raw materials and semi-finished and finished goods.

The findings submitted to the Party Central Committee by this Commission were reportedly highly critical of the discrepancy between plan targets and market demand for products, the lack of sufficient advance notice of orders for special products, the failure of the GDR to acquire a continuous supply of critically needed materials from imports, excessive drains on the capital of enterprises by the government, and similar problems of a fundamental character. Moreover, the Commission allegedly concluded that these conditions could not be improved without altering some of the basic concepts of central planning and permitting greater flexibility in the operations of individual industries. The Party Central Committee and the Council of Ministers, however, did not immediately act upon the recommendations of the ad hoc Commission, and the practical effect was to defer reform at the enterprise level indefinitely. Likewise, no was made to enhance the economic role of the local organs of the state administration as recommended by the 25th Plenum, although routine functions were in a few instances transferred to them on a piecemeal basis. In view of the de-Stalinization in the USSR, the Peoples Chamber of the GDR began with great fanfare to consider new legislation for "continuing the democratization" of government by increasing the powers of local organs. On 21 August 1956, two bills dealing, respectively, with the relationship between the Peoples Chamber and the local legislative assemblies and with the regulation of working methods of the administrative organs were given a first reading in the Peoples Chamber. Contrary to the usual custom of the Chamber, the bills were sent to committee in order to provide an opportunity for widespread publicity, and no serious attempt was made to enact them until after the uprisings in Poland and Hungary. Thus the leaders of the GDR were clearly more interested in propagandizing the public about their "democratic" intentions than in really enhancing the economic role of the local organs.

(‘TRENDS IN ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT IN EAST GERMANY 1945-57: ECONOMIC INTELLIGENCE REPORT’, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), May 15, 1958, pp. 26-27) (IMG)

In East Germany:

After some initial panic [about the Hungarian colour revolution] they [i.e. East German communists] joined with the USSR in rejecting national Communism and in reaffirming Soviet Bloc solidarity. They also conducted an active campaign against the doctrines and experience of Poland and Yugoslavia and took vigorous measures to repress dissidents and "revisionists" in the GDR. (‘TRENDS IN ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT IN EAST GERMANY 1945-57: ECONOMIC INTELLIGENCE REPORT’, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), May 15, 1958, p. 27) (IMG)

At the same time though, the MI6-backed colour revolution led by the anti-German chauvinist and Gestapo agent Gomulka meant that the Polish exports of coal and coke were reduced, and thus the East German economy was hit. Gomulka had helped his Gestapo and West German Nazi friends by stabbing East Germany in the back. Regarding the impact of the Polish colour revolution, the CIA reported:

Loss of vital imports from within the Soviet Bloc caused dislocations in the East German economy. The reduction in Polish shipments of hard coal and coke, for example, contributed to underfulfillment of production targets for steel, which in turn disrupted production schedules in other economic sectors. The October uprisings obviously were not the sole cause of the economic difficulties experienced by the GDR. (‘TRENDS IN ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT IN EAST GERMANY 1945-57: ECONOMIC INTELLIGENCE REPORT’, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), May 15, 1958, p. 27) (IMG)

The disruption of coal supplies and the weakening of the East German economy weakened the East German communist faction and thus strengthened the Titoist and Kautskyite enemies of the East German communists. This allowed for greater lobbying power in favor of economic decentralization. On the other hand, since there already was a strong enough industrial blue-collar working class base in East Germany, the East German communists were able to partially mitigate these revisionist lobbies. Thus, East German leaders pretended to be interested in decentralizing the economy (and proliferating bureaucracy), but did not actually go forward with it as much as desired by the Kautskyites and Titoists:

The regime therefore took an ambivalent position on management reform after the October 1956 uprisings. Although adhering to the "hard line" ideologically, the leaders pretended to have some interest in workers' councils and other liberal innovations, without any intention of making serious use of these reforms. They also resumed implementation of the reform proposals of the 25th Plenum and attempted to convince the public that their efforts would adequately "decentralize" and "democratize" the economic structure. (‘TRENDS IN ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT IN EAST GERMANY 1945-57: ECONOMIC INTELLIGENCE REPORT’, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), May 15, 1958, p. 27) (IMG)

C20S18. On the Construction of the Berlin Wall

Stalin once advised Pieck and Ulbricht:

The demarcation line between East and West Germany should be considered a border--and not just any border, but a dangerous one. We need to strengthen the defense of this border. The Germans will guard the first line of defense, and we will put Russian troops on the second line. Agents of Western countries are moving around the German Democratic Republic all too freely. They can decide to use some extreme measures and kill you or Comrade [Vasilii] Chuikov. This has to be taken into account. Therefore, we need strong border defenses. (‘Conversation between Joseph V. Stalin and SED leadership’, Wilson Center, April 07, 1952, p. 2. Conversation between Joseph V. Stalin and SED leadership, History and Public Policy Program Digital Archive, Library of Congress, Dmitri Volkogonov Collection; according to Mikhail Narinsky, April 07, 1952. A copy can be found in Arkhiv Prezidenta Rossiiskoi Federatsii, Moscow (AP RF), fond (f.) 45, opis’ (op.) 1, delo (d.) 303, list (l.) 179.) (IMG)

During the era of Khrushchev, there was an effort at reducing the number of Red Army troops in East Germany, and to leave East German People’s Democracy defenseless against foreign aggression by cross-border infiltration of terrorists. In this midst, East Germany needed to come up with relatively cheap means of preventing foreign aggression by cross-border infiltration of terrorists. The German Democratic Republic had every legal and moral right to surround itself with defense barriers, be it with barbed wire or with walls, against foreign aggression by cross-border infiltration of terrorists. While the building of defense barriers is a morally and legally legitimate physical defense policy, the question is: whether the building of the wall, as opposed to barbed wire, helped the enemy more in terms of psychological warfare? Undoubtedly, the wall was of great use to the media of the US-led bloc for the purpose of anti-communist propaganda. However, establishing barbed wire instead of the wall would have been no better in terms of the psychological warfare since it would have been picked up by Western propaganda outlets as "evidence" that East Berlin was a giant "concentration camp" "surrounded by barbed wire" "in a manner reminiscent of the Nazi era." While barbed wire was used in some areas of East Germany, barbed wire was, in terms of psychological warfare, not much less detrimental than the wall, and in terms of physical defense, was obviously less effective than the wall.

C20S19. Titoization in Bulgaria

In the agrarian countries, the countries with a low blue-collar worker population, it was much easier to oust the communists. The peasants had favorable attitudes towards communism in many of these countries but owing to their petit-bourgeois attitudes, they were usually passive in the face of Titoization. Hence, by 1954, the Chervenkov faction began to weaken:

The personal position of Vulko Chervenkov has become rather delicate. In order to replace those who had disappeared from the Politburo and the Secretariat of the Central Committee of the Bulgarian Communist Party [during the purge of Kostov's group] he had to appoint men who had been in the interior resistance, by far the most numerous and the youngest. The President of the Council has thus an important clique against him. The entire secretariat is here: Todor Zhivkov; Kruchev; Ganev, eliminated from the Politburo in May 1949 and again in March 1954; and Boris Taskov, who, because of continuous disputes with General Ivan Mikhaylov, was dismissed from the Presidency of the "Food and State Reserves" Administration in May 1952. In the Politburo, the clique includes Yugov and Zhivko Dzhinkov, mentioned above; Rayko Damyanov, washed out after the Delyana affair; Georgi Chankov, a member of the Clandestine Politburo in March 1944, an ally of Yugov's; and Staykov and Prakhov, recent arrivals on the scene. (BULGARIAN POLITICAL REVIEW, CIA, July 21, 1954, p. 3) (IMG)

By the time of the twentieth CPSU Congress, the Yugoslav intelligence agent Yugov rose to power:

For the Yugoslavs, the coming to power of Yugov is a success.... (POLITICAL CLIMATE AFTER CHERVONKOV DEMOTION AND STALIN DENIGRATION, CIA, October 31, 1956, p. 8) (IMG)

The collaboration of Yugov with the Yugoslav fascists is well-known. Around the same time, the Yugoslav agent Kostov was rehabilitated; Yugov and Kostov had never been real enemies. Todor Zhivkov was the kind of a counter-revolutionary who was able to so easily flip-flop and alter his rhetoric in favor of anyone he was talking to. In his speeches, it was hard to find an actual real point made, and there was so little criticism and self-criticism. Zhivkov was excellent at talking for hours upon hours without actually making any real point. In the cases in which he did make a point, it was stereotypically either aimed at attacking anti-Titoists for opposing the Yugoslav regime, or was aimed at slandering Dimitrov as a 'Titoist' and denouncing his 'naivete' for supposedly allowing Bulgaria to be devoured by Yugoslavia.

Why would Anglo-American imperialism ever continue the conflict against a country dominated by a comprador bourgeois state? Why continue the Cold War, when the socialist state in the territory of the former Soviet Union was overthrown?

Short answer: class struggles never end; when communism becomes the order, one shall continue to struggle against bourgeois restoration; when imperialism dominates, finance capital continues the class struggle for retaining such dominance; when political fighters are losing, they try to lose as little as possible, and when they are winning, they try to win as much as possible; there is never enough with class struggles.

Long answer: there are several reasons inherent to class struggles in general. Firstly, note that the dictatorship of a class is the quantitative dominance of a certain faction over a certain state; a dictatorship of the proletariat cannot possibly be the rule of the proletariat over all the aspects of a state but constitutes the decisive and strict dominance of the proletariat over the overwhelming majority of a state; in a dictatorship of the proletariat, the anti-proletarian classes inevitably catapult their intelligence agents into the ranks of the workers' state thus preventing the absolute 100% control over the state by the proletariat. Similarly, in a dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie, the comprador bourgeoisie do not have absolute 100% control over the comprador bourgeois state, but rather the proletarian class and the kolkhoz peasants catapult their communist agents to the ranks of the comprador state apparatus, thus creating a powerful opposition intelligence network against the comprador bourgeois forces within the comprador state. Hence, while the Titoist faction had gained the margin over the communist faction, it was not at all the case that the communist faction had ceased to exist. There still existed a chance that the communist faction would be able to resurge back to decisive dominance. The communist faction was responsible for diverting the funds of the Titoist state in Eurasia towards funding the anti-imperialist and anti-fascist forces worldwide instead of allowing those funds to be used by the Titoist state in Eurasia for the funding Titoist projects. As such, the communist faction continued to pose a menace. Eurasia had vast amounts of productive forces some of which were still under the influence of the communists. Those productive forces too had to, from the imperialist viewpoint, be dismantled so that Anglo-American finance capital's exploitation of the resources and the dismantlement of the productive forces could easily proceed.

To the contingent planners of the US-led bloc of imperialist powers, the overthrow of socialism and the establishment of the comprador bourgeoisie was not really the end, but was rather a beginning. The Anglo-American imperialists were well-trained in the science of contingent planning, meaning that they made plans against not only what already was happening, but also what may have potentially occurred. There was the potential that the proletariat would swiftly conquer power in Eurasia hence to reinstate the dictatorship of the proletariat; there was the potential that a national-bourgeois force would launch a putsch to overthrow the dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie and replace it with a dictatorship of the national bourgeoisie hostile to the interests of the US-led camp. In fact, in the late 1970s and the early 1980s, the dictatorship of the proletariat was briefly restored, but it was quickly overthrown again. As contingent planners therefore, the imperialists needed not just the overthrow of socialism but also the large-scale sabotage of the productive forces that had developed during the years of socialist development; they also needed the Eurasian heartland – the territory of the former Soviet Union, the largest country in the world with resource self-sufficiency – to be torn asunder, partitioned further and further so that it is easier to dominate; they also needed the culture of the peoples of the former Soviet Union to become further and further corrupt, reactionary, anti-communist, and pro-imperialist. Hence, the Eurasian Titoists, as agents of the CIA-led alliance of imperialist-fascist secret services, not only overthrew socialism and the Soviet Union, but also embarked on the project of sabotaging the productive forces of the Eurasian Heartland, pave the way for Eurasia's shrinkage and partition, and to sow corruption wheresoever they could find room for corruption.

The fact that the Titoist faction had a proverbial 51% stake, rather than an 80% stake let alone a 99% stake, over the state meant that while the state was dominated by the Titoist comprador bourgeoisie, there still existed a communist faction that had a proverbial 49% stake, thus being immensely capable of lobbying for pro-communist policies. This immense lobbying power which the communist faction had against the Titoist policies of the dominant comprador bourgeoisie obviously led to major discrepancies and self-contradictions in the Eurasian foreign policies and internal policies. For example, after the communist political forces compelled Nikita Khrushchev to place their nuclear warhead in Cuba, the MI6's 'good' boy Nikita took his revenge on the communists by striking a deal with American intelligence behind Guevara's and Castro's back, removing the nuclear warheads and allowing 'UN inspectors' (read: American spies) into Cuba to inspect the military intelligence even though Khrushchev knew that these 'inspections' were imperialist espionage. The Red Army militarily funded the Abdel-Nasser faction but so too is it true that the Kremlin conspired to overthrow the United Arab Republic as shall be explained in further detail in C21S2.1. Ultimately, since Eurasia was a dictatorship of the Titoist comprador bourgeoisie, the Titoist faction eventually won in its fight against the communist faction, and hence Eurasia's economic infrastructure was sabotaged, and Eurasia was partitioned by 1991. Since the Titoist faction in 1956 was only slightly more powerful than the communist faction though, the process of bringing about the collapse of Eurasia took as long as 1991 – 1956 = 35 years, as opposed to just a few years.

The discrepancies in Eurasia's foreign policy line allowed Maoist propaganda to deliberately conflate the communist faction with the Titoist faction, hence to portray the communist faction as the same as the Titoist faction, hence to portray the communist fighters against the US-led bloc as collaborators with the US-led bloc! The laws of the crises of overproduction dictate that the communist faction would have collaborated with the American imperialists only if there was another power, such as a powerful Nazi Germany revived, that was more a threat to the communist and American imperialist projects, hence to draw the communists in Eurasia and US imperialists into an alliance against this greater threat. However, such a threat was practically non-existent, meaning that according to the laws of the crises of overproduction, Eurasia and the US-led camp would be the two main global rival forces. The rivalry, according to dialectical laws of history, could not possibly be limited to specific geographic areas or specific fields, but stretched onto all the different fields: in every corner of the planet, in the space, in the fields of culture, propaganda, military, intelligence, etc. Worse yet, the Maoist propagandists referred to the communist faction as 'Soviet social imperialist'. In other words, according to Mao and the Maoists, the 'Soviet social imperialists' and the US imperialists – which were the two main rivals – were cooperating with each other in many fields, as opposed to thoroughly confronting one another in all fields. Does that thesis sound familiar? That is the Kautskyite notion of 'ultra-imperialism', the notion that imperialist rivals will not compete with each other, will not launch devastating wars, and instead can come together, cooperate with each other, and form a peaceful harmony of imperialist powers; the implication of this fundamentally anti-'Leninist' thesis is that imperialist wars can be prevented. The global propaganda apparatus of the CIA-backed international Maoist reaction promoted Kautsky's anti-dialectical, anti-historical, anti-materialist, anti-scientific, and anti-communist argument.

C20S21. Why it is Impossible to Lose Hope

Even if one single imperialist power – for example, the United States – conquers the other imperialist powers, defeats all of its major rivals and goes on the path of victory and total dominance of the world, such an imperialist power would be quickly fractured into two imperialist powers, because each of the imperial elites dominating this imperialist power, out of utmost greed, would seek to get power for oneself and not the other imperial elites. Hence, a segment of the imperial elites dominating this imperialist power would defect to the camp of the enemies of this single world-dominating imperialist power and would thereby rally massive parts of this empire with oneself so to pave the way for the partition of this empire. It follows that there cannot ever be a single colonial empire dominating the world.

In the same ways, inter-imperialist alliances quickly break up. The term 'NATO' is ironic because it implies that imperialist France is strategically aligned with Anglo-American-German imperialism, whereas in reality, in spite of appearances to the contrary, French imperialism was unofficially allied to the USSR/Eurasia/Russia and the anti-imperialist forces throughout the Cold War so that French imperialism could defeat its Anglo-American-German imperialist rivals. Even if such an Anglo-American-German imperialist alliance were to take over almost all of the world, before such a global conquest, this Anglo-American-German imperialist alliance would split and these former allies would be rivals. Perhaps –perhaps! – for this reason did Stalin, a few months before the hybrid coup against him, mention this in The Economic Problems. He knew that even if the communists begin to lose, and even if the imperialists begin to win, the imperialists then begin to lose and the communists then begin to win. Inter-imperialist rivalry is the primary contradiction that weakens global imperial dominance and allows for the breathing room, the operational freedom, for the cause of the proletariat and the anti-colonial national bourgeoisie to rise, exploit inter-imperialist contradictions, and achieve its objectives. The inter-imperialist contradiction, the primary contradiction, allows for the proletarian-bourgeois conflict, the secondary contradiction, to result in the victory of the proletariat over the bourgeoisie – such did Stalin correctly imply in The Economic Problems. Therefore no matter how much defeat the proletariat face, they will win thanks to the imperialist bourgeoisie ensuring their own defeat.

C20S22. Revisionism in Mongolia  IMG-All-{Mongolia}

Tsedenbal, the Trotskyite adventurer who had pretended to be staunchly pro-Soviet during the Choibalsan years, replaced the latter in 1952, and joined Nikita Khrushchev and other Kremlin Titoists in denouncing communism under the cover of denouncing 'Stalinism' in 1956. The Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress:

Under the guidance of early party leaders Horloyn Choybalsan and Yumjaagiyn Tsedenbal, the principle of democratic centralism was weighted heavily toward its centralizing features, just as it was being applied in the Soviet Union under Josef Stalin. Purges, reprisals, and political violence in Mongolia mirrored the arbitrary behavior of Stalin. Choybalsan directed his attacks against political foes, rivals, and religious institutions. After Choybalsan's death in 1952 and Tsedenbal's emergence as the top party and government leader, Mongolian politics again followed the Soviet example. Starting in 1956, Tsedenbal initiated an extensive anti-Stalinist, anti-Choybalsan campaign, accusing the party leader of having conducted a "cult of personality" like Stalin. (Country Study: Mongolia, Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress, sponsored by the US Department of the Army, edited by: Robert L. Worden & Andrea Matles Savada, June 1989) (IMG)

The Mongolian Party composition also changed during the approximately four decades of Titoist reign in Mongolia. As early as 1970, and probably much earlier, half of Mongolia's Party membership was made up of the intelligentsia and bureaucrats, whereas less than a third of the Party was made up of blue-collar workers. As early as 1968, half of the state legislature was dominated by intelligentsia. The US military colonel Dupuy reported:

There were 48,570 members of the MPRP in 1966, 3,000 of these being candidate-members. This was a significant increase over the figures for 1963, when reportedly the party had 41,015 members and 2,077 candidate-members. Nearly half of the party membership (49 percent) represents government officials. About 30 percent are classified by the party as workers, and the remaining 21 percent as livestock cooperative members. The Party's youth organization, the once dominant Revsomols, still has a larger membership than the parent is today very much a subsidiary organization to the MPRP.

The 48,000-plus members of the MPRP represent a very favored elite, slightly more than 4 percent of the population of 1.1 million. They owe their status to their preferred positions as functionaries of the Soviet-supported Mongolian Communist regime. There is no reason to believe that the overwhelming preponderance of this elite is not most satisfied with the regime. its accomplishments, and its prospects. Because of the nature of the state and the society, the individual careers of the members of this elite are unusually closely tied to the political leadership of the Party and its ties in turn with the USSR. There is no evidence to suggest the likelihood of an early change in the attitude of this elite, whatever the change in its membership.

(Area Handbook for Mongolia, Vol. 550, Issue 76, Historical Evaluation and Research Organization, Washington, D.C., Historical Evaluation and Research Organization, Trevor Nevitt Dupuy, 1970, p. 233) (IMG)

In the election of June 1966 to the Great People's Khural, it is claimed that only 27 ballots in opposition were cast. In that Khural, still in office in 1968, reported results indicate that of the 287 members, about half were "workers and peasants" and the rest from the "intelligentsia" (largely government and Party officials and bureaucrats). Nearly 22 percent were women, (see ch. 10, The Governmental System). (Area Handbook for Mongolia, Vol. 550, Issue 76, Historical Evaluation and Research Organization, Washington, D.C., Historical Evaluation and Research Organization, Trevor Nevitt Dupuy, p. 235) (IMG)

The Mongolian Party adopted the line of the Kremlin Titoists headed by Khrushchev and Gorbachev, and was thus the Party of the revisionist intelligentsia and bureaucrats, and hence the dictatorship of the bourgeoisie. By 1990, the revisionist Party and state apparatus had enough corruption and decentralization for the bourgeois state to transition from a state that was socialist in appearance but bourgeois in content, to a state that is bourgeois in appearance and content.

Chapter 21

C21S1. The New Titoization Drive in France's Communist Movement  IMG-All-{PCF post-1953}

As a result of the 1956 Titoization speech, quick changes began in the line of the French Communist Party (PCF). The PCF, which had opposed the colonization of Algeria, began to officially support it to a significant extent, just a number of days after the Titoization speech, once the PCF leaders went to Moscow and returned from there:

COMMUNISTS MAY BACK MOLLET GOVERNMENT ON ALGERIA

The French Communist Party (PCF) is seriously considering supporting [the Kautskyite 'Socialist'] Premier Mollet in the National Assembly vote on special powers for Algeria, according to a member of President Coty's staff. The acting secretary general of the Socialist Party believes that the Communists may at least abstain. He comments that the current PCF line stressing "ties between France and Algeria" is an amazing change probably linked with the recent return of Communist leaders from Moscow.

The US embassy believes Mollet's chances are very favorable for winning the vote, which is expected by 13 March. Comment Communist support of Mollet for a strong policy in Algeria would indicate the party's determination to use every device to achieve a popular -front. In an effort to get widespread support on this issue, Mollet has been consulting with party leaders from the Communists to the Poujadists. None of the major nongovernment parties has committed itself. However, it is believed that the right-center would be unwilling to bring down the government now, particularly since the government's Algerian policy is much more to its liking than seemed possible when Mollet assumed office. In the event of Communist support, the right-center can also be expected to back the government in an effort to avoid the appearance of a popular front.

(COMMUNISTS MAY BACK MOLLET GOVERNMENT ON ALGERIA. In: CURRENT INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, 15740205, March 8, 1956, p. 4) (IMG)

As part of the Kremlin Titoist project to contain the expansion of the influence of the Abdel-Nasser faction, the Eurasian Titoist ambassador Vinogradov supported the 'French' colonial presence in Algeria so to strengthen American imperialist presence:

MOLLET WINS CONFIDENCE VOTES WITH COMMUNIST SUPPORT

The National Assembly's overwhelming support of Premier Mollet's request for extraordinary powers will give the French government a temporary respite to begin implementation of its Algerian policy. The government can now be expected to increase its military effort. At the same time it will attempt to win Moslem support by seeking to put into effect its announced program of economic, administrative, and social reform in Algeria.

The Communists, probably believing that the government's policy will end in failure, were willing to reverse their stand on Algerian independence and support the government rather than jeopardize their popular front objective. Soviet ambassador Vinogradov told a high French Foreign Ministry official on 7 March that the USSR supports continued French presence in North Africa. Vinogradov made no reply when the Frenchman asked: "Isn't it because you Russians would prefer to have a weak France in that strategic area rather than let it fall under the influence of the US?"

(MOLLET WINS CONFIDENCE VOTES WITH COMMUNIST SUPPORT. In: CURRENT INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, 15740205, March 13, 1956, p. 4) (IMG)

Vinogradov would not have known how to answer that question because the whole point of supporting the 'French' colonization of Algeria was to precisely ensure the continued presence of the Anglo-American and German imperialist domination of Algeria in the name of France.

Enver Hoxha too wrote:

The French Communist Party took an active part in the meeting of the Information Bureau which examined the situation in the Communist Party of Yugoslavia. It condemned and sternly denounced the betrayal by Tito and his group.

However, after the death of Stalin and Khrushchev's advent to power, vacillations and deviations appeared again in the line of the French Communist Party and the stands of its leaders. These vacillations were apparent as early as 1954, in its attitude towards the liberation war of the Algerian people.

What did the French Communist Party do to assist this war? It waged only a propaganda campaign and nothing more.

(Eurocommunism is Anti-Communism, Hoxha, MIA)

There also came about the revisionist distortion of the concept of popular frontism, and there came the incorrect view that popular frontism and non-sectarian approach to proletarian class struggles was through subordination to the Kautskyite agents of imperialist-fascist secret services, who in France were represented by Mollet and his 'French Socialists'.

Hence, in line with the Kremlin Titoist emphasis on collaboration with the Kautskyite agents of imperialist-fascist secret services,:

Unity of action with the [Kautskyite fake] Socialists was given special emphasis at the congress, and the chief of the visiting Soviet delegation stated in his "directive" the great importance attached to such collaboration.... (CURRENT INTELLIGENCE WEEKLY SUMMARY, CIA, July 26, 1956, p. 10 of 16) (IMG)

As with virtually every communist party, there came renewed pressure for having intellectuals into the Party:

Thorez ... baited an appeal to intellectuals to join the party by reiterating the "different roads to Socialism" thesis.... (CURRENT INTELLIGENCE WEEKLY SUMMARY, CIA, July 26, 1956, p. 10 of 16) (IMG)

All of these facts about the partial Titoization of the PCF should not by any means imply that the French Communist Party was at its core, Titoist or revisionist. It is no exaggeration to say that PCF had a glorious history, with the Popular Front of the prewar years, the training of numerous communists and progressives, the leadership of the French Resistance during World War II, the planting of their leaders at - and hence infiltration into - the top ranks of the French imperialist state. The Party also waged a resistance against the Yugoslav regime and the Kremlin Titoists. In fact, the Titoization that occurred in the PCF was clearly under the pressure of the Kremlin Titoists and did not represent the true core of the PCF.

As part of the PCF resistance against the Moscow Titoists,:

Thorez ... claimed that nearly 50, 000 new members have joined since January, but added that some recruitment weaknesses exist, particularly among metal and mine workers. He also emphasized the weakness of the Communist youth organization.... (CURRENT INTELLIGENCE WEEKLY SUMMARY, CIA, July 26, 1956, p. 10 of 16) (IMG)

Enver Hoxha wrote:

As to the leaders of the French Communist Party, such as Thorez, Duclos and others, however, it is a fact that at first they were dismayed at Khrushchev's "secret" report against Stalin and did not accept it. After this report was published in the Western press, the Political Bureau of the French Communist Party made a statement in which it condemned this report and expressed its reservations about the attacks on Stalin. Thorez personally, told me in regard to this problem: "We sought explanations from the Soviet comrades, they gave them to us, but we are not convinced." I pointed out to Thorez, "You are not convinced, while we do not agree in the least." Thus Thorez and the French Communist Party had long been aware of our opinion of the 20th Congress and of the Khrushchevites' slanders against Stalin.

The French and the Italians were like cat and mouse. I had talked with Thorez and Duclos about the stands of the leaders of the Italian Communist Party against the Marxist-Leninist line, in defence of the Titoite revisionists and against our Party. At first, they and the French as a whole seemed to behave well towards us. We stuck to our views and they to theirs. We continued our ceaseless attacks against the Titoites and they seemed to have no trust in Tito. We were on the same course in our stand towards the Italian leaders, too. (The Khrushchevites, Hoxha)

Not for nothing did Lavrenti Beria despise PCF leader Jacques Duclos:

Another he could not endure was Jacques Duclos, who reminded him of Rakosi: 'reptiles,' he called them. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 196) (IMG)

Hoxha continued:

Prior to the events which brought the split, Comrades Marcel Cachin and Gaston Monmousseau, two glorious veterans of communism, came to our country. Our whole Party and people welcomed them with joy and affection. I had very open and cordial talks with them. They visited our country, spoke to me about it with great sympathy, and wrote in glowing terms about our Party and people in "L'Humanité". Monmousseau also published a very pleasant book about our country. Sitting with me in front of the fire, he told me about the visit he made to Korça and his participation with the cooperativists of Korça in the grape harvest. In the course of our talk, I asked the author of "Jean Bécot", who is from Champagne, the place of famous wines:

"Comrade Monmousseau, what do you think of our wine?"

He replied pince-sans-rire³

"Like vinegar."

I laughed heartily and said:

"You are right, but tell me, what should we do about it?"

Monmousseau went on to speak for a whole hour about wine and this helped me greatly. I listened with admiration to the old man whose cheeks were glowing and eyes sparkling with enthusiasm, who had the colour of the wine of his birthplace, Champagne.

Before we went to the 81 parties' Meeting in Moscow, Maurice Thorez asked to come to our country for a holiday. We welcomed him with great pleasure. We thought (and we were not wrong) that he was sent by the Soviets to "soften us up".

When he was on holiday in Durrës, I told Thorez about all the vile things the Soviets had done to us.

Maurice listened attentively. He was astounded because he did not know these things. They had hidden everything from him. I spoke about the Bucharest Meeting and our stand at that meeting. He said that they had been informed about the stand of the Party of Labour of Albania at the Bucharest Meeting by the delegation from their party, and since this stand had impressed them, he had set out for Albania with the intention of talking about this question with us. Thorez said that the Bucharest Meeting was useful and did not pronounce himself at all on whether or not it was in order. He did not criticize our stand in Bucharest and when he had heard me out, all he said was:

"Comrade Enver, you must clear up these things they have done to you with the Soviet leadership."

As to the struggle against Titoism, Maurice Thorez approved everything. We saw him off by ship for Odessa.

In Moscow, before I spoke at the 81 parties' Meeting, Maurice Thorez invited us to dinner. This time it was obvious that he had come from Khrushchev to persuade us not to speak against the revisionist betrayal at the meeting, but he failed in his mission. We did not accept the mistaken "advice" he gave us.

Maurice Thorez criticized us in the meeting, but in moderate terms. However, after I had spoken, Jeannette Vermeersch, Thorez's wife, met me and said:

"Comrade Enver, where are you heading on this course you have begun? We do not understand you."

"You do not understand us today, but perhaps you will understand us tomorrow," I replied.

Everyone knows how things turned out for the French Communist Party. It, too, set out with determination on the revisionist road. It betrayed Marxism-Leninism and, with some nuances, followed the line of Khrushchev and Brezhnev.

(The Khrushchevites, Hoxha)

The full Titoization of the PCF, therefore, was resisted with some success by the Party. In the words of the CIA,:

The congress was geared to give incontrovertible evidence of party solidarity despite the effects of Moscow's de-Stalinization campaign. Maurice Thorez's re-election as secretary general and the Soviet delegate's reference to him as a "dear friend" emphasize his continuing leadership. Thorez paid lip service to the value of criticism of the cult of personality, but he stressed that such criticism could not be "transferred mechanically" to the French Communist party. The de-Stalinization drive within the French party thus seems to be successfully checked.... (CURRENT INTELLIGENCE WEEKLY SUMMARY, CIA, July 26, 1956, p. 10 of 16) (IMG)

However, obviously, there were serious problems that arose. The communists of the PCF, Thorez and Duclos included, had always opposed the colonization of Algeria. This is well-documented and the CIA document cited previously briefly mentions it. Nonetheless, as with every other communist party, the Titoization speech inflicted severe pressure on the PCF to collaborate with the Kautskyites in various fields and not just in the occupation of Algeria. As mentioned before though, the Moscow Titoists wanted the PCF to fully and completely endorse the colonization of Algeria. The fact that, as Hoxha stated, the Party only partially opposed the colonization of Algeria during the mid-1950s is evidence of the factional dispute between the communist and Titoist factions of the PCF. Overall though, the PCF descended into a degree of Titoization. It did recover during the 1960s and the 1970s, and then went down again long later. Either way, what matters is that Moscow Titoist pressures on the PCF pushed it towards an anti-Algerian direction.

C21S2.1. Abdel-Nasser Faction wages Cold War against Moscow Titoists  IMG-All-{UAR}

Imperialist media presents Gamal Abdel-Nasser and Nikita Khrushchev as great 'friends' and 'allies'. Such a portrayal is false. Abdel-Nasser was indeed allied to the anti-imperialist elements that surrounded Nikita Khrushchev and other Kremlin Titoists, but that does not mean that Abdel-Nasser was friends with Nikita Khrushchev and the Kremlin Titoists per se. On the contrary, Abdel-Nasser was engaged in a bloody cold war against Nikita Khrushchev and the Moscow Titoists; such a bloody cold war against Khrushchev and Co. was unfavorable to Anglo-American interests because Khrushchev and Co. were agents of Anglo-American intelligence; such a bloody cold war was favorable to the weak though significant anti-imperialist elements that surrounded Nikita Khrushchev and the Kremlin Titoists; such a bloody cold war was indirectly helpful to the weak though significant communist elements in the CPSU, elements which were a minority but which waged intra-Party struggles against the dominant white collar (intelligentsia and bureaucrat) elements that supported Titoism.

In a secret letter to Nikita Khrushchev, Gamal Abdel-Nasser complained that the Eurasians came to Egypt's aid far too late with regards to 1956 war. When the 1956 war began, Shukri El-Quwwatli – who had been a military ally of Stalin-era USSR and socialist Czechoslovakia – had gone to Moscow to ask for Eurasian assistance to Egypt against the aggressors. There, Quwwatli was mistreated by the Kremlin Titoists and Eurasian aid to Egypt was flatly rejected. Egypt had to face the Anglo-'Franco'-Israeli aggression on its own, and the Eurasian ultimatum against the aggressors came very late. Here are excerpts of Abdel-Nasser's letter:

The aggression came at the same time that we were preparing for negotiations in Geneva, on October 29, 1956.

You referred to a speech I gave in Damascus in which I said "We were standing in the face of the tripartite aggression on the battlefield alone, not waiting for anyone's help," but this phrase - as I felt from your speech and your statements - made you upset!

It did not occur to me to underestimate the value of the ultimatum given by Bulganin, the Soviet prime minister at the time, but the fact remains that we were on the battlefield alone. Our soldiers in Sinai were fighting alone, and our army and people were fighting in the streets of Port Sa'id alone.

The visit of Shukri al-Quwatli to Moscow was on October 30, 1956, and he had the opportunity to talk with Bulganin in the presence of a number of Soviet leaders and senior military marshals. I received a letter sent by al-Quwatli specifying your position on the aggression: the Soviet Union is not ready to enter a world war, and on this basis it cannot intervene militarily, even by sending volunteers, and that the most it can do to help us [Egyptians] is to send some equipment to us, along with some technicians!

What I did was; I removed this letter from the file which contained it, and put it in my pocket; Because I did not want anyone whose morale might be affected by reading it to see it, and it returned to its place as one of the state documents after the battle was over.

This document is an honor for us; it is the best proof that we fought, and were not only in the battlefield alone, but we knew that we would remain alone!

The Soviet ultimatum - the effect of which no one can deny - came from Moscow as a surprise to us, after 9 days had passed in which we were on the battlefield alone, and everything - even the Soviet ultimatum - depended on the steadfastness of this people, and their willingness to sacrifice.

It was the matter that necessitated statements - which did not fall from you on the site of contentment - about the truth in the matter of the tripartite aggression; Radio stations that speak in your name, and newspapers published in your countries, began - amid discussions between us and the Syrian Communist Party - thanks to this warning! It was my duty to put the role of the Egyptian people in its rightful place.

We appreciate your position and understand its motives, and it never occurred to us to ask you to enter a world war for us!

You [went on and] accused us of interfering in the internal affairs of others, but also in the affairs of the Soviet Union!

Syrian President Shukri El-Quwwatli had been overthrown in a CIA coup in 1949 by Colonel Za'im. A fascist terror state was established. However, later on, democracy was restored, and Quwwatli returned to the scene. Syria by then had been heavily infiltrated by the CIA. This meant that there was a strong chance that another coup against the Syrian democracy was coming. In this midst, Quwwatli advocated Syria's merger with Egypt. Abdel-Nasser knew quite well that economically, such a project was definitely not feasible; the reason why he accepted such an offer though was to assist Quwwatli in the purge of CIA agents in Syria. Thus, the merger of Egypt and Syria into the United Arab Republic (UAR) was not for the purpose of a real integration of those countries because such a project was not feasible – rather it was to undermine CIA-MI6-Mossad interests in Syria. Khrushchev and the Kremlin Titoists disliked the purge of the CIA-MI6-Mossad elements and so began a hostile policy against the unification of Syria and Egypt. In his letter to Khrushchev, Abdel-Nasser wrote:

As for the Unity [of Syria and Egypt into the United Arab Republic (UAR)], the evidence indicated that the new direction for it did not suit your tendencies and desires. The position of the Communist Party was on Unity; it did not accept the comprehensive consensus of the Syrian people for its establishment, and the communist MP Khaled Bakdash was the only one who preferred to flee, and then we found him resorting to some countries of the socialist bloc. Finally, he stood beside you in the celebration of the 21st Congress of the Communist Party, and began to attack the government of his country [Syria], which caused us anxiety and annoyance: its purpose [i.e. the purpose of the Unity of Egypt and Syria] is to violate the principles of peaceful coexistence in this public way!

It was also an indication of your direction; the Soviet Union, after the Declaration of Unity on February 1, 1958 from Cairo, remained for more than two weeks keen to refrain from expressing its opinion on it.

(Cairo-Moscow, Dar ul-Shoruq, Sami Ammareh) (IMG)

In his memoirs, Nikita Khrushchev admitted:

On the other hand, we did support Bagdash, and Bagdash was waging a struggle, exerting all the influence the Syrian Communist Party had – a struggle against unification with Egypt. ('Memoirs of Nikita Khrushchev, Volume 3: Statesman, 1953-1964', Watson Institute, Nikita Khrushchev, p. 820) (IMG)

Khrushchev continued:

By that time the formation of the UAR had been accomplished. Syria fell under Nasser's leadership, and democratic conditions in that country were abolished. The Syrian Communist Party found itself in a difficult situation. Syria began to be trimmed down, having its hair cut to conform to the Egyptian social and political model. We, of course, did not support this and spoke out against it. Our position offended Nasser; he became unfavorably disposed toward us. That's fully understandable. He understood correctly that we were supporting the Communists of Syria, who were fighting against Egypt and against Nasser. ('Memoirs of Nikita Khrushchev, Volume 3: Statesman, 1953-1964', Watson Institute, Nikita Khrushchev, p. 820) (IMG)

A campaign of fascistic slanders began by the Kremlin Titoist propaganda sheet, 'Pravda'. According to Abdel-Nasser, Pravda went so far as to claim that the notorious Khrushchev-backed Syrian politician Riad Al-Turk (who as I am writing, is still alive and is now 91 years old) was murdered in 1958 in a UAR prison! Abdel-Nasser responded in UAR media:

Informed circles in Cairo commented on what the Soviet newspaper Pravda published today against the United Arab Republic. (...). Pravda did not learn from the consequences of its abuse of the UAR, and today it is slipping into new abuses. In a way, if it indicates anything, it is due to the ignorance of its editor of the nature of the Arab people, who do not accept abuse, and who are determined to preserve their independence and dignity. Yesterday, the Soviet newspaper Pravda accused the UAR of killing Riyad al-Turk in the Mezzeh prison in Damascus, and carried out a campaign based on slanders and defamation. (Political comment by the President [Gamal Abdel-Nasser] in response to what was published by the Soviet newspaper Pravda attacking the United Arab Republic, Gamal Abdel-Nasser) (IMG)

Why would there be any surprise that Abdel-Nasser and Khrushchev would be enemies, in light of the fact that Khrushchev personally promoted Zionist? Also, socialist Czechoslovakia was a country that provided military assistance to the UAR. Khrushchev and other Kremlin Titoists imposed tough sanctions on and fomented colour revolutionary uprisings in Czechoslovakia, and supported Titoist-Zionist agents centered around Dubcek against communist blue-collar workers' elements in the Party headed by Novotny. Not only were sanctions imposed on the country that militarily funded Egypt/UAR, the Kremlin Titoists delayed as much as possible Eurasian arms sales to the UAR and then when the arms transfers were to come, they stopped the arms flow. In doing so, Khrushchev wished to push the UAR into Tito's hands and Khrushchev did partially succeed, since the UAR was forced to look to the Yugoslav regime for arms. Hoda Abdel-Nasser, the daughter of Gamal Abdel-Nasser, has very extensively studied the personal and secret intelligence papers of Gamal Abdel-Nasser. Hoda wrote:

A reciprocal media campaign took place between Gamal Abdel Nasser and Khrushchev several months after the Egyptian-Syrian union, despite its opposition to the interests of both countries. As for the Soviet Union, it entered the Middle East by selling arms to Egypt, after the West had been procrastinating with it for more than three years, during which Israel took advantage of the opportunity to carry out repeated attacks on its borders with Egypt. (...). Relations between the UAR and the Soviet Union had become volatile, but the general trend was for the worse. This was reflected to a large extent, especially with regard to the supply of weapons; as the delivery was stopped and the price was raised, the situation with regard to spare parts in particular became bad, and the UAR began looking for other sources of weapons, such as Yugoslavia or local industry. (Secret Letters between Nasser and Khrushchev, Hoda Gamal Abdel-Nasser, November 14, 2013) (IMG)

Yugoslavia and the UAR had contradicting stances on the Middle East issues. In order to contain the expansion of UAR influence into Lebanon, the US deployed its troops there. The response of Yugoslavia, the alleged 'ally' of the UAR, is interesting to note. The Yugoslav regime's Chargé d'Affaires Franc Primozic spoke to the US Secretary of State. Here are excerpts of the Memorandum of the Conversation between the two leaders:

The Secretary asked Mr. Primozic whether the Yugoslav Government considers that it is wrong to send troops to aid a friendly nation which has requested assistance in preserving its independence. Mr. Primozic replied that the UN is the proper body to take such action. ('SUBJECT: Yugoslav Chargé d'Affaires' discussion with the Secretary concerning Middle East crisis: Memorandum of Conversation', US Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, Yugoslav Chargé d'Affaires ad interim Mr. Franc Primozic, July 19, 1958. In: 'Foreign Relations of the United States, 1958-1960', Eastern Europe; Finland; Greece; Turkey, Volume X, Part 2, p. 344) (IMG)

Sometimes, arguing that the US should invade a country via the UN is used by diplomats of anti-imperialist states as a cover and an excuse with which to block a US invasion. However,:

The Secretary then noted that the Soviet Union had vetoed a proposal in the Security Council which would have transferred to UN forces the responsibilities which US troops have assumed in Lebanon. He asked Mr. Primozic whether in the Yugoslav view this Soviet veto was a constructive step. Mr. Primozic conceded that it was not. The Secretary then continued that there are US military elements in some 30 countries throughout the world where they have been sent without involving the UN. Should they now be withdrawn, he asked. Mr. Primozic replied in the negative.... ('SUBJECT: Yugoslav Chargé d'Affaires' discussion with the Secretary concerning Middle East crisis: Memorandum of Conversation', US Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, Yugoslav Chargé d'Affaires ad interim Mr. Franc Primozic, July 19, 1958. In: 'Foreign Relations of the United States, 1958-1960', Eastern Europe; Finland; Greece; Turkey, Volume X, Part 2, p. 344) (IMG)

According to the Yugoslav view, therefore, the 'US military elements in [approximately] 30 countries throughout the world' including in Lebanon should not have been withdrawn, and the Eurasian move to obstruct a US intervention into Lebanon via the UN was counter-productive.

The climax of the story, however, was manifested in Iraq. Iraq was where the covert intelligence war between the UAR and its allied freedom forces against the joint alliance of Khrushchev and the Kremlin Titoists, Tito's fascist gang, the SAVAK, the Mossad, the Kurdish bourgeois-nationalists, the Hashemites, and the Anglo-American secret services became bloodier and more violent than ever. There are many critical pieces to the story, but presenting all of them would require me to write too much; so I will only present the most important parts.

In Iraq existed was a circle of Nasserist Free Officers headed by Iraqi generals Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim and Abdel-Salam Aref. The former was a fake 'Nasserist' 'Free Officer' whereas the latter a real one. In July 1958, the battalions under the command of the Iraqi General Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim and the Iraqi Nasserist Free Officer Abdel-Salam Al-Aref were sent by the Hashemite Iraqi regime to support the Hashemite Jordanian regime. The Nasserist Free Officer Abdel-Salam Aref used this opportunity to launch a military coup against the Hashemite monarchy, to seize Baghdad's critical stations and thus to install a new state in Iraq. This was the critical time in which Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim, who at the time posed as a Nasserist Free Officer and as a 'friend' of Aref, to join Aref in the coup. However, Al-Qasim did not participate and thus betrayed the person to whom he presented himself as 'friend'. Instead of marching to Baghdad to help Aref, Al-Qasim stayed in Jordan thus to fulfill his mission of supporting the Jordanian monarchy. Fortunately, Aref succeeded in his coup despite Al-Qasim's stab in the back. Upon being informed of Aref's success, Al-Qasim rushed to Baghdad ostensibly to 'help' Aref but actually to launch a counter-coup against Aref and his comrades. As such, Al-Qasim made himself the first in command of the newly established Iraqi republic and made Aref the second. Shortly thereafter, Qasim made up slanders and excuses, and ousted Aref out of even the second-in-command position. To this day, the CIA-MI6-Mossad puppet media falsely presents the enemy of the Arab nation, Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim, as the true coup plotter and operator. The Moscow Titoists and the social-fascist 'Iraqi Communist Party' parroted the CIA-MI6-Mossad narrative. In his letter to Khrushchev, Abdel-Nasser remarked:

The [1958] Iraqi revolution was the beginning of the great crisis in our relations, although much of what was mentioned in your speech opened our eyes to the fact that the causes of misunderstanding between us extended to much before this revolution!

It is surprising that we hear from different circles an attack on Arab nationalism as a basis! [Our] solidarity with the Iraqi revolution began a long time ago; a number of the leaders of the Iraqi revolution - including Qasim, the Iraqi prime minister - had contacted us before the revolution, and asked that we help them in planning it. Our advice to them was; That they keep their affairs a secret even from us, and that they seek help only from their own people, and that only those who will bear the burden of implementing the revolution undertake the development of the revolution's plan.

After the Iraqi revolution succeeded, the Iraqi Communist Party wanted to seize the opportunity to control it; it took advantage of a personal dispute that broke out between Qassem and his deputy, Arif; in order to create an atmosphere of confusion to help him achieve his goals!

(Cairo-Moscow, Dar ul-Shoruq, Sami Ammareh) (IMG)

In the above quote regarding the 1958 Iraqi coup and counter-coup, Gamal Abdel-Nasser, who waged a bloody struggle against Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim, was being highly diplomatic, and thus used kind words in describing that traitor Qasim. Unlike what Abdel-Nasser diplomatically stated, the conflict between Aref and Al-Qasim was not as much a personal conflict, as it was a conflict between anti-imperialist and progressive forces headed by Aref and the imperialist-fascist reaction led by the MI6 agent Qasim. Upon seizing power, Qasim presented himself as a third force lying in between the reactionary Arab monarchies and the UAR. He started saying that Palestine was occupied by Egypt and by reactionary Jordan. In reality, the MI6 agent Qasim continued his old mission of serving the Hashemite monarchy in Jordan. Volumes of documents prove the irrefutable fact that the Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim regime was covertly allied to the British intelligence service. However, perhaps a top document on this matter is the following, in which it is admitted that Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim supported financial aid to the Anglo-American imperialists' comprador regime in Jordan:

Jordan Seeking Financial Aid From Iraq

Iraqi Prime Minister Qasim is favorably disposed toward a Jordanian request for financial assistance, according to information from the Lebanese ambassador in Baghdad who until recently handled Jordanian affairs there. The amount and terms of the aid sought were not disclosed. Qasim reportedly has not made a final decision on the matter.

Iraqi aid to Jordan probably would arouse considerable opposition among many Iraqis who are displeased over the rapprochement with Jordan, which they view as aligning Iraq against the UAR. Qasim, however, may consider that benevolence toward Jordan would enhance his prestige as an impartial Arab leader amid apparently rising pan-Arab sentiment in Iraq. A pro-government Baghdad newspaper has referred to possible efforts by the "Iraqi Government to eliminate differences between the UAR" and Jordan [by ousting the UAR and installed an Anglo-American puppet state in Egypt to make it like Jordan].

The Jordanian Government is preoccupied with the UAR's threat to its security and with its perennial financial problems. The Jordanians apparently hope Qasim will be helpful in both of these situations. King Husayn's regime swallowed its outrage over the murder of Husayn's Hashemite relatives in the Iraqi revolution of 1958 and recognized Qasim's regime in October 1960. Since then gradual progress has been made in re-establishing relations between the two countries.

In fact, according to Roby Barrett, a US State Department's Foreign Service Officer and fellow at CIA front think tanks,;

The British actually feared a Nasserist regime in Iraq and the potential consequences for the petroleum interests there and throughout the Gulf more than the potential threat of a Communist takeover. London pressed for continued arms shipments to Iraq, arguing that strengthening Qasim and the Iraqi military provided the most potent firewall against the [real] Communists and Nasserists. ('Intervention in Iraq, 1958-1959', The Middle East Institute, Roby Barrett, April 1, 2008) (IMG)

In a confidential conversation with Iran's Shah in the Buckingham Palace, Selwyn Lloyd, the Antony Eden-era Conservative British Secretary of State, admitted to the Shah that the MI6 was militarily funding the Khrushchevian-backed Al-Qasim regime:

After dinner at Buckingham Palace on the 5th of May I had a short conversation with the Shah. (...) I then spoke of our relations with the new Iraqi Government and our dilemma about arms. The Shah said that he thought we were right to agree to continue the supply of arms to Iraq and added that the situation seemed strange to Iranians. The Iraqis had [under Nasserist pressure] left the Baghdad Pact and were flirting with [Khrushchevian pseudo-]Communism and they got arms both from the Russians and now from us [the MI6]. (EQ 10334/15, RECORD OF CONVERSATION BETWEEN THE SECRETARY OF STATE AND SHAHANSHAH OF IRAN ON THE 5TH OF MAY, 1959, Mr. Selwyn Lloyd to Mr. J. W. Russell (Tehran), No. 69 Confidential, Foreign Office, May 8, 1959) (IMG)

Playing his usual hypocrisy games vis-à-vis the British, and to lobby the British into further military armaments of Pahlavi Iran, the Shah ostensibly expressed 'regrets' about the MI6 militarily funding of the Qasim regime; yet, it remains a fact, presenting the evidence of which is beyond the scope of this work, that the SAVAK ceased the campaign against Iraq's government as soon as the Qasim faction consolidated power against the Nasserist faction.

The MI6 agent Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim received the full support of the MI6 agent Nikita Khrushchev, who admitted in his memoirs:

We supported Kassem by all possible means.... ('Memoirs of Nikita Khrushchev, Volume 3: Statesman, 1953-1964', Watson Institute, Nikita Khrushchev, p. 820) (IMG)

Al-Qasim and his fascist gang also received the support of Tito's group. Regarding Abdel-Nasser's line on the Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim regime, Tito explicitly said:

Nasser took an overly radical route and is needlessly and profusely inflaming the relations [with Iraq] . . . He can lose a lot of his own prestige . . . Nasser is a man who allows himself to be 'fired up' ... He should look at these things with more reservation and realism but I fear that this is not the case. "Janko Smole, a high-ranking Yugoslav Party official, commented to a British diplomat" the following:

Nasser had made very serious blunders in the Middle East but the main negative factor in the situation was the degree of control achieved by the Iraqi communist party acting solely in the interest of the [Soviet] 'camp' ... Nasser, who had lost his head and behaved in a hysterical fashion, had made it easier for them to establish their grip. Horrible crimes against humanity were committed by the Al-Qasim regime. However, there was hope. Undoubtedly, the Iraqi Baath movement was infiltrated by fascist assassins such as Saddam, Ali Salih Al-Sa'di, and (later on) Nadhim Kzar, but at the time, the progressive revolutionary elements headed by Ahmad Hasan Al-Bakr held the upper hand. Upon the request of Michel Aflaq, the UAR began financing the Iraqi Baathists headed by General Ahmad Hasan Al-Bakr to help them in their counter-coup against Al-Qasim's gang. Knowing that a coup was being planned against the Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim faction, the Tito regime informed Abdel-Karim Qasim of the coup plot, thus allowing the Al-Qasim regime to hunt down the prominent Iraqi Ba'athist freedom-fighter Salih Mahdi Al-Ammash. Sa'id Aburish, a prominent journalist and spy for the CIA's Radio Free Europe / Radio Liberty, was a supporter of Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim, and lashed out at Abdel-Nasser and the Ba'athists for involvement in the coup against Qasim. Yet, Aburish also confirmed:

Kassem was not without friends and the Yugoslavs, among others, told him of the plot to overthrow him. Colonel Saleh Mahdi Ammassh, a Ba'athist officer in the Iraqi Army who was among the conspirators, was arrested in January 1963.... (Saddam Hussein: The Politics of Revenge, Sa'id Aburish, 2001, p. 56. Bold added.) (IMG)

Salih Mahdi Al-Ammash later rose to become a prominent Iraqi Ba'athist supporter of Hafez Al-Assad and a major foe of Saddam Hussein. Ammassh was assassinated by Saddam Hussein's Mukhaberat in the 1980s.

Yet in spite of the counter-measures by the Al-Qasim regime, the regime was still vulnerable, and in 1963, Ahmad Hasan Al-Bakr successfully launched a coup against Al-Qasim known as the Ramadan 1963 coup. However, much as how in July 1958 there occurred two military coups stacked closely on top of each other but presented as one coup, the Ramadan 1963 coup by Al-Bakr was followed by at least three other military coups so spatio-temporally proximate to Al-Bakr's coup that it appeared as though one coup happened in the Ramadan of 1963.

The net results of these four (or more) coups/counter-coups was that Ahmad Hasan Al-Bakr was able to re-install Abdel-Salam Aref as head of state but also that the Trotskyite mass-murderer Ali Salih Al-Sa'di was able to launch a reign of fascist terror: terrorizing Arabs, Kurds, Persians, fellow Baathists and Nasserists, communists, etc. He did this in order to provoke an uprising against the faction of Al-Bakr and Aref. He did indeed give the Anglo-Americans and Khrushchev and their agents the excuse to wrongly blame Aref for the mass-murder, kind of like how Stalin was blamed for Yezhovschina. By blaming Aref and Al-Bakr, Khrushchev and the Anglo-Americans were undermining the enemies of Ali Salih al-Sa'di hence to indirectly promote Al-Sa'di's gang to which Saddam is said to have belonged. The Moscow-based Titoists viciously slandered Iraq's UAR-backed government of committing a genocide in Iraq's Kurdistan region, as the following excerpts of a UN document reveal:

1. Mr. ARKADIEV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that his delegation had addressed a letter (E/J809) to the President requesting the inclusion in the agenda of the current session a new item entitled "Policy of genocide which is being pursued by the Government of the Republic of Iraq against the Kurdish people". In submitting its request, the USSR delegation had been guided by the provisions of Article 62 of the Charter, and of General Assembly resolution 96 (I) of 11 December 1946 on the crime of genocide. To its letter of request the USSR delegation had attached a memorandum setting forth facts which confirmed that a policy of genocide was being pursued by the Iraqi Government against the Kurdish people. At the same time, the Soviet Government had addressed communications to the Governments of Iraq, Iran and Syria on the same question, giving the relevant facts of the case and proving that the matter had acquired serious international significance and should be drawn to the attention of United Nations organs.

2. In view of its international significance, the problem should be examined in the Economic and Social Council, for it was directly linked with the problems which came within the Council's competence, and with the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide which the Council had prepared. Moreover, the Council already had a number of items relating to human rights on its agenda.

3. The Soviet Union had been compelled to urge that the item should be included in the Council's agenda because at that time brutal reprisals were being conducted by the Iraqi authorities against the Kurdish people, who comprised nearly a quarter of the population of Iraq. Large-scale military action was being taken against peaceful Kurdish towns and villages; troops supported by aircraft, tanks and artillery were gradually exterminating the civilian population, including children, women and old people; vast areas were being laid waste and large numbers of civilians were being driven from their homes.

4. Some might say that those data were available only to the Soviet Government, but that was not the case: the events had been publicized so widely that factual information could be obtained not only from official statements of the Soviet Government and from the Soviet press, but from such international newspapers as Le Monde, which bore out the Soviet statements in a leading article in its issue of 11 July, and the New York Herald Tribune, 10 July, which reported that three divisions, or 60 per cent of the Iraqi army, were conducting a merciless campaign against the Kurds, wiping Kurdish villages from the face of the earth with tanks, bulldozers and napalm bombs.

5. That was why the Soviet delegation had hastened to all the attention of the Economic and Social Council to the question, in order that the Council should use all its authority and influence to ensure that those merciless and brutal actions should be terminated forthwith.

Suddenly, the partners-in-crime of the butcher of Kosovo, the traitors who assisted the Marshal of the Traitors in the crimes against humanity, started 'worrying' about the 'genocide' in Iraqi Kurdistan. While murder of Kurds did occur, it could not be genocide per se, not as much because Al-Sa'di was murdering people semi-indiscriminately. To kill one border guard of a hostile state gives the foe the pretext for invasion; to kill a thousand border guards deters a foe from an invasion. Killing one border guard is a provocation of an enemy invasion, whereas killing a thousand border guards is a suppression of an enemy invasion. The same goes for genocide. A Kurdish bourgeois-nationalist rebellion, not a genocide, was desired by Al-Sa'di and his mafia. Annihilating the Kurds would have prevented a rebellion by the Kurdish bourgeois-nationalists, whereas massacring a relatively smaller number of Kurds would have provided the pretext for a bourgeois-nationalist rebellion. Al-Sa'di, an Arab, was also exterminating countless Arabs. He murdered people not to 'cleanse' entire ethnic groups, not to break the spirit of those ethnic groups, but to rather provoke the tribes of those ethnic groups into revolting against the Iraqi government.

Elsewhere in that UN document cited above, it is confirmed that India – a country that was allied to Stalin-era USSR and the UAR and which had assisted the UAR in hijacking Tito's 'Non-Aligned Movement' – refused to accept the Moscow Titoist line. Of course, India rejected the Eurasian Titoist line in the usual diplomatic language:

Mr. NEHRU (India) said he had listened to the statement of the Soviet Union representative with great attention and respect. (...). However, in dealing with such matters affecting a friendly country, there had to be some objective in view. The Indian objective was to help in promoting a peaceful atmosphere conducive to a peaceful settlement. The passing of resolutions condemning one side or the other would be of no help in creating such an atmosphere. It was India's desire and hope that the Government and people of Iraq would be able to overcome their difficulties. He was aware that they wished to avoid conflict, to solve their problems peacefully and to devote themselves to the great task of internal construction and development which was the principal task of all the Afro-Asian countries, including India. (...). Irrespective of legal and other considerations, and because of India's desire to help in promoting an atmosphere which would lead to reconciliation and peace rather than to bitterness and recrimination, his delegation was unable to support the Soviet proposal. [Nehru] appealed to the Soviet delegation to reconsider its initiative. The objective should be the promotion of peace rather than the aggravation of difficulties. (UNITED NATIONS ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL, 1278th meeting, Thursday, 11 July 1963, official records, Palais des Nations, Geneva, p. 2) (IMG)

To this day, many CIA spies on CIA payroll denounce Abdel-Nasser and his comrades as 'sellouts' to 'American imperialism' for the operations against the Qasim regime. Furthermore, Aref and Al-Bakr were trying to arrest Al-Sa'di for his numerous crimes and to execute him. By blaming Aref and Al-Bakr and Co. for the crimes of Al-Sa'di, the Khrushchev group were actually indirectly assisting Al-Sa'di, the very perpetrators of these mass-murders. Khrushchev wrote in his memoirs:

Bad relations had developed between Aref and us. We did not consider him a progressive-leaning person, and as an individual he was unpleasant. It was hard to have a conversation with him. Nasser gave a ceremonial dinner for his guests. Just prior to that, news arrived that Aref had carried out reprisals against the progressive forces in Iraq. I remarked to Nasser: "This is very distasteful. According to our information, Aref has arrested or killed a lot of people. It's distasteful even to sit next to such a person." The seating arrangement at President Nasser's table was such that I was supposed to sit right next to Aref. Nasser took exception to my remarks: "I think your information is incorrect. I don't think Aref has done this, especially while he's in Egypt as my guest and would be meeting with you. He has very much wanted to meet you and wants closer ties with the USSR."

I said to him: "I doubt it. Nothing like that has been evident in his speeches or his political line."

"I will find out right now," said Nasser, and hurried away.

After a little while [Nasser came back and] said: "Aref swears to God that he hasn't done any such thing, that these are fabrications of the capitalist press. Nothing of the sort has happened. They are lying. I [that is, Nasser] believe him because he's a devout religious person. He spends all his time on his knees, bowing toward Mecca and praying to Allah, asking Allah to answer his prayers about every possible problem. Aref is such a religious man that he's incapable of lying, I assure you."

The dinner proceeded with full ceremony, and afterward I had a talk with Aref, who brought up the subject on his own initiative. "The information you have received is inaccurate. It is apparently being circulated by persons who don't want improved relations between Iraq and the USSR. I have done no such thing, and I never would."

(Memoirs of Nikita Khrushchev, Vol. 3, p. 832) (IMG)

A few years later, Abdel-Salam Aref was murdered by a plane crash 'incident', allowing for a CIA-backed fascist coup. Khrushchev was probably cheerful.

Although Khrushchev was officially ousted before 1965, the Titoist faction continued to wield a significant level of influence until early 1968. The Eurasian Titoists supported the military coup by the CIA agent Salah Jadid and his gang of Trotskyite-fascist butchers and torturers. In an interview after the Jadid coup, Michel Aflaq, who had been directly leading the Syrian branch of the Ba'ath Party prior to the Jadid coup, complained of the hostile attitude of the Eurasians towards the Ba'athists in Syria:

The Soviet Union is the largest socialist country and the largest progressive international weight in the world. Our party has faced hostility without serious justifications. However, we did not react and reciprocate the hostility. Rather, we were patient and ignored. We remained on the position dictated by revolutionary logic and the interest of the Arab nation in befriending the socialist state. Finally, the Soviet Union pushed hostility to the end when it supported the rebels against the party and considered the sons of the wealthy families who were brought to power by tanks and who disguised themselves in the words of leftism and socialism as the true representatives of the party, while attacking the party and its leaders and founders who lived their lives in deprivation and fought for thirty years for socialism. And regarding the issues of the toiling Arab masses, [Moscow] accused them of being right-wing and reactionary.

It is not permissible for us to react and act in any way from which colonialism and reaction could benefit. However, in addition to this legitimate concern, this caution, and this wisdom, we must be faithful to the truth and to warn against getting carried away in the politics of force, imposition, arbitrariness and tyranny whatever the disparity between our strength and the strength of the Soviet Union. The truth is the measure; it is stronger than the largest force in the world and it [i.e. the truth] is on our side. Our answer to the Soviet Union will not be to go backwards in approaching the positions of the right and reactionary but rather in being faithful to our revolutionary approach and goals, and in clarifying our position to our people and to the progressive parties and movements in our country and in the world.

(The June 5 War and the time for Historic Action, Michel Aflaq, October 1967. In: 'Fi Sabil El-Ba'ath' [In the Path of Resurrection], Vol. 2, Michel Aflaq, pp. 269-270) (IMG)

The reign of Salah Jadid and his fascist gang, not to be confused with the Hafez Al-Assad era, was marked by barbaric terror, the handing over of the Golan Heights to Israel, the extension of Kuwaiti intelligence and Muslim Brotherhood terrorist networks in Syria, the rise of the Fatah, a conspiracy to transform the Arab National Movement (ANM) into a Maoist network, a hostile attitude towards the UAR and post-1969 Libya, and many other treasonous activities. Even after he was overthrown, Jadid continued his subversive activities against Syria through his correspondences from jail. He set up a subversive network within the Syrian Arab Army in order to launch a coup against the Al-Assad faction in 1976. By the late 1970s, his network also allied with fascist Iraq and Saddam's Mukhaberat.

It must also be recalled again that it was 'thanks' to the Kremlin Titoists that the 1953 coup in Iran happened. Mosaddeq made a reference to this matter (see C20S7 and C17S7). Furthermore, it was Khrushchev himself who stabbed the struggles against the Shah in the back, promoting peaceful coexistence with the regime. Khrushchev had the audacity to go as far as to make the ridiculous left-deviationist argument that since people in Iran are getting hungrier and hungrier under the Shah, they will automatically overthrow the Shah regime and that hence there is no point in revolutionary class struggles against Iran's regime because over time, the Shah's regime will be naturally overthrown! According to Special Report by the SAVAK:

Khrushchev made this clear to the American informant Walter Lippmann, saying that the poverty, misery and dissatisfaction of the Iranian people contributes to the advancement of communist goals in Iran.... (...). Khrushchev has stated that we do not need to take action with regards to Iran because the time in this country works in our favor, and it seems that Khrushchev does not want to spend anything in this country more than time. (The Special Report of the Foreign Intelligence and the Activities of Iranians Living Abroad [Gozaresh e Vizheh e Ettela'at e Khareji va Fa'aliat e Iranian e Moqim e Keshvar haye Kharej], SAVAK, p. 3. In: 'The Tudeh Party in Exile According to SAVAK Documents' [Hezb e Tudeh dar Kharej az Keshvar be Revayat e Asnad e SAVAK], Vol. 2, p. 549. In: The Center of Historical Documents Survey) (IMG)

The Iranian regime was also financially supported by the Moscow Titoists in late December 1954. During the Stalin era, the Shah faction demanded that the USSR 'repays' its 'debt' to Iran for 'invading' Iran during the Great Patriotic War. The USSR had no real obligation to pay Iran because Iran was rightly intervened in militarily by the USSR during the Great Patriotic War, an intervention that was morally just and in line with international law. On the contrary, the hostile regime in Iran was morally obliged to pay debt to the USSR for the former's criminal pro-Nazi activities during and prior to the Great Patriotic War. Nonetheless, during the Razmara era and the Mosaddeq era, the USSR began to change its stance and use the issue of 'debt' 'payment' as an excuse to fund the Razmara and the Mosaddeq administrations. Since Mosaddeq's position was still not very strong, however, Iran was still not ready just yet for being thoroughly funded by the Stalin-era USSR. Thus, the USSR took steps towards funding Iran under the cover of 'paying' its 'debt' for the 'invasion', but ultimately did not fund Iran because the USSR needed to ensure that any financial support it would provide to Iran would not fall into the hands of the enemies of the Mosaddeq faction and yet the Mosaddeq faction had still not gained enough influence over the Iranian regime. Stalin's death, as Mosaddeq had stated, paved the way for the 1953 coup (see C17S7). Furthermore, the Kremlin Titoists not only refused to support the Mosaddeq faction, but also, after the 1953 CIA-MI6 coup, provided financial support to the Shah regime in the form of the 'repayment' of the 'debt' in 1954:

The High Contracting Parties have agreed to a final settlement of all mutual financial claims relating to the period of the Second World War.... Within two weeks after the entry into force of the present Agreement, the State Bank of the USSR shall transfer to the National Bank of Iran in two consignments, at the frontier railway station of DzhulfaiIranskaya, 11,196,070.3 (eleven million one hundred and ninety-six thousand and seventy point three) grammes of gold in payment of the claims of the Iranian Side.... (IRAN and UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS – Agreement concerning the settlement of frontier and financial questions (with Protocols and annexes). Signed at Tehran, on 2 December 1954. Official texts: Persian and Russian. Registered by Iran on 24 January 1963. In: UN Treaty Series, UN, for: 1963, p. 260.) (IMG)

As such, the Kremlin Titoists paid for a 'debt' that the USSR should not have paid to Iran's regime. It is fair to say that this measure was basically funding the Shah's regime. The Titoists in Moscow also provided the Iranian regime with military funding. Bizhan Jazani, the founder and the primary theorist of the Organization of Iranian People's Fedai Guerrillas (OIPFG) and a former Tudeh Party activist, remains an icon of Iran's communist movement. He is even greatly praised by the Tudeh Party leaders. Jazani wrote the following concerning the Eurasian military aid to Iran's regime:

We have seen in this analysis that all opposition forces in Iran, even the Tudeh Central Committee (which considers it its duty to defend all aspects of Soviet diplomacy in Iran without exception), agree that the reactionary, anti-national, anti-democratic, anti-popular, and comprador nature of the Shah's regime has not changed, and that it is not in the path of the weakening of these features, but rather as explained previously, the recent maneuvers are especially for the entrenchment and of the positions of the Iranian regime, which contradict the interests of our nation, and the anti-colonial interests of the peoples of the Middle East and the [rest of the] world, and is in line with the strategies and tactics of neocolonialism.

Therefore, there are no objective factors that could justify the change in the policy of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries towards the Shah's regime, neither from the publication of national positions nor from the regime's foreign policy, and that is why we say and believe that unfortunately the Soviet Union violates socialist policy and proletarian internationalism. Today, a regime is flattered, a monarch is hailed as a "great reformer," a government is given weapons and economic aid with which to stabilize its government, which has had no fundamental change away from its much-despised past, the days in which the corruption in the palaces of the Shah were being revealed. Military aid to it is a betrayal of the peoples of Iran and the liberation movement[s] of the Middle East....

In a report to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union on Sino-Pakistani relations on February 14, 1964, Mr. Suslov said: "The leadership apparatus of China, in addition to deteriorating its relations with India to an extraordinary level, has reached a point which, as you are aware, while not being a member of any official military pact, is practically an ally of Pakistan, a member state SEATO and CENTO, military pacts that pose a danger to the peace and security of the nations of Asia. The fact is that the leaders of China, by throwing away "all the revolutionary statements" of their own, have gone down a road which cannot be reconciled with the principled approach of the united front of the socialist countries in the struggle against the imperialist blocs. What can be said? The methods of the Chinese leaders about choosing their friend and ally is very strange. A question must be asked:

How can they dishonor and tarnish the socialist countries and the communist parties, and at the same time to flatter the reactionary regime of Pakistan right in front of the whole world? It is really incomprehensible. Would there be anyone who would believe that close relations with Pakistan is rooted in the interests of the progress and the development of the revolutionary struggles of the nations of Asia against imperialism, about which the Chinese leaders have stirred up controversy?"

(Suslov's Report, Persian translation, p. 27)

Indeed, what can be said! We ask, in particular, Mr. Suslov and the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party, which justifies Soviet policy: does anyone believe that approaching the Shah's regime and providing military and economic assistance to the Iranian government and political and propaganda support for the monarchy results in the advancement of the interests and the development of the struggle of the Asian nations against imperialism?!

How is it that no blind eye is turned towards the deviation of China towards the government of Pakistan, but a blind eye is turned to the deviation of the Soviet Union towards the government of Iran and even towards Pakistan itself? Why is the flattery of the reactionary regime of Pakistan condemned but the flattery of the Shah's regime is not reprehensible and even the Central Committee has tried to justify it as correct policy? Yes, "It is really incomprehensible" as to what the Shah's regime lacks in terms of its reactionary position from the Pakistani regime? The same reasons that led Suslov to ask "Would there be anyone who would believe that close relations with Pakistan is rooted in the interests of the progress and the development of the revolutionary struggles of the nations of Asia against imperialism?", compel the Communists of Iran and all the anti-colonial forces of the Iranian people, to ask, and especially to ask Mr. Suslov and the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party: Would there be anyone who would believe that close relations with Iran is rooted in the interests of the progress and the development of the revolutionary struggles of the nations of Asia against imperialism, and is based on proletarian internationalism?

In our view, the policy of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries in Iran is contrary to the interests of the progress and development of the revolutionary struggle of the nations of Asia against imperialism, is contrary to the principles of proletarian internationalism, and constitutes anti-socialist diplomacy. That is because helping the Iranian government and further entrenches the reactionary and anti-national regime and the cause of imperialism in the Middle East....

(The Problems Facing the Iranian People's Anti-Colonial and Liberation Movement & the Most Critical Tasks of Iran's Communists in the Current Conditions, Bizhan Jazani, Autumn 1967. Reprinted by the: The Organization for the Unity of the Iranian People's Fedayeen, Winter 2003, pp. 13-14) (IMG)

The Eurasian armament of Iran's regime in 1967 (Brezhnev era) and during the Khrushchev period could not have been for the purpose of 'coopting' the regime of Iran. Sometimes, certain regimes under the significant influence of the reactionary forces can be overthrown through a progressive state's tied aid unto them. For example, in such a case, armaments would be provided on the condition that 'Soviet advisors' and 'Soviet technicians' (i.e. Soviet spies) would be placed in charge of installing those weapons. Such was why Stalin offered weapons sales to the Shah, provided that Soviet advisors/technicians would be running such equipment; the Shah, initially unaware that Stalin wanted 'advisors' and 'technicians' to come along with those Soviet weapons to be installed, welcomed this weapons sales, but upon finding out about the real depth of the matter – that this was a plot for Soviet intelligence penetration – rejected the Soviet offer. Hence, sometimes, weapons sales can be a means of intelligence penetration. However, such weapons sales have to occur provided that there are mechanisms in place to prevent the reactionary forces from hijacking those weapons and expelling the spy-'technicians' or spy-'advisors'. Note that Stalin made that offer back in the mid-1940s, when Iran had been democratized, and the progressive forces had a significant influence; back then, there was a low chance of the Shah's faction from being able to hijack those weapons and expel the Soviet advisors. The scenario was radically different in 1967 when the fascist faction had more influence over the Iranian regime than before, due to the defeat inflicted upon the UAR in the 1967 War. The 1967 defeat of the UAR was directly correlated with the sharp demotion of the Nasserist agents in the high ranks of the SAVAK, a demotion which had rendered the Shah's faction all the more powerful. Clearly, arms sales to the Iranian regime back then would not have allowed intelligence penetration, for the SAVAK would have been able to easily receive those weapons and then, through excuses and blackmail, expel the spy-advisors and spy-technicians. Without a doubt, Iran's regime was being armed, not coopted, by the government of Eurasia, which proves that Moscow was dominated still by the Titoist comprador bourgeoisie.

Brezhnev, Shah, Empress Farah discuss arms sales to Iran.

Nikita Khrushchev also supported Israel's war against Egypt. Later, in his memoirs, he morally endorsed Moshe Dayan, argued that the Jews are culturally superior, that the UAR was the aggressor in the 1967 War, and that Israel was just defending itself through a pre-emptive strike against Egypt:

The main reason for Israel's victory was that it had a higher cultural level and better discipline in its army, and its officers had combat experience and excellent training. After all, very good specialists from many different countries had come together in Israel. For example, I have a very high regard for their top general, [Moshe] Dayan, as a military man. He's a fine fellow! I said as a joke that if I was premier and he was in the Soviet Union, I would immediately appoint him our minister of defense. He is worthy of that. The Jews are a people who have been dispersed all over the world. That's why it turned out that their officers were better trained, and so were their soldiers, their tank crews, and airplane pilots. What about the factor of fanaticism? Well, that's not primary. There are all sorts of fanatics. But if you pull down a fanatic's pants and whip him a few times, that fanatic will run off without looking back, so as not to get another whipping. The thing is that the Israelis were simply better organized, had a better mastery of their weapons, and made more intelligent use of them.

It was hard for the Egyptians to contend with them, and they paid dearly, poor fellows. To put it crudely, they could ride camels and knew how to handle rifles, but they had now been seated in tanks. (...).

I simply can't understand how such a thing happened. How could we have permitted it? I repeat, the Soviet Union bears a major share of the responsibility for what happened. With the possibilities we had of exerting influence we could have restrained Nasser from going to war. We had the possibility of giving President Nasser good advice, not to make a display of ardent militancy in demanding that UN peacekeeping troops be withdrawn. Also, it was not necessary to close the gulf that Israel used for commercial shipping.

In short, he shouldn't have heated up the atmosphere. But as things happened, an atmosphere of imminent war was created. That's how I understood the situation at the time. It's true that Israel started the war. It launched a surprise attack, but it launched that attack preemptively, to forestall its opponent, because both sides had already mobilized and were on a war footing. Israel struck first and easily achieved a thorough routing of Egypt's troops.

(Memoirs of Nikita Khrushchev, Vol. 3, pp. 862-863. Bold added.) (IMG)

Yes, Khrushchev was being serious. He would have been a good comedian or clown, however, just by continuing to talk like a Khrushchev.

Again, it is essential to emphasize that these crimes against the peoples of the Middle East and North Africa were not committed by the 'national-bourgeois' elements in Eurasia, but were rather done by the comprador bourgeois elements. Khrushchev, the Kremlin Titoist assassins, and the white-collar workers in the CPSU that supported them were affiliated with the comprador classes, not the national bourgeoisie. They operated not for Eurasian interests but for the home-grown reactionary classes allied to Anglo-American finance capital.

Abdel-Nasser and other freedom fighters rightly decided to partially ally with Eurasia insofar as the communist and anti-imperialist elements in Eurasia maintained some influence. The conditions of class struggle in the USSR – particularly, the facts that Khrushchev and other Titoists dominating the state were supporters of the Dayanites in the Israeli regime but the government which Khrushchev headed provided some arms to Egypt – is demonstrative of the deep divisions in the Eurasian state.

At the same time, contrary to how some would seek to depict the matter, the communists or the proletariat did not continue to maintain the upper hand during the Khrushchev era. No, Eurasia was a dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie, which held the upper hand even in the Eurasian military. This is proven by the fact that Eurasia during the Khrushchev era provided not just financial support but also military support for the SAVAK regime in Iran, a regime posing a far greater menace to Egypt than Israel's regime.

Abdel-Nasser was also critical of the role of Tito's group for the latter's support for the Dubcek faction. Referring to Tito's group, in a 1968 conversation with Gromyko, Abdel-Nasser stated:

In fact, they [i.e. Tito's group] were reckless in their position on the issue of Czechoslovakia.... (Minutes of President Gamal Abdel Nasser's talks with Andrei Gromyko, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Soviet Union, Cairo, El-Qubba Palace, December 23, 1968, p. 17) (IMG)

Also worthy of consideration are Hoxha's remarks on Abdel-Nasser's relations with Tito. In part because a relatively small country like Albania did not have as much of an intelligence presence in the Middle East as it did in Yugoslavia, Enver Hoxha's assessments of the situation in Yugoslavia were often very correct but his assessments of the situation in the Middle East often contained serious flaws. Therefore, as Hoxha had information on Tito but not so much on Abdel-Nasser, the value of Hoxha's assessments of the Tito-Nasser relationship is mixed. Nonetheless, to the extent that it is worth, Hoxha said:

Apparently, Tito has lost all credit in Nasser's eyes.... Nasser has understood what Tito really is. (THE ANTI-IMPERIALIST STRUGGLE OF THE ARAB PEOPLES IS JUST, Enver Hoxha, May 25, 1967. In: The Reflections on the Middle East)

Nasser ... understood that Tito was a perfidious liar who hatched up plans to the detriment of the UAR and other peoples. In the UAR Tito's diabolical game was unmasked. (TITO, AN AGENT OF THE AMERICANS, FALSE FRIEND OF THE ARAB PEOPLES, HAS FOLDED HIS ARMS, Enver Hoxha, June 8, 1967. In: The Reflections on the Middle East)

Considering that Tito's gang supported the Israeli regime, the Al-Qasim regime in Iraq, the US military intervention in Lebanon, etc., it seems unlikely that Abdel-Nasser would support Tito's gang.

In 1968, thanks to the intervention of the Warsaw Pact in Czechoslovakia, the UDB was greatly shaken and thus the Tito gang began to lose some of its influence in the UDB. The communist forces gained a slightly greater level of influence in fascist Yugoslavia, thus forcing Tito's gang to capitulate to the anti-Titoist forces in Eurasia. In this midst, Abdel-Nasser was to serve as an intermediary, getting Tito's gang to 'improve relations' with the Eurasians:

but the truth is that Tito sent me a letter and I said it to the ambassador, in which he says: He wants to strengthen his relations with the Soviet Union, and he was talking about meeting two delegations from the two countries to speak. Of course, if having any chance like this, the West, and America is going to Yugoslavia! In fact, we see the need to settle relations with Yugoslavia very strategically. (Minutes of President Gamal Abdel Nasser's talks with Andrei Gromyko, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Soviet Union, Cairo, El-Qubba Palace, December 23, 1968, p. 17) (IMG)

Worthy of highlight is that such an improvement in Eurasian-Yugoslav relations in the 1970s occurred during the Brezhnev era, when the remnants of the Stalin faction, Shtemenko and Vasilevsky along with others, had seen a rise in their influence over the Eurasian state. In this case, whereas the improvement of relations with Yugoslavia during the 1950s and the 1960s was a case of capitulation to the Titoist forces, in the 1970s the improvement of relations with Yugoslavia, when Rankovic was forcibly demoted by the communist forces whose influence in the UDB had increased, was a case not of Eurasian capitulation to the Titoist regime in Yugoslavia but of the communist anti-Titoist agents in the Yugoslav regime forcing the latter to capitulate to the anti-Titoists. One must make the distinction between the 1970s vs. 1950s-1960s when it comes to 'improvement of relations' with Yugoslavia. In the 1970s, Tito remained a fascist agent of the Anglo-Americans but he was back then encircled and pressured by the 'Cominformists' so to capitulate to the Eurasians.

Yugoslavia, partially de-Titoized, began to serve as a transit point for aid sent from Moscow to Egypt:

Abdel Nasser: The second issue is the issue of Tito. The issue of Yugoslavia is very important to us, as it is the railway that brings [materials] from Moscow to Cairo from a [geo-]strategic point of view. As for the last time they made an air bridge, it was Yugoslavia. (Minutes of President Gamal Abdel Nasser's talks with Andrei Gromyko, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Soviet Union, Cairo, El-Qubba Palace, December 23, 1968, p. 17) (IMG)

Since, under the influence of Palestinian anti-Semitic propaganda, Arab public opinion had been misled against direct negotiations with Israel, the UAR negotiated with Israel via Yugoslavia and Romania:

Brezhnev: You do not have contact with Israel?

Abdel Nasser: Two indirect contacts..

The first contact is through Tito who met with Goldman, and Goldman said that Israel wants peace, and that they [i.e. Israeli leaders] are divided, and the Cabinet has a hard-line part, and a part that wants peace, and the majority wants peace, [and] Goldman wants peace. (...). The second call came from Romania. The Deputy Foreign Minister came to Egypt and said: He wants to come to a special issue of peace with Israel. He came and repeated the same words that Tito had said. I said: This talk contradicts what the government of Israel is doing.

C21S2.2. Khrushchev Faction on Sukarno and Indonesia  IMG-All-{Indonesia}

According to the CIA, which in turn cites the conversation with Indonesia's foreign minister, Nikita Khrushchev insulted Sukarno:

Indonesian Foreign Minister Subandrio has told the American ambassador that Khrushchev's visit was the "toughest affair he has ever had to handle" and that there was almost constant bickering between President Sukarno and the Soviet leader. He quoted Sukarno as saying "I didn't invite this man here to be insulted by him." Subandrio gave the impression that Khrushchev had boasted of Soviet achievements, alluded to Indonesian bungling, and given blunt lectures on the virtues of Communism.

In discussing Indonesia's five-year plan, wanted detailed figures on the country's economy. When Sukarno said he was not interested in these details, Khrushchev told him, "You aren't socialist. Socialism consists of figures, figures, figures." "You are a robot," Sukarno retorted. When Khrushchev challenged Indonesia's purchase of Lockheed Electras as "imperialist aircraft," Sukarno replied that he was buying what he considered best suited for Indonesia.

C21S2.3. The Khrushchev Faction Promotes Zionist Migration  IMG-All-{Zionist Migration post-1955}

As detailed in depth in C16S2, during the Stalin era, efforts were maximized to block Zionist migration. However, from 1955 onwards, by the time of the historic triumph of the Titoist faction led by Khrushchev, there came a radical shift in policy in favour of sending the USSR's Yiddish and Juhuri citizens as cannon-fodder for Moshe Dayan and Ariel Sharon. Mohammad Hasanein Heikal, a presidential envoy and diplomatic representative of Gamal Abdel-Nasser and a top media official of the United Arab Republic, wrote:

Throughout the periods extending from the mid-fifties to the end of the eighties – the rate of Jewish immigration from the Soviet Union did not exceed an annual average of four thousand immigrants. (On the Issue of Migration of Soviet Jews, Mohammad Hasanein Heikal, February 27, 1990, p. 2. From: nasser.bibalex.org) (IMG)

In other words, approximately 140,000 Yiddish and Juhuri citizens left Eurasia between 1955 to 1990. Some went directly to Israel. Others, who did not wish to go to a territory 'encircled' by the Arab states, were first lured into the West, in which they were bombarded enough with propaganda to end up in Israel.

For what it is worth, the PFLP Information Bulletin stated in 1975 that when many Zionist Jews were leaving Israel, there was also 'a large number of Soviet Jews ... immigrating to Israel, thus strengthening the Zionist state':

Immigration in 1974 dropped drastically and an increasing number of Israeli Jews left the country or expressed a desire to leave. Although a large number of Soviet Jews are immigrating to Israel, thus strengthening the Zionist state, there is on the other hand an increasing emigration of those Jews from Israel. (PFLP Information Bulletin, No. 16, March 1975 to April 1975, Foreign Relations Committee of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), p. 11) (IMG)

The PFLP media until 1979 was not very reliable on these matters, for the PFLP until then was dominated by the terrorist agents of Saddam Hussein's Mukhaberat. However, the above information is corroborated in spirit by Heikal's remarks and the PFLP's own later comments. By the late 1970s, an anti-Saddamite and pro-Syria faction led by the team of Abu Ali Mustafa was elevated to the leadership in the PFLP and temporarily began to exercise a much greater influence over the PFLP military and media, rendering the PFLP media more reliable as anti-imperialist media. In 1981, the reliable PFLP Information Bulletin confirmed that 1,100 Yiddish and Juhuri citizens from the Soviet Union migrated and became the potential cannon-fodder of Ariel Sharon:

The number of Jewish emigrants from the Soviet Union was 6,670 during the first half of 1981; only 1,100 of these immigrated to occupied Palestine; 84% changed their minds. (PFLP Information Bulletin, No. 59, February 1982, Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), p. 16) (IMG)

According to Clive Jones of Britain's Royal Historical Society, Yuri Andropov and Kosygin were key figures behind the project for Zionist mass migration:

the world outcry ... coupled with the need to court Washington, allowed the reformers within the Kremlin – Kosygin and KGB Chief Yuri Andropov among them – to implement measures leading to large-scale emigration. ('Soviet Jewish Aliyah, 1989-1992: Impact and Implications for Israel and the Middle East', Clive Jones, 2013, p. 22) (IMG)

Yuri Andropov was a Titoist on the side of Beria. Sergio Beria recalled how the Anglo-Yugoslav agent (see C20S13) and KGB chief Yuri Andropov told Sergio Beria:

'I have closely studied your father's proposals on economic and foreign policy fields. Many of them are absolutely correct.' ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergio Beria, p. 277) (IMG)

The fact that there still occurred a large amount of Zionist migration during the Brezhnev era is a strong indication that the revolutionary forces in Eurasia were overall still not so strong as to halt to such a project. The inability to contain Zionist migration in the long-run is not on its own a proof of the comprador bourgeois character of the state, but serves as a reflection of the weakness of the proletarian class forces in Eurasia.

C21S3. Slight Proletarian Dominance or Slight Comprador Dominance?

Some argue that the communists and non-communist progressives' simultaneous maintenance of positive relations with Eurasia and negative relations with the Khrushchevians was not because the Titoists comprador forces maintained a majority stake and the proletariat a minority stake over the state, but that the reverse was the case; the proletariat, they allege, maintained a slim majority share while the comprador forces maintained a very large minority. This view is incorrect, for it again fails to account for why the strategic orientation of the Eurasian state was tilted in favour of the Yugoslav regime against the Peoples' Democracies, in favour of the SAVAK regime against the UAR. Strategic orientation is determined by the question of which faction dominates the military and intelligence bodies of a state, the means of violence, the determinants of the class character of a state. Strategic orientation is not weakly or moderately correlated with the class character of a state. Rather, it is most strongly correlated. It completely reflects on whose side of history – the side of the proletariat, the anti-colonial national bourgeoisie and the cooperativists? Or the side of finance capital, mercantile capital, the bureaucrats, the kulaks, and the feudal landlords? – the state is. And the strategic affiliation of the Khrushchev-era Eurasian state with the latter side of history was direct proof that the slight majority held by the white-collar elements in a CPSU which dominated the Red Army, had been a slight majority that transformed the strategic orientation of the state and, in correlation, converted the Eurasian state into a comprador bourgeois state, not a dictatorship of the proletariat.

C21S4. The 'Anti-Party' Group / On Voroshilov  IMG-All-{Voroshilov}

In 1957, the Molotov faction in the CPSU spearheaded an attempt to oust Nikita Khrushchev from the leadership of Eurasia and to install Malenkov in replacement. Malenkov had previously taken Titoist stances and had held views at times more reactionary than those of Khrushchev. However, Malenkov, later re-coopted by the communists, began to assist Molotov in the struggle against Khrushchev's group. The efforts against Khrushchev proved unsuccessful. The latter, supported by an overwhelming majority in the Party, struck back, leading to the demotion of Molotov. To weaken communist influence, the communist-coopted Titoist agent Malenkov and Bulganin too were sharply demoted by the Khrushchev group.

One who belonged to the Molotov faction was Voroshilov. Many do not know that Voroshilov had always been a weak personality somewhat annoying Stalin. Voroshilov was no 'reactionary' man – a comrade of Stalin since the days of the Civil War, he had credentials as a fighter for socialism. However, many among his comrades criticized him for his underperformance. The Titoists had an easy time coopting him, due to his relatively weak personality. In 'The Khrushchevites', Enver Hoxha recalled how Voroshilov joined Nikita Khrushchev in slandering Stalin even in unofficial meetings. In 'Molotov Remembers', Molotov too criticized Voroshilov by mentioning that Voroshilov began to associate himself with the intelligentsia, showed poor performance in his tasks, and started disgracefully siding with Khrushchev. It may have been the case that Khrushchev had managed to intimidate Voroshilov into accepting his line, for Khrushchev used intimidation tactics often. Regardless, by 1957, Voroshilov showed some sympathies with the so-called 'anti-Party' group headed by Molotov and Malenkov against Khrushchev faction:

Khrushchev renewed the attack on the anti-party group in the USSR, which has long since been ousted from power, and for the first time publicly named Marshal Voroshilov – former titular chief of the Soviet state – as the seventh member of the group which had sought to unseat him in 1957. (CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, CIA, October 18, 1961, p. 3) (IMG)

Enver Hoxha recalled:

At a meeting of the Presidium of the Central Committee of the party in the Kremlin, in the summer of 1957, after many criticisms, Khrushchev was left in the minority, and, as Polyansky told us from his own mouth, Khrushchev was dismissed from the task of the first secretary and was appointed minister of agriculture, since he was an "expert on *kukuruz*²". However, this situation did not last more than a few hours. Khrushchev and his supporters secretly gave the alarm, the marshals surrounded the Kremlin with tanks and soldiers and gave orders that not even a fly was to leave the Kremlin. On the other hand, aircraft were sent to the four corners of the Soviet Union to gather up the members of the Plenum of the CC of the CPSU. "Then," said Polyansky, this product of Khrushchev, "we entered the Kremlin and demanded admission to the meeting. Voroshilov came out and asked what we wanted. When we told him that we wanted to enter the meeting, he cut us short. When we threatened to use force he said: 'What does all this mean?' But we warned him: 'Mind your words, otherwise we shall arrest you.' We entered the meeting and changed the situation." Khrushchev was restored to power. (The Khrushchevites, Enver Hoxha, Chapter 6)

During the purge of the 'anti-Party' group, Voroshilov apparently continued to capitulate to Khrushchev, perhaps in part due to a calculated desire to stay in the system and revolt against the Khrushchev faction at a more opportune time, but certainly also in part because he was easy to cajole and blackmail.

C21S5. Khrushchev (Again) Sabotages the Economy on a Large-Scale through Decentralization / Kosygin Reforms  IMG-All-{Economic Titoization in Eurasia}

As confirmed by the CIA's National Foreign Assessment Center,:

organizational disarray [was] created by Khrushchev's regional economic council (Sovnarkhoz) system.... (ORGANIZATION AND MANAGEMENT IN THE SOVIET ECONOMY: THE CEASELESS SEARCH FOR PANACEAS, CIA, National Foreign Assessment Center, December 1977, p. 13) (IMG)

Details of the corrupt chaotic bureaucracy generated by the Sovnarkhozy of the Khrushchev-led Moscow Titoists is provided by Kenneth Whiting, a prominent scholar from the United States Department of the Air Force, and the Documentary Research Division of the Aerospace Studies Institute, Maxwell Airbase in Alabama. Whiting basically confirmed that the decentralization policy, which promoted bureaucracy, created a massive disarray in the Soviet economy, sowed chaos, and allowed the creation of loyalist cliques of corrupt nepotist families that neglected the needs of the whole economy and local needs. The following is an excerpt of the document by Whiting:

The Khrushchev Period.—Khrushchev, in his decade of power from 1955 to 1964, ... [was] an advocate of high priority for consumer goods and meaningful investment in agriculture. In his efforts to push his programs Khrushchev was very likely to thrash about nosily, suddenly decide upon a scheme for reorganizing some sector of the economy, or even the whole economy, and then rush about the Soviet Union excoriating officials right down to the local level if he thought them insufficiently responsive to his latest gambit. Needless to say, the Soviet economy was in a state of turmoil during Nikita's hey-day from 1957 to 1964. and even a brief outline of his many reorganizations is bound to seem like a complex story.

On May 7, 1957, Khrushchev addressed the Supreme Soviet on the subject of an overall reorganization of the Soviet economic management and announced some drastic changes. (...). In announcing the new program, Khrushchev stated:

The tasks of further advancing the national economy at the present stage of its development, as has already been said, make it necessary to shift the center of gravity of operational guidance of industry and construction closer to enterprises and construction projects. However, this can be done only by a transition from the management of the national economy through the industrial ministries and agencies to management based on territorial principles. The party Central Committee and the U.S.S.R. Council of Ministers hold that the economic councils, which are to be set up in economic administrative regions should become the organizational form of such management.

(...). Under the new system a large number of economic ministries were abolished and 105 Councils of the National Economy (sovnarkhoz) established in their place. Each of the 15 republics had at least one sovnarkhoz, and large republics such as the Ukrainian S.S.R. and the R.S.F.S.R. had many. Each of the sovnarkhozy was thus charged with the guidance of a wide variety of enterprises within its geographical area.

In connection with the reorganization, the composition of the U.S.S.R. Council of Ministers underwent considerable change. Only six All-Union ministries (Construction of Electric Power Stations, Foreign Trade, Medium Machine Building, Railways, Sea Fleet, and Transport Construction) and ten union-republic ministries were retained. This was a drastic reduction from large numbers of ministries prior to the reorganization. But the new Council included 15 chairmen of the Republic Councils of Ministers as well as 11 high officials of Gosplan, raised to ministerial rank. In addition, the heads of over 20 state committees and commissars were also members. Thus the U.S.S.R. Council of Ministers had over 60 members.

Under the new system the importance of the U.S.S.R. State Planning Commission, or Gosplan, was augmented considerably. Khrushchev summed up the role of Gosplan in his speech of May 7, 1957.

The U.S.S.R. State Planning Commission (Gosplan U.S.S.R.) must become the scientific economic planning agency of the country. It is called to submit the requirements of the national economy to profound and comprehensive study, to take into consideration the achievements of science and technology and, on this basis, to draw up proposals for the development of all branches of the national economy, taking the potentialities for the integrated development of the economy most carefully into account, and to rationally utilize resources in the general interests of the state. Under the new conditions, the national economic plans will be drafted on the basis of the union republics and the economic administrative regions. The U.S.S.R. State Planning Commission must insure the correct and proportionate development of the branches of the country's economy and check from these positions the plans of the different union republics and regions.

(...). The plans were formerly routed from Gosplan to ministry to glavk to enterprise, but under the new system they went from Gosplan to Republic Councils of Ministers to their Gosplans to sovnarkhozy to enterprise. This was mandatory if the local desires of the sovnarkhozy and Republic Councils of Ministers were not to take precedence over the goals of the national plan. (...).

The Councils of Ministers in the multi-sovnarkhoz republics found themselves overburdened with detail in trying to settle disputes among their sovnarkhozy. For example, the R.S.F.S.R. had 67 sovnarkhozy to cope with. In July 1960 all-Republic sovnarkhozy were set up in the R.S.F.S.R., the Ukraine, and Kazakhstan to deal with sovnarkhoz problems within their jurisdiction.

In May 1961 the Soviet leadership came up with a plan to establish 17 large economic regions (10 in the R.S.F.S.R., 3 in the Ukraine, one in Kazakhstan, one for the 3 Baltic Republics, one for the Transcaucasian Republics, and one for the 4 Central Asian Republics). These large economic regions were an attempt to coordinate the production of the various sovnarkhozy more in the way of what the central planners wanted. Nothing, however, seemed to lick the problem of "localism". New protective "family circles" composed of the top officials of the sovnarkhoz, the enterprises, and sometimes the Republic Gosplan were constantly emerging, and drastic penalties did not seem to stop the tendency. These officials put their local welfare first and the national plan second whenever they thought they could get away with it. Sometimes the sovnarkhoz tried to make itself self-sufficient so as not to be dependent on the vagaries of outside sources of supply, even though the local inputs cost more. In other words, they were guilty of the same sin that the former ministries had been accused of, but this time it was on a local level.

(Background Information on the Soviet Union, Air University, Maxwell Airbase Alabama, United States Department of the Air Force, Documentary Research Division of the Aerospace Studies Institute, 1970, Kenneth R. Whiting, pp. 58-60) (IMG)

Years later, the CIA reported on how some of Khrushchev gang's sabotage 'reforms' were repealed and stated:

The restoration of the economic ministries and the centralization of responsibility for some key functions in newly created state committees had a positive impact, eliminating the near-chaotic situation created by Khrushchev's organizational innovations. The implementation of other aspects of the reforms ... has been characterized by considerable recentralization of decision-making authority, removal of elements of spontaneity, and increasing complexity in decision-making rules and related incentives. (ORGANIZATION

AND MANAGEMENT IN THE SOVIET ECONOMY: THE CEASELESS SEARCH FOR PANACEAS, CIA, National Foreign Assessment Center, December 1977, p. 17) (IMG)

The year 1965 also saw another major sabotage policy partially enforced through a decentralization "reform." In fact, during this period, the spectre of Titoism-Beriyatism continued to haunt the Soviet economy. As Sergo Beria put it:

In 1965 Kosygin took up some of my father's ideas on the economy but applied them only partially. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 277) (IMG)

The prominent scholar Albert Szymanski, perhaps out of naivete rather than opportunist intent, defended the policies implemented by the Belgrade and Moscow Titoists, and wrote books in their defense. Szymanski, who stated that central planning was as dominant in Eurasia as it had ever been, nonetheless admitted:

The 1965 Kosygin Reforms reduced the number of planned targets assigned to enterprises from between 20 and 30 to eight. These were: (1) the total quantity of goods to be produced and sold, (2) the main assortment of these goods, (3) the size of the wage fund, (4) the amount and rate of profit, (5) the payment to and allocation from the state budget, (6) the volume of investment and exploitation of fixed assets, (7) the main assignment for improving technology, and (8) the allocation of material and technical supplies. In addition it should be remembered that all wage rates and prices, as well as interest rates and the main distribution of credit, remained centrally determined. The number one indicator of success by which managers were judged (and so their bonuses decided and their future careers determined) was 'realized output' i.e. the actual material quantity of goods sold. (Is the Red Flag Flying: The Political Economy of the Soviet Union Today, Albert Szymanski, June 1979, p. 40) (IMG)

The greater the number of indicators, the more the pressure on the enterprises to improve the different aspects of the production process, with regards to quantity, and more importantly, with regards to quality. That is, the large number of indicators would specify the qualitative details of the production. The dramatic reduction of the number of indicators was – contrary to Szymanski's beliefs – a severe decentralization program that dramatically reduced the quality of products. Hence, the decentralization amounted to yet another major economic sabotage by the Moscow Titoists. The media of the CPSU in 1971 reported that the 1965 reforms brought even greater autonomy for enterprises:

The [23rd] Congress adopted the Directives for the Five-Year Plan for 1966-70. It drew attention to the need to strengthen economic methods and stimuli in management of the economy, to improve planning and increase the economic initiative and independence of industrial enterprises and collective and state farms. (THE 24TH CONGRESS OF THE CPSU: What the Congress Discussed and Decided, March 30, 1971 to April 9, 1971, Novosti Press Agency Publishing House, p. 78) (IMG{ Communist Resurgence })

Nonetheless, by the late 1960s, the communist anti-Titoist faction saw a rise in influence, and was able to partially undo some of the sabotage carried out by the Moscow Titoists:

Another reform occurred in 1973 which coincided with the re-centralization of authority over enterprises and which was probably its corollary. Facing the continuing problem of the geometrically growing complexity of central planning and the problems of decentralizing authority, individual enterprises are being consolidated into multi-enterprise associations. Each association either links enterprises which perform similar functions or links those that are closely integrated economically with each other (typically they are in close physical proximity). Thus considerable decision making power is now vested in this middle level between the enterprise and the ministry. Centrally planned targets are now given only to the association which in turn allocates its responsibilities to its various constituent units, thereby considerably simplifying the job of the centre without losing any fundamental control. The average number of enterprises per association is three to five with usually around 4,000 employees per association. (Is the Red Flag Flying: The Political Economy of the Soviet Union Today, Albert Szymanski, June 1979, p. 40) (IMG)

The correct policy would have of course been to restore the powers of the ministries, instead of creating these Associations of Production, the combined of enterprises mentioned above. However, the formation of such combines was nonetheless a partial though vastly insufficient undoing of the decentralization project.

C21S6. Bulgaria's Revisionist Economic Reform  IMG-All-{Bulgaria}

With the blessing of the Kremlin Titoists, Bulgaria's Titoists headed by Zhivkov decentralized the state industries in a sneaky manner. In all economies, there are ministries and state enterprises. Scientific socialism advocates the gradual but steady centralization of the economy such that the rate of centralization correlates with the process of the development of the productive forces. Therefore, if scientific socialist policies were to be carried out in Bulgaria, the economy would have been concentrated in the economic ministries over time. The Titoists in Sofia on the other hand, skillfully decentralized the economy through the establishment of the 'state industrial associations', a series of economic organizational and planning bodies that lied in between the state enterprises and the economic ministries. The powers of the economic ministries were decentralized onto the state industrial associations, and the level of authority that economic ministries had over the state enterprises was handed over to these mid-level state industrial associations. As such, it appeared as though the economy was centralized away from state enterprises and onto the state industrial organizations, whereas in reality, the economy was decentralized from the economic ministries at the top onto the mid-level, the state industrial organizations. By the way, the same kind of a strategy had been pursued by the Slansky faction in Czechoslovakia in order to sabotage the economy, as shown in C15S8. A 1974 book published by the media of the 'Bulgarian Communist Party' Central Committee explained in depth the history of 'socialist' Bulgaria's political economy. The book admitted:

The state industrial associations, which in 1954 were renamed industrial departments and general directorates, generally until 1959, when the management of the national economy was organized on a territorial basis, represented superior organizations over enterprises with relatively broad autonomy in their operational management. They had the rights of legal entities, had certain features of separate business units, as they had the right to dispose of machinery, equipment, vehicles and valuables made available to the enterprises involved in them. However, their balance sheet and profit were formed as the sum of the balance sheets and profits of enterprises. The associations were not materially responsible for the results of the economic activity of their subordinate enterprises. However, with the planning system, with the right to shift fixed and working capital and direct bank credit, they were a unit in the management of enterprises, which even then showed its advantages and helped the development of industry, especially in some industries with more enterprises. Associations such as Vinprom, Tobacco Monopoly, Canning Industry and others managed to cover, direct and centralize the activity of purchasing, processing and marketing the products. With this, specific independent economic functions developed in them. In principle, however, their main task was to manage, plan and control the activities of enterprises. In all cases, the main responsibility and the main economic functions were concentrated in the enterprises. (THE ECONOMIC POLICY OF THE BULGARIAN COMMUNIST PARTY, Partizdat (Publishing House, Central Committee of the Bulgarian Communist Party), Sofia, 1974, pp. 196-197) (IMG)

Then, in 1959, the economy was further decentralized to a level below the state industrial organizations and still above the state enterprises. The growth of inefficient, corrupt, bureaucracies was encouraged through the decentralization:

In 1959 the form of economic management of enterprises was reorganized on an administrative-territorial basis. The associations were closed and the enterprises were subordinated to the "Industry" department of the district people's councils.

For about three years, the companies were territorially subordinated, but did not change their economic and legal nature. Until 1964, when the experimentation of a new system of management of the national economy began, they worked under the economic and legal conditions set by the Law on State-Owned Enterprises. According to these conditions, they had a certain property independence, had fixed and working capital and as a final result made a profit or had a loss. They had a separate account with the Bulgarian National Bank and were accountable to the state for the results of their business activities. The fixed assets and their working capital were expanded on the basis of a plan, using own and borrowed funds or funds from the state budget. The budget received taxes from enterprises, the most important of which was the turnover tax. The state could seize surpluses from the working capital of enterprises, cover their losses, provide subsidies and finance their capital investments free of charge. Due to the great need to centralize the accumulations for solving the main tasks of socialist construction, a significant part of the realized profit was accumulated in the state budget.

A characteristic feature of the functioning of business organizations during this period was the immediate planning of their activities on all indicators. The plan of the enterprises was built on their proposals, but after its compilation by the state authorities it took on a directive character. The system of material interest and stimulation of the collectives and the managements of the enterprises was built mainly on the basis of the implementation of the plans by volume and by some of the qualitative and value indicators. The savings from the salary fund, the reduction of the prime cost, the realization of the profit were sources or conditions for the formation of incentive funds, which served for the bonus of the leading engineering and technical personnel.

The economic relations between the enterprises were direct and each of them bore economic responsibility for the performance of the contracts. The companies were also a party in the negotiations with the bank for obtaining working capital loans. The capital investments they received were mostly gratuitous, depending on the planned needs. Their development depended mainly on the considerations provided for in the national economic plan.

(THE ECONOMIC POLICY OF THE BULGARIAN COMMUNIST PARTY, Partizdat (Publishing House, Central Committee of the Bulgarian Communist Party), Sofia, 1974, pp. 197-198) (IMG)

Naturally, the decentralization of economic decision-making to local districts turned each district into its own independent economic 'kingdom', and these local kingdoms naturally had a tendency not to coordinate. The result was a highly uncoordinated, chaotic, inefficient bureaucratic economy. Furthermore, it is always more difficult for anti-corruption 'watchdog' or supervisory bodies to track corrupt activities among numerous local bureaus than it is for them to track in a few concentrated bureaus. The bureaucratic chaos and the weakened anti-corruption drive, boosted the corrupt bureaucratic class, upon which the Bulgarian Titoists relied, in that country. The US Department of the Army and the Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress have always advocated economic decentralization. Yet so pervasive was the bureaucratic corruption resultant from decentralization that even the US Department of the Army and the Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress could not hide the fact that in this system,:

major enterprise directors used newly decentralized financial resources to line their own pockets. (Bulgaria: A Country Study, Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress, sponsored by the US Department of the Army, June 1992) (IMG)

C21S7. 'Peaceful Coexistence'

Lenin and Stalin denounced the Trotskyite thesis of worldwide military adventurism, in favor of the thesis of 'peaceful coexistence' between socialist and non-socialist states. At the same time, Lenin and Stalin argued for the intensification of class struggles within each country. They regarded participation in parliaments as a tool with which to pursue the agenda of an armed revolution. The MI6 agent Khrushchev, on the other hand, deliberately misinterpreted the line on 'peaceful coexistence' as meaning that class struggles should cease altogether, that any kind of revolutionary confrontation against imperialists and fascists must end, that armed struggle should completely cease, and that almost-exclusively parliamentary means for reaching 'socialism' should be adopted. The CIA's daily bulletin reported:

Khrushchev, prior to his visit to the United States, told Indian Communist party secretary Ajoy Ghosh that Communist parties in India and other non-bloc countries should avoid uprisings and other "warlike situations" since their overall effect would be harmful to the growth of Communism.... While Ghosh presumably presented the Soviet leader's remarks in a manner designed to give the greatest possible support to his own moderate position within the Indian party, Khrushchev's instructions are consistent with Moscow's current emphasis on relaxation of international tensions.

Khrushchev was reported by Ghosh as having justified his views on the grounds that if war can be avoided for three or four years, the military strength of the bloc will surpass that of the West, especially the United States. He also explained that while the USSR would try to give aid in the event of uprisings by "progressive forces" in non-bloc countries, violent actions would lead reactionary elements to unite in suppressing them.

The Soviet leader's counsel to Ghosh follows closely the advice given Indian Communists by letter from the Soviet party in late July just before the fall of the Kerala Communist regime. Moscow then suggested continuing to rely on "parliamentary means" to come to power. The Chinese Communists, while agreeing with this general policy line, suggested to Ghosh during his visit to Peiping in early September that the Indian party should adopt a "tougher" line in opposing Nehru and Congress party policies or it would risk losing the Indian Communist party's right wing to "reactionary forces." Ghosh, who returned to Peiping for national day celebrations on 1 October because of fears the Chinese might throw their support to the left wing of his party and thus jeopardize his position as party secretary, planned to leave Peiping for another visit to Moscow on 10 October.

(‘Khrushchev Advises on Communist Tactics’, CIA, October 10, 1959. In: ‘CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN[15787706]’, CIA, October 10, 1959, p. 1) (IMG)

Nikita Khrushchev's Titoist revisionist distortion of the Lenin-Stalin principle of 'peaceful coexistence' was manifested in every country.

C21S8. Dictatorial Khrushchev Fosters Cult of Personality Around Himself

Contrary to the Anglo-American imperialist propaganda which depicts Khrushchev as democratic and committed to collective leadership, the opposite is true. Khrushchev was dictatorial, and forced Party members to adopt his policy line. Myron Rush, an employee of the CIA and the RAND Corporation, reported:

Perhaps the most striking evidence of Khrushchev's capacity to change the composition of the leading bodies is the nature of the Central Committee elected at the 22nd Party Congress (1961). The majority of voting members (around 60 percent) were newly promoted; moreover, about half the candidate members from the previous Central Committee failed to win re-election. Khrushchev dominated the proceedings at Central Committee plenums, frequently bullying the speakers — even Politburo members. He was a great innovator, and while some of his schemes were successfully resisted, it is remarkable how many of his innovations actually were enacted (including some highly disruptive ones) and how much his successors found necessary to repeal. (Brezhnev and the Succession Issue, Myron Rush. In: Problems of Communism, Vol. 20, July – August 1970, p. 11) (IMG)

A SAVAK spy with extensive contacts to the international communist movement and the Warsaw Pact countries reported that in fact, Nikita Khrushchev:

created a new form of cult of personality in the Soviet Union. In fact, his aim was to take over Stalin's spot through demagogical measures and through compromise with the Western world. (The Interrogation session of Mr. Parviz Nikkhah [Jalaseh Bazjuyi az Aqaye Mohandes Parviz Nikkhah], SAVAK, Parviz Nikkhah, June 1965. Source: 'Parviz Nikkhah According to SAVAK Documents' [Parviz Nikkhah be Revayat e Asnad e SAVAK] book, page 187. In: The Center of Historical Documents Survey) (IMG)

The SAVAK spy continued:

He [i.e. Khrushchev] made serious errors in his relations with other socialist countries, ... in a vulgar way.

He basically forgot the relations of equality between the socialist countries and created the role of the father of the world of socialism for himself.

Khrushchev also:

moved away from communism and pursued a policy line of megalomania and careerism. (The Interrogation session of Mr. Parviz Nikkhah [Jalaseh Bazjuyi az Aqaye Mohandes Parviz Nikkhah], SAVAK, Parviz Nikkhah, June 1965. C21S9. Confessing the End of the Dictatorship of the Proletariat / The Terror Attack in Novocherkassk  IMG-All-{Khrushchev – Political}

Almost 5 years after the 1956 capitalist restoration and overthrow of the socialist Soviet state, Titoist leaders officially admitted that the country they ruled was no longer socialist. In 1961, the Party, partly owing to the fact that white-collar and bourgeois intellectual elements formed its majority, and partly under the dictatorial coercion of Khrushchev, officially denounced what it had already unofficially denounced years ago: dictatorship of the proletariat. Indeed, the new rules of the Party stated that the 'Communist Party' which used to be the Party of the proletariat, had become the 'party of the Soviet people as a whole' and that socialism had 'triumphed completely':

Socialism has triumphed completely and finally. The Communist Party, the party of the working class, has today become the party of the Soviet people as a whole. (Rules of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, Adopted by the 22nd Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, October 31, 1961, p. 5)

Not until the communist stage is reached can it be said that 'socialism has triumphed completely and finally'. And in this specific context, to argue that the party was the party of the 'Soviet people as a whole' would mean to also include the corrupt bureaucratic class hostile to the proletariat as a part of the 'Soviet people'. Anyways, thanks for almost admitting that the territory of the former Soviet Union was no longer ruled by the proletariat. Another course of action which the Khrushchev group undertook was to launch a suppressive terrorist attack on the workers in order to prevent the resurgence of the communist faction in the CPSU. By the early 1960s, popular pressure against the Khrushchev-Mikoyan group had begun to mount. Large-scale anti-Titoist manifestations of the working class in Novocherkassk occurred. In the streets, the proletarians demonstrated support for the legacies of the USSR, Lenin and Stalin, and against the corrupt Titoist elites. They also protested against the falling wages, and higher prices. The response of the ruling Titoist elites, the Khrushchev-Mikoyan group, was to shoot those workers. The case of the Novocherkassk massacre has been widely documented in the Anglo-American imperialist media. However, it has also been corroborated. In a 2018 statement, the Russian Communist Workers' Party, which is a new Party that emerged after 1991, confirmed:

Abandoning dictatorship of proletariat and the goal of socialism changed the class essence of the state. The state became incapable of acting in the interests of workers class, these interests being the interests of society during proletarian dictatorship. It's indicative to point out that the revisionist program of the nationwide party was adopted by the XXII Congress of CPSU in the autumn of 1961, whereas in June 1962 in the city Novocherkassk of Rostov Region there were applied troops against workers that expressed their protest against rising prices, falling wages and boorishness of the officials. The protesters were shot at. Thus we can say that dozens of victims among workers served as the first evidence of the so called nationwide state and the party led by N.S. Khrushchev in the making. C22S1. The Partial Resurgence of the Communists via Brezhnev Group  IMG-All-{Communist Resurgence}

In post-1956 Eurasia, the only realistic way to restore socialism was for communists and their progressive allies to expand their influence over the Eurasian intelligence and military, so that proletariat would expand their influence over the means of violence, while minimizing the anti-communist Titoist faction's influence over the means of violence. Then, after controlling the means of violence, the communists could use legal mechanisms to purge off many of the corrupt bureaucrats and counter-revolutionary intellectuals that existed in the CPSU, and to lobby for greater percentage representation of blue-collar elements in the CPSU. Through the purges of the white-collar elements and the increased quantity of blue-collar elements, the leap from quantity to quality could occur, and socialism would be restored. The control of the communist agents of the proletariat over the means of violence could bring about purges that would change the character of the state; and the use of the means of violence would give these changes a revolutionary character, even though the change would be gradual and hence would superficially appear as 'reformistic'. This is why the communist comrades of Stalin in the Red Army – Shtemenko, Vasilevsky, and Konev – did not give up their positions in the military – the means of violence – after 1956, and continued to work within the Eurasian state apparatus.

The left-opportunist reactionary tools of imperialist-fascist secret services – e.g. Mao's gang and their Maoist followers – condemned those communists who did not give up their positions as 'collaborators', 'reformists', and 'revisionists'. Later on, they also added 'social-fascist' and 'social-imperialist' to the list of their swear words against these communists. Why did the Maoists do this? There were many reasons, but a key reason was to increase pressure on the communist forces who resisted the Titoist Khrushchev faction to give up their resistance, and thereby leave the stage to be dominated by the Titoist Khrushchev faction and their Anglo-American imperialist backers. The Maoist left-deviation sought to strengthen the Khrushchev right-deviation through such left-opportunist rhetoric, such revisionist rhetoric disguised as 'anti-revisionist'. Under the cover of 'fighting reformism', the Maoists wanted the communists to give up their influence over the means of violence, so that the only kind of resistance against the Khrushchevians would be the unarmed reformist 'resistance'. Under the cover of 'refusing' to collaborate with the Khrushchevians, the Maoists advocated what amounted to greater strength for the Khrushchevians. The hostile attitude towards communist influence over the Red Army is why Mao's gang launched the social-chauvinist invasion against Eurasia in the late 1960s, murdering Red Army units – during the late 1960s, communist comrades of Stalin, such as general Shtemenko, were elevated and gained more prominent positions in the military.

In Eurasia, the comprador bourgeois elements dominated the state, and hence Eurasia was a dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie. However, the dominance of the comprador elements was not as pervasive as it was, for example, in Yugoslavia. Hence, whereas in Eurasia, the communists could operate both covertly and overtly against the reactionary forces, in Yugoslavia, the way forward was for communists to operate covertly against the regime, try to infiltrate its ranks, and destabilize the state from within. In Eurasia, a 'communist' armed rebellion against the state would have bogged down the Red Army – the stronghold of the communist faction – for suppressing the rebellion, hence weakening the communist forces. In Yugoslavia on the other hand, the Yugoslav army was a stronghold of Titoist fascist butchers, and hence an armed communist rebellion against it would have weakened the Titoist faction and was thereby to be hailed as progressive. In judging whether an armed rebellion against a comprador bourgeois state is to be launched, one must ask: whom will the armed rebellion target – revolutionaries or reactionaries? If revolutionary infiltrators in the counter-revolutionary state would be the target of the armed rebellion from below, then the communists should not launch such a rebellion. If, however, the counter-revolutionaries in the counter-revolutionary state would be the inevitable target of the armed revolt from below, the armed rebellion from below should by all means be launched, in a manner that accounts for the strategic and tactical conditions.

Nikita Khrushchev was indeed able to undermine the socialist forces. However, the conditions of the world were not very favorable to the Khrushchev faction by the 1960s. Firstly, by 1962, the Kennedy Administration successfully curbed CIA influence worldwide, thereby giving the Khrushchev group less lobbying power in the struggle against the communist faction. The team of Kennedy had a direct role in staging counter-coups against imperialist-backed fascist regimes (one of which, by the way, was the Abdel-Karim Al-Qasim regime, supported by Khrushchev and the Anglo-American imperialists). The curbing of CIA influence allowed for the collapse of many imperialist-backed regimes in 1962-1964 all around the world. Inevitably, this global decline of the CIA influence during the Kennedy years favoured the communist faction in Moscow, resulting in the ouster of Nikita Khrushchev and his replacement by Leonid Brezhnev.

It is no secret that Brezhnev was a Titoist, and a pupil and agent of Nikita Khrushchev. This was mentioned in C19S7.2. Through the leadership of Brezhnev, the Titoist comprador bourgeoisie continued to exercise influence in Eurasian affairs. Nonetheless, the fact that the Khrushchev group planted its agent Brezhnev in charge of key aspects of the military also made Brezhnev more accessible to the communist anti-Titoist elements to be found in the military. In time, with the weakening of the Khrushchev faction in the early 1960s, the surrounding of Brezhnev by the communist anti-Titoist elements was tantamount to communist anti-Titoist encircling and hence coopting of Brezhnev. Coopted by the communists, Brezhnev organized the ouster of Khrushchev in 1964. During the period 1964-1968, the policy line of the Titoists headed by Khrushchev largely continued, but clearly began to decline. Note that during those years, the Titoists in Eurasia still had enough power to ensure the military funding of the regime of the Shah and in supporting the Salah Jadid group's Trotskyite coup against the Ba'athists in Syria in 1965 (see C21S2.1). At the same time, the communists were increasing their influence over the Red Army, and the Red Army was deploying its forces in the border with China in order to confront China's terror regime (see C23S5.4). By 1968, the communist faction in Eurasia had greater influence, the results of which were the elevation of Stalin's comrades, Red Army commanders Shtemenko and Vasilevsky in the hierarchy of the Warsaw Pact and Red Army forces. With the rise of Brezhnev therefore, anti-Titoist elements gained greater influence over the government. The Central Intelligence Agency rightly made note of:

The persistently expanding political role of the Soviet military leaders. (STALIN FULLY REHABILITATED AS WARTIME LEADER: SOVIET MILITARY NOW APPEAR TO BE REACHING FOR MORE POWER, March 1969, p. 4) (IMG)

It was not the case that the expansion of the influence of the military leaders was resulting in a military dictatorship instead of the rule of the Party. Rather the 'STALIN FULLY REHABILITATED AS WARTIME LEADER: SOVIET MILITARY NOW APPEAR TO BE REACHING FOR MORE POWER' CIA document's reference to the increase in the role of the military leaders was a reference to a specific faction, the communist faction, of the Red Army. As an indication of the trends in the ideological development, the CIA document added:

the military [were] prominent in [the] rehabilitation of Stalin as a wartime leader.... (STALIN FULLY REHABILITATED AS WARTIME LEADER: SOVIET MILITARY NOW APPEAR TO BE REACHING FOR MORE POWER, March 1969, p. 4) (IMG)

Karen Dawisha of the CIA's Brookings Institute wrote:

The question of Stalin's place in Soviet history had been fiercely argued since his death, with his contribution clearly receiving more favorable appraisal after Khrushchev was ousted. In June 1968 a book was published entitled The General Staff During the War, by General Sergei Shtemenko, who praised Stalin's wartime leadership. In a review of the book, Krasnaya zvezda commented that the General Staff had not been so unprepared for the Nazi invasion as some historians believed. The attack had not thrown the General Staff into disarray, thanks primarily to Stalin, who had remained in the Kremlin throughout, refusing to evacuate the Staff headquarters to underground shelters in Kirovskaya Metro. Shtemenko, who had been demoted by Khrushchev for his loyalty to Stalin, was soon to regain some of his former prominence. He was to become the chief of staff of the Warsaw Pact only three weeks before the invasion of Czechoslovakia. (The Kremlin and the Prague Spring, Karen Dawisha, 1984, p. 205) (IMG{Czechoslovakia})

Correlated with the rise of the communist faction in the Red Army was the Warsaw Pact intervention in Czechoslovakia in 1968, the weakening of the Tito faction in Yugoslavia in 1968 and of the Gomulka faction in Poland in 1969-1970. In the Middle East, increased Eurasian military and intelligence presence was useful in strengthening Egyptian commandos in the War of Attrition against the Israeli occupation of the Sinai in 1969, a factor which elevated the Mapam faction led by the communist intelligence agent Yigal Allon in Israel. Correlated with these was the destabilization of the reactionary foes of Egypt – such as the royalist Libyan regime, the Jadidist Syrian regime, and the Abdel-Rahman Aref regime (not to be confused with Abdel-Salam Aref) – which led to the 1969 Free Officer coup in Libya, the Hafez Al-Assad faction's ascendancy to dominance in 1969-1970, and the 1968 Ahmad Hasan Al-Bakr faction's Ba'athist coup in Iraq. In Somalia, Siad Barre's terror gang was forced to capitulate to the communist faction of the Red Army; in South Yemen, the Abdel-Fattah Al-Isma'il faction was pushing ahead against the Maoist elements; in Saudi Arabia, the Faysal faction, the progressive bourgeois-democratic faction with a long history of strategic partnership with the Stalin-era USSR, saw a major boost in its influence. Even in Egypt, after the Sadatist takeover in 1970-1971, the Sadat gang was, for the while, so weak that the Nasserist forces in Egypt forced the Sadat gang to cooperate with Syria and Libya. There was a boost in Eurasian aid to Cuba. In France, after a brief setback in 1968-1969, the Gaullists, the agents of the French imperialist rivals of Anglo-American-German imperialism, saw a further boost in their influence at home. Many positive developments were occurring worldwide, thanks to the partial resurgence of the communist faction in the Red Army and the CPSU. So shaken were the dark forces of fascist reaction, thanks to only a partial – only a partial! – communist resurgence in the territory of the former Soviet Union.

In the sphere of the economy, many of the liberalization reforms which were sabotaging the economy were slowed down. As a result of the increased influence of the anti-Titoist elements, there was a:

Slow-down in economic reform (major elements of the program are not being implemented... (STALIN FULLY REHABILITATED AS WARTIME LEADER: SOVIET MILITARY NOW APPEAR TO BE REACHING FOR MORE POWER, March 1969, p. 4) (IMG)

The Maoist and Hoxhaist currents mislead progressive-minded individuals by claiming that the Brezhnev era was as bad as the Khrushchev era. It is worth reminding these left-deviationists that the policy of promoting Brezhnev against Khrushchev was the policy of Stalin. As mentioned in C19S7.2, Stalin's plan was to first coopt the Malenkov-Bulganin group and support this coopted group against the Beriaites and the Beriaites against the Malenkov-Bulganin group. The next step was to coopt the Khrushchev team and support it against the Beriaites and the Malenkov-Bulganin group. The third step was to coopt Brezhnev and then promote him against Khrushchev. The latter steps were basically 'Salami Tactics', Soviet-style. That Khrushchev, Malenkov and Beria were covertly allies, and that Brezhnev was an agent of Khrushchev, was a definitive fact. However, on the overt level, they pretended to have opposed each other, and they could be coopted and used against each other. That is why Stalin brought Brezhnev to the high ranks:

In August 1951, after Ignat'ev's appointment, several new men, all associated with Khrushchev, suddenly appeared in the MGB: A. A. Epishev, a party secretary in Ukraine, and I. T. Savchenko, also from the Ukrainian party apparatus, became deputy ministers of State Security; V. E. Makarev, a former Moscow party official during Khrushchev's tenure there in the 1930s, became chief of the MGB Personnel Department. In addition, a lesser official named N. R. Mironov, who had served in the Ukrainian party apparatus under Khrushchev's protégé Leonid Brezhnev was brought to Moscow to work for the MGB. (Beria: Stalin's First Lieutenant, Amy Knight, p. 158) (IMG)

The next stage was to unfold a few months later, with ... Khrushchev suffering the same fate. No great problem there. Stalin would have left no witness in place. He would have got rid of the old Politburo and promoted new people, idiots like Brezhnev. After winning the Third World War he was determined to correct all the 'mistaken' interpretations of historical events which had been current in the West. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergo Beria, p. 243) (IMG)

After Stalin's death, in the 1950s, General Konev had a role in coopting Malenkov and using him against Beria, then coopting and partnering with Khrushchev and using Khrushchev against Malenkov. General Shtemenko and General Vasilevsky were responsible for coopting and supporting Brezhnev against Khrushchev in the 1960s. Stalin, Konev, Shtemenko, and Vasilevsky were all communist friends, hostile to the Titoist faction, and were all named as the targets of the Doctors' Plot. Therefore, the narrative promoted by Maoist and Hoxhaist currents is quite misleading; it is true that Brezhnev himself was a Titoist reactionary 'at heart' but he was coopted by the communist forces and pursued many correct policies on different fronts.

During the Brezhnev era, the communists in the Red Army also increased confrontation against the Titoist Regimes, in particular:

the Rumanian and Yugoslav practice[s].... (STALIN FULLY REHABILITATED AS WARTIME LEADER: SOVIET MILITARY NOW APPEAR TO BE REACHING FOR MORE POWER, March 1969, p. 4) (IMG)

A tougher line on the Yugoslav regime was shown. One notable statement was written by General Konstantin S. Bochkarev, a military theoretician, in the 14 February issue of the Ministry of Defense Daily Red Star (Krasnaya Zvezda). (STALIN FULLY REHABILITATED AS WARTIME LEADER: SOVIET MILITARY NOW APPEAR TO BE REACHING FOR MORE POWER, March 1969, p. 4) (IMG)

Remarkably:

the article Bochkarev was directing criticism, and possibly even implied threats, to the Rumanians and Yugoslavs. (STALIN FULLY REHABILITATED AS WARTIME LEADER: SOVIET MILITARY NOW APPEAR TO BE REACHING FOR MORE POWER, March 1969, p. 4) (IMG)

The Brezhnevian phenomenon was very well-reflected in the membership composition of the Party. Whereas the Khrushchevian era marked the rule of the white-collar elements as the dominant majority in the Party, the Brezhnevian era marked the rule of the white-collar elements as the dominant minority in the Party. This meant that like the Khrushchev era, Titoist policies were to continue, but also that unlike the Khrushchev era, the anti-

Titoist elements and the remnants of the communist faction could much greater exercise greater influence over the Party. The dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie in Eurasia was not overthrown, but it was weakened, no doubt.

The US State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research reported that the white collar / intelligentsia / bureaucrat stratum dominated the revisionist CPSU, but they dominated it no longer as a majority but as the largest minority; they now composed a significant amount less than 50% of the Party membership composition:

Over the years, the CPSU has become largely a white-collar organization of careerists although it attempts to retain contact with the "masses" through recruitment from the workers and, to a lesser degree, the peasants. Still, the tendency of the better educated and professionals to seek membership for opportunistic reasons reinforces trends that tend to turn the party into a conventional ruling caste. At the beginning of 1968, 94,000 doctors and candidates of arts and sciences were party members; this is more than half of the total number of scholars with advanced degrees in the USSR. Similarly, about 33% of the country's engineers, of the agronomists and livestock experts, 25% of the teachers, and of the medical doctors were party members in early 1968. Males predominate at a 4:1 ratio, although the percentage of women has risen from to in the last 40 years. The CPSU is overwhelmingly urban in composition; workers comprised 38% of total membership in 1967, white-collar employees and others comprised almost 46%; and only 16% came from collective farms. This last percentage sank to 11.4% in November 1969. (World Strength of the Communist Party Organizations, Issue 22, US Department of State, Bureau of Intelligence and Research, CIA, 1970, p. 72) (IMG)

Approximately 2-3 years later, there was an increase in the percentage of the blue-collar workers and again a decline in the percentage of the white-collar elements:

The period under review has seen further growth of the Party ranks and qualitative improvement in the composition of its membership. At present the CPSU membership is 14,455,321, or nine per cent of the country's adult population. The membership composition is as follows: workers, 40.1 per cent; farmers, 15.1 per cent; and office employees, 44.8 per cent. It should be noted that over two-thirds of these office employees are engineers, agronomists, teachers, doctors, scientists, and workers in the field of literature and art.

Three million people have joined the CPSU since the 23rd Congress. Of these, almost 1.6 million are workers. The speaker noted that the requirements for CPSU membership have been raised. The Party has begun to rid itself more resolutely of those who violate Party and state discipline, or abuse their official powers, or whose behaviour casts a slur on the name of Communist.

All these years the CPSU and its Central Committee have undeviatingly followed the line of further developing inner-Party democracy, observing the Leninist norms of Party life, and stepping up the activity of Communists. The Party has consistently implemented the principle of electivity and accountability of its leading bodies. The spirit of collective effort and collective leadership has taken firm root. Questions relating to Party work are discussed and decided on a thoroughly democratic basis.

(THE 24TH CONGRESS OF THE CPSU: What the Congress Discussed and Decided, March 30, 1971 to April 9, 1971, Novosti Press Agency Publishing House, p. 20. MIA) (IMG)

Then, in 1976, there was again an increase in the percent composition of the blue-collar elements in the Party (41.6%), and a slight decline in the white-collar elements, the intelligentsia and other white-collar employees together forming 44%:

Since the 24th Congress, nearly 2.6 million men and women have been admitted into the CPSU. At present the Party has 15,694,000 members. Of them 41.6 per cent are workers, 13.9 per cent collective farmers, nearly 20 per cent intellectuals in the technical fields, and over 24 per cent workers in science, literature, the arts, education, public health, management and the military spheres. (Report of the CPSU Central Committee and the Immediate Tasks of the Party in Home and Foreign Policy, Leonid Brezhnev, February 24, 1976. In: Documents and Resolutions: The XXV Congress of the CPSU, Moscow, 1976, pp. 75-76. MIA) (IMG)

By 1981, the white-collar elements held only a slight margin over the blue-collar elements, according to the Party's report, but they continued to rule as the largest minority:

In the period under review the membership of the CPSU grew by 1,800,000. Today it has 17,480,000 members. Of these, 43.4 per cent are factory workers, 12.8 per cent are collective farmers and 43.8 per cent are members of the technical, scientific and creative intelligentsia, workers in education, medicine and culture, people working in administrative apparatus, and members of the armed forces. (Report of the Central Committee of the CPSU to the XXVI Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Immediate Tasks of the Party in Home and Foreign Policy, Leonid Brezhnev, February 23, 1981. In this situation, since the white-collar elements only held a small margin over the blue-collar workers, the blue-collar workers and the cooperative peasants in the Party could together form a majority with which to dominate the minority white-collar elements. Surely, the cooperative peasantry were not as proletarian in class character as the actual proletariat, but surely also, their class interests converged enough with the working class to lead them to side with the blue-collar elements in the Party on most issues. The collectivized peasants, in a socialistic and collective manner, owned big agricultural businesses, thereby giving them the ability to afford taking risks against the reactionary class forces, unlike the petit-bourgeoisie who feel that they cannot afford to risk losing their businesses by standing up against finance capital. Due to this character of the collectivized peasantry, they are more susceptible to cooperation with the proletariat. In this midst, the leap from quantity and quality had occurred enough to render Eurasia back into a dictatorship of the proletariat, albeit a fragile and weak dictatorship of the proletariat. For that period in time in the late 1970s and early 1980s, 'Eurasia' became the Soviet Union again, a socialist state. By 1983, according to the CPSU data, the proletarians once again formed the largest percentage. The composition of the CPSU in the early 1980s bore some resemblance to the composition of the Party in the early 1920s. The difference however was that in the 1920s, the balance of power was not so decisively in favor of the Anglo-American imperialists, whereas in the 1980s, the global balance of power was in the favor of the Anglo-American imperialists. The Red Army was bogged down in the war in Afghanistan, meaning that communist and anti-Titoist elements in it had to reallocate more resources away from the fight against the Titoist bureaucrats onto fighting Al-Qaeda. This gave the white-collar elements more space to breathe in the political sense, and thus meant that the struggle for weakening the white-collar elements in the Party peaked by the early 1980s. With the bogging down of the Red Army in Afghanistan and the military setbacks it faced, the socialist faction that dominated the Soviet state apparatus was rolled back again and lost leverage, thereby giving increased strength to the Titoist faction. Hence, by the mid-1980s, the white-collar elements regained control over the state apparatus. The rise of the Gorbachevian tendency was a symptom of this white-collar control over the state, party, military, and intelligence bodies.

C22S2. East Germany Transitions to the Dictatorship of the Proletariat  IMG-All-{GDR }

SED Party membership had the blue collar workers as the largest percentage. The blue-collar workers together with the kolkhoz peasants constituted the majority in the SED membership. It is worth mentioning that whereas the agrarian petit-bourgeoisie, who have too small of businesses to risk competition with imperialist finance capital, the kolkhoz farmers have big businesses, big businesses that are controlled democratically by the farmers working in them and which are large enough as businesses to be able to risk standing up against imperialism. Hence, the collective farmers gain a pro-socialist anti-imperialist class characteristic, making them allies of the proletariat.

In a document co-authored by Colonel Donald W. Bernier – the former Director of Foreign Intelligence Office of the Assistant Chief of Staff for Intelligence in the US Department of the Army – and William Giloane – a researcher working for the US State Department – it was written:

Statistics coming out of the Seventh Party Congress reported a total of 1,769,912 SED members, with blue-collar workers listed as the largest single component—over 45 percent of the party membership. Salaried workers, consisting largely of members of the bureaucracy in state and party offices, made up the next largest group, with some 16 percent of the total membership. In order to portray the SED as a worker's party, the leadership asserts that the salaried employees and the intelligentsia (see Glossary) are also workers. Compared to the party composition as reported in 1961, there was an 11-percent increase in the number of blue-collar workers by the time of the Seventh Party Congress and a decline in salaried employees from 32 to 16.1 percent. Because the for categorizing the membership are not known, however, the differences may be in the manner of classification rather than in actual in membership (see table 10). (AREA HANDBOOK FOR EAST GERMANY, Eugene K. Keefe, Donald W. Bernier, Lyle E. Brenneman, Wayne A. Culp, William Giloane, James M. Moore, Jr., 1972, p. 144) (IMG)

The table to the right, using information from the document by the Colonel, sheds light on the class struggles within the SED. By the 1970s, East Germany was ending the private sector:

Since December 1971 the government has been engaged in a major effort to nationalize the remaining private and semi-private enterprises, which employ one out of every seven industrial employees.

The industrial sector is 79% nationalized, while handicrafts and small artisan operations have a higher proportion of private and semi-nationalized ownership. Transportation and communications are 93% state-owned, while construction is 52% nationalized. Cooperatives make up about 80% of agricultural management, and state farms account for 16%. No other country in Eastern Europe has achieved collectivization to this extent. (Basic Data on the Economy of East Germany, US Department of Commerce, Office of East-West Trade Development, Bureau of East-West Trade, James Ellis, 1973, p. 5) (IMG)

Ending the private sector was important because the existence of the bourgeoisie even in the economy inevitably gets reflected in the upwards catapulting of the agents of the bourgeoisie into the state, even a workers' state. It is not the case that the continued existence of the bourgeoisie in the economy has no effect on the level of the influence of the proletariat over the proletariat's state. No, crippling the material base of the bourgeoisie in the economy leaves the enemies of the proletariat devoid of the material base through which to retain lobbying power in the workers' state. Hence, the great weakening of the private sector was of great importance for the rise of the dictatorship of the proletariat.

Membership by Social Composition, of the Socialist Unity Party of East Germany, 1967

Salaried employees (white collar)	16.1
Intelligentsia	12.3
Pensioners	12.1
Cooperative farmers	6.4
Housewives	4.4
Students and school pupils	1.6
Producer cooperatives	0.8
Others (including businessmen and tradesmen in semi-state-owned semi-private enterprises)	0.7

(AREA HANDBOOK FOR EAST GERMANY, Eugene K. Keefe, Donald W. Bernier, Lyle E. Brenneman, Wayne A. Culp, William Giloane, James M. Moore, Jr., 1972, p. 146) (IMG)

It is worth mentioning a few caveats, however. Firstly, although the blue-collar workers together with the kolkhoz peasants formed the majority in the SED, so was it also true that a significantly large minority of the SED was made up of the remnants of the Kautskyite SPD faction headed by Grotewohl and other such traitors. Secondly, the bourgeois parties in East Germany were not dissolved and continued to exercise some influence over the East German state. Hence, the hold of the proletariat over the state was not as strong, despite the general dominance of the proletariat over the state. Unfortunately, by the late 1970s, the weakening of the socialist forces throughout Eastern Europe was paving the way towards the rollback of the proletariat's faction in the East German state and the increase in the strength of the corrupt bureaucrats in the East German state. This was manifested in the drastic economic decentralization and the elevation of the corrupt bureaucrats. The result was the liquidation of the dictatorship of the proletariat in the 1980s, a while prior to the official 1989 collapse of the 'German Democratic Republic' as a state.

C22S3. Libyan Jamahiriyah against Yugoslavia / Yugoslav Trouble-Making against Syria  IMG-All-{Titoists against Libya and Syria}

It is often claimed that Muammar Al-Qadhafi was a real friend of the Mossad agent Tito. Such a narrative is false. Erik Goldstein, the Secretary of the Navy Senior Research Fellow at the US Naval War College, noted the opposition of Qadhafi and Castro against Yugoslavia's fascist leader. As early as 1973, and by:

the time of the Algiers conference, a split in the movement had become apparent. (...). Quaddafi and Castro ... soon found common cause against the United States, and united in opposition to Tito who preferred to remain less pro-Soviet. But Tito continued to remain in the minority as NAM members refused to equate Soviet imperialism with Western imperialism. ("Guide to International Relations and Diplomacy", Michael Graham Fry, Erik Goldstein, Richard Langhorne, 2002, p. 24) (IMG)

By 1975, the Anwar Sadat faction in Egypt had gained decisive control over the Egyptian state, and immensely boosted Egyptian Sadatist subversion against Syria and Libya. The Sadatist Egyptians could count on the support of Yugoslavia, which lobbied against the attempts to expel Egypt from the Non-Aligned Movement. A US State Department document leaked by the Wikileaks confirmed:

ON THE CREDIT SIDE, YUGOSLAV SUPPORT OF OUR EFFORTS WAS OCCASIONALLY HELPFUL. YUGOSLAV BACKING WAS IMPORTANT FOR SADAT WHEN HE CAME UNDER FIRE FROM RADICAL ARABS DURING THE SINAI DISENGAGEMENT NEGOTIATIONS (ALTHOUGH IT REMAINS TO BE SEEN WHETHER THERE WILL BE ANY YUGOSLAV SUPPORT FOR SADAT'S RECENT ANTI-SOVIET ACTIONS). THE GOY [Government of Yugoslavia] SHOWED CONSIDERABLE COURAGE IN HEADING OFF THE MOVE AT THE LIMA NON-ALIGNED MEETING TO ADOPT A RESOLUTION CALLING FOR ISRAEL'S EXPULSION FROM THE UN, A KEY FACTOR IN PREVENTING THE ISSUE FROM COMING TO THE FLOOR OF THE UNGA. YUGOSLAVIA REACTED CONSTRUCTIVELY TO THE SECRETARY'S ECONOMIC PROPOSAL AT THE GA AND HAS CONTINUED AMONG THE MOST REALISTIC IN ON-GOING WORK ON THE DC-LDC ECONOMIC RELATIONS. FINALLY, BY ABSTAINING FOR THE FIRST TIME ON A PUERTO RICO RESOLUTION, YUGOSLAVIA DEMONSTRATED CLEARLY THAT IT WILL ON OCCASION TAKE OUR INTERESTS INTO CONSIDERATION IF WE FIGHT HARD ENOUGH (AND EARLY ENOUGH) FOR THEM. TWO DEVELOPMENTS IN THE YUGOSLAV-SOVIET RELATIONSHIP WERE USEFUL TO US. THE ARRESTS OF AND PROPAGANDA CAMPAIGN IN YUGOSLAVIA AGAINST PRO-S[OV]IET COMINFORMISTS REMINDED THE WORLD OF CONTINUED SOVIET MEDDLING. DESPITE THE SOOTHING NOISES OF THE "PRAVDA" ARTICLE AND MINIC-GROMYKO COMMUNIQUE, THE YUGOSLAVS CONTINUE TO MAKE CLEAR THE NEED TO KEEP DEFENSES UP. IN PREPARATIONS FOR THE EUROPEAN COMMUNIST PARTY CONFERENCE, AND AS EVIDENCED BY DOLANC AT THE CPSU JAMBOREE, THE YUGOSLAVS HAVE LED A GROWING RESISTANCE TO SOVIET CONTROL OF THE MOVEMENT. (BUT THIS IS A TWO-EDGED SWORD FROM THE U.S. VIEWPOINT, HELPING TO LEGITIMIZE AND STRENGTHEN WESTERN EUROPEAN COMMUNIST PARTIES EVEN AS IT ENCOURAGES THEIR INDEPENDENCE FROM MOSCOW.) Against the Arab states and Cuba, the Yugoslav regime lobbied for the inclusion of Sadatist Egypt in the NAM. As a result of the seizure of the US Embassy in Tehran in 1979, a number of intelligence documents on Titoist-Sadatist collaboration were leaked. One US intelligence document uncovered due to the 1979 student seizure of the US Embassy in Tehran, revealed:

3. EVEN BEFORE THE ISLAMIC CONFERENCE, THE PLO, IRAQ AND SYRIA HAD TURNED THEIR ATTENTION TO SUSPENDING EGYPT FROM THE NAM, SPECIFICALLY TO INSCRIBING AN ITEM ON THE AGENDA OF THE NACB MINISTERIAL IN COLOMBO. HOWEVER, THEIR INITIAL EFFORTS HAVE THE NACB CONSIDER EGYPT'S SUSPENSION FROM THE NAM DID NOT WORK. AT MEETINGS OF THE NACB. IN APRIL, FOR EXAMPLE, EGYPT—SUPPORTED BY SRI LANKA, INDIA, AND YUGOSLAVIA-- PREVENTED CIRCULATION OF T[he] LETTER QC ALL NAM MEMBERS ASKING FOR EGYPT'S SUSPENSION.

4. THIS PROCEDURAL SETBACK HAS PROMPTED SOME ARAB AMBASSADORS TO QUESTION THE FEASIBILITY OF SUSPENDING EGYPT FROM THE NAM AND OAU.

5. THE YUGOSLAVS AND INDIANS ARE SENDING MINISTERIAL LEVEL DELEGATIONS TO LOBBY AGAINST EGYPT'S SUSPENSION AMONG ASIAN AND ARAB MEMBERS OF THE NAM. TITO PLANS TO VISIT LIBYA ON MAY 31 TO URGE RESTRAINT ON QADHAFI.

6. IN ADDITION TO ITS OBJECTION ON PRINCIPLE TO EGYPT'S SUSPENSION, YUGOSLAVIA IS CONCERNED THAT THE INTENSITY OF ANTI-EGYPTIAN SENTIMENT AMONG THE OTHER ARAB STATES MAY FORCE BELGRADE TO TAKE SIDES. (...).

8. AS AN INFLUENTIAL MEMBER OF THE NAM AND THE HOST OF THE NEXT SUMMIT, CUBA'S POSITION IS ESPECIALLY [IM]PORTANT. ORDINARILY CUBA WOULD SUPPORT THE SUSPENSION MOVE OUT OF SYMPATHY WITH THE ARAB HARDLINERS AND A DESIRE TO RETALIATE FOR EGYPT'S PREVIOUS ATTEMPTS TO "EXPEL" CUBA....

No wonder that a declassified CIA document corroborated:

In recent years Yugoslavia has been under assault from Cuba and other nonaligned radicals – as well as Moscow – for its allegedly lax record in supporting anti-Western causes. (Yugoslavia: PLO Ties and Terrorism, CIA, March 3, 1986) (IMG)

The Yugoslav regime's trouble-making against Libya and Syria was far from being limited to the diplomatic sphere. The Yugoslav regime also funded the PLO terrorists that were fighting against the Syrian Arab Army and the Libyan expeditionary forces in Lebanon in the 1970s and the 1980s. Further demonstrating the Yugoslav regime's malice is also the fact that Yugoslavia supported especially the Abu Nidal Organization (ANO), an army of terror that was supported by the fascist Iraqi Mukhaberat, the Rif'at-Khaddam-Khouli faction in Syria, the gang of Mousa Kousa and Abdel-Salam Jalloud in Libya, and the gang of Sadat in Egypt. The enemies of the Al-Assad faction and of the Al-Qadhafi faction were being materially sponsored by the Yugoslav regime. The CIA agreed that the Belgrade fascists provided arms to Abu Nidal's gang:

Our best evidence of Belgrade's involvement with international terrorism comes from Yugoslavia's long-standing cooperation with Abu Nidal's Black June Organization. (The Abu Nidal group, formerly known as Black June, was responsible for terrorist operations worldwide against conservative Arab governments, Israeli interests, and moderate Palestinian leaders). Yugoslavia reportedly agreed to allow Abu Nidal's group to use Yugoslavia for safe haven and transit as long as Black June kept it secret and informed Belgrade in advance. Belgrade refused a request for explosives but offered to provide assault rifles and training to Black June members. In exchange Black June reportedly transferred $2 million to a Yugoslav bank and promised to induce other Arabs to invest in troubled Yugoslav firms. (Yugoslav Support for International Terrorist Groups, Directorate of Intelligence, CIA, September 17, 1984, p.2) (IMG)

The 'Black June' was the name which the ANO adopted as the name of the Lebanon branch of the ANO. The term 'Black June' was named after June 1976, when the Syrian Arab Army intervened in Lebanon to save that country from being further settler-colonized by the Palestinian terror network that was funded by Sadatist Egypt and Saddamite Iraq.

The ANO was able to move freely in European countries. Most permissive of the European regimes, however, was Yugoslavia. A US intelligence document leaked by the Wikileaks stated:

THE GROUP'S ABILITY TO MOVE AT WILL IN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES [makes] THEIR ACTIVITIES HARDER TO TRACE. TO FACILITATE TRAVEL, THE ORGANIZATION HAS A RECORD OF USING MOROCCAN AND OTHER NORTH AFRICAN TRAVEL DOCUMENTS INCLUDING THOSE PRODUCED BY ITS OWN FORGING OPERATION. SOME COUNTRIES SUCH AS YUGOSLAVIA HAVE BEEN MORE PERMISSIVE THAN OTHERS IN ALLOWING ABU NIDAL MEMBERS FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT, APPARENTLY HOPING THAT THIS WILL BUY THEM A MODICUM OF IMMUNITY FROM TERRORIST ACTS. THERE IS GROWING RECOGNITION THAT THIS IS A DUBIOUS ASSUMPTION. (85STATE371963_a, ABU NIDAL TERRORISTS ORGANIZATION, US Secretary of State, December 6, 1985) (IMG)

The Libyans were well aware of Abu Nidal's connections to the Titoist-fascist Yugoslav secret service. According to a US State Department:

The [Yugoslav] government has denied, as has the United States, the assertion of Libyan ruler Qadhafi, carried in a US newspaper, that notorious Palestinian terrorist Abu Nidal was living in Yugoslavia. (Patterns of Global Terrorism, US Department of State, 1988, p. 35) (IMG)

The MI6 operative Patrick Seale, one of the foremost authors on Abu Nidal, confirmed that Yugoslavia was the primary center of Abu Nidal Organization:

Abu Nidal's oldest relationship in Eastern Europe was with Yugoslavia, where Palestinians had been going to study in large numbers since the 1960s. When Abu Nidal broke from Fatah in 1974, he managed to poach some of Fatah's students in Yugoslavia and used them to start recruiting in earnest, causing violent clashes between his supporters and Fatah's. In April 1980, his men in Belgrade threw a bomb at a car in which Abu Iyad was thought to be travelling. Not wanting further headaches of this sort, Yugoslav intelligence decided to open a line to Abu Nidal.

The Yugoslavs considered Abu Nidal a terrorist... But they ignored his activities.... He of course exploited such tolerance for all it was worth. From 1980 onward, he kept a secret representative in Belgrade: first Ali al-Farra (Dr. Kamal), then Iyad Muhammad (the husband of one of his nieces), then Ali Afifi, followed by others. As a result, from 1980 to 1985, Yugoslavia became the organizational center for Abu Nidal's European operations. Weapons were stored there; his teams of assassins coming in from Libya or Lebanon used Yugoslavia as a staging post on their way to other destinations; and weapons were moved from there into the rest of Europe. Inside the organization, Yugoslavia was considered "semisecure" in the sense that if its members got into trouble, the organization could usually strike an under-the-table deal with the Yugoslavs to get them out of it.

(Abu Nidal: A Gun For Hire, Patrick Seale, 1993, pp. 276-277) (IMG)

Back in 1958, Yugoslavia had supported the US intervention in Lebanon, which was aimed at containing the influence of anti-Zionist Egypt. Mossad agent Tito's successors continued his legacy. In 1982, the UDB-funded ANO helped Israel invade Lebanon. The Abu Nidal Organization, launched the assassination attempt against Shlomo Argov. While serving as the Israeli ambassador to the United Kingdom, Shlomo Argov was an agent of the Mapam Underground, the communist intelligence network in Israel that sought the establishment of a dictatorship of the proletariat in Israel, and a democratic peace between the Hebrew nation and the Arab nation in an Arab-Israeli strategic partnership to drive out the Anglo-American imperialists from the Middle East. The Zionist mainstream disliked Argov and would have loved to see him dead. The goal of the ANO was to on the one hand physically eliminate this Mapam Underground agent, while also giving the Ariel Sharon group in Israel the 'needed' pretext for invading Lebanon. The Israeli intelligence Colonel Efraim Karsh admitted:

Even worse, the attempt on the life of the Israeli Ambassador in London, Shlomo Argov, which was carried out by the Baghdad-based Abu Nidal terrorist group and which sparked the 1982 Lebanon War, the PLO's gravest military defeat since the 1970 Black September, was conceived by Saddam Hussein. It is inconceivable that Abu Nidal (who was later expelled from Baghdad) could have carried out such an operation without his host's approval. It was also common knowledge at the time that any Palestinian attack on Israeli targets was bound to lead to a general conflagration. Israel had publicly announced its determination to remove the Palestinian military threat to its civilian settlements in the Galilee, and was impatiently looking for an excuse to make good on its promise.

What could Hussein gain by providing the bellicose Israeli Defense Minister, Ariel Sharon, with a long-sought pretext to unleash Israeli troops on the Palestinian and Syrian forces in Lebanon? The diversion of Iran's attention from the war against Iraq, to the "treacherous attack by Zionism and imperialism" on brotherly Muslim states, who incidentally also turned out to be Tehran's main Arab allies. But even if Tehran failed to live up to his expectations, an Israeli-Syrian-Palestinian confrontation in 1982 would still debilitate Iran's two most prominent Arab allies, thereby ensuring Iraq's western border against a perennial rival.

(Saddam Hussein: A Political Biography, Efraim Karsh, Inari Rautsi, 1991) (IMG)

As such, the Yugoslav intelligence, which was partially in service to the Mossad, yet again supported the Ariel Sharon faction in Israel, in devastating Lebanon, so as to contain the influence of Syria and of the revolutionary faction of Islamist Iran. Furthermore, in contrast to what is usually stated, the mainstream factions of Syria and Libya were not supporters of the Abu Nidal group. The ANO did receive support from the Khaddam-Khouli group in Syria, the enemies of the Al-Assad faction, and the Mousa Kousa group in Libya, the enemies of the Al-Qadhafi faction. The CIA's Bureau of Intelligence and Research (INR) admitted that Syria had many problems with Abu Nidal's gang:

INR stated that it agrees that serious tensions have arisen between the Syrian Government and the ANO and that President Assad is unhappy with ANO's involvement in the Palestinian Camp Wars. Syria, moreover, is attempting to lower its profile in regard to the use of terrorism and to decouple itself from ANO terrorism generally. (SUBJECT: Counterterrorism Warning and Forecast Report, National Intelligence Council, CIA, FROM: Charles E. Allen (National Intelligence Officer for Counterterrorism), MEMORANDUM FOR: Director of Central Intelligence, Deputy Director of Central Intelligence, June 1, 1987, pp. 4-5) (IMG)

Qadhafi is believed to have once verbally supported Abu Nidal and Arafat simultaneously, but he never really sympathized with Abu Nidal nor with Yasser Arafat, despite the appearance of 'friendship' with Arafat. Libya 'welcomed' Abu Nidal into Libya, by jailing him. American journalist on Arab affairs and British Petroleum Vice President Youssef Ibrahim reported in the New York Times (a copy of his article was published by The Washington Post):

Abu Nidal, the Palestinian widely considered one of the world's most dangerous terrorists, has been placed under house arrest by Libya, officials of the Palestine Liberation Organization here and Arab diplomats in Paris say.

The move against Abu Nidal, who lives in a compound near Tripoli, the Libyan capital, is believed to be a result of Arab and Palestinian pressure on Libya to put an end to his terrorist activities, which were becoming an obstacle to Arab diplomacy.

P.L.O. officials here and senior Egyptian diplomats said that ... President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt in October asked the Libyan leader, Col. Muammar el-Qaddafi, to either extradite Abu Nidal to Egypt or prevent him from mounting any terrorist operations from Libya as an essential condition for restored relations between the two nations.

There is no indication that Colonel Qaddafi intends to turn Abu Nidal over to Egypt, the officials said. Deadly Feud With P.L.O. Officials of the P.L.O., which has been Abu Nidal's principal enemy in the Arab world since he broke with it in 1973, said the developments could signal the end of the Abu Nidal organization, or at least the beginning of a long paralysis. The faction is believed responsible for terrorist attacks that have killed or wounded 900 people in at least 20 countries since 1974, when it was formed.

(...). Abu Nidal, who has lived in Libya since he was expelled from Syria in 1987, is wanted in Egypt for, among other things, the 1985 hijacking of an Egyptian airliner that ended with the deaths of 56 passengers in Malta during an attempted rescue.

His organization is held responsible for several of the most heinous acts of terrorism, including the killing of 21 people in the bombing of a synagogue in Istanbul in 1986. It has also claimed responsibility for the slaying of a leading Palestinian moderate, Issam Sartawi, in 1983.

Several Arab affairs experts said the Libyan action against Abu Nidal strongly suggests that his organization, the Fatah Revolutionary Council, is nearing collapse. Under pressure from several Arab governments, a growing number of its leaders and trained cadres have defected to the P.L.O.

Dissident senior leaders of the faction, Arab diplomats and P.L.O. officials had reported in early November that more than 150 members of the group, including more than 20 of its leaders, were slain this year and last year in an internecine struggle as Abu Nidal sought to assert absolute control over the group's 1,000 to 1,200 members and its considerable financial resources.

Officials said Colonel Qaddafi had ordered a search for the bodies of senior leaders of the group who were said to have been killed and buried inside the Abu Nidal compound near Tripoli.

(...). "The man's time is over," said a senior Arab diplomat and former intelligence official who is familiar with Abu Nidal's relations with Syria, Iraq, Libya and the P.L.O. '

(Abu Nidal Is Reportedly Placed Under House Arrest by Libyans, New York Times, Youssef Ibrahim, November 28, 1989) (IMG)

The Abu Nidal group was however responsible for kidnapping Musa Al-Sadr on behalf of Saddam Hussein's Mukhaberat and then making it appear as though the kidnapping was done by Qadhafi.

The Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies (JCSS), the Israeli think tank subordinate to IDF military intelligence (AMAN) and later renamed as the famous 'Institute for National Security Studies' (INSS), admitted in 1990 that since 1987 – the year in which the UDB agent Abu Nidal moved his troops to Libya – there was a significant reduction in the activity of the Abu Nidal's gang. Note that the Abu Nidal gang was officially called the Fatah Revolutionary Committee (FRC). The JCSS stated:

Additional factors that presumably produced a reduction in FRC international activity were intra-organizational. In 1987 Abu Nidal promised to halt terrorist activity in the international arena for a period of ten months, as part of a new strategy aimed at positioning himself closer to the mainstream of the Palestinian national movement and leadership. When this period ended in mid-'88, elements of the organization made a spectacular comeback to the international arena (for details, see Infer 1988.) By then, the entire framework of the Palestinian struggle had changed due to the outbreak of the uprising in the Territories, and the assaults were perpetrated to manifest dedication to the armed struggle. But the campaign generated friction within the group's ranks, focusing on the issue of the future course of the fight; this culminated by late 1989 in a series of intra-organizational assassinations in Lebanon and Libya, causing several prominent members to leave the FRC. All this took place against a backdrop of rumors concerning Abu Nidal's terminal illness, his worsening relationship with Qadhafi, and his house arrest by the Libyan ruler. Yugoslavia's regime was never a real friend of Assad-era Syria. By 1969, when the faction headed by Defense Minister Hafez Al-Assad had emerged as de facto triumphant in Syria, unofficially sidelining the Salah Jadid faction, Syrian strategic cooperation with Nasserist Egypt were maximized. In a conversation with Gamal Abdel-Nasser about the tactical details of what would later become the October 1973 War, Hafez Al-Assad said that the Yugoslav military 'aid' offered to Syria was malfunctional:

Al-Assad: (...). We harbour no doubt as to the importance of having field artillery, counter-artillery. Yet, we are searching for it everywhere, in the West, even with smugglers and [their] companies, And in this, there is great difficulty.

Abdel Nasser: The Yugoslavs might be able to send it.

Al-Assad: They offered us a hexagonal cannon for about 19,000 Syrian pounds, which is used and has many faults, as I myself and Lieutenant-General Fawzi went out and tried it. After the battle, after the war, they sent me 3 cannons. We tried every cannon and they all had a malfunction!

C22S4. Yugoslav, Romanian, and Chinese Support for Saddamite Iraq against the Republic of Iran  IMG-All-{Titoist-Saddamite Connection}

During the Iran-Iraq War, the Yugoslav regime supplied Iraq with weapons against Iran, while it did not sell weapons to Iran. Ali Khamenei, who was the President of Iran during the Iran-Iraq War, recalled:

former Yugoslavia ... was one of Iraq's main centers of support.... (The Trip of Ayatollah Khamenei to Yugoslavia, Ali Khamenei, October 21, 2006. In: farsi.khamenei.ir) (IMG)

He also remembered:

After the war was over – I think it was the end of 1967 – I, then-President, and a number of other officials had a trip to the former Yugoslavia.... After a long and detail negotiation, they refused to even sell a tank to us! Meanwhile, whenever the Iraqis had low supply in the war front, all kinds of eastern and western tanks immediately came to them. (The Trip of Ayatollah Khamenei to Yugoslavia, Ali Khamenei, October 21, 2006. In: farsi.khamenei.ir) (IMG)

Regarding the superficial 'greeting' and 'respect' that the Yugoslav regime authorities had for Iran:

Back when I was President, I traveled to Yugoslavia. There, they pretended to respect us and welcome us. But no matter how much we insisted, they refused to give us any conventional weapons. (The Trip of the Supreme Leader to Yugoslavia, Ali Khamenei, September 16, 2010. In: farsi.khamenei.ir) (IMG)

The Islamic Revolution Documents Center, which is an official archives center of the Islamic Republic of Iran, listed Romania, China, and Yugoslavia as three of the sponsors of fascist Iraq during Saddam groups' fascist war on Iran:

In addition to the above list, countries such as Switzerland, Sweden, Poland, Yugoslavia, China, Romania, Italy, Singapore, etc. should also be added to the list of Saddam's supporters. (The 80 Countries that Armed Saddam in the War against Iran, Islamic Revolution Documents Center (IRDC), September 22, 2015) (IMG)

Anglo-American intelligence confirms that the Yugoslav regime supported Saddam's fascist war on the people of Iran. According to the International Crisis Group (ICG), which is a front for CIA agent George Soros's Open Society Foundation, the Titoist regime of Yugoslavia also exported 'several thousand Orkan rockets to Iraq in the late 1980s':

Given the presence of Iraqi specialists at Potoci, the partnership on developing the Orkan system, the Yugoslav success at manufacturing chemical-capable Orkan rockets, and the export of several thousand Orkan rockets to Iraq in the late 1980s, it is possible that technical cooperation extended to converting Iraqi Orkan rockets for chemical warheads. (ARMING SADDAM: THE YUGOSLAV CONNECTION, International Crisis Group (ICG), December 3, 2002, p. 6) (IMG)

The arming of the Iraqi fascist regime was yet another step in the long history of the Titoist collaboration with Saddam's group, a collaboration that began – back when Tito was alive – primarily through such terrorist organizations as the Abu Nidal group, which was one of the many contact points between the UDB, Mossad, SAVAK, Kuwaiti intelligence, Saudi intelligence, and Saddam's Mukhaberat. It is also worth noting that Abu Nidal carried out terrorist attacks in Syria in the 1970s and was the main culprit behind the kidnapping and murder of Musa Al-Sadr, which was wrongly blamed on Qadhafi.

C22S5. The Titoist Yugoslav regime on the British Occupation of Ireland and Apartheid South Africa  IMG-All-{Richard West – Titoist Reign}

The Yugoslav regime opposed the freedom forces on every corner of the planet. The Yugoslav fascist propaganda sheets based in Belgrade hailed the British army of terror, the army of the colonial occupation of Ireland:

Significantly, the Belgrade newspapers were almost alone in Europe in taking the side of the British army in Northern Ireland. (Tito: and the Rise and Fall of Yugoslavia, Richard West, p. 303) (IMG)

Concerning Tito's stance on South Africa, the MI6 operative Richard West reported:

Nor did [Tito] lend support to terrorist organisations such as the African National Congress, which was subsidised by the Soviet Union. (Tito: and the Rise and Fall of Yugoslavia, Richard West, p. 284) (IMG)

C22S6.1. Revolutionary Cuba against Titoist Yugoslavia  IMG-All-{Cuba}

In 1968, Fidel Castro revealed the depth of the crimes of the Yugoslav regime against the people of Cuba. In a speech he gave in denouncing the Yugoslav regime, Fidel Castro read a part of a document that was captured by the post-Batista Cuban revolutionary government. Parts of the document which Castro presented are as follows:

"From the military attache to the Cuban Embassy in Mexico, Mexico, D.F., 13 December 1958; Gen. Francisco Tabernilla Dolz, (?MP), Military City, Marianoa.

"My dear friend, I enclose various photographs which have been given me by the Yugoslav ambassador in this country – a great friend of mine. On a certain occasion I talked to him when I had been told that private negotiations were taking place about the possibility of acquiring armaments. He tells me that in fact he can supply us with various types of armaments that we might need, such as 30.06 rifles and so forth, and he talked about a type of boat like those in the photographs that could be of great use to us.

“He explains that he has an ample quantity of these torpedo boats, which would be very economical, since they produce with very cheap labor and have the best naval shipyards today, after the English.

“These boats have a speed of over 40 kilometers an hour. They have two antiaircraft machineguns, an antiaircraft gun, and torpedo launchers. There is also a great abundance of these torpedoes, which are very cheap.

“Although I explained to him that at this time the negotiations for any kind of armaments were suspended because we had acquired enough in other places, he told me that at any rate he would give me a list with exact specifications, cost, date of delivery, and freight charge to our ports.

“As soon as he gives me these data, I shall send them to you immediately. (...).

“Col. Chief A. P. Chaumon, military attache.”

Castro’s speech was published not only by the Cuban government press but also by the Punto Final (‘Full Stop’), the media organ of the Movement of the Revolutionary Left (el Movimiento de la Izquierda Revolucionaria), a Guevarist-inspired guerrilla organization that later formed the armed detachments supporting the Allende government in the 1970s and attempted to foment subversion against the Pinochet-influenced Chilean military. The speech was translated to English by the US government agency Federal Broadcast Information Service (FBIS) and subsequently copied and published by the Marxists Internet Archive (MIA), a Trotskyite-dominated online media outlet that publishes speeches and articles from all communists and – in the broadest sense – ‘leftists’. To ensure that the English translation is correct and not distorted by American imperialist propaganda, I checked the Spanish version and slightly altered the English translation provided by the FBIS/MIA so to increase the accuracy of the translation. The reader can check the screenshots of both the FBIS/MIA version and the original Spanish-language document in the Screenshots appendix section of this book.

Since the United States government, under the pressure of the remnants of the pro-Soviet Roosevelt faction in the Democratic Party had officially sanctioned the Batista regime, the American imperialist secret service decided to covertly sponsor Batista – much like how Reagan had denounced the Nicaraguan contras but also covertly funded it nonetheless. Explaining the nature of the document discovered, Fidel Castro explained:

Imagine our surprise some months later when, one day, poking around in the archives, in the archives of the Batista government, we found the text of this document... (...). Those who have read the history of Moncada know that this Chaumon was precisely the officer who perpetrated tens of assassinations in the Moncada garrison after the attack. He was the most criminal of all the officers, who assassinated tens of prisoners, and he was later sent to Mexico and was a “great friend” of the Yugoslav ambassador, to whom, 18 days before the triumph of the revolution in December 1958, when thousands of Cubans had been here – we had been fighting for 2 years – this ambassador, in the name of Yugoslavia, and after consulting, was offering all kinds of arms – cheap, economical, launches, everything.

How great, I say, was our indignation and surprise when we found this document in the archives, signed by the person who signed it, especially when we needed arms to defend ourselves from the imperialists, and they had put all kinds of obstacles in our way and did not sell us a single weapon, and they were offering arms to Batista just as the war was ending.

As we are not going to hold the worst opinion, we are not going to have the worst concept of the role that this party played, when even the imperialists would not sell arms to Batista, when not even the Yankees would sell them arms, these gentlemen were offering good and cheap arms.

Indeed, the fact that the Yugoslav regime supplied weapons to the Batista junta is also confirmed by the British intelligence agent Richard Gott, who served in the MI6 front ‘Royal Institute of International Relations’, which was the predecessor of the Chatham House. Gott wrote:

the Yugoslavs ... continued to supply Batista with weapons until the last moment. (Cuba: A New History, Yale University Press, Richard Gott, p. 164) (IMG)

In spite of the fact that the Yugoslav regime and the Anglo-American intelligence services continued to covertly sponsor the Batista junta, the Cuban revolutionaries succeeded in ousting the Batista junta in 1959.

In the sphere of domestic policy, a number of revolutionary economic reforms occurred in Cuba. A lesser-known one is that Cuba pursued the correct economic policy – fully endorsed by Che personally – of emphasizing producer goods over the consumer goods. In October 1964, Che wrote:

The transformations so far made in the Cuban economy have produced great changes in the structure of our foreign trade. As regards exports the changes have been limited chiefly to the opening up of new markets, with sugar continuing to be the main export article. On the other hand, the composition of our imports has changed completely during these five years. Imports of consumer goods, particularly durables, have decreased substantially in favor of capital equipment, while a small decrease can be noted in the imports of intermediate goods. The policy of substitution of imports is showing slow but tangible results. (The Cuban Economy: Its Past and Its Present Importance, Ernesto Che Guevara, October 1964. In: ‘Che, Selected Works of Ernesto Guevara’, The MIT Press, Edited and with an introduction by Rolando E. Bonachea & Nelson P. Valdes, 1969, pp. 144-145) (IMG)

At the same time, the Yugoslav intelligence missed no chance to conspire against the new revolutionary government of Cuba. The same Yugoslav embassy that had served as a base through which Yugoslavia would negotiate the arms sales to Batista, emerged as a base through which Tito’s gang stabbed Cuba in the back. After the revolution, initially the Cubans were not well aware of the criminal character of the Yugoslav regime. Hence, the Cuban revolutionaries decided to purchase arms from the Yugoslav regime – and the arms were never coming. Fidel Castro remarked:

I was saying that some will ask why have we been so tenacious in our attitude toward the Yugoslav League of Communists. We want to point out a fact, a very important fact from the beginning of the revolution regarding our relations with Yugoslavia. It was in the year 1959, when our country had already made the first laws, when not only had we begun in our country the agrarian reform that brought us into confrontation with imperialism, but also, in the United States, the first plot against us was already being hatched.

At that time we did not have relations as yet with the USSR or with other countries of the socialist camp. And we had to buy our arms in some capitalist countries. We made our first purchases of arms in Belgium and Italy. Because of pressure by the imperialists, and first not by pressure but by CIA conspiracy, there was an explosion on one of the ships coming from Belgium with arms, which resulted in around 80 victims. Later, the Belgian Government, under pressure from the U.S. Government, stopped selling arms.

Meanwhile, the United States was preparing its mercenaries against us and on the other hand was carrying out its policy of blockading our purchase of arms. The Italian Government at that time was under such pressures. We recall that we were trying to buy 16 mortars – 16 mortars from Italy, and they had already sold us four and [some parts] of the other 12. However, under the pressure of the Yankee imperialists, they stopped the sale of the 12 pieces. That left us practically with four pieces and [parts] of the others, but without the cannon.

In this situation, we turned to the government of Yugoslavia to try to buy some arms, including the 12 cannon and some 120 mortars and some other pieces. And here we have a report by the comrade in charge of that mission, Maj. Jose M. Fernandez Alvarez.

And here is it in synthesis; I am going to read this information. It says:

“In 1959, as the Batista tyranny was defeated, after the defeat of the tyranny, military equipment had to be acquired. This equipment was needed urgently and immediately to defend the revolution, whose laws and measures in process of being promulgated would surely cause hate among its logical enemies, who would try to destroy it.

“On a tip that was given us, we got in touch with the ambassador of the Yugoslav republic at the end of 1959 and at the beginning of 1960, in a very superficial manner. Later, we went to visit him in the Yugoslav Embassy on 42nd Street and (Tercera) Miramar, accompanied by Maj Raul Castro.

“On this visit, the minister of the armed forces informed the ambassador of Cuba’s interest in buying arms and equipment, especially light infantry arms, rifles, machineguns, rocket launchers, mortars, and ammunition.

“The ambassador was generally evasive, and when the minister said something about payments, he said that the matter of arms was a different matter in regard to payments and that many details [were involved]. The minister indicated to the ambassador that I should stay in contact with him to learn about prices and the arms available, and to carry forward negotiations in this regard.

“It was extraordinarily difficult to carry out this task since the lists were delayed. Evasive answers were constantly given us. It was said that there were no arms available and that they had to be manufactured, that the prices had not arrived; and when the prices were finally in our possession, they dealt especially with small caliber arms at extraordinarily high prices, even on the international market.

“Prior to this and afterward, when we tried to get arms in Yugoslavia, some comrades went to Yugoslavia and also tried to arrange for the purchase of arms with the same results, with the presentation of other obstacles.

“We can say that in no operation could we make progress, despite our negotiations and great interest, since the Yugoslav representation here in Cuba did not make it feasible.

“As a conclusion to the foregoing, we can say that Yugoslavia’s attitude was markedly opportunistic, since it wanted to be paid in dollars and at black market prices for the few lines that it offered.

“They said that the total amount of the operation did not justify the difficulties that they would have with the United States over selling us arms. And they were reluctant to give us the lists and prices. They proposed that discussions be carried out through a private Yugoslav commercial company as a screen, in order that the operation should not appear under that country’s name, and in general little cooperation was shown. But it appeared that Yugoslavia did not want to make the sale to us, and on the other hand it appeared opportunist or at least intended to dissuade us from the conditions stipulated.”

Therefore, in the face of conspiracies of American intelligence against the revolutionary government of Cuba, the latter was also stabbed in the back by the Yugoslavs who did everything they could to waste the time of the Cuban people. The distrust that the Cuban revolutionaries had towards the Yugoslav regime was also reflected in the remarks of Che Guevara. While Che Guevara – whether out of unawareness/naivete or out of diplomatic pragmatism – rejected the narrative that Tito’s gang were agents of imperialism, he nonetheless did show that, at least intuitively, he found Yugoslavia’s government problematic:

GUEVARA: (...). We must find ways and means by which to face the new issues brought about by removing the old situation and by building a socialist society.

REPORTER: What is your opinion of the Yugoslavian experiment in this respect?

GUEVARA: We definitely oppose the Yugoslavs, and we do not wish to use big flashy words on this subject; we are not talking about backsliding – but we also do not wish to talk about being stationary. We do not at all accuse the Yugoslavs of being agents of imperialism, and so forth – but we oppose them in a basic manner.

REPORTER: How?

GUEVARA: We believe that there are two ways in which we differ from the Yugoslav experiment: that is, in our reaction to Stalinism and in opposition to the Soviet Union to dictate to us its economic and leadership ideals.

(Interview with Al-Tali’ah, Al-Tali’ah, No. 4, April 1965. In: ‘Che, Selected Works of Ernesto Guevara’, The MIT Press, Edited and with an introduction by Rolando E. Bonachea & Nelson P. Valdes, 1969, p. 411) (IMG)

One of the many problems that Cuba had with the Eurasian Titoists headed by the Khrushchev gang and the Gomulka regime in Poland among others was precisely with regards to the issue of Yugoslavia. Fidel Castro later recalled:

The occurrences in Czechoslovakia only serve to confirm to us the correctness of the positions and the theses that our revolution and our party have been maintaining – our position at the Tricontinental Conference, our positions in the Latin American Solidarity Organization, and our positions regarding all the international problems – there is a series of facts that confirm this point of view. It is known, for example, that one of the factors that we have explained – which explains – which has been a constant element of irritation in our relations with many countries of the socialist camp and with many communist parties is the problem of Yugoslavia. (Castro Speech on Czechoslovakia 1968. In: ‘The Cuban Approach in the face of the Czechoslovak Crisis’ [El planteamiento Cubano frente a la crisis checoslovaca], Punto Final, The Movement of the Revolutionary Left, Santiago, Chile, Documents, September 10, 1968, pp. 10-11. Castro continued:

However, recently in many countries, the communist parties, including the communist parties of the Warsaw Pact, have begun quite to forget the role and nature of the Yugoslav League of Communists. They began to call Yugoslavia a communist country, they began to call it a communist party, to invite the Yugoslav League of Communists to meetings of the socialist countries, to meetings of base organizations of the communist parties; and this evoked our constant opposition, our constant disagreement, our constant taking or exception, expressed on various occasions. (...). The communist movement for a long time – with much justification – kept that party ostracized. An infinity of articles written by all the parties appeared in publication against that movement, denouncing it, pointing a finger at it.

Afterward, naturally, some parties forgot this, and the friends, followers, the unconditionals, began also to forget this in the face of all the political preaching about the ideological resurgence of the revolutionary movement, which has led to these most dolorous situations. (Castro Speech on Czechoslovakia 1968. At the same time, Cuba continued to maintain bonds with the enemies of the Yugoslav regime. When the Eurasian Titoists headed by the gang of Nikita Khrushchev imposed the fiercest pressures on different countries in order to make them break their relations with People’s Democratic, Cuba was one of the few countries that refused to bow to such intensive pressure. Fidel Castro said in 1967:

Our country never broke relations with Albania, when a large number of countries from the socialist camp broke relations with this country.

(FIDEL CASTRO SPEECH AT LASO CLOSING SESSION, Speech by Prime Minister Fidel Castro at closing ceremony of First LASO Conference, held in Havana's Chaplin Theater — Live, Havana Domestic Radio and Television Services in Spanish, Havana Domestic Radio, August 11, 1967. In the meantime, the Yugoslav embassy continued its hostility to revolutionary Cuba. The MI6 operative Richard West recalled:

In Communist Cuba I happened to meet a diplomat from the Yugoslav Embassy. Apparently Fidel Castro’s bodyguards had recently shot up the embassy car and wounded one of their personnel, so he was not feeling well disposed to Cuba, but even this could not explain the flow of invective to which he subjected the country, making no effort to keep his voice down. He said that Fidel was just a tin-pot Latin American fascist, similar to Juan Peron, the Argentine dictator. He said that the Cubans lived in terror and hoped only to reach the United States. He added that when the revolutionary leader Che Guevara disappeared to try and start a revolt in Bolivia, Fidel Castro had an affair with Guevara’s wife. All this was told to me by the diplomat of a country supposed to be on the best of terms with Communist Cuba. (Tito: and the Rise and Fall of Yugoslavia, Richard West, p. 271) (IMG)

The freedom forces in Cuba greeted the Warsaw Pact intervention into Czechoslovakia in order to undermine the Yugoslav regime’s intelligence presence in that country. Regarding Warsaw Pact intervention into Czechoslovakia, the Maoists obviously blatantly sided with Tito’s fascist gang. Unfortunately, the Party of Labour of Albania – at the time under Maoist influence – overtly sided with the butcher of Kosovo on this matter, even though by then, covertly, Albania’s trade relations was being strategically realigned with Brezhnev-era Eurasia. Castro on the other hand, fully endorsed the Warsaw Pact intervention in Czechoslovakia, which was obviously aimed at minimizing Yugoslav regime’s influence presence there:

Some people must have asked themselves the reason for that attitude – why Cuba is always emphasizing the role that the Yugoslav League of Communists Party plays in the world. What is the role of an instrument of imperialism that that party plays in the world?

Now, in relation to the occurrences in Czechoslovakia, the main promoter of all that bourgeois liberal policy – the main defender, the main promoter – was the organization of the so-called Yugoslav communists. They applauded with both hands all those liberal reforms, that whole concept of the party ceasing to be the instrument of revolutionary power, of power ceasing to be a function of the party – because this is very closely linked to the entire outlook of the Yugoslav League of Communists. All those criteria of political nature that completely deviate from Marxism, those criteria of an economic nature, are intimately linked with the Yugoslav League of Communists’ ideology. (...). And here we have the facts. It was this organization that was one of the principal promoters of the deformations of the political process in Czechoslovakia as the agent – that is what this organization is – of the imperialists.

Some will say that [I err, but] I am going to show at least some facts. Tito was received as a hero in Prague a few weeks ago. This was the result of what? Of the ideological weakening, of the political weakness.... And were we not saying, how this can be? And to what extremes we are going, when this element – known to be revisionist, condemned historically by the revolutionary movement, which has taken the role of an agent of imperialism – was received by [the intelligentsia of] a nation practically as a hero? Now, of course, Tito is one of those most scandalized by this event of the participation of Warsaw Pact countries in Czechoslovakia.

In the 1970s, when the Guatemalan terror regime, the CIA-installed fascist terror state hostile to Cuba, was being de-funded by the Carter Administration, the Administration whose aim was to stab US imperialism in the back, the Guatemalan regime could nonetheless comfortably rely on the regimes of Israel, South Africa, and Yugoslavia to provide the arms it needed:

In the early 1980s, a whole worldwide right-wing network could be seen in action in Guatemala, offering aid in whatever form was needed. General Rodolfo Lobos Zamora mentioned the United States, Israel, and Argentina as countries that offered Guatemala military aid “spontaneously” (Enfoprensa, 1984). Since 1975, Guatemala has received arms from the United States, Israel, France, Switzerland, Taiwan, Italy, Belgium, and Yugoslavia. (The Israeli Connection: Whom Israel Arms and Why, Benyamin Beit-Hallahmi, 1987, p. 82) (IMG)

Indeed, the hostile relations between Cuba and Yugoslavia continued well into the 1970s and the 1980s. During the 1970s, the Cuban communists were aiming to hijack the CIA-backed Titoist ‘Non-Aligned Movement’. In cooperation with Libya, Cuba spearheaded the attempt to isolate the reactionary gang of Tito. Erik Goldstein, the Secretary of the Navy Senior Research Fellow at the US Naval War College, noted the opposition of Qadhafi and Castro against Yugoslavia’s fascist leader. As early as 1973, and by:

the time of the Algiers conference, a split in the movement had become apparent. (...) Quaddafi and Castro ... soon found common cause against the United States, and united in opposition to Tito who preferred to remain less pro-Soviet. But Tito continued to remain in the minority as NAM members refused to equate Soviet imperialism with Western imperialism. (“Guide to International Relations and Diplomacy”, Michael Graham Fry, Erik Goldstein, Richard Langhorne, 2002, p. 24) (IMG)

As late as 1979, Castro continued to be opposed to Tito:

The debate between Castro and Tito continued at Havana, albeit in an anticlimatic fashion. Castro attacked the United States and China as the cause of the world's ills and reportedly sought to have the conference adopt a more openly pro-Soviet view of events. Tito responded by urging the Non-aligned Movement to remain independent from the superpowers. Efforts to bring the movement back to discussing economic difficulties and the debt crisis met with little success. (“Guide to International Relations and Diplomacy”, Michael Graham Fry, Erik Goldstein, Richard Langhorne, 2002, p. 26) (IMG)

Documents leaked due to the US Embassy seizure in Tehran in 1979, confirm that the US State Department regarded the interests of the dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie in Yugoslavia against People’s Democratic Cuba as in line with the interests of the United States:

UNDER SECRETARY NEWSOM NOTED THAT THE US WAS TALKING FIRST TO YUGOSLAVIA ABOUT THE CUBAN DRAFT BECAUSE WE ARE CONFIDENT THAT WE HAVE PARALLEL INTERESTS. (NNNNVV ESB028BRA554, PP RJQMHR, DE RUEHC #7420/02 2011651, ZNY CCCCC ZZH, P 200030Z, From: Secretary of State, Washington DC, To: RUDKRB/American Embassy Belgrade, Priority 2892, INFO ALL DIPLOMATIC POSTS PRIORITY, July 1979) (IMG)

After all, the Yugoslavs were struggling to defend American imperialist interests in the NAM:

THE YUGOSLAVS WILL FIGHT HARD TO AVOID POSITIONS THAT WILL OFFEND THE US, BUT IT IS POSSIBLE THAT IN THE END THERE WOULD BE SOME COMPROMISES THAT COULD CAUSE THE US SOME PROBLEMS. (NNNNVV ESB028BRA554, PP RJQMHR, DE RUEHC #7420/02 2011651, ZNY CCCCC ZZH, P 200030Z, From: Secretary of State, Washington DC, To: RUDKRB/American Embassy Belgrade, Priority 2892, INFO ALL DIPLOMATIC POSTS PRIORITY, July 1979) (IMG)

In order for the Tito regime to pursue such pro-American objectives:

BELOVSKY HOPED, HOWEVER, THAT WE [Americans] WOULD UNDERTAKE THESE EFFORTS IN A WAY THAT DID NOT SUGGEST INTERFERENCE IN NAM’S AFFAIRS AS THIS WOULD CONSTITUTE AN ADDITIONAL BURDEN THAT THE YUGOSLAVS AND OTHER MODERATES WOULD HAVE TO DEAL WITH. (NNNNVV ESB028BRA554, PP RJQMHR, DE RUEHC #7420/02 2011651, ZNY CCCCC ZZH, P 200030Z, From: Secretary of State, Washington DC, To: RUDKRB/American Embassy Belgrade, Priority 2892, INFO ALL DIPLOMATIC POSTS PRIORITY, July 1979) (IMG)

The United States pretended to be separate from the NAM, when in fact, the United States was supporting Yugoslav attempts to control the NAM.

C22S6.2. Revolutionary Cuba against the Moscow Titoists / People’s Democratic Development in Cuba with Brezhnev-era Eurasian Assistance / The Struggle for Establishing a Dictatorship of the Proletariat in Cuba / Some Theoretical Errors of Cuban Leadership  IMG-All-{Cuba}

Revolutionary Cuba on the one hand faced the front-stabs of the imperialist powers headed by the United States, and the stabs in the back by the Moscow Titoists. Added to this was the fact that Cuba had poor economic infrastructure and a low availability of communist literature. All of these were obstacles in front of the Cuban proletariat, making it harder for them to achieve their objectives. There were at the same time factors that worked to Cuba’s advantage. By the end of the Great Patriotic War, the international colonial system had been severely damaged. This itself was a factor that assisted the Cuban people in their liberation from American yoke in the first place. At the same time, there were many other freedom movements that succeeded in the countries formerly colonized, thus paving the way for allies worldwide with which a revolutionary Cuba could trade, and thus break Americana encirclement. Furthermore, in spite of the dominance of the Titoist tendency in Eurasia, and despite the fact that Eurasia had become a dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie, there were nonetheless communists as well as progressives within the state apparatus of Eurasia, and they sympathized with Cuba’s struggles against Anglo-American intelligence. These communist and progressive elements that continued to exist in Eurasia made the effort to assist Cuba in the face of the aggression-by-infiltration projects of the American secret service.

The powerful existence of both the factors that favored and the factors that disfavored Cuba’s proletarian class is reflected in the foreign and domestic policies that the Cuban government pursued, and is also correlated with the strength of the worker membership within the Communist Party of Cuba (PCC). The purpose of this section is to expose both the lesser-known positive aspects and the lesser-known negative aspects of the situation in Cuba, with regards to political economy, international relations, and intelligence wars, to demonstrate the intensive class struggles and at times, stalemates, that occurred in that country.

A major problem between the Cuban revolutionary leadership and the Khrushchev group was the latter’s support for American military espionage against Cuba. Nikita Khrushchev agreed that the so-called ‘international inspectors’ on nuclear programs are nothing but spies seeking to collect military intelligence:

If inspection is established without confidence, this will not be inspection. With spoiled relations between countries, such inspection becomes a form of military intelligence aimed at choosing the most favorable moment for either of the parties to commit aggression. We entertain no thoughts of any aggressive attack and will certainly not accent such inspection. But if conditions of mutual confidence are created between countries, then the establishment of inspection will present no difficulties. (Interview with William Randolph Hearst, Jr., Nikita Khrushchev, November 22, 1957, Pravda, November 28, 1957. In: 'Soviet World Outlook: A Handbook of Communist Statements', Bureau of Intelligence Research of the US State Department, July 1959, p. 201) (IMG)

The belief that 'UN inspectors' have historically been 'neutral' observers is a childish delusion. It is no secret that the 'UN inspectors' or 'nuclear inspectors' from the IAEA have historically been CIA-MI6 spies. The CIA spy Saddam Hussein defected to the anti-imperialist camp in 1989 and began to clash with the CIA; this is why after 1989, Saddam fiercely struggled against the arrival of 'UN inspectors' or 'nuclear inspectors' to Iraq. The 'inspectors' got into Iran's nuclear sites and subsequently Iran saw numerous explosions in its nuclear sector. The same Khrushchev who agreed that 'international inspectors' on nuclear matters are spies and the same Khrushchev who knew very well that the UN – the body that invaded Korea in 1950 – was an Anglo-American military and intelligence front, promoted such military intelligence gathering by the 'UN inspectors' in Cuba, something that got Khrushchev into a fierce clash with Fidel Castro:

On October 24 Khrushchev announced that he was determined to avoid "reckless decisions," and certain Soviet vessels en route to Cuba were ordered to change course. On October 28 Khrushchev advised the [US] President that he had given orders to "dismantle the arms which you describe as offensive and to crate them and return them to the Soviet Union." Khrushchev's agreement to permit U.N. observers to verify the dismantling of the missile sites was obstructed by Cuban Premier Fidel Castro, who refused to allow observers to come to Cuba. The United States therefore continued air and naval surveillance of Cuba and withheld any formal promise not to invade the country in the future. (USSR, Capsule Facts for the Armed Forces, Armed Forces Information Service, Department of Defense, October 1967, p. 8) (IMG)

Had Khrushchev committed such a treasonous policy 'in consultation' with Cuba's leaders, Khrushchev was still going to be a traitor and an enemy spy anyways. Referring to Khrushchev's behaviour regarding Cuba, a terrorist who had agreed to spy for the SAVAK told his bosses:

Regarding the question of Cuba and the Caribbean Sea crisis and regarding the treatment of Albania, [Khrushchev] made serious errors. Ostensibly to maintain world peace, [Khrushchev] agreed to capitulate to the Americans against Cuba's independence.... And if it were not for the steadfastness of the Cuban people, the Americans would have swallowed [Cuba]. (The Interrogation session of Mr. Parviz Nikkhah [Jalaseh Bazjuyi az Aqaye Mohandes Parviz Nikkhah], SAVAK, Parviz Nikkhah, Khordad 22, 1344 / June 12, 1965. Source: 'Parviz Nikkhah According to SAVAK Documents' [Parviz Nikkhah be Revayat e Asnad e SAVAK] book, page 187. In: The Center of Historical Documents Survey) (IMG)

Revolutionary Cuba's alliance with Eurasia was not because of the Khrushchev group but was rather in spite of the Khrushchev group. Some people hold the incorrect view that the deployment of weapons by Eurasia was a dangerous provocation and a profound error; these people are incorrect. The policy of ruthless confrontation with the United States and 'grabbing America by the throat' off the coast of Florida was a policy of anti-imperialist confrontation emanating from the remnants of the communist faction in Eurasia. Imperialist America's tough response to such confrontation by the Eurasians gave Khrushchev the leverage he needed to commit treason and to denounce such anti-CIA confrontation as 'reckless'. He therefore was able to allow the 'UN inspectors' (CIA-MI6 spies) to gather military intelligence on Cuba, and ensured the withdrawal of some of the Eurasian military units from Cuba.

By the mid-1960s, there came about an erosion of the power of the Nikita Khrushchev faction, and the communist anti-Titoist elements that had encircled the Khrushchev agent Leonid Brezhnev, coopted Brezhnev to make moves to oust Nikita Khrushchev. By October 1964, Khrushchev was officially ousted and Titoist influence in Moscow saw some – but by no means total – decline. The Cubans greeted the ouster of Nikita Khrushchev and the rise of the Brezhnev faction, although they were wary of the profound Titoist deviations that the Brezhnevians had as well, since after all Brezhnev too was covertly as Titoist as Khrushchev and overtly a mere lesser-Titoist. In that same month of Khrushchev's ouster, Che Guevara wrote the following in an article:

One of the main bases for the development of our sugar industry, as well as for the development of the country as a whole, is the agreement recently signed between the U.S.S.R. and Cuba. This guarantees to us future sales of enormous quantities of sugar at prices much above the average of those paid in the North American and world markets during the last twenty years. Apart from this and other favorable economic implications, the agreement signed with the U.S.S.R. is of political importance inasmuch as it provides an example of the relationship that can exist between an underdeveloped and a developed country when both belong to the socialist camp, in contrast to the commercial relations between the underdeveloped countries exporting raw materials and the industrialized capitalist countries—in which the permanent tendency is to make the balance of trade unfavorable to the poor nations. (The Cuban Economy: Its Past and Its Present Importance, Ernesto Che Guevara, October 1964. In: 'Che, Selected Works of Ernesto Guevara', The MIT Press, Edited and with an introduction by Rolando E. Bonachea & Nelson P. Valdes, 1969, pp. 145-146) (IMG)

The same Che Guevara that had fiercely denounced the Moscow Titoists headed by Khrushchev, wrote the above, which clearly reflects the Cuban recognition of some shifts occurring in Eurasia. Note that during the Khrushchev era, Che Guevara once openly declared that he will resist Cuba becoming dominated by the Moscow Titoists to the end:

BERGQUIST: You once said that Cuba would resist becoming a Soviet satellite to the "last drop of blood." But how "sovereign" were you when Khrushchev arranged with Kennedy for the missile withdrawal without consulting you?

GUEVARA: As you know from Fidel's speech, we had differences with the Soviet Union.

(Interview with Bergquist, No. 2, Look Magazine, April 1963. In: 'Che, Selected Works of Ernesto Guevara', The MIT Press, Edited and with an introduction by Rolando E. Bonachea & Nelson P. Valdes, 1969, p. 398) (IMG)

Much like most of the freedom forces around the world, the Cubans were hostile to the Kremlin Titoists headed by the Khrushchev gang but looked favorably towards an alliance with the remnants of the communist network and anti-Titoist elements that from the Soviet legacy. As such, Cuba opposed the Eurasian Titoists but sought to form an alliance with the anti-Titoist elements that existed in Eurasia. Che, who resisted the domination of Cuba by the Moscow Titoists, favoured strategic partnership with the Eurasians when signs of improvement came in the mid-1960s.

Castro knew that the Brezhnevians in the Warsaw Pact, while definitely preferable over the Khrushchevians in the overt level, were nonetheless Titoists on the covert level, and were not going to make the moves necessary to counter the Yugoslav regime influence, nor were they going to turn against the fascist enemies of Cuba in Latin America as much as they should have:

And we wonder whether, perhaps, this bitter experience with Czechoslovakia will not lead to a rectification of these errors, and whether the party of the League of Yugoslav Communists will cease to be accepted as a communist party, as a revolutionary party, and will cease to be invited to mass meetings and the political organizations of the socialist camp.

We are seeing many interesting things as a result of these events. It is explained that the countries of the Warsaw Pact sent armies to put down on imperialist plot and the development of counterrevolution in Czechoslovakia. However, it has caused us to disagree and be discontented and to protest over the fact that these same countries have been fomenting relations and a rapprochement of an economic, cultural, and political nature with the oligarchical governments of Latin America, which are not simply reactionary governments, exploiters of their peoples, but are shameful accomplices in the imperialist aggressions against Cuba and shameful accomplices in the economic blockage against Cuba. And these countries have seen themselves stimulated and encouraged by the fact that our friends, our natural allies, have forgotten this cavalier role, this traitorous role, that these governments carry out against a socialist country, the blockage policy which those countries carry out against a socialist country.

Until early 1968, the Titoist faction in Moscow was still able to wield a high influence in many of the policy matters. This is reflected in the profound economic mismanagement that occurred in Cuba during this period, which could have been prevented through Eurasian aid. In 1966, the program for a harvest of 10 million tons by 1970, was launched. The Central Committee of the PCC noted that during this period there was:

an inefficient management of resources, which aggravated the financial problem and the shortage of workforce. (The Report to the First Congress of the Communist Party of Cuba: Historical Analysis of the Revolution, Cuban Communist Party, 1976, pp. 16-17. In: Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodísticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

The report by the Central Committee further added:

Organizational deficiencies and inadequate methods of direction and economic management were also present. The realities turned out to be more powerful than our purposes. (The Report to the First Congress of the Communist Party of Cuba: Historical Analysis of the Revolution, Cuban Communist Party, 1976, pp. 16-17. In: Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodísticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

During those years, severe mismanagement took place, including the left-deviationist policy of wage equalization:

However, in the social order between 1967 and 1969, negative trends such as the decoupling of wages from the production norm and the elimination of interest on credits and taxes charged to the peasantry took hold. All this, together with the fact that the issue of remuneration according to work was not taken into account, caused an excess of circulating money parallel to a shortage of supply of goods and services; promoting the conditions for the increase of absenteeism and labor indiscipline. (Politica Socioeconomica, Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodísticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

Surely, the economic mismanagement was something that happened inside of Cuba, but the Eurasians could provide technical expertise in preventing such a high level of mismanagement. Had the communist anti-Titoist elements in Eurasia had such a massive hold over politics, they surely would have been able to assist Cuba much earlier in preventing this catastrophe, but they obviously did not have as much power until 1968-1969. The revisionist policy of wage equalization and many other such bad policies were either abandoned or diminished in influence by 1969, but the effect was enough to cause the damage to the economy.

It would be wrong to entirely blame the Eurasian Titoists and the inadequate aid or 'aid' to Cuba as the factor for such economic problems. Cuba's economic management is known to have been directly influenced ideologically by the views of Che Guevara. Che Guevara held correct stances on a number of political-economic issues, one of which was the need to emphasize producer goods over consumer goods. However, he also held some erroneous theses that need to be mentioned, in order to shed light on the wage equalization policy that was promoted by many managers in Cuba at the time.

Despite Che's positive intentions, some of the views that he promoted gave greater ideological leverage to the anti-Cuba economic saboteurs in the Cuban economic management positions. It also misled many of the well-meaning albeit naïve individuals in the economic management positions. In particular, Che Guevara held incorrect views with regards to the question of material vs. moral incentives, and against the historical materialist science. What follows are a number of excerpts from the works of Che Guevara. The underline and bold of Che's writings is done by me to highlight those parts that are especially idealist. The square brackets are added by me and contain my critiques of the views in the quotes. Here is the quote from Che:

It is necessary to make one thing clear: We do not negate the objective need for material incentives, but we are reluctant to use them as a fundamental element. [The word 'element' is too broad. Insofar as incentives are concerned, promoting 'purely' moral incentives is a fundamental goal of communism, but communist historical materialist analysis holds that material incentives are the fundamental means of reaching this fundamental goal.]

We believe that in economics such a lever becomes an end in itself and then begins to impose its own force on the relationships among men. We should not forget that material incentives come from capitalism and are destined to die under socialism. [No, they are not destined to die under socialism, but are rather destined to die under communism, when production is so extremely high that material incentives in production become irrelevant.]

How are we going to make them die?

Little by little, through gradual increase in consumer goods for the people, which will make this type of incentive unnecessary—we are told. [We are told so by Marx and Engels in The Critique or the Gotha Programme. One should not be dogmatic about the ideas of Marx and Engels, but certainly on this issue, as with the vast majority of their other ideas, Marx and Engels are very correct.] We see in this answer a very rigid mechanism. [With all due respect to Che, Che's view on this matter is idealist. Since Che has an idealist stance on this matter, Che is incorrectly viewing scientific analysis as 'mechanistic' or mechanical materialist.]

Consumer goods, that is the watchword and the great molder, in the end, of consciousness, according to the defenders of the other system. We believe that direct material incentives and consciousness are contradictory terms. [No, they are not so contradictory. Material incentives lay the material foundation to the transition towards communism, and by laying the material foundation, they create the comfort and free up the needed time and space for individuals to develop their consciousness.]

This is one of the points at which our disagreement reaches concrete dimensions. It is no longer a matter of variations. To the defenders of financial self-management direct material incentives – projected into the future and accompanying the society in the diverse stages of building communism—do not contradict the "development" of consciousness. For us, they do. That is why we fight against their predominance; they mean a delay in the development of socialist morality.

Che again promoted the left-deviationist notion that providing bonus payment for over-fulfilment is incorrect:

we do not accept that the principle of from each according to his capacity, to each according to his work be interpreted as the complete payment, bonus pay, for the overfulfillment of a given quota.... (On the Budgetary System of Finance, Nuestra Industrial Revista Economica (Havana), Ernesto Che Guevara, February 1964, pp. 3-23. In: 'Che, Selected Works of Ernesto Guevara', The MIT Press, Edited and with an introduction by Rolando E. Bonachea & Nelson P. Valdes, 1969, p. 124) (IMG)

The following quote also contains some obvious flaws but the latter part of the:

What, then, is the correct handling of material incentives? We believe that their existence cannot be forgotten, whether as a collective expression of the masses' strivings or as an individual presence; they are a reflection of the workers' mental habits from the old society. We do not have a clearly defined idea as to how to use material incentives collectively due to insufficiencies in the planning apparatus which prevent us from having absolute faith in the system and from having organized a structure until now that would permit us to steer clear of difficulties. We see the greatest danger in the antagonism created between the state administration and production organizations. This antagonism has been analyzed by the Soviet economist Liberman, who concludes that the methods of collective incentives should be changed, abandoning the old formula of rewards based on the fulfillment of quotas and moving to more advanced ones

Even if we disagree with Lieberman on the matter of how much emphasis should be given to material incentives (as a lever), we believe that his concern with the aberrations that the concept "fulfillment of the quota" has suffered is quite correct. The relations between enterprises and central organizations acquire contradictory forms and the methods used by the enterprises to obtain benefits sometimes have taken on characteristics that have nothing to do with socialist morality.

We believe that in a certain way the possibilities of development offered by the new production relationship for promoting the evolution of man in the direction of "the kingdom of freedom" are being wasted. We gave a detailed account of precisely this in our definition of the essential agreements of the system of interrelationships that exist between education and the development of production. One can embark on creating the new consciousness because there are new production relationships and, although in a general historical sense consciousness is a product of production relationships, the characteristics of the present period must be considered because there is a fundamental contradiction (on a worldwide level) between imperialism and socialism. Socialist ideas have influenced the consciousness of the whole world; that is why consciousness can develop and advance further than the particular stage of productive forces in a given country.

(On the Budgetary System of Finance, Nuestra Industrial Revista Economica (Havana), Ernesto Che Guevara, February 1964, pp. 3-23. In: 'Che, Selected Works of Ernesto Guevara', The MIT Press, Edited and with an introduction by Rolando E. Bonachea & Nelson P. Valdes, 1969, pp. 121-122) (IMG)

It surely is possible that with the spread of communist ideas worldwide, consciousness develops to the stage in which it becomes a more significant historical force than the other historical-material forces and factors, at the specific period of time. However, this would require an in-depth and extensive education of virtually all of the population of the world in the science of socialism. Only then can consciousness become a force potentially capable of overpowering all the other historical-material forces. This was clearly not the case in Che Guevara's time, however. Che Guevara was correct in stating that 'consciousness can develop and advance further than the particular stage of productive forces', but the implication he seemed to be drawing from that statement is incorrect, for it would certainly be an exaggeration to believe that consciousness can develop and advance so further and farther than the productive forces that consciousness would be able to yield a socialist society.

The issue of whether Fidel Castro was a communist or not is controversial. Some argue that he was never really a communist, whereas others argue that he was one as soon as he declared himself one. It is true that Fidel Castro and some of his followers in the Party harbored some erroneous views alien to scientific socialism. It is also true that Fidel Castro in the first years, even when he declared himself a 'communist', was not so well-versed in the science of communism to be a communist. In the 1960s and early 1970s, while having a good anti-imperialist intuition, Castro did not have a strong understanding of scientific socialism. However, by the mid-1970s, Castro gained practical knowledge of how to class-struggle, and used that knowledge in order to advance the influence of the proletariat over the state and that state's influence over the economy, thus advancing communist objectives. In the end, knowledge of the core tactics and strategies of waging proletarian class struggles constitutes the core knowledge of scientific socialism. And Fidel Castro, despite some of the theoretical errors he had, understood the core of scientific socialism by the mid-1970s. Some question whether the Castro faction (since the 1970s) was a communist faction in the PCC; such a view is erroneous. The Castro faction since the 1970s was striving for proletarian control over the state and a proletarian-controlled state's control over the economy and culture. As such, it was struggling for socialism.

The gradual rise of the Brezhnev faction in Eurasia meant that material changes occurred in the partial resurgence of the communist faction. Fidel Castro confirmed that improving Cuba's economic situation:

would not have been possible without the understanding of the Soviets, who accepted reduced amounts of sugar between 1972 and 1974 [i.e. Brezhnev era], without thereby reducing the increasing shipment of raw materials, food, fuel and equipment to Cuba and by increasing, on the other hand, the prices of our export products, thereby improving the terms of trade. (The Report to the First Congress of the Communist Party of Cuba: Historical Analysis of the Revolution, Cuban Communist Party, 1976, pp. 16-17. In: Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodisticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

The CIA-sponsored Maoist left-opportunists will promote the narrative that Cuba was a 'colony' of the 'Soviet social-imperialists' and so the 'social-fascist' 'puppet' Castro was merely promoting 'lies' to help his 'colonial masters'. However, an intelligence memorandum by the CIA's Office of National Estimates (ONE), which is responsible for handling economic data, confirmed:

Cuba also benefits from guaranteed Soviet purchases of sugar at prices usually above the world market level. (CHANGING INFLUENCES ON CUBAN FOREIGN POLICY, CIA, Office of National Estimates (ONE), December 29, 1972, p. 7) (IMG)

Long after the dismantlement of the CMEA and 30 years after the 1991 partition of Eurasia, when the Cubans were not under the 'duress' of the 'Soviet social-imperialists', the official website of the Cuban Communist Party (PCC) acknowledged that the CMEA – to which the Maoist left-opportunists refer as a 'Soviet social-imperialist' economic 'exploitation' body – gave preferential prices, a secure market, and necessary production inputs to Cuba:

In 1972, Cuba joined the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (CMEA), which meant access to the necessary inputs for production processes and at the same time having a secure market for national productions, even with preferential prices. (Politica Socioeconomica, Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodisticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

Even though Cuba faced a drought in the early 1970s, Cuba nonetheless experienced a significant amount of economic growth, at least according to Cuban government source that emerged 30 years after the 1991 partition of Eurasia:

In general, between 1971 and 1975 the Cuban economy experienced an annual growth of 10%. (Politica Socioeconomica, Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodisticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

During the period 1970-1975, thanks to the assistance of the communist faction in Eurasia, as well as the fortunate increase in the world sugar prices, Cuba was able to import much of heavy industry from the Western countries. Cuba could not import much heavy industry from Eurasia since Eurasia was just recovering from years of Titoist economic sabotage inflicted upon heavy industry by the Khrushchev group. Anyways, the CIA reported:

Although Havana remains heavily dependent on Soviet trade and economic assistance, rising world sugar prices between 1970 and 1975 enabled Cuba to sharply step up purchases from the West. Despite a doubling of Cuban-Soviet trade in this same period, the share of imports from the West rose from 31 percent in 1970 to 48 percent in 1975. Havana considers many Western capital goods to be of higher quality than Soviet counterparts and has sought for some time to diversify its import sources. (The Cuban Economy and Trade with the West. In: WEEKLY SUMMARY, CIA, March 18, 1977, p. 14) (IMG)

Then in 1976, drought hit Cuba again, damaging its sugar production:

CUBA: Drought Hampers Sugar Production

Cuba's persistent drought probably will hamper sugar production this year despite improved efficiency by sugar processors. Sugar production this year will total about 6 million tons, roughly equal to last year's level. This stagnation reflects below-normal rainfall for the third consecutive year in the important cane-growing regions in eastern Cuba. Milling yields could improve, however, because of reduced caneburning and a planned increase in mechanical harvesting of the crop from 33 percent of total volume harvested in 1976 to 42 percent next year.

Stagnation of sugar output in 1977, together with prospective low world market sugar prices at least through mid-year, may force Cuba to curtail imports further from non-communist countries, already down by a third this year. Cuban hard-currency earnings in 1977 are unlikely to exceed this year's estimated $800 million, an amount equal to only about two thirds of 1976 imports from non-communist countries. Cuba is reluctant to expand its hard-currency debt substantially beyond the current estimated $1.3 billion because debt service obligations, estimated at $400 million in 1977, are already burdensome. Imports from the USSR and other communist countries will probably be increased slightly again next year. Cuba will not feel a new financial constraint on imports from the communist countries because they will continue to pay 19 to 30 cents a pound for Cuban sugar compared with the likely free market price of 7 to 9 cents.

(‘CUBA: Drought Hampers Sugar Production’. In: NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, December 27, 1976, pp. 6-7) (IMG)

By the way, the CIA document above once again confirmed that the Eurasians were purchasing Cuban sugar at a price two times to four times the world market price. If ‘Soviet social-imperialism’ bore material reality, then certainly the ‘Soviet social-imperialists’ did a poor job of ‘colonially exploiting’ ‘their appendage’ Cuba, contrary to how the global Maoist fascist reaction portrays the matter. The effects of the 1976 drought were perhaps somewhat more severe than the drought in the early 1970s, because they were coupled with drops in the world price of sugar, noted both the PCC and the CIA. The PCC media reported:

In that period, the economic evolution of the country as of 1976 was not without difficulties that led to the reconsideration of the goals agreed upon in the First Congress.

Among the adverse factors were the fall in the price of sugar, the severe droughts that affected the country for three years, the dependence of the national economy on the world capitalist market, and the deterioration of international economic relations, which was felt in the growing interest on foreign debt and on the increase in freight rates in international transport. (...). However, Fidel synthesized in the Central report rendered at the II Congress: “ The current period 76-80, which is about to end, has been one of extraordinary advances in the organization of our economy, in the struggle to create the conditions for a greater efficiency in the use of our productive resources, and also of significant achievements in our economic development and in the purposes of increasingly satisfying the needs of our people, although it has been a period fraught with numerous difficulties of an objective nature, both internal and as external, which have prevented us from reaching everything that we have proposed. ”

(Politica Socioeconomica, Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodisticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

The CIA too reported:

Stagnating Cuban sugar production, declining world sugar prices, and rapidly rising hard-currency debt led to a sharp cutback in Cuban imports from the West last year. Hard-currency earnings fell by approximately half, as the world free market price for sugar plummeted from 14 cents per pound at the beginning of the year to 7 or 8 cents per pound at the end of the year.

At the same time, Havana was forced to restrict additional borrowing because of its mounting hard-currency debt, estimated at $1.3 billion, and the bleak prospects for a significant rebound in world free market sugar prices. An estimated 30 percent of deliveries from the noncommunist world were held up at Cuba's request.

Continued low world sugar prices will limit Havana's hard-currency earnings in 1977 to about $800 million—close to the 1976 level.

(The Cuban Economy and Trade with the West. In: WEEKLY SUMMARY, CIA, March 18, 1977, p. 14) (IMG)

The economic damages inflicted upon Cuba reduced the amounts of funds available to the communist faction in Cuba, making it harder for the communist faction to wage the secret service conflict against the Titoist faction. This gave the Titoist faction greater lobbying power, leading to the pursuit of Titoist economic policies, especially the decentralization and further bureaucratization of the economy through the demagogical policy of 'worker self-management'. In 1976, the policy laid down in Cuba was the System of Direction and Planning of the Economy (SDPE). The SDPE system reaffirmed the policy of decentralizing planning to the local enterprises such that the planning process would become subordinate to the local districts' 'needs':

Planning is a unique system in which the three objective economic levels must be integrated: global of the entire national economy, branch and companies, coordinated with their territorial planning. The determining and decisive interest is that of the national economy as a whole. Therefore, the plans of the companies will be subordinate to the objectives of the development of the given territory, in aspects such as finances, standard of living, labor resources, local natural resources and others. (First Congress of the PCC: Thesis and Resolutions: On the System of Direction and Planning of the Economy, Cuban Communist Party, 1976, p. 5. In: Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodisticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

Part D of the new SDPE document approved of and advanced by the congress of the PCC called for the worker self-management principle – a populist means of decentralizing the economy and proliferating bureaucracy – to be incorporated into the planning process:

d) Combine the necessary centralization of the main decisions with the maximum possible participation of the workers, the administration of the companies and the intermediate levels of management in economic planning and management. In relation to this, it is necessary to grant the corresponding autonomy to companies in economic-operational decisions. (First Congress of the PCC: Thesis and Resolutions: On the System of Direction and Planning of the Economy, Cuban Communist Party, 1976, p. 2. In: Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodisticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

Again, remember that worker self-management makes the production slower by so-called 'democratizing' the individual enterprises. Along with such a demagogical anarchistic measure, came the decentralization of the economic decision-making to such enterprises. The decentralization sowed further chaos in the economy, making it harder for enterprises to coordinate. Out of such chaos grew the bureaucratic mess, that strengthened the corrupt bureaucrats at the expense of the proletariat in the secret service battle for control over the state. Furthermore, the centralization of the economy allows the communist counter-intelligence service to have to surveil only a few economic bodies, whereas the decentralization of the economy forces the counter-intelligence authorities to have to surveil many economic bodies, thus making it harder to hunt down the corrupt bureaucrats. Pay attention to the following data provided in 1976 congress of the PCC, which shows the percent membership composition in the Party:

Workers in Industrial Production, Agriculture, Construction, and Services: 35.9%

Professional and Technical Workers: 9.2%

Workers in the Tasks of Political and Administrative Direction: 42.1%

Administrative Workers: 4.1%

Small Farmers: 1.8%

Others: 6.9%

(First Congress of the PCC: Theses and Resolutions on the Internal Life of the Party, PCC, 1976, p. 4. p. 50. In: Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodisticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

As can be seen, the 'Workers in Industrial Production, Agriculture, Construction, and Services' and the 'Small Farmers' together comprised $35.9\% + 1.8\% = 37.7\%$ of the membership composition of the Party. On the other hand, adding the percent composition of the white-collar elements in the Party, represented by the 'Professional and Technical Workers', the 'Workers in the Tasks of Political and Administrative Direction', and the 'Administrative Workers', we get $9.2\% + 42.1\% + 4.1\% = 55.4\%$. As can be seen, the white-collar elements in the Party formed a majority at the time of the 1976 congress, which is what generated the Party line in favor of the revisionist pro-bureaucrat policy of economic decentralization.

After the 1976-1977 hit taken by the communist faction, however, there came some improvements in the conditions faced by Cuba, which once again strengthened the agents of the proletariat while undermining the agents of the bureaucrats. Fortunately, the revisionist economic policy of 'worker self-management' was implemented only partially:

The participation of the workers in the elaboration of the plans of the companies has not been possible to carry out at the desired level. At times, there has been a lack of programming the necessary time for their effective inclusion in this process. On other occasions, the meetings to discuss the Control Figures of the Plan have not been properly organized. In addition, there are cases of lack of attention from company administrations and central and local State agencies, in terms of fulfilling the task of fully informing the groups of workers.

In this way, it has been manifested, in many companies, the fact of not explaining to the workers, later, when the Directive Figures have been issued, the reasons that have led to not accepting their proposals for reasons that vary but that have, generally, fundamentals referring to supply difficulties or of a technical nature.

The participation of the workers in the elaboration of the plans is a basic element of the policy of the Communist Party and of the socialist State that favors the initiative of the masses and of the cadres and that constitutes a fundamental aspect of socialist democracy to which shall be given utmost attention.

(Second Congress of the PCC: Resolutions: On the System of the Direction and Planning of the Economy, Cuban Communist Party, 1980, pp. 2-3. In: Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodisticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

This was correlated with the fact that the communist faction in Cuba's Party was able to actually carry through with its agenda of increasing the working class representation in the percent membership composition of the Party. Hence, by the year 1980, the 'Production Workers' and the 'Service Workers' together reportedly formed 47.3% of the percent membership composition of the PCC (source: Vanguard Party Politics in Cuba, Marifeli Perez-Stable. In: 'Conflict and Change in Cuba', edited by Enrique A. Baloyra & James A. Morris, p. 75. Citing: Cuban government data.) (IMG). At the same time, the white collar elements formed $15.0 + 23.6 + 4.3 + 4.3 = 47.2\%$ of the Party membership ((source: Vanguard Party Politics in Cuba) (IMG). One could call this a neck-and-neck race between the white collar and blue collar elements. The election of Reagan in 1980, and the gradual replacement of the agents of the Carter faction with the agents of the G. H. W. Bush faction, further strengthened the CIA and the US military, allowing for a more aggressive projection of American imperialist influence in Latin America. Although by 1980, the pace of Titoization had been slowed down and the blue-collar elements had seen an increase in their membership percentage in the Party, the December 1980 congress saw a partial resurgence of Titoism. The second congress of the PCC in 1980 reaffirmed:

The participation of the workers in the elaboration of the plans is a basic element of the policy of the Communist Party and of the socialist state that favors the initiative of the masses and the cadres and that constitutes a fundamental aspect of socialist democracy to which there will be to be given the utmost attention. (Second Congress of the PCC: Resolutions: On the System of the Direction and Planning of the Economy, Cuban Communist Party, 1980, pp. 2-3. In: Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodisticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

The conditions became even worse in the mid-1980s, for there came an even greater increase in Titoist influence projected from Eurasia. During the era of the Anglo-American spy Gorbachev (see C24S4), the pressures on Cuba to decentralize was much stronger, because this was part of the strategy to sabotage Cuba's economy through greater bureaucratization. Thus, the PCC programs of the 1980s too decentralized the economy further and further:

In this sense, the Party and Government Measures Programs stand out as instruments of direction to ensure the economic and social objectives of the years 1983 and 1984, approved in the XI and VIII Plenary sessions of the Central Committee of the PCC in the years 1982 and 1983, respectively.

These Programs decentralized economic, social and political tasks as a way of ensuring the integral development of the country in the corresponding year and constituted a more efficient working instrument to centrally control those activities that were decisive to achieve prioritized objectives.

(Politica Socioeconomica, Congresos del PCC, Compendio Informativo Para Coberturas Periodisticas, Center for Information for the Press, Government of Cuba, congresopcc.cip.cu, Territorial y General Suarez, Plaza de la Revolucion, la Habana, 2021) (IMG)

Since the 1980s until the late 2010s at least, Cuba's economy had been decentralizing further and further, thus generating more and more economic inefficiencies and bureaucracy. The decentralization increased further afterwards, especially in the 1990s. Back in the Gorbachev years, CIA-sponsored media was actively spreading the news of the Castro faction's deep conflicts with the Gorbachev faction in Eurasia, so to give the Gorbachev faction the excuse to condemn the Cubans as 'disrespectful' to 'fraternal USSR' hence 'deserving' to be de-funded by the Eurasians. Once aid to Cuba would reduce, the Fidel Castro faction would be weakened and Gorbachev's agents in Cuba would gain greater leverage in the factional conflict, thus being able to rollback the proletarian influence over the Cuban state apparatus and open up that country to Anglo-American colonization. To foil such a conspiracy, Fidel Castro publicly endorsed Gorbachev and denied the correct accusations that he opposed Gorbachev. This was a correct move, and can be compared to the fact that a few days before Operation Barbarossa, the Soviet media deliberately denied that a war with Germany was soon to come.

With the Titoist faction in the CPSU – itself generated from the majority white collar membership – fully in charge by 1985, the pressures in favor of the bureaucrats and white collar elements in the PCC increased as well; hence, in 1985, the 'Production Workers' and the 'Service Workers' together comprised 43.2% of the percent membership composition of the PCC, whereas the white collar elements increased to 47.4% of the Party membership (source: Vanguard Party Politics in Cuba, Marifeli Perez-Stable. In: 'Conflict and Change in Cuba', edited by Enrique A. Baloyra & James A. Morris, p. 75. Citing: Cuban government data.) (IMG). The proletariat comprised a large minority in the PCC, but were not able to dominate the PCC. On the other hand, the white collar elements maintained a slight majority during that period. While Cuba's revolutionaries did make mistakes, for the most part, the problems concerning the role of the working class in the PCC as well as the decentralization measures are the result of the Anglo-American intelligence stabs in the front and the Titoist stabs in the back. At least for the period studied, it would not be fair to say that Cuba reached the phase of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat', and instead remained a progressive bourgeois-democracy that was led by the proletariat. In that respect, therefore, Cuba fulfilled the first stage of the development of People's Democracy but not the second stage. Left-deviationist currents misinterpret this phenomenon as to imply that one should launch another 'revolution from below', an armed rebellion to destroy the Cuban government in order to establish a socialist state – this view is incorrect. In Cuba, the proletariat already control a large segment of the state apparatus and it would be counterproductive and pro-imperialist to launch an armed rebellion to demolish the whole Cuban government. Rather, the correct step is for the Cuban proletariat to merely expand their influence over the state apparatus by gaining greater influence over the means of violence – the armed forces and the security and intelligence bodies – and then purging the corrupt bureaucrats in the Party and increasing the quantity of the communist blue-collar elements in the Party, as the key steps for the transition to the second stage of People's Democracy, namely the dictatorship of the proletariat. In the years examined, the Cuban proletariat, in the face of intense Titoist backstabbing and Anglo-American front-stabbing, could not establish a dictatorship of the proletariat. However, because of the assistance they received from the freedom forces worldwide, and obviously due to their own efforts as well, they were able to hold out and to entrench themselves as a large minority in the Cuban state, thus making Cuba a progressive bourgeois-democracy led by but not dictated by the proletarian class, much like many of the Peoples' Democracies in their first stage. With the decline of imperialism, Titoism will decline as well and the proletarian elements in the state can increase their quantity to cause a qualitative leap, thereby making Cuba a well-entrenched dictatorship of the proletariat.

There is and has been plenty of mismanagement and bureaucracy in Cuba going back to the 1960s. The reason why the Cuban system deserves admiration is that it advanced more than all the other Latin American countries in combatting such bureaucracy by elevating the class enemies of the bureaucrats – the proletariat – over the state. In many of the other Latin American countries, under the banner of liberalization, the black-marketeers and bureaucratic oligarchic thieves were legalized and placed in charge of government; and since they were legalized and given state legitimacy, they were no longer defined as bureaucrats, mis-managers, and black-marketeers. Cuba has advanced more than most others because it has cracked down on so many parasitic class forces and has elevated the proletariat as replacement; that is what the progressives should have presented as the admirable feature about Cuba. More correct than the narrative that the US sanctions have made Cuba poor, is the narrative that the sanctions imposed by US finance capital have given increased factional leverage to the corrupt bureaucrats in Cuba thus causing internal economic mismanagement and sabotage. Unfortunately, many progressives have been somewhat dishonest about Cuba, by sweeping the fact of the bureaucratic class there under the rug. The problem with such a dishonest narrative is that it presents Cuban society as almost monolithically proletarian and socialist, does not recognize that class struggles between the bureaucrats and the proletariat exist, and thus presents anything that goes wrong in Cuba as purely 'externally'-made. It does not mention the alliance of US finance capital (an 'external factor') with the corrupt bureaucrats (the 'internal factor') in Cuba, and does not mention the Cuban proletariat's struggle against the Cuban bureaucrats who generate the fifth column serving US intelligence and cause deformities in the Cuban system. Hence, the reason why Cuba deserves admiration is not that therein thrives a rosy economy, which actually exists only in the exaggerative descriptions of the romantics, but rather the admirable thing about Cuba is that it has remained as a state far more under the influence of the proletarian class than most of the other states since the 1989-1991 collapses. And such a continued high influence of the proletariat over the Cuban state has allowed that country to retain the vital economic standards and has prevented that country from descending into the reign of economic terror by which most of Latin America was struck.

C22S7. People's Democratic Development in Albania / Titoization and Anti-Titoist Resistance in Albania  IMG-All-{Albania}

Even as late as 1955;

Yugoslav clandestine activities against Albania have continued, at any rate until recently. Cedo Mijovic, Kapllan, ... and Vlado Popovic, who is a major in the UDB, are among the chief recruiters of Albanian agents who are sent into Albania. General Dushan Mugosha (member of the Communist Party of Serbia, Deputy in the Federal Parliament, and a director of all immigrants) does not appear as one of the recruiters, although he directs these activities. He certainly wants to overthrow the present Tirana regime and substitute one under Yugoslav influence. But Mugosha has said that they must wait for the opportune moment. ('1. Yugoslav-Albanian Relations 2. Yugoslav Attitude vis-à-vis the Soviet Union 3. League of Albanian Refugees (Prizren Committee)', CIA, January 3, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

Hence,:

The Yugoslav Government geeks, in a quiet way, a closer relationship with the National Committee for a Free Albania - NCFa, and with the Albanian emigrants in the West, in an effort to gain greater influence in this refugee community. ('1. Yugoslav-Albanian Relations 2. Yugoslav Attitude vis-à-vis the Soviet Union 3. League of Albanian Refugees (Prizren Committee)', CIA, January 3, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

Yet, Albania was bullied by the Kremlin Titoists to re-establish diplomatic relations with the Yugoslav regime and to allow a Yugoslav fascist spy ('Yugoslav ambassador') into Albania. Nonetheless, the Albanians refused to give much fanfare to the Yugoslav regime:

No fanfare accompanied the renewal of diplomatic relations with Yugoslavia, and the arrival of the Yugoslav ambassador in Tirana was barely mentioned in the press. ('1. ALBANIAN REACTION TO GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION 2. NEW ECONOMIC POLICY 3. RAPPROCHEMENT WITH YUGOSLAVIA', CIA, March 13, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

A document by the CIA Office of Current Intelligence (OCI) stated:

Preoccupied with the maintenance of domestic order, both public and party, plagued with the most primitive economy in all of Europe, and ... suspicious of Yugoslavia, the Albanian leaders have been unhappy with the trend of soviet policies since the death of Stalin. Inter alia, only lip service – and not much of that – was paid to the post-1954 Soviet bloc campaign to improve relations with Yugoslavia. (ALBANIAN RELATIONS WITH THE USSR AND COMMUNIST CHINA, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 30, 1961, p. 1) (IMG)

The Kremlin Titoists assassins who rose to power after murdering Stalin, stabbed People's Democratic Albania in the back by discouraging Albanian investment into heavy industry, so to keep it an agrarian country with a weak military-industrial backbone, so that it could be easily colonized by the Yugoslav regime. This fact has been confirmed by Enver Hoxha and the Albanian media several times (see for example 'The Khrushchevites'). However, it has also been confirmed by CIA-Mossad agents. For example, the Soros agent Miranda Vickers wrote:

During the war, Italian mineral exploration had revealed the extent of Albania's raw material base, yet both Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union wanted the Albanians to concentrate on developing agriculture rather than their considerable mineral resources. (The Albanians: A Modern History, Miranda Vickers, 2011) (IMG)

The emphasis was to no longer be on heavy industry but rather on agriculture:

In 1954, Enver Hoxha, First Secretary of the Albanian Party Central Committee, announced that the USSR had granted Albania considerable credit and other economic privileges for the further development of the country's economy. It was implied that the economic aid was of an agricultural nature. ('SOVIET ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE TO THE SINO-SOVIET BLOC: LOANS, CREDITS, AND GRANTS', Intelligence Memorandum, CIA, August 20, 1956, p. 14) (IMG{Bulgaria})

Thus:

The government's new economic policy to increase production of consumer goods, introduced in the summer of 1953, has been disappointing. ('1. ALBANIAN REACTION TO GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION 2. NEW ECONOMIC POLICY 3. RAPPROCHEMENT WITH YUGOSLAVIA', CIA, March 13, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

The defunding of Albanian heavy industry 'thanks' to the pressures of Moscow Titoists no doubt resulted in only partial success in the Five Year Plan:

During the 1950s Albania embarked on an ambitious programme of electrification and industrialization. Despite protests from Moscow, greater attention was paid to the exploitation of Albania's rich mineral wealth, which included chrome, oil, nickel, coal and copper. The first five-year plan, 1950-5, which was aimed primarily at relieving acute shortages and strengthening the overall economy, proved to be far too ambitious.... It did, however, manage to produce the Vlore cement works, a sugar-cane factory, the tobacco fermentation plant at Shkoder, and the Tirana textile combine, plus a few tractors and threshing machines. (The Albanians: A Modern History, Miranda Vickers, 2011) (IMG)

Meanwhile, the Yugoslav regime continued its hostile and subversive activities against People's Democratic Albania, even after the exchange of embassies:

All Albanian political emigrants in Yugoslavia believed they were going to be sent back to Albania after the exchange of embassies. Mugosha issued a declaration that they would never do this, regardless of relations with Albania, and drew attention to Tito's declarations on the subject of normalization. ('1. Yugoslav-Albanian Relations 2. Yugoslav Attitude vis-à-vis the Soviet Union 3. League of Albanian Refugees (Prizren Committee)', CIA, January 3, 1955, p. 2) (IMG{Titoist Yugoslavia})

As always, there was a correlation between the wave of Titoization that struck the Party of Labour of Albania between 1953 to 1956 and the increase in the Party recruitment of the white-collar elements. In the 3rd Congress of the Party of Labour of Albania, Enver Hoxha remarked:

As Marxism-Leninism and the experience of our Party teach us, the strength of the Party and the steel unity of its ranks rests, first of all, on the social composition of the Party, on the quality and purity of its ranks. It is for this reason that the strengthening of the composition of our Party has been and remains one of the primary problems.

During the period since the 2nd Congress, the party organizations have carried out more careful work to bring into the ranks of the Party the best people, those most loyal and determined, in the first place, from the working class, from the ranks of the working peasantry, and the people's intelligentsia. As a result of this work, some successes have been achieved in the improvement of the composition of the Party. At the 2nd Congress only 11.5 per cent of the members were of worker status, whereas today workers comprise 17.7 per cent of the membership of the Party, that is, there is an increase of 6.2 per cent. In the admissions to the Party during this period workers make up 23.55 per cent, members of the agricultural cooperatives 6.18 per cent, members of the artisan cooperatives 2.61 per cent, poor and middle peasants 37.5 per cent, while office workers, students, and so on, make up 30.15 per cent.

From the above figures it results that, despite some advance in comparison with the past, in the work for the improvement of the composition of the Party, especially as regards the more rapid increase of its ranks with workers, we have not done very well. In the admissions to the Party, not only do workers not occupy the first place but, in comparison with those admitted from the other strata, in particular from among the office workers, the percentage of workers is still quite unsatisfactory.

All the conditions have been created in our country for the constant strengthening of the composition of the Party, because our industry has been set up and is growing. Increasing the ranks of the Party with elements from the working class is a vital question for the Party. However, it is noticed that some party committees and organizations do not properly tackle the problem of training elements from the working class for admission to the Party, but frequently submit to the requests of office workers, carried away by the phrases, in the ready presentation of which such people are well skilled. The party organizations should thoroughly understand that the time has come when they must achieve a more marked increase in the percentage of workers in the total membership of the Party, and educate these elements from the working class through active work. Naturally, this does not mean that from now on we should fling the doors of the Party wide open to all the workers who may wish to join the Party.

(REPORT AT THE 3rd CONGRESS OF THE PLA, Central Committee of the Party of Labour of Albania, Enver Hoxha, May 25, 1956. In: Enver Hoxha Selected Works, Vol. 2, The "8 Nëntori" Publishing House, Tirana, 1975, p. 555-557. MIA)

Hoxha credibly claimed that some within the Party were liberally recruiting white collar elements while not sufficiently elevating the blue-collar elements in political education so to join Party membership. Since the previous Congress of the Party was in 1952, it is likely that Moscow Titoist pressures and influence in the Party resulted in such a shift. This factor definitely also must have reinforced the pro-Titoization tendency in the 3rd Congress.

At the time, since the reactionary character of the Khrushchev group had not yet become well-known amongst communists, an open revolt against the Khrushchev group would not have been feasible, and such an open revolt would have been exploited by the Titoists to crush the then-isolated communist resistance against Titoization. With the advent of the 20th CPSU Congress and Khrushchev's infamous Titoization speech, Enver Hoxha, like pretty much every other communist leader in the bloc, paid lip service to Khrushchev's Titoist theses in order to survive politically against Khrushchev's Titoization agenda, buy time, so that later on, when the true face of the Moscow Titoists had been revealed enough, the fomenting of a strong action against Khrushchev's group could be undertaken. The excerpt of Hoxha's speech is provided by the Communist League of UK, which was the well-known Hoxhaist organization founded by the famous 'Hoxhaist before Hoxha' William Bland, one of the most well known authors in support of the Party of Labour of Albania. Here is the excerpt of Hoxha's speech cited by the Communist League (UK):

The 20th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union has made a profound Marxist-Leninist analysis of the decisive role played in the building of socialism and communism by the masses of the people, and the great damage caused by the cult of personality, alien to Marxism-Leninism.

These incorrect and non-Marxist conceptions on the individual were developed and cultivated over a long period in regard to Comrade Stalin.

The great error of J. V. Stalin lies in the fact that not only did he accept the praises and flatteries addressed to him, but he himself supported and encouraged these anti-Marxist viewpoints.

The cult of personality and the leadership practice of J. V. Stalin were marked by the open violation of Leninist principles of the collective leadership of the Party, were marked by violations of the Leninist norms of the Party. The contempt of J. V. Stalin for the norms of Party life and for the principle of collective leadership of the Party, the solution of problems in an individual manner on his part, the contempt for Party opinion, taking even severe measures against those who expressed a contrary opinion to his own could not fail to cause, and did cause, great harm, producing grave deviations from Leninist rules of the life of the Party and the violation of revolutionary legality. He did not show the necessary vigilance on the eve of the Patriotic War against Nazi Germany; he did not devote the necessary attention to the further development of socialist agriculture and to the material well-being of the collective farms; he supported and incited an erroneous line in the Yugoslav affairs.

(Enver Hoxha: 'Rapport d'activite du comité central du Parti du Travail d'Albanie au Ille Congres du Parti' (Report on the Activity of the Central Committee of the Party of Labour of Albania to the 3rd Congress of the Party) (May 1956); Tirana; 1956; p. 180, 181, 182-83. In: 'DIMITROV: REPLY TO READER', Communist League (UK)) (IMG)

This fact – Hoxha's lip service to Khrushchev's Titoist theses – was later covered up and omitted by Hoxha probably so that he could present his resistance against Khrushchev as completely firm and devoid of the slightest 'vacillation'. Hoxha's temporary lip service in favor of the Titoist theses of the 20th CPSU congress was a strategically necessary means of pretending to fit in the Eastern Bloc, because back then, an open revolt against Khrushchev would have served the Titoists by helping them isolate the Albanian communists. Khrushchev was to be overtly confronted at a later more opportune time, when Khrushchev and the degenerate nature of the Titoist theses of the 20th Congress were sufficiently exposed among the communists of the Eastern Bloc. This correct strategy which the Party of Labour of Albania pursued was also the correct strategy pursued by the Romanian communists headed by Gheorghiu-Dej and the French communists headed by Maurice Thorez. Both of the latter leaders tried to do what Hoxha did.

Even as late as the 1980s, Hoxha – while acknowledging that Dej and Thorez were opposed to the Yugoslav regime and hostile to Nikita Khrushchev's lines – also made the error of denouncing Dej and Thorez for their temporary lip service to Khrushchev's counter-revolutionary theses; in other words, Hoxha criticized Dej and Thorez for doing precisely what Hoxha himself had done. All the while, having largely omitted the fact of Hoxha's own temporary lip service to Khrushchev's Titoist theses, Hoxha presented himself as inflexibly opposed to the Kremlin Titoists. While the fact of omitting Hoxha's own lip service to the Titoist theses is understandable and was perhaps needed for keeping the 'moral high ground' against the left-opportunists, the fact that Hoxha criticized Dej and Thorez for pursuing the same strategy that Hoxha himself pursued was a historiographic error from Hoxha. The opportunity for confronting the Kremlin Titoists did emerge for Albania by the 1960s. The CIA Office of Current Intelligence stated:

An opportunity for registering Albania's strong discontent arose in the spring of 1960, when Peiping brought its growing dispute with Moscow into the open. Here for the first time was a potential center of support for a militant dissent from Soviet strategy. At both the Soviet-convened Communist conferences at Bucharest, in June and at Moscow in November, the Albanian leaders, Hoxha and Shehu, unequivocally, and seemingly irrevocably, cast their lot with Peiping. (ALBANIAN RELATIONS WITH THE USSR AND COMMUNIST CHINA, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 30, 1961, p. 1) (IMG)

Albania's alliance with the People's Republic of China must not be understood as genuine friendship with that regime. Enver Hoxha basically regarded Chinese government's 'opposition' to Khrushchev and the Kremlin Titoists as semi-fake. Here is an excerpt of a document written by him in 1962:

THE CHINESE ARE GIVING KHRUSHCHEV A HAND (APRIL 6, 1962)

The Chinese ambassador came to transmit to me a message from the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China to the Central Committee of the Party of Labour of Albania which, in substance, says: The Central Committee of the Communist Party of China is of the opinion that a meeting should be held with the Soviets on the basis of the proposals of the parties of Indonesia, Vietnam and New Zealand, in order to iron out differences and strengthen the unity of the socialist camp. We must take the initiative, say the Chinese comrades, and uphold the banner of unity. They add that the conditions we have laid down for this meeting are understandable to the Chinese, but will not be accepted by the other parties, therefore, for its part, the Communist Party of China lays down no preconditions. It proposes that we exchange party delegations to discuss the issue.

We shall reply to them. We accept the exchange of delegations with the Communist Party of China, but we will not alter our stand in the least in regard to the proposed meeting with the Soviet revisionists.

This is a wrong course the Chinese comrades are trying to lead us on to, it is an opportunist road of vacillations and concessions to the Khrushchev traitor group which finds itself in grave difficulties, and is intriguing in order to escape defeat. The Chinese comrades are giving it a hand to pull it out of the mire, giving it the possibility to strengthen its positions and go on the attack again.

(Reflections on China, Enver Hoxha. Bold added)

Negotiations with enemies are useful, but require preconditions. According to Hoxha, the Chinese government was willing to iron out differences without preconditions. While Hoxha regarded China as an ally, he did not see them as being truly on his side. Nonetheless, for the while, the Chinese regime leaders held a line useful to the Party of Labour of Albania, hence the overt-level alliance of the two parties. However, none of that is to mean that at any point in time did the Albanians regard the Chinese regime leaders as true comrades. Enver Hoxha further stated:

Many a time later I have turned back to this period of the history of the Communist Party of China, trying to figure out how and why the profoundly revisionist line of 1956 [adopted by the Chinese] subsequently seemed to change direction, and for a time, became "pure", "anti-revisionist" and "Marxist-Leninist". It is a fact, for example, that in 1960 the Communist Party of China seemed to be strongly opposing the revisionist theses of Nikita Khrushchev and confirmed that "it was defending Marxism-Leninism" from the distortions which were being made to it, etc. It was precisely because China came out against modern revisionism in 1960 and seemed to be adhering to Marxist-Leninist positions that brought about that our Party stood shoulder to shoulder with it in the struggle which we had begun against the Khrushchevites.

However, time confirmed, and this is reflected extensively in the documents of our Party, that in no instance, either in 1956 or in the '60s did the Communist Party of China proceed or act from the positions of Marxism-Leninism.

In 1956 it rushed to take up the banner of revisionism, in order to elbow Khrushchev out and gain the role of the leader in the communist and workers' movement for itself. But when Mao Zedong and his associates saw that they would not easily emerge triumphant over the patriarch of modern revisionism, Khrushchev, through the revisionist contest, they changed their tactic, pretended to reject their former flag, presented themselves as "pure Marxist-Leninists", striving in this way, to win those positions which they had been unable to win with their former tactic. When this second tactic turned out no good, either, they "discarded" their second, allegedly Marxist-Leninist, flag and came out in the arena as they had always been, opportunists, loyal champions of a line of conciliation and capitulation towards capital and reaction. We were to see all these things confirmed in practice, through a long, difficult and glorious struggle which our Party waged in defence of Marxism-Leninism.

(The Khrushchevites, Hoxha)

People's Democratic Albania 'allied' with the left-deviationist government of China as means of countering the right-deviation of the Kremlin Titoists headed by Khrushchev, much as how the Stalin faction in the CPSU 'allied' with the remnants of the Trotskyite left-deviationists in order to keep the Bukharinite right-deviation in check. And much as how the Bukharinites and Trotskyites were overtly hostile to each other but covertly allied to launch a pincer attack on the USSR on behalf of imperialists, the Maoist left-deviationist regime of China and the Khrushchevian right-deviationist administration in Eurasia were overtly hostile but covertly allied. Both the Chinese Maoists and the Khrushchevian Eurasians were allied to the Yugoslav regime and supported international Titoism (more on this later). People's Democratic Albania could never possibly be a true friend of the Chinese regime because China's regime was a Yugoslav satellite of the left-deviationist type, even though for a while, China 'criticized' Tito and his regime, but also semi-officially praised it several times. Nonetheless, Albania rightly 'allied' with left-deviationist Titoist China to keep the right-deviationist Titoist administration in Eurasia in check, much as how the communist faction led by Stalin 'allied' with remnants of Trotskyites so to weaken Bukharin's right-wing faction and so to move away from NEP. It was not impossible to utilize the fake 'contradictions' between the Chinese Maoists and the Khrushchevians in order to obtain concessions. The Syrian Arab Republic during the Al-Assad years was able to, through a special process, compel the Iranian regime led by the Shah to provide loans to Syria, while Syria was working to further undermine the regime of the Shah under the guise of fighting against the 'enemies' of Iran's regime. Anyways, the new situation allowed Albania to get the Chinese to sponsor Albania, thus allowing Albania to industrialize and allowing the Albanian communists to stand up against the Moscow Titoists:

The Chinese Communists, on the other hand, have in many ways indicated their support of the "heretical" Albanian stand. They, for example, replaced Moscow as Albania's principal supplier of grain, providing about 180,000 tons since last September for credit (as against 70,000 tons from the USSR, at least a part of which required cash) – this despite famine conditions in China. And in late April, they announced a new, long-term Sino-Albanian aid agreement granting 125,000,000 in credits for Albania's Five Year Plan (1961-1965). These actions substantially reduce the ability of Moscow to apply economic pressure against Tirana. (ALBANIAN RELATIONS WITH THE USSR AND COMMUNIST CHINA, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 30, 1961, p. 3) (IMG)

On the other hand, the Kremlin Titoists – in an operation headed by the Anglo-Yugoslav agent Yuri Andropov (see C20S13) – launched a Putsch against the Party of Labour of Albania and above all targeted Hoxha himself:

Their latest move against Moscow, however, came this month with the holding of a public trial of ten "traitors and spies" who were charged with seeking – as agents of Greece, Yugoslavia, and the United States – to overthrow the Albanian regime. Testimony during the trial, was in fact, directed against Soviet policies particularly those toward Yugoslavia. The coup itself, far from being hatched in the Free World, represented – according to all of our evidence – an attempt by the USSR last summer to purge the party of anti-Soviet and pro-Chinese elements.

Since that abortive coup, Moscow has attacked Tirana through economic pressures, innuendo in public speeches, and direct criticism of the Albanian party by ... Italian Communist Party chief Togliatti.

(ALBANIAN RELATIONS WITH THE USSR AND COMMUNIST CHINA, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 30, 1961, pp. 1-2) (IMG)

It is important to note that the putsch launched against the Hoxha faction was not a case of Eurasia seeking to establish its own 'imperial' domination over Albania. Rather, the goal was to turn Albania into a Titoist state to be devoured by the Balkan Empire, so that the Anglo-Americans would control that territory. In other words, the coup was a plot aimed at pushing Albania out of the Eastern Bloc instead of having it be 'controlled' by Eurasia.

Since the 1960s, plans were established for developing a network of bunkers to defend Albania against foreign aggression by the Greeks in the south, the Yugoslavs in the north, and the Italians in the west. Tito's fascist group established a settler-colonial fascist apartheid regime in Kosovo. In their desire to extend the boundaries of their Titoist settler-colonial empire, Belgrade's ruling fascist junta hatched plots for the swallow-up of Albania. In such circumstances, setting up special defensive networks of bunkers throughout Albania was a necessary means of resisting a potential Yugoslav regime aggression.

As with the rest of the Peoples' Democracies, Albania faced heavy economic pressures, which weakened the communist faction in that country and allowed the counter-revolutionary faction to grow. This led to the implementation of the revisionist 'worker self-management' line which was later famously criticized by Hoxha himself. Michael Kaser, who provided economic advice on Eastern Europe to several of the Western governments and NATO bodies, wrote:

However, by 1965 it had become clear that the Albanian leadership was not satisfied with the outcomes generated by the economic system.

The Third Five-Year Plan target for global industrial production was 97 percent fulfilled. Taking into account the economic difficulties caused by the Soviet Union's economic blockade, it would seem that the industrial sector of the Albanian economy had performed well over the period 1961-65. However, it should be recalled that following the split with the Soviet Union in 1961 there was a drastic downward revision of plan targets and, as the discussion in Section III shows other sectors fared less well than industry. Thus, under admittedly difficult environmental circumstances, the classical Soviet model of economic administration was not producing economic growth rates to satisfy leadership. More seriously, it has been suggested that economic failures were "a major factor in triggering off the unrest that began to spread through Albania during 1965 and 1966". In other words, Enver Hoxha's position as leader of the PLA was in jeopardy and this, probably more than any other factor indicated the [tendency toward] change.

(...). In October 1965 the PLA took a further step, apparently attempting to [respond to] the level of popular unrest, when its Central Committee, in conjunction with the Council of Ministers issued a call to the masses to participate in drawing up the Fourth Five-Year Plan. In the document, it was explained that Albania was surrounded by imperialist and revisionist enemies, and was being subjected to an economic blockade and that, therefore, would have to build socialism relying on its own resources. (...). It was argued that investments and construction projects should be more profitable, timely and essential". Workers were exhorted to approve plans which minimized expense and waste and party members were reminded that their duty was to further the "ideo-political" education of the workers. The only specific change in planning introduced in the Appeal was that henceforth workers in enterprises would discuss broad plan targets, which the enterprises would use in drafting a detailed project plan rather than be sent a detailed plan from the state hierarchy.

(ALBANIA – A UNIQUELY SOCIALIST ECONOMY, Michael Kaser and Adi Schnytzer, East European Economies Post-Helsinki: A Compendium of Papers Submitted to the Joint Economic Committee of the Congress of the United States, pp. 586-588) (IMG)

William Ash, at the time a Maoist sympathizer with People's Democratic Albania, was one of the people who travelled to that country to study it and provide information for other sympathizers with Albania. William Ash too wrote:

Industrial enterprises in Albania are the property of the people and are run by the class enjoying state power, the workers themselves who, indeed, through their representatives in the Government manage the country's entire economy. But is this merely an ideal or do the workers actually exercise control in the places where they are employed?

The managers of enterprises are appointed by the appropriate ministry and are responsible to it for the organisation of production. In this task they are assisted by the Party branch, the trade union and the various workers' collectives in that particular concern. Manager, Party and trade union run the enterprise in compliance with the directives of the current plan on the basis of democratic centralism, combining centralised leadership with the maximum creative participation of workers engaged directly in production.

(Pickaxe and Rifle: The Story of the Albanian People, William Ash, 1974, pp. 165-166) (IMG)

Another serious problem with the economic policy of People's Democratic Albania was the petit-bourgeois left-deviationist wage equalization program. In this regard, William Ash wrote:

Correct relations between workers on the factory floor and those in leadership positions are maintained by a system of payments in which there is no pronounced disparity. The ratio between low, average and high pay is among the lowest if not the lowest in the world, brought about by consistently lowering the salaries of all high ranking officials including state and Party leaders while improving the rates of pay of those in the medium or lower brackets. Since 1966 when Enver Hoxha at the Fifth Party Congress called for special efforts in implementing socialist principles, higher salaries have been cut twice and there has been a steady rise in lower rates of pay and pensions. (Pickaxe and Rifle: The Story of the Albanian People, William Ash, 1974, pp. 167-168) (IMG)

Providing further details on the wage equalization which Ash himself supported, Ash wrote:

In the huge Mao Tsetung textile combine at Berat the manager receives 1100 leks a month and the lowest paid workers start at 550. Skilled technicians receive about 750. At the caustic soda factory in Vlora the chief engineer gets 900 leks, the director 1000, those doing light work from 500 to 550 and average workers between 700 and 750. The manager of the copper wire factory in Shkodra gets only 880 leks per month because it is fully-automated and comparatively easy to run, while the workers, 60% of whom are women and young girls, make about 600 leks. All women, who have been drawn into industry in ever increasing numbers, have always received equal pay for equal work. At the tractor spare parts factory in Tirana workers get on the average 600 leks a month, the chief engineer 900 and model workers may make as much as 1000. Workers, invariably men, engaged in particularly hard or hazardous work like mining, heavy loading and unloading, dyeing where lead paints are used, diving or glass smelting, receive more pay, often exceeding the salaries of directors; but there is a continuous movement by the use of new techniques and equipment toward eliminating the heavier and more hazardous jobs.

To compare these payments in industry with those to writers and intellectuals: teachers, depending on qualifications, start at about 550 leks per month, rising at the end of five years to 700 and after 20 years to 750. They receive an additional 20 leks per month if they take posts in rural areas. Full time writers in the Writers Union are paid about 800 leks.

(Pickaxe and Rifle: The Story of the Albanian People, William Ash, 1974, p. 169) (IMG)

To be clear, by 'wage equalization', the idea is not that the wages were equal for everyone. Rather, their differentials were reduced to an unreasonable level shown above. Enver Hoxha himself personally supported wage differentials as a means of supposedly changing the consciousness of the people and supposedly shifting it away from 'bourgeois' attitudes. Hoxha said:

The differentials must be reduced, the high salaries should be cut down further so that the raised standards of living for a certain category of people will not encourage the desire for a bourgeois way of life, the desire for material gain and stimulus. (CADRES MUST BE TRAINED IN THE SCHOOL OF THE WORKING CLASS, Enver Hoxha, March 31, 1975. In: Enver Hoxha Selected Works, Vol. 4, Central Committee of the Party of Labour of Albania)

If someone earned a high amount of wealth through unjust methods, then it would be fair for the socialist state to reduce his income or wealth. However, if someone tried very hard and earned a correspondingly and proportionately high amount of income, then it would be unjust for their income to be cut. The Party of Labour of Albania was pursuing the left-wing revisionist policy of reducing wage differentials to such an unreasonable level demonstrated by William Ash (himself a sympathizer with this system) above. Worse yet, Enver Hoxha himself called for even greater wage equalization in order to 'weaken' bourgeois attitudes. This was a blatant Maoist left-deviation from Hoxha. As for bourgeois attitudes, they can be weakened through cultural work to inspire – but not force – people to spend their money for the good of the society instead of themselves; the state had no right to seize the wealth of people who earned it through their efforts, nor would state theft of people's money reduce greed.

The Party of Labour of Albania, due to its alliance with China, was able to obtain a significant number of concessions from that left-opportunist Mao regime. In certain periods in time, however, the Party of Labour of Albania, especially until the mid-1960s, was under the influence of the Chinese state. The Chinese state itself was under the heavy influence of the Chinese peasantry. The influence upon Albania of a Chinese government upon which the petit-bourgeoisie have a high influence meant a significantly high influence of the petit-bourgeois forces over Albania. Enver Hoxha himself had some of such petit-bourgeois deviations in the form of Maoist left-deviations.

The most significant Maoist left-deviationist line parroted by People's Democratic Albania was the narrative that firstly, the revisionist "Soviet Union" had become a social-imperialist power competing with American imperialism, and that secondly, this "Soviet social-imperialist" rival of the US imperialism cooperated with American imperialism globally! This kind of a rhetoric, which is a repeat of the Kautskyite notion of 'ultra-imperialism', is to be found all over Hoxha's writing and is seen throughout Zeri i Popullit, the organ of the Albanian Party. The reason for how and why this 'Soviet social-imperialist' collaboration with American imperialism is a revisionist and Kautskyite notion has been explained in C20S20 and C1S2. Many Hoxhaists have been sincere communists, have sincerely struggled against American imperialists, and have objectively contributed very positively to the movement of the proletariat; however, such left-opportunist discourse regarding the 'Soviet social-imperialists' and their allies was undoubtedly a godsend to the countless Maoist spies of the American secret service who started presenting themselves as 'Hoxhaists', and helped convert many – though not all – 'Hoxhaist' parties into the weapons of the Anglo-American secret services.

Nonetheless, what matters more than calling Eurasia "social-imperialist" is that the Party of Labour of Albania correctly recognized that the US-led camp is the greatest and greater enemy of the world, and thus refused to accept the Chinese revisionist notion of 'Three Worlds Theory'. Albania also realigned itself economically and strategically with the allies of Brezhnev-era Eurasia, and thus covertly realigned itself with Brezhnev-era Eurasia, even though it overtly continued to denounce them as 'social-imperialist'.

Well before the mid-1960s, Enver Hoxha had already criticized the Chinese several times. Some of the documents for this have been revealed and many more of such documents exist from Hoxha. However, from the mid-1960s onwards, the criticism of China went up to another level albeit initially in 'secret'. Secretly in Party meetings, Enver Hoxha began to criticize China's left-deviationist and revisionist policies as early as 1966, as shown previously. Then, in 1967, the relations declined even further:

Albanian-Chinese relations outwardly appear solid, but there are indications that Tirana's friendship for Peking peaked in early 1967, and has since cooled off. (EASTERN EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCER, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), April 18, 1968, p. 1) (IMG)

The Brezhnev group, coopted by the communist faction, saw an increase in its influence at the expense of the Khrushchev group. The rise of the Brezhnevians was a partial resurgence of the communist faction, using their cooptee Brezhnev as the vehicle of influence. Since Eurasia, increasingly under the influence of the communist resurgents, was practically no longer a real threat to People's Democratic Albania, Albania found it easier to increase its trade with the other Eastern European countries in the latter half of the 1960s. Although outwardly, Albania continued to denounce Eurasia, in practice, there was an increase in covert commercial relations with Eurasia - 'covert' not in the sense that it was some kind of a secretive smuggling operation, but rather covert in the sense that Eurasia boosted its economic trade relations with the Eastern European states. In a document co-authored by William Giloane, a researcher employed by the US State Department, it is stated:

In 1964 Communist China's share of the trade was equal to that of the Soviet Union in 1960, and the actual volume represented by that share was 23 percent larger. During the 1962-68 period trade with Communist China amounted to about half the total trade volume, but the share of Communist China declined below that level toward the end of this period. This decline was the result of a successful effort by the leadership to expand the country's trade with ... Communist Eastern Europe....

Trade with the Communist countries of Eastern Europe, other than Yugoslavia, continued after the break with the Soviet Union and increased by 66 percent from 226 million leks in 1960 to about 375 million leks in 1968. The share of this group in total trade rose during this period from 35 to 40 percent, almost entirely after 1964. Albania's most important trade partner in this group has been Czechoslovakia, second only to Communist China with a volume of 118 million leks in 1968, equivalent to about 12 percent of Albania's total trade volume in that year. Following Czechoslovakia in order of importance were Poland, East Germany, and Bulgaria, with trade volumes ranging from 69 million to 53 million leks. Trade with Hungary and Romania amounted to about 40 million leks and 32 million leks, respectively. With the exception of Poland and Romania, Albania's trade balance with the countries of Eastern Europe (Area Handbook for Albania, Vol. 550, Issue 98, Eugene K. Keefe, William Giloane, Sarah Jane Elpern, James M. Moore, Jr., Stephen Peters, Eston T. White, 1971, p. 172) (IMG)

Since Albania boosted its trade relations with the Eastern European allies of Eurasia, it follows that Albania, dialectically speaking, de facto covertly boosted economic relations with Eurasia, with Eurasia's Eastern European allies as the intermediary for covertness. Whereas the Khrushchev group had sanctioned Eastern European countries and was seeking to push them into the Western trade orbit, the Brezhnevians in Eurasia were trying to move the Eastern European countries farther away from the US-led camp and closer to Eurasia instead. Albania did not restore relations with the Eurasians directly, but boosted ties with the Eastern European states that were closer to Eurasia. This gave Albania greater leverage for more freely criticizing the Chinese revisionists. This fact about Albania's increased economic relations with Eurasia's camp is significant because it shows that (1) the Brezhnevian tendency in Eurasia reduced pressures on Albania on the covert level; (2) Albania, while independent and self-reliant, was not 'xenophobically' 'autarkic'; (3) by the laws of dialectics, assuming the absence of miscoordination and misunderstanding, there can be no third force in politics; and 'third force' is almost always a delusion; hence, by the laws of dialectics, Albania's move away from a pro-Western China would have meant an inevitable unavoidable move towards an anti-Western Eurasia; and although Albanian media presented socialist Albania as a 'third force' miraculously lying in between 'Soviet social-imperialists' (Eurasia) and the Sino-Western alliance, in practice Albania covertly shifted further towards the Eurasian camp. To be sure, trumpeting the quasi-myth ('quasi' as in 'almost') of a third force in one's media can be useful for the pursuit of covert operations and deceiving one's enemies, but in the end, none of that means that the 'third force' is no longer a quasi-myth.

The Party of Labour of Albania, despite adopting the Maoist left-deviationist line, went up an anti-Maoist route in practice and – indirectly and de facto – boosted strategic partnership with the resurged communist faction in Eurasia. Even if Hoxha himself genuinely believed such foolish theories as 'Soviet social imperialism', he still could not avoid the material forces much more powerful, the inevitable tendency of the People's Democratic Albanian state to partner with the communist agents of the proletariat resurging in Eurasia. The Party of Labour of Albania covered itself with such a Maoist left-opportunist veneer while being communist anti-Maoist in practice and at core. This pseudo-Maoism of the Party of Labour of Albania is rooted in the proletarianized and kolkhoznik composition of the Party. Concerning the composition of the Party, the CIA reported:

Total party membership in January 1970 was officially announced as 75,673. This figure represents about 3.5% of the country's total population and an increase in membership of 9,346 since November 1966 when total party membership was 66,327. Workers accounted for about 35% of the total party membership, peasants almost 29%, and white-collar workers about 36%. Since 1966, the percentage of party members classed as workers has slowly increased. Of the new party members selected during the period 1966-69, 35% were workers, 45% collective farmers, and only 16% white-collar employees. Efforts are continually made to increase the number of women party members, who in 1966 amounted to 12.5% of the total membership. The regime is also concerned about the unequal geographic distribution of the party membership. Although the rural population is twice as large as the urban population, 68% of party members live in urban areas. Despite the great number of peasants joining the party in 1966-69, the percentage of peasants in the total party membership in 1970 was only 0.02% higher than in 1966, indicating, in part, changes in job status. (NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE SURVEY 20: ALBANIA: GENERAL SURVEY, CIA, August 1971, p. 47) (IMG)

In 1982, Richard Staar - a major CIA official, US State Department intelligence research specialist, and Hoover Institute fellow - wrote:

More recent statistics indicate that the proportion of industrial workers in the party had increased to 38.0 percent and the proportion of peasants on collective farms to 29.4 percent. The remaining 32.6 percent in late 1981 were probably for the most part government officials, intelligentsia, and members of the armed forces. (Communist Regimes in Eastern Europe: Fourth Edition, The Hoover Institute, Richard F. Staar, 1982, p. 5) (IMG)

The Party definitely made a constant effort at increasing the blue-collar elements and reducing the percentage of the white-collar elements. Enver Hoxha said:

Now 122,600 communists, of whom nearly 38 per cent are workers, 29.4 per cent cooperativists and 32.6 per cent office workers, are militating in the ranks of the Party. (...); 24,363 candidates for membership, 42.40 per cent of them workers, 40.43 per cent cooperativists and 17.17 per cent office workers, have been admitted to the Party in the years following the 7th Congress. (REPORT TO THE 8th CONGRESS OF THE PLA, Central Committee of the Party of Labour of Albania, Enver Hoxha, November 1, 1981. In: Enver Hoxha Selected Works, Vol. 6, The "8 Nëntori" Publishing House, Tirana, 1987, p. 352. MIA)

The proletarians, despite not forming an above-50% majority in the Party, did constitute the largest percentage of the Party. Reinforcing the hold of the proletariat over the Party were the kolkhozniks that emerged in the late 1960s with the success of the collectivization drive. At the same time, the Party of Labour of Albania was initially composed in its membership primarily of the petit-bourgeois peasantry rather than the kolkhoznik peasantry. This strength of the petit-bourgeoisie in the Party of Labour of Albania in the initial years gave some strength to the Titoism-Maoism current in it, leading to the adoption of reactionary Maoist left-opportunist stances – alongside the correct anti-Titoist anti-Khrushchevian stances it held – and the material implementation of some of such Maoist lines. However, the rendering of the petit-bourgeois contingent in the Party into a kolkhoznik contingent led this Maoist-deviationist Party to become more communistic at its core, while retaining its previously-adopted Maoist left-opportunist line no longer as the core of the policy line of the Party but merely as the appearance, the veneer, of the Party. In other words, the core of the Party's character was communist proletarian and kolkhoznik, while the veneer of the Party, the outwardly shell, continued to retain the legacy of Maoist petit-bourgeois left-deviationism. (Note that the proletarianization of the membership/electorate of a party/movement does not automatically change the veneer into a communist one, but does change the core class orientation of that party/movement into a communistic or pro-communist one. Such was why the proletarianization of the staff of the Storm-Troopers rendered that staff into a pool of KPD-Soviet agents disguised as Strasserite 'Nazis' (see C10S7), such as why the Democratic Party of Roosevelt and Kennedy ended up becoming the party of the pro-Soviet traitors to American imperialism disguised as 'liberals', etc.). The characteristics of the Party of Labour of Albania were reflected in the personality of Enver Hoxha himself as well. Hoxha was a communist with some Maoist left-deviations.

C22S8. The Demotion of Rankovic

The gradual resurgence of the communist faction in the Red Army in the mid-1960s weakened the UDB, bogging it down in several theatres, thus giving greater room for action for the freedom fighters in Kosovo in 1960s. As a result, Tito's ally Rankovic lost his position as the UDB chief and was demoted in July 1966. Enver Hoxha recalled:

To save their own skins, to save the system of terror, oppression and exploitation which is being shaken to its foundations, J.B. Tito and his clique have «sacrificed» their closest collaborator Ranković on whom they loaded all the blame and made the scapegoat for all the failures, [so-called] mistakes, crimes and defeats of the Titoite regime to date. (WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR GENOCIDE IN KOSOVA?, Enver Hoxha)

Tito was obviously being a hypocrite in blaming Rankovic for the crimes that he himself had committed in cooperation with Rankovic. However, the demotion of Rankovic was not without a material cause; it was a setback for the Tito regime itself. Under the pressure of the growing tide of the 'Cominformists' in Yugoslavia, Tito's gang was forced to give some concessions to the Eurasians and to improve relations with Eurasia in a manner that weakened the Titoist faction in Yugoslavia.

C22S9. Counter-Revolutionary Stabs in the Back of Socialist Czechoslovakia  IMG-All-{Czechoslovakia}

The Czechoslovak Communist Party represented the reality of Czechoslovakia as well. The fact that the Czechoslovak Communist Party had the industrial blue-collar workers with staunchly pro-Soviet anti-West-German views as majority led to committed communists to rise to the top ranks of the Party. It is worth noting that the communist leader Novotny had the support of the Czechoslovak industrial (blue-collar) working class. Even as late as February 29, 1968, when Novotny was alleged to be in his least popular, the CIA stated:

Novotny's strength ... lies among ideological conservatives, industrial workers, and the government and party bureaucrats at regional district levels. (CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, CIA, February 29, 1968, p. 6) (IMG)

Enver Hoxha too expressed favorable views towards the top Czechoslovak leaders, though he was critical of Novotny:

In my opinion, the Czechoslovaks were different from the others. They were more serious than all of them. I have spoken about Gottwald, but it must be said that we Albanians also got along well with those who came after him. We were sincere with them, as with all the others, but the Czech leadership behaved well towards us, too. They had respect for our people and our Party. They were not very lively, but I can say they were restrained, correct and kindly.

Novotny and Shiroky, Dolansky and Kopecky, whom I have met and talked with many times, when I went to their country on business or for holidays with the family, behaved openly and in a modest way with me and all our comrades. That conceit and arrogance, which was apparent in the others, was not to be seen in them.

(...). In Czechoslovakia the difference was even greater. Whether in Prague, Bratislava, Karlovy Vary, Brno and many other places to which I have travelled, either officially or privately, I have been free to go wherever I wanted, whenever I wanted, with one obvious guard and everywhere I have been welcomed in a very cordial and friendly way. In the course of a trip, they themselves spontaneously took me to strategic places. Wherever I have gone in Czechoslovakia, either in official talks or in free conversations with the families of Novotny and Shiroky in Prague and Karlovy Vary, or with Bacilek in Slovakia and with a number of party secretaries in various towns and factories, the conversations have been sincere, joyous, happy and not formal. There was not that heavy atmosphere which I felt in the Soviet Union, despite the great love we had for that country and that people.

(...). But as I said above, after the death of Gottwald, the Khrushchevites were getting their grip on Czechoslovakia. It seemed that Novotny, as the first secretary of the Czechoslovak Communist Party, adhered to correct positions, but time showed that he was a wavering opportunist element, and thus, in one way or another, he did the work for Khrushchev and Co. He played a major role in carrying through the plans which made Czechoslovakia a dominion occupied by Russian tanks.

(The Khrushchevites, Enver Hoxha, Chapter 5)

Regarding the Red Army's intervention in Czechoslovakia, Novotny had the correct position, and Hoxha was incorrect. However, as the above quote rightly suggests, Novotny, Siroky, and Dolansky followed the path of Gottwald and Stalin on key issues. These communist leaders in Czechoslovakia were the tip of the iceberg in their Party, the iceberg being the majority industrial blue-collar workers in the Party.

Czechoslovakia was an industrial socialist country with a large blue-collar working class base, and the workers there were vehemently anti-Nazi and pro-communist. The memory of Munich 1938 was not forgotten. Many such workers were well-educated in the science of socialism. This not only politically strengthened the socialist state, it also allowed for Czechoslovakia to face less economic problems even in the face of the stabs in the back by the Kremlin Titoists. The CIA reported:

Economic conditions had improved in Czechoslovakia in 1955. According to official claims, the growth of gross industrial production equalled the previous peak year's (1953) figure and the real wages index rose from 59 to 72, while the cost of living dropped from 139 to 130. The highest level of pre-war agricultural production was claimed to have been exceeded in 1955, for the first time. Complaints of food and other shortages were comparatively rare in Czechoslovakia, by far the most prosperous of the Satellites. In political and intellectual spheres, there were no signs of ferment, in striking contrast to Poland and Hungary. Not that everybody was satisfied in Czechoslovakia, far from it, but there was less economic cause for dissatisfaction. There had been no split of any consequence in the Party, in which the Stalinists, headed by Antonin Novotny, the General Secretary, and Viliam Siroky, the Prime Minister, held complete control, with President Zapotocky presumably smoothing out eventual disagreements. (COMMUNISM IN EASTERN EUROPE POST-

STALIN DEVELOPMENTS IN THE SATELLITES: Part II/D: Czechoslovakia, CIA, Senior Research Staff on International Communism, December 31, 1958, p. 1) (IMG)

While problems came about as a result of Kremlin Titoists in the back swiftly after the assassination of Stalin, Czechoslovakia was able to partially recover:

The economic plans of the regime, announced in February 1956, mirrored a conviction that the troubles which had set in after Stalin's death in 1953 had been successfully overcome. (COMMUNISM IN EASTERN EUROPE POST-STALIN DEVELOPMENTS IN THE SATELLITES: Part II/D: Czechoslovakia, CIA, Senior Research Staff on International Communism, December 31, 1958, p. 1) (IMG)

Industrial Czechoslovakia had inherent weaknesses too, however. The industrial capitalism in Czechoslovakia had not developed into a very highly concentrated monopoly capitalism, meaning that there were many capitalists in Czechoslovakia. This is important because capitalist property-owners married and would form families, resulting in there being numerous families forming a large bourgeois stratum. This in turn gave rise to a large stratum of intellectuals from bourgeois family roots. Thus, much as how the industrialization of Czechoslovakia was a blessing, the fact that capitalism was not heavily concentrated into a few monopolies gave rise to numerous capitalist families and hence a large stratum of liberal intellectuals in Czechoslovakia. The counter-revolutionary intelligentsia were a lobbying force for Titoist influence in Czechia.

Unlike Czechia, Slovakia was not very industrialized. The population there was to a large extent agrarian petit-bourgeois. Unlike the proletarians, who have nothing to lose except their 'chains' in the struggle against finance capital, the petit-bourgeoisie have small businesses which they may lose. At the same time, unlike the national bourgeoisie and the cooperative peasants who have big businesses with which they can take the risk of engaging in a struggle against finance capital, the petit-bourgeoisie do not have such big businesses and therefore cannot afford to take major risks in the struggle against finance capital. The inability of the petit-bourgeoisie to wage a struggle against imperialism results in the areas populated by the petit-bourgeoisie to become easy prey to material domination by finance capital. Such was the reason that Slovakia was a channel through which the Nazi Germans were able to more easily conquer Czechoslovakia. Such was the reason that Slovakia became a major hub for fascism. Such was the reason that after the Czechoslovak Revolution of 1948, Slovakia continued to be the major base of the Trotskyite and Titoist agents of the CIA, MI6, UDB, Mossad, BND, etc.

Socialist Czechoslovakia faced serious challenges, because firstly, it was front-stabbed by the imperialist camp and their agents in Czechoslovakia, and backstabbed by the Moscow Titoists who supported the imperialist secret service plans against it. Titoist reaction could count on the Trotskyite agents retaining influence in Slovakia, the intelligentsia in Czechia, all in a united front led by finance capital against the Czechoslovak proletarians. The Titoization speech by Khrushchev in 1956 did cause damage to socialist Czechoslovakia, despite the strong resistance by the proletarian state. The Czechoslovaks first defended Stalin against Khrushchev's accusation, and stood against Khrushchev's other Titoist theses. Later on, when facing greater pressure, they presented the Titoist counter-revolutionary Slansky and his group as the 'Stalinists' of Czechoslovakia and stated that Czechoslovakia had already 'de-Stalinized' well before the USSR. This was a means by which the Czechoslovak communists were able to continue their 'Stalinism' under the guise of the 'anti-Stalinism' approved of by the Moscow Titoists. The CIA's senior research staff wrote:

5. The top leadership of the Czechoslovak Communist Party, being one of those which was quite satisfied with conditions as they were ... apparently decided that, so long as the 20th Congress had reaffirmed the admissibility of different roads to socialism, it might as well differ from the USSR in the matter of de-Stalinization. When, therefore, the regional Party meetings held on March 5 to discuss the lessons of the 20th Congress revealed considerable lower level interest in this particular subject, the official press service, CTK, issued the following day a lengthy report in which the chief points were applied in general terms to Czechoslovakia, but Stalin was defended rather than accused. While the report admitted the necessity of overcoming "all the remnants and the recurrences of the cult of the individual and agreed that in the later period of his activities, Stalin committed many mistakes, shortcomings appeared in his work, such as in the principle of collective leadership, it also declared that it was necessary to see "the positive role which Stalin played." His was the "historical merit" of having "resolutely frustrated the attempts of enemies who tried to destroy the Party and Soviet State." In other words, Stalin had, according to the report, saved Russia and Communism. How much did his mistakes and shortcomings weigh in the balance?

6. As more and more details of Khrushchev's indictment of Stalin leaked out and news of developments in Poland kept coming in, feeling in Czechoslovakia rose considerably. The Party leadership found it expedient to howl with the wolves for a while. In a report issued on April 10, the Central Committee of the Party gave an extensive criticism of Stalin's mistakes and admitted that the cult of personality had seriously corrupted the Czechoslovak Party. Two days later, the Party mouthpiece, Rude Pravo, carried the further admission that the security organs had frequently violated socialist legality and that a special commission appointed by the Political Bureau had been investigating trials for the last 18 months. It had been found, the paper stated, that it was Rudolf Slansky, the Party leader executed in November 1952, and two of his associates, who had introduced the practice of violating socialist legality, and that these violations had continued even after his exposure. Persons found to have been innocent had been released.

7. The providential discovery that Slansky had been responsible for the death of many innocent people presumably made it impossible for the Czechoslovak Communists to follow the example of their Hungarian and Bulgarian comrades in parallel cases and to rehabilitate him. It was true, as Premier Siroky admitted to a New York Times correspondent on April 13, that Slansky had been falsely accused of Titoism and that "certain manifestations of anti-Semitism" - eleven of the fourteen defendants in the Slansky trial had been Jews - "had been mistakenly introduced," but Slansky had on the other hand been subsequently found guilty of another serious crime. His culpability was, on balance, no less. Besides, Slansky's and his associates' conviction as "Trotskyite, Zionist, bourgeois, nationalist traitors and enemies of the Czechoslovak people and of Socialism" stood. Siroky was apparently not in the least troubled by the fact that all the foreign fellow conspirators besides Tito named by Slansky in his confession — Gomulka, Kostov, and Rajk had been officially declared innocent, or by the fact that Rude Pravo had the day before denounced the sentencing of people "on the mere basis of their own confession obtained by illegal methods, without there being any material proof." That apparently only applied to sentences of which Slansky was the author, not the victim. Neither did Siroky explain why the three live members of the Slansky conspiracy, who had received only jail sentences, were being released.

(COMMUNISM IN EASTERN EUROPE POST-STALIN DEVELOPMENTS IN THE SATELLITES: Part II/D: Czechoslovakia, CIA, Senior Research Staff on International Communism, December 31, 1958, pp. 2-4) (IMG)

The Czechoslovak communists opposed the Titoist opposition to Stalin's line, but did not come out openly against it, since that would have undermined the socialist state in Czechoslovakia. The US intelligence document further stated:

The episode spotlighted the embarrassing situation which the Czechoslovak holdovers from the Stalin era shared with most of their satellite colleagues. They were ... foresighted enough to oppose de-Stalinization and liberalization, yet unable openly to contradict Khrushchev, on whose support their continuance in power depended more than ever. A concrete proof of their disorientation was their failure to issue directives to the lower level apparatchiki who had the difficult task of presiding over local Party meetings in which the "historic" resolutions of the 20th Congresses were discussed. The result was an outburst of criticism at the lower levels, which it seemed expedient to calm by jettisoning some expendable ballast and granting some superficial concessions, but without sacrificing any of the material bases of power. (COMMUNISM IN EASTERN EUROPE POST-STALIN DEVELOPMENTS IN THE SATELLITES: Part II/D: Czechoslovakia, CIA, Senior Research Staff on International Communism, December 31, 1958, p. 4) (IMG)

The stab in the back of the Czechoslovak communists led to the ouster of the well-known communist revolutionary Alexei Cepicka, a relative of Gottwald. It led to the colour revolutionary uprising of the liberal intelligentsia, the fifth column of the BND, Mossad, MI6, CIA, etc. It also caused some change in the budget and economic planning in general. The CIA reported:

The 1956 budget, introduced on February 9, showed a 17.4 percent increase over 1955 in investment in heavy industry, but, true to the Khrushchev line, an almost identical increase in agricultural investment. As further proof of the regime's solicitude for the people, a price reduction on a number of consumer goods, estimated to increase purchasing power by 6.5 percent, followed on April 1. (...).

9. The victim selected to be thrown to the wolves was ... Minister of Defense, Alexej Cepicka. His expulsion from the Politburo and dismissal from the posts of First Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Defense were announced on April 25, on the grounds of "shortcomings and mistakes he committed in the execution of state and party functions." But the fact that he was a son-in-law of Gottwald was certainly more important. (...).

10. Intellectuals also were restive. The Czechoslovak Writers Congress, meeting April 22-29, deplored the damage to literature caused by the cult of personality and condemned the "code of esthetics" which was supposed to guide writers as an "incredible collection of half-truths and regular inconsistencies. Two writers, Jaroslav Seifert and Frantisek Hrubin, insisted that writers should represent the conscience of their nation and accused them of having betrayed their mission by indulging in evasions and lies. Even the Congress chairman, Jan Drda, considered a Party stalwart, declared that in the future, writers must reflect the people's "justified dissatisfactions" and take into account the conflicts and "contradictions" of everyday life. Although the Party had, in a message read by President Zapotocky, announced its intention of giving writers "more freedom" and encouraged them to be "bold and fearless" in their creative work, it was getting more than it bargained for. Zapotocky took the floor a second time and rebuked the more outspoken writers for their wholesale condemnation of the past and for their failure to understand the Party's present policy. Nevertheless, Hrubin and Seifert were elected members of the new "collective leadership," while two orthodox writers sponsored by the regime were blackballed.

12. Student meetings were even more outspoken. Typical resolutions demanded, besides greater freedom for students, numerous political reforms: release of political prisoners, permission for opposition parties to function effectively, an end to newspaper censorship and to jamming, access to banned Western literature, and freedom to travel abroad. Some resolutions protested against the unjustified idealization of the Soviet Union and the privileges accorded Soviet citizens, and asked pointed questions about the Jachymov uranium mines.

13. Even the Communist Youth League was the scene of stormy sessions. Mlada Fronta (April 27) reported that besides excessive study hours, compulsory attendance and overcrowding, the "unpersuasive and dogmatic lectures in Marxism-Leninism" and the Minister of Education were sharply criticized. On May 6, the paper announced that the Minister had received the delegates of the Youth League and that many of the demands would probably be met.

14. More sensational still was the permission granted the students to hold the Majales, a traditional student parade, for the first time since 1938. On May 20, columns of students carrying placards reproducing many of the student protests and demands and dragging floats biting satirizing conditions in Czechoslovakia marched unmolested down the streets of Prague. The chants of the marching students are reported to have included demands for the removal of President Zapotocky and First Slovak Party Secretary Bacilek.

(COMMUNISM IN EASTERN EUROPE POST-STALIN DEVELOPMENTS IN THE SATELLITES: Part II/D: Czechoslovakia, CIA, Senior Research Staff on International Communism, December 31, 1958, pp. 1-7) (IMG)

There was also a rise in Slovak separatism:

The resurgence of separatism within Slovakia since the Soviet 20th party congress in February 1956 has been of mounting concern to the Prague regime, and since the Slovak party congress in April 1957 has been condemned in increasingly stronger terms by Czech party boss Antonin Novotny. (CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN [15772430], CIA, January 17, 1958, p. 1) (IMG)

Further reporting on decentralization in Czechoslovakia, the CIA reported:

Prague's implementation of an economic decentralization program this year has caused popular discontent to spread. Over 100,000 have been hit by labor relocation plans and large-scale reductions of the central administrative staffs, but the population does not seem generally disposed to make trouble. Within the party, underlying discontent – possibly extending into the top echelon – is hidden from the public behind an appearance of solidarity. Serious differences are not likely to break into the open before or during the party congress in June. (CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN [15772422], CIA, April 15, 1958, p. 1) (IMG)

The industrial sector of Czechoslovakia was being sabotaged through decentralization, causing widespread popular discontent and an economic downturn. Without simultaneous advancements in industry, however, the swift advancement in collectivization would be very difficult, and perhaps would be also premature. Yet, a project for the swift 'collectivization' of agriculture in the absence of industrial advancements began:

The program for economic reform recently begun in Czechoslovakia has caused widespread popular discontent. Over one hundred thousand persons have been affected by the labor relocation plans, and the lives of several hundred thousands, primarily in Prague and other cities, have been unsettled. Furthermore the government has renewed last year's collectivization offensive, with the intention of increasing the area of agricultural socialization from the present 65 percent to more than 80 percent by the end of 1959. It hopes to socialize all agriculture in the country within the next three years. The collectivization campaign will be carried out primarily in Slovakia and may intensify existing separatism there.

There are no signs, however, that the population is any more disposed than in the past to make trouble. The regime is alert to this dissatisfaction and has indicated, both through propaganda and a vigilance campaign specifically directed against Slovak nationalism, that it will permit no interference or challenge.

(CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN [15772422], CIA, April 15, 1958, p. 1) (IMG)

As a result of the prematurely swift advancements in ‘collectivization’, the CIA-backed Slovak separatist tendency gained strength. The industrial decentralization also gave the Slovak separatists greater leverage over the rest of the economy of Slovakia. According to the CIA:

Slovak Nationalism Increasing Problem for Czechoslovak Regime

Nationalist elements in Slovakia apparently are attempting to use the Czechoslovak regime's economic decentralization program to benefit their own regional interests at the expense of nationwide goals.

In a strongly worded speech to the Slovak party central committee plenum meeting of 9-10 January, Slovak Party First Secretary Bacilek complained that there were separatist tendencies in various sectors of cultural, political, and scientific life, and even in some of the central offices. The dismissal on 13 January of Slovak Deputy Premier Stefan Sebesta, responsible for industrial and urban construction, probably is the first step to remove officials with nationalistic tendencies, who, according to Bacilek, have appeared at the highest levels of the Slovak government.

(...). The tone of Bacilek's speech indicates that the situation now demands the ruthless stamping out of “bourgeois nationalist” elements promised by Novotny last April when he first publicly warned the Slovak dissidents to conform or suffer the consequences.

The Czechoslovak intelligentsia, the fifth column of the Yugoslav regime, argued that the economy was damaged because it was not decentralized enough, whereas the Novotny faction, the communist agents of the proletariat, argued that the sabotage of the economy was the direct result of the counter-revolutionary strategy of decentralization. The CIA reported:

Basically the serious concern with economic reform and the radical nature of some of the proposals being entertained in Czechoslovakia stem from the near absence of economic growth during the past [two and a half] years. As early as 1962, Czechoslovak economists were pressing for reforms, and the need to improve techniques of planning and management was emphasized at the Party Congress in December 1962. Party leader Novotny, however, continued to blame some of the country's economic difficulties on the partial decentralization of 1958-60 and called for a tightening of central controls. (CZECHOSLOVAKIA DEBATES MARKET SOCIALISM, Current Support Brief, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), 1964, p. 2) (IMG)

The economic sabotage that the intelligentsia caused allowed for the Titoist fifth column to push such prominent communists as Viliam Siroky (Vilem Siroky) out of power, push Novotny to the wall, and install Titoist elements – particularly the neoliberal economist Ota Sik – into the heights of power:

In 1963, as the economic situation deteriorated further and cultural ferment accompanied a new wave of “destalinization,” criticism of the regime's policies increased greatly, and some of the critics argued – in direct contradiction of Novotny – that the error in 1958-60 had been in decentralizing too little. Novotny and his followers were forced to admit that planning had been overambitious, that serious mistakes had been made in the allocation of investments, and that incentives did not give enough stimulus to technical progress and improvement in the quality of output. Then, in the wake of a Party and government shakeup of September 1963, which replaced some of the dogmatic officials (especially Vilem Siroky) by more pragmatic men such as Jozef Lenart and Drahomir Kolder, the Party gave official blessing to a thoroughgoing debate on the economic system. A group of economists, headed by Ota Sik, a member of the Central Committee of the Party and Chief of the Economics Institute of the Academy of Sciences, was charged with an intensive study of possible reforms and asked to present its recommendations to the leadership through the newly organized Economic Commission of the Party. Sik told a Central Committee Plenum in December 1963 that the traditional Soviet forms of socialist management no longer worked in Czechoslovakia.... (CZECHOSLOVAKIA DEBATES MARKET SOCIALISM, Current Support Brief, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), 1964, p. 2) (IMG)

Led by Ota Sik, the Czechoslovak intelligentsia proposed liberalizing the Czechoslovak economy. A report by the RAND Corporation stated:

The Czech economists proposed – they referred to their proposal as the New Economic Model – to imitate the Yugoslav Marxists and introduce a Socialist market, a hybrid combining state ownership with a restricted play of market forces. Over a period of years the central planning machinery would be dismantled, prices would be permitted to seek their own level, the domestic market would be opened to Western competition, and the management of factories (as distinct from their ownership) would be turned over to men who, regardless of their politics, could make a profit. Factories which did not turn up in the black would be closed, and the temporary unemployment of their workers accepted as the lesser evil. The general direction of economic development would be regulated by the manipulation of such indirect levers as taxation and monetary policy. (THE DECLINE OF COMMUNISM IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA, The RAND Corporation, Santa Monica, California, Richard V. Burks, DTIC: AD0676274, p. 6) (IMG)

The Novotny faction, the faction of the communist blue-collar workers in the Party, was referred to by Anglo-American media as the ‘conservative’ faction, a propaganda term used to imply that the communists wanted ‘backwardness’ and that the liberals were seeking to ‘rejuvenate’ Czechoslovakia. The communist faction continued to resist such a counter-revolutionary policy line promoted by the intelligentsia:

It seems unlikely that the present leadership will give enterprises anywhere near the amount of authority desired by the liberals or allow market forces to determine output except within narrow limits. According to Novotny, reforms will be introduced “step by step ... with much prudence” and “without upsetting upheavals.” This cautious approach gives the conservative forces every opportunity to prevent fundamental changes.... (CZECHOSLOVAKIA DEBATES MARKET SOCIALISM, Current Support Brief, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORR), 1964, p. 7) (IMG)

Novotny and his comrades were well aware of how destructive such liberalization would have been. The NEM would have brought a corrupt bourgeois system, with greater autonomy for the local bureaus increasing bureaucratic corruption; the NEM would have fostered the chaos of the market; the NEM would have gotten workers out of their jobs, resulting in widespread unemployment. Longer-term unemployment promotes the lumpen-proletarian mentality, the mentality of bandits, terrorists, and violent reactionary protesters haunted by bestial frenzy, unwilling to reason. Over time, the further immiseration of the unemployed could create a massive lumpen-proletarian force, rather than a proletarian force, that would be exploited by finance capital and the corrupt bureaucrats to launch a reactionary rebellion against the communist faction in the Czechoslovak state, thus giving the intelligentsia greater leverage for even greater economic liberalization and Titoization. The RAND Corporation report stated:

It was not long, however, before it became apparent that the introduction of the New Economic Model seriously threatened the power of the party apparatus. It was not so much that the NEM ran counter to the traditional teachings of Marxism-Leninism, though that was important. It was rather that the emergence of an autonomous class of industrial managers chosen on the basis of ability would deprive the apparatus at local levels of its main employment, the detailed supervision of the enterprise, and would consequently bring about the downgrading or unemployment of large numbers of the faithful. There were other, even less pleasant implications. If managers were granted autonomy in a market situation, should not trade unions be permitted to protect the interests of the working class, even if this involved a restoration of the right to strike? If factory managers should have autonomy, why not collective farm managers? Indeed, if the management of factories, under the general supervision of the party, were turned over to man who knew how to turn a fast crown, perhaps the management of ideas should be given to writers and others professionally concerned with communication. The NEM soon became a political football, conservatives opposing it because of the danger that its implementation would lead to other liberalizing changes, revisionists pushing for it in the hope of changing much more than the economy and bringing into being, perhaps, a new political model. Novotny tried to compromise by accepting economic reform in principle, but withholding the personnel changes necessary to implement it. After heavy infighting he was replaced (January 1968) by a leadership which meant to carry out wide-ranging political reform as the prerequisite not only of market Socialism but of the conciliation of an angry public opinion as well. (THE DECLINE OF COMMUNISM IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA, The RAND Corporation, Santa Monica, California, Richard V. Burks, DTIC: AD0676274, pp. 6-7) (IMG)

The Moscow Titoists covertly imposed sanctions on socialist Czechoslovakia. The excommunication of China and Albania by the Kremlin Titoists did not just undermine People's Democratic Albania and the people of China, but also undermined the Korean, Romanian, and Czechoslovak Peoples' Democracies. The expulsion of China was a means of sanctioning not only China, but also the Peoples' Democracies, Czechoslovakia included. A document by the RAND Corporation stated:

Aside from the general slow down in intra-Bloc trade, Czechoslovakia's new Eastern market was also affected by a series of more immediate disasters. The quarrel between Soviet Russia and Communist China ended with a virtual severance of trade between Prague and Peking, ending the Czech dream of penetrating the huge Chinese market and leaving Prague stuck with enormously expensive turbogenerators designed to Chinese specifications. The Romanian national deviation brought further trouble; as a proportion of total Romanian imports Czechoslovak machinery dropped rapidly from 50 to 10 percent. The Russians also began to refuse delivery of various shipments of Czech machinery, on the ominous grounds that they were below world market standards. (...). The decline in machinery shipments to the East not only precipitated the recession of 1962-65 but it also suggested that, if Prague wished to maintain a high rate of economic growth in the future, Czechoslovakia should re-enter the capitalist market on a major scale and necessarily, reduce the degree of her economic dependence on the USSR. Such a shift in the patterns of trade would, however, have political significance. (THE DECLINE OF COMMUNISM IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA, The RAND Corporation, Santa Monica, California, Richard V. Burks, DTIC: AD0676274, pp. 4-5) (IMG)

Again, since Czechoslovakia was under siege by Titoists from all the countries around her, and because Czechoslovakia faced counter-revolutionary Mossad-backed bourgeois-nationalist elements in Slovakia, it was not so tough for the intelligentsia to lobby for the NEM to be implemented. The NEM thus became the policy of Czechoslovakia. In mid-1967, the US Congressional Subcommittee on International Trade reported:

Now the command economy is being dismantled. The role of the central authorities in determining production has been reduced. Ministries will play a smaller role in day-to-day operations. Production will respond to the world market through the introduction of flexible prices and by the pressure of imports on domestic prices. Enterprises will produce to make a profit rather than to fulfill centrally determined targets. (Initially, some profits may be illusory because some raw material inputs are subsidized by the entire economy). This is entailing a rebirth of cost accounting. (THE FIAT-SOVIET AUTO PLANT AND COMMUNIST ECONOMIC REFORMS: A REPORT, House Resolution 1043, 8th Congress, 2nd Session, Subcommittee on International Trade, Committee on Banking and Currency, US House of Representatives, March 1, 1967, p. 52) (IMG)

The report went on:

New investment will be largely made from enterprise profits or from loans approved by the State Bank in coordination with the Central Planning Commission. Loans from the State Bank will bear interest rates, working from a prime rate of 6 percent, which will reflect the Bank's estimate of the soundness of the proposed investment. Should the Bank not be willing to make the loan, an enterprise may proceed from its own funds. (THE FIAT-SOVIET AUTO PLANT AND COMMUNIST ECONOMIC REFORMS: A REPORT, House Resolution 1043, 8th Congress, 2nd Session, Subcommittee on International Trade, Committee on Banking and Currency, US House of Representatives, March 1, 1967, p. 52) (IMG)

And:

When enterprises cannot make a profit they must nevertheless pay workers a minimum wage. State subsidies to cover wage deficits: tax deficits and loan arrears will be on a selective basis for limited periods. (THE FIAT-SOVIET AUTO PLANT AND COMMUNIST ECONOMIC REFORMS: A REPORT, House Resolution 1043, 8th Congress, 2nd Session, Subcommittee on International Trade, Committee on Banking and Currency, US House of Representatives, March 1, 1967, p. 52) (IMG)

Most importantly, the unprofitable factories (such as in heavy industry) would have to be not just closed down, but also outright dismantled, with their industrial equipment and physical capital to be taken away for profitable use:

Enterprises which cannot make a go of it must close and their resources (labor, capital, equipment) must be shifted to profitable use. This introduces the capitalist concept of "business failure" and "frictional unemployment" to the Communist world. (THE FIAT-SOVIET AUTO PLANT AND COMMUNIST ECONOMIC REFORMS: A REPORT, House Resolution 1043, 8th Congress, 2nd Session, Subcommittee on International Trade, Committee on Banking and Currency, US House of Representatives, March 1, 1967, p. 52) (IMG)

a coal mine and two coke ovens in Bohemia were closed on grounds of unprofitability. Some of their workers are to be retrained and some absorbed into more efficient mines as part of a program which is designed to ease the frictions of shifting labor into more efficient uses. The official trade union movement has been given responsibility for being prepared to retrain over 502000 workers a year. (THE FIAT-SOVIET AUTO PLANT AND COMMUNIST ECONOMIC REFORMS: A REPORT, House Resolution 1043, 8th Congress, 2nd Session, Subcommittee on International Trade, Committee on Banking and Currency, US House of Representatives, March 1, 1967, p. 52) (IMG)

In other words, the policy line propagated and enforced by the Czechoslovak Titoist intelligentsia was that in order for Czechoslovakia to have economic 'growth', it has to have its industrial infrastructure dismantled! The counter-revolutionary effects of this need no mention and are quite obvious: (1) the destruction of the military-industrial backbone that would assist Czechoslovakia against an invasion by NATO and Yugoslavia; (2) large-scale unemployment and misery in Czechoslovakia to cause a lumpen-proletarian colour revolutionary uprising against the socialist state, which would create further costs for the communist faction and bring to power the Titoists.

As a result of such a large-scale program for Titoist sabotage against industrial Czechoslovakia, there came:

economic troubles for the most highly industrialized nation in eastern Europe. (The Soviet Decision to Invade Czechoslovakia, Advanced Research Paper, Naval War College, Robert M. Guth, 1975, p. 3) (IMG)

The severe economic damage inflicted upon People's Democratic Czechoslovakia reduced the amounts of funds available to the communist faction, rendering it more difficult for the communist faction to pursue its secret service conflict against the Titoist faction. The result was the ascendancy of the Dubcek faction and the demotion of the Novotny faction, the communist faction.

The rise of the Dubcek faction in Czechoslovakia in the late 1960s, however, also coincided with the rise of the Brezhnev faction in Eurasia. Again, although Brezhnev was a Titoist at core, he nonetheless was coopted by the communist anti-Titoist faction in Moscow, which is what led Novotny to call for Brezhnev's aid against the Titoist faction of the Party. However, this time, Brezhnev apparently showed his Titoist face and, ever the double-faced opportunist, reportedly refused to strongly support Novotny, tacitly backing Dubcek instead. According to the leader of the modern revisionist 'Communist Party of Moravia and Bohemia' (KSCM):

Dubcek, replacing Novotny, was a Moscow's choice, too. Novotny was, on the contrary, sacrificed as a scape-goat. ('50 years after the Prague events of 21 August 1968: The Guardian interview with Josef Skala, leader of the KSCM Leninist wing'. In: Marx21, August 21, 2018) (IMG)

The CIA too stated:

Initially backed by Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev, Dubcek had replaced ... Antonin Novotny in December 1967. ('A Look Back ... The Prague Spring & the Soviet Invasion of Czechoslovakia', CIA, 2008) (IMG)

A document published by the US Naval War College stated:

Novotny's attacks on his critics — [bourgeois-minded] economists, writers, and intellectuals — did not help the situation, for all of these enemies were highly capable of expressing themselves. Coupled with discontent among the Slovak minority, these troubles led to a revolt against Novotny which reached its climax at the January 1968 plenum of the Czechoslovak Central Committee when Alexander Dubcek, a Slovak, was elected party secretary. The change was seen as no cause for alarm at the Kremlin, as Dubcek was an old associate of Brezhnev. According to one account, the two men had known each other when they were students in Moscow. The Soviet leader had spoken personally with Dubcek only a few weeks before the latter's elevation to the party secretaryship, when he was still First Secretary of the Slovak Communist Party. Novotny had invited Brezhnev to visit Czechoslovakia in December of 1967, in hope of receiving support in the face of increasing political opposition. Before returning to Moscow, Brezhnev had surprised Dubcek with a visit during which he took the measure of the young "firebrand." When he left, Brezhnev abandoned Novotny, saying "Eto vashe delo" ("It is your affair.") and gave Dubcek de facto endorsement by doing nothing to interfere in the events which were taking place. Dubcek of course was no firebrand but a fairly unassuming and unimpressive if serious party functionary with a good record as a loyal communist party member, educated in the Soviet Union. William Shawcross' recent biography cites him as a man who had, in the Kremlin's eyes, an almost perfect pedigree. Son of working-class parents, brought up and educated in the Soviet Union, loyal apparatchik, university in Moscow, a man whose regard for Russia had always been quite unconditional, who seemed, in many ways, more Russian than Czechoslovak—this was someone of whom the Kremlin need have no fear.

That Brezhnev's assessment of the situation was faulty and the responsibility for succeeding events rests with him is historically accurate. (The Soviet Decision to Invade Czechoslovakia, Advanced Research Paper, Naval War College, Robert M. Guth, 1975, pp. 3-4) (IMG)

Already, the economy of Czechoslovakia was in shambles, and the Brezhnev group (intentionally) failed to provide the necessary support to the Novotny faction in the Party. The communist industrial blue-collar workers' contingent in the Party, therefore, was on the verge of removal from dominance. The more immediate cause of the ouster of team Novotny and the rise to power of the Dubcek faction was the final tactical blow: the defection of General Sejna.

Sejna, a corrupt Titoist element in the Czechoslovak military and intelligence sectors, was politically weak. The agents of the Novotny faction had encircled Sejna and compelled Sejna to cooperate in undermining the other corrupt Titoist elements in Czechoslovakia. However, the Titoist faction of the Czechoslovak Communist Party, already with tremendous power by the late 1960s, was able to utilize Sejna to its own advantage. The severe economic damage inflicted upon the Czechoslovak economy had reduced the funds for the Novotny faction of the Czechoslovak intelligence service, causing Sejna to be less encircled by the Czechoslovak counter-intelligence, allowing Sejna more room to maneuver not as cooptee of the communists but as the true agent of Titoism he had always been. Sejna, an imperialist intelligence agent, defected to the West almost certainly via Yugoslavia. Beside the provision of military and political intelligence to the West, the defection of Sejna also had propaganda advantages for the Dubcek faction. It must be remembered that Dubcek and his Titoist faction were already accused of being agents of Yugoslavia, Israel, the Anglo-Americans, etc. Through the defection of Sejna, Dubcek's Titoist faction were able to reverse the tide in the propaganda war and to denounce Novotny's ostensible 'ally' Sejna as a means by which to denounce Novotny himself and the communist elements in the Czechoslovak military and intelligence. Not only were Dubcek and his Titoist faction able to present themselves as purgers of foreign spies and corrupt elements, they were also able to purge the faction that actually opposed corruption and foreign anti-communist anti-Czechoslovak espionage. The result was a large-scale purge that encompassed Novotny, his comrades in the Party, and the communists in the military and intelligence of Czechoslovakia, paving the way for the rise of the Titoist agents of the Anglo-American imperialists in Czechoslovakia. The Titoist agents were expanding their influence over the means of violence, paving the way for the establishment of a comprador bourgeois state, and the liquidation of the proletarian state. Regarding the case of Sejna, the following is a part of the report by the US Naval War College document:

Consider the curious case of General Sejna, the man who precipitated the fall of Novotny and set in motion a series of events in intelligence and security circles which culminated in the August invasion — the man who, in Aristotelian terms, could be viewed as the material cause of the invasion. The first public notice he received appeared in the New York Times datelined Prague, March 2, 1968, and headlined, "General Accused of Theft Flees From Czechoslovakia." The brief story was that "Czechoslovakia's military prosecutor said today that Maj. Gen. Jan Sejna, wanted on charges of 'large-scale machinations with grass seed,' had fled the country." Subsequently it appeared that Sejna had fled through Yugoslavia to the West, and had requested and received approval for permanent residence in the United States. He was accompanied by his son and girl friend, leaving his wife in Prague to report his disappearance to the newspapers and giving his defection more the air of escapade than escape. The 22-year-old girl friend was described by the State Department as the son's fiancée and by the Czechs as the General's girlfriend. The wife's plight as well as her comments to the press tended to make the State Department's claim suspect or the young lady's position ambivalent.

But who was General Sejna, and why did his disappearance cause such a stir? Surely his grass seed manipulations would not have caused Marshal Ivan I. Yakubovsky, the Soviet commander of all Warsaw Pact forces, to make a hurried trip to Prague to "learn the extent of damage to Communist-bloc security." Part of the answer was that Sejna, as a Major General in the Czech Army, was in a position to provide Western intelligence with considerable information concerning Czechoslovak and Warsaw Pact forces and plans. But why the arrests and suicides which followed and the wholesale reorganization of the security section of the Czechoslovak Ministry of the Interior? Major General Jan Sejna, forty years old at the time of his defection, was a "political general," a senior communist party official assigned to the military and given a military rank to perform his assignment – security. He was a friend of the Novotny family and a close friend of the President's 37-year-old son, Antonin Novotny, Jr. As secretary of the Party Committee in the Ministry of Defense, Sejna worked for Miroslav Mamula, the head of the Central Committee's Department of State Administration, a euphemism for Czechoslovakia's security organization. It was Mamula who was the first senior official ousted by Dubcek after election as First Secretary of the Czechoslovak Communist Party Central Committee. On the military aide, Sejna had worked for Colonel General Valdimir Janko, a Deputy to the Defense Minister, General Bohumir Lomaky. Sejna was a member of Parliament.

In the unprecedented climate of the Prague Spring questions arose in Parliament and in the press, with the result that the Sejna story became public very quickly. When it was all out, Sejna stood accused of masterminding a military putsch to restore Novotny's power. The plan, which he is accused of having actually set in motion, was developed with the approval of Mamula and implemented by Sejna together with Deputy Defense Minister Janko. As a result, in mid-December 1967, Czech armored units were moving toward Prague and Bratislava. They were stopped by order of Dubcek upon learning of the moves from General Vaclav Prchlik, who was then head of the Army's Military Political Administration and who was instrumental in arranging their return to base without incident.

Named to investigate the Sejna affair was General Prchlik who in January 1968 had been appointed Mamula's successor as head of the Central Committee's Department of State Administration. As the investigation proceeded, a scandal unfolded which led to the suicide of General Janko, dismissals of the Minister of the Interior and the Attorney General, and resignations of a Deputy Premier, two Central Committee secretaries, and the Defense Minister. Finally, on the twenty-first of March, less than three weeks after Sejna's flight became known. President Novotny himself, in response to intense pressure and apparently having abandoned hope for support and intervention from the Soviet Union, resigned.

The after-effects of the Sejna affair went further. One theory holds that Marshal Yakubovsky's hurried visit to Prague on February 28 served a dual purpose—to consult urgently with Czech political and military officials regarding the security implications of Sejna's defection and to examine the feasibility of military intervention in Czechoslovakia. This view is based on retrospective estimates made by Czechoslovak intelligence officers and by the Czechoslovak Defense Minister, General Martin Dzur, that six months were needed to develop the necessary plans for the 22 August invasion. Whether or not this was the case and whether, if so, Yakubovsky was acting from personal motives, for the Soviet military, or for the Soviet government, remains a puzzle. At least one commentator, however, has marked the Yakubovsky visit as the beginning of Soviet military pressure for action against Czechoslovakia:

Within a couple of days of General Sejna's flight. Marshal Ivan Yakubovsky, commander-in-chief of the forces of the Warsaw Pact organization, arrived in Prague. It was no ceremonial visit. The marshal went straight to see Mr. Dubcek, Mr. Novotny, who was then still President of the country, and Mr. Josef Lenart, who was still Prime Minister. Though little is known about what passed between the Russian marshal and the Czechoslovak leaders on that occasion, there is every reason to believe that it marked the beginning of the long campaign of pressure by the Russian military to restore their control of Czechoslovak territory. It was nearly six months later before the campaign succeeded, with the invasion of Czechoslovakia by troops of the Warsaw Pact.

The Prague housecleaning which began with the ouster of Mamula continued through the spring and summer and resulted in removal of some 150 Czechoslovak nationals who worked directly for Soviet advisers in the Ministry of the Interior. Care was taken not to interrupt the flow of intelligence made available to the Soviets, but merely to isolate the advisers from their Czech contacts. At the same time a large number of Czechoslovak officers with known conservative leanings were ousted from higher commands. The [so-called] merit system, which excluded party membership or loyalty to the Soviet Union as requisites for promotion to high positions, was strengthened.

(The Soviet Decision to Invade Czechoslovakia, Advanced Research Paper, Naval War College, Robert M. Guth, 1975, pp. 9-12) (IMG)

Through Dubcek, the intelligentsia of Czechoslovakia rose to higher ranks, and the blue-collar industrial workers' element in the Party lost the battle for the membership composition. A CIA document confirmed that whereas Dubcek represented the intelligentsia and bourgeois reformers, the industrial blue-collar workers in Czechoslovakia supported the Novotny faction, the faction opposed to Dubcek. The document stated:

The conservative tactic is aimed particularly at compounding workers' fears that reforms will mean loss of jobs, rising prices, and a general drop in the standards of living. An attempt is being made to alienate industrial workers from intellectuals and from "radical economic reformers," and by implication from Dubcek, who has the support of the reformers.

Dubcek has rallied significant support from other sources. Association of writers, journalists, and farmers have pledged their aid. The chairman of the parliament and the key party boss of the city of Prague have deserted Novotny. Dubcek probably can count on most of the party in Slovakia and Moravia, but the extent of his support in Bohemia is unclear. He has taken steps to control the armed forces and the secret police.

Novotny's strength, in turn, lies among ideological conservatives, industrial workers, and the government and party bureaucrats at regional district levels.

(CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, CIA, February 29, 1968, p. 6) (IMG)

Beyond the comprador-minded intelligentsia, the corrupt politicians, and the agents of Anglo-American finance capital in Czechoslovakia, the Dubcek gang had no other socio-economic base. Hence, Dubcek decided to make the intelligentsia the dominant element in the Party. By May 1968, the intelligentsia formed the largest group in the Party. Since the and thus decisively overthrew the dictatorship of the proletariat in Czechoslovakia, establishing the dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie:

Since the Party leadership was worried about the constant tendency to deterioration of the social composition of the membership from the class point of view, the CC of the CPC in May 1959 decided that the Party organizations had to carefully select new candidates and attract among them 60 per cent of workers and 20 per cent of collective farmers or 80 per cent of workers and farmers plus 20 per cent of "other working people. The main Party organ then claimed that "workers represented half of the membership of the Party and out of the total number of workers engaged in production almost every fifth is a member of the Party." But it was admitted that if only workers actually engaged in production were counted, the half would shrink to 36 per cent and in addition 9.6 per cent workers, members of the party, were pensioners. Till 1967 a further deterioration would take place: "If in 1947 workers formed 50 per cent of the Party membership, then in 1967 the number of active manual workers represented only 26.4 per cent." And till 1969 the number of retired workers went up to 15-9 per cent.

At the end of May 1968, the CPC had 1,687,565 members. It represented 12 per cent of the Czechoslovak population and 17 per cent of persons older than eighteen years. The intelligentsia formed the largest group – 40 per cent of economically active members. Almost 34 per cent of the intelligentsia was organized in the CPC, and among them up to 40 per cent of teachers were represented.

(Fools and Heroes: The Changing Role of Communist Intellectuals in Czechoslovakia, Peter Hruby, 1980, p. 142) (IMG)

Via the intelligentsia, the corrupt bureaucrats controlled the Czechoslovak state and linked the comprador regime of Czechoslovakia to Anglo-American and West German finance capital. The pace of the Titoization program in Czechoslovakia in 1968 was far higher than the pace of the Titoization program in the Soviet Union in 1956. That is because the influence of the proletariat over the Czechoslovak means of violence was far lower in 1968 than the influence of the proletariat over the Soviet means of violence in 1955-1956. In the Soviet Union, only in 1956, when the white-collar elements gained a membership composition above 50%, did the forces of Titoist counter-revolution gain the margin over the proletarian forces throughout the entire state apparatus and not just the Party. By contrast, in Czechoslovakia, the Titoist counter-revolutionary forces did not so badly need the white-collar elements to be more than 50% of the Party membership and could achieve their objectives at a far higher base even without the white-collar elements (which formed the largest percentage in the Party) reaching above the 50%. In Czechoslovakia, the Titoist agents representing the white-collar elements in the Party had already ascended to dominance over enough of the Czechoslovak means of violence, the Czechoslovak military and intelligence bodies, to quickly pursue the Titoization of Czechoslovakia from the anti-imperialist camp. Only a few months more of Titoization in Czechoslovakia could pass and the Czechoslovak people would have found themselves in NATO or Yugoslavia. Had the Titoist agents not had the upper hand over the Czechoslovak means of violence, then there would have been no need for Warsaw Pact deployment of troops, and the Czechoslovak communists would have been able to resolve that land's Titoism problem for years to come. Yet, the very fact that the Warsaw Pact deployed its troops, coupled with the very rapid pace of Titoization in that country, all serve to reinforce the thesis that in Czechoslovakia back then, the Titoist agents of the comprador bourgeoisie already had gained the upper hand in the military and intelligence bodies, rendering the Czechoslovak state into a comprador bourgeois state. Only as a result of Warsaw Pact intervention was this pace of Titoization 'reforms' kept in check and even then only partially – Dubcek's group retained the white-collar majority, Dubcek continued as Party leader until a year later, Egypt was military and economically defunded by the Dubcekite Czechoslovakia in 1969, and Husak, a Slovak separatist, became leader after Dubcek. The fact that Titoization went on even after Warsaw Pact intervention is proof of how vigorous the pace of the Titoists in Czechoslovakia had become, and is demonstrative of the fact that the counter-revolutionary situation in Czechoslovakia resembled more so that of Yugoslavia in early 1948 and was much more severe than that of the Soviet Union in 1956. The communist faction of the Red Army and the of the CPSU agreed that they who controlled the means of violence in Czechoslovakia were highly untrustworthy:

The concern that Soviet leaders had about the proposed nuclear weapons sites in Czechoslovakia—and about Czechoslovakia's policy more generally—increased still further when it turned out that Prchlik, rather than being fired ignominiously, was merely reassigned to other military-related duties. In his new capacity, the general was even able to continue working on drafts of the national security Action Program, an arrangement that infuriated Soviet officials when they found out about it. Soviet leaders were equally dismayed that neither the KSC nor the Czechoslovak defense ministry would formally repudiate any of Prchlik's comments until 15 August, a month after the general's news conference. In the meantime, Prchlik received an outpouring of public admiration and expressions of support from many of his colleagues and subordinates in the Czechoslovak Defense Ministry. Needless to say, these reactions produced even greater Soviet consternation and led to serious doubts in Moscow about Czechoslovakia's military alignment.

Thus, well before the invasion in August 1968, Soviet Army commanders had lost all confidence in their Czechoslovak counterparts and had become convinced that the risks of deploying nuclear warheads on Czechoslovak soil would be too great unless the storage sites were converted into larger bases for Soviet forces.

(THE PRAGUE SPRING AND THE SOVIET INVASION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA: New Interpretations, COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT BULLETIN, Issue 3, Wilson Center, Mark Kramer, Fall 1993, p. 10) (IMG)

With the rise to power of the intelligentsia and the Titoist faction of the Czechoslovak 'Communist' Party, there came a further purge of the communist elements of the Czechoslovak military and intelligence and the decline in the influence of Eurasian intelligence services:

The result of these changes following the defection of Sejna was that the Soviet military lost its eyes in Czechoslovakia and, worse, lost its influence in the selection of senior military leaders. This was tantamount to shifting the Czechoslovak army from its previous position as the most reliable element in the Warsaw pact to the least reliable. (...). The effective loss of contact in the security field must have resulted in both alarmist reporting by the advisers and severe distortions in the perspective with which the Soviet political and security leadership viewed developments in Czechoslovakia. At a seminar on the Czechoslovak reform movement held at the University of Reading in 1971, Pavel Tigrid, the Paris-based Czechoslovak emigre journalist and publisher, pointed out that the Soviets used to get accurate information from Czechoslovakia when Soviet liaison officers were directly connected with the Ministry of the Interior, the security and they lost this control with the personnel the army, and changes and simply did not have adequate information on what was going on.

According to a former Czechoslovak intelligence official who was there at the time, the advisers replaced their sources with new ones, hastily recruited and unvetted, selected from the ousted ultraconservatives who, of course, had a built-in bias.

(...). Marshal Yakubovsky, Commander in Chief of Warsaw Pact forces, must have been alarmed at the Czechoslovak situation in 1968. When he came to Prague to explore the security repercussions of General Sejna's defection to the West he found not only the problems created by the presumed compromise of key Czechoslovak and Warsaw Pact secrets to Western intelligence but a situation in which top military and security leaders, known and trusted by their Soviet associates and counterparts, were being replaced with known liberals or politically untested unknowns.

(The Soviet Decision to Invade Czechoslovakia, Advanced Research Paper, Naval War College, Robert M. Guth, 1975, pp. 12-18) (IMG)

On the other hand, the Yugoslav agent Dubcek and his Titoist comrades promoted the influence of the Yugoslav secret service in Czechoslovakia. The fact that Dubcek's Titoist clique was backed by Yugoslavia's regime was indeed a fact that fostered the prospect of a 'Little Entente', a Titoist-dominated 'Federation', against the Eurasians, the paper published by the US Naval War College admitted. The document stated:

Support for Prague also came from Marshal Tito, the one Eastern European leader who had broken from Soviet domination and survived both the break and the subsequent introduction of many of the measures for which Dubcek was fighting. Both Ceausescu and Tito visited Prague in August 1968, just a few days before the invasion. Tito was in Czechoslovakia on August 9 and 10 and Ceausescu on August 15. Both were received with enthusiasm; Tito's welcome is described as "tumultuous" and "triumphant." The contrast of their reception to that of Ulbricht on August 12 was marked and ominous. Also ominous were references to a revival of the Little Entente, which Rockingham Gill suggests would have been "directed, not against the imperial pretensions of Budapest like the first Little Entente, but against the hegemony of Moscow." The prospect of an alliance of Czechoslovakia, Rumania and Yugoslavia, heretics in the middle of the Warsaw Pact, must have produced violent reactions in Moscow. (The Soviet Decision to Invade Czechoslovakia, Advanced Research Paper, Naval War College, Robert M. Guth, 1975, p. 30) (IMG)

The Yugoslav agent Dubcek was moving Czechoslovakia into Yugoslavia's sphere of influence:

There is little doubt that, had the conservatives been nullified and Czechoslovakia able to continue with an independent foreign policy, some closer relationship to the maverick Yugoslavs and recalcitrant Rumanians would have taken place. (The Soviet Decision to Invade Czechoslovakia, Advanced Research Paper, Naval War College, Robert M. Guth, 1975, p. 38) (IMG)

Furthermore, Otto Klieka – regarded as an obstacle to relations with the West German regime – was removed from his position as deputy foreign minister and was demoted to be the ambassador to the United Arab Republic (UAR). Being an ambassador to the UAR was no doubt important, but certainly was a demotion. The CIA reported:

On 14 January Deputy Minister for Foreign Affairs Otto Klieka, through to be a staunch anti-German, was named Czechoslovak Ambassador to Cairo. Klieka, an intelligent and capable diplomat, spent some five years in Nazi concentration camps, and later became known as an expert on Germany in the foreign ministry. Since he is a dedicated Communist and a Novotny man, he may be one of those hardline leaders opposing rapprochement with Bonn. Klieka's wife, Karla, is known to be outspokenly anti-German. (EASTERN EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCER, CIA, January 15, 1968, p. 2) (IMG)

The Titoist regime in Czechoslovakia, following the footsteps of the Gestapo agent Tito, was moving Czechoslovakia towards subjugation by West German finance capital. American finance capital, the ally of West German finance capital, of course encouraged this process; the US encouraged the West Germans (FRG) to provide tied 'aid' to Czechoslovakia:

With regard possibility West European countries, including FRG, extending financial assistance to Czechs, we would encourage such action.

Dubcek and his Titoist comrades in the Party pursued precisely what the US Department of State called for. Regarding Czechoslovakia's cooperation with the US-led camp, especially with West Germany, the Vienna Domestic Service reported:

The second point concerns economic cooperation. On this issue there are also certain fears that Prague might orient itself more to the we know that last week there was talk about a Western loan for Czechoslovakia. The amount was about 400 million dollars. Here in Prague, official sources do not want to talk about this. However, according to unofficial reports, the Soviet Union said to be very much interested in the further course of these talks. It had been intended that the Soviets grant such a loan to the Czechs, but so far they have not evidenced any reaction. Should the Soviet Union continue to leave this matter unsettled, Czechoslovakia would be forced to make use of this Western loan, however, carries 7-percent interest, very expensive for Czechoslovakia. But Czechoslovakia would have to swallow the bitter pill, since these million dollars would be the least needed for an upswing in the Czechoslovak economy. (MACHER REPORTS ON ULBRICHT'S PRAGUE VISIT, Vienna Domestic Service in German, 11:24 GMT, August 13, 1968. In: Federal Broadcasts Information Service (FBIS), CIA, August 14, 1968, p. 6) (IMG)

The cooperation with the West Germans of course came with Czechoslovakia liberalizing its border – rendering itself defenseless against NATO invasion. Karen Dawisha of the CIA's Brookings Institute confirmed that under the Dubcek faction in 1968, there came:

the official policy of removing the barbed wire along the Czech-Austrian border. (The Kremlin and the Prague Spring, Karen Dawisha, 1984, p. 205) (IMG)

Alongside Austrian tourists, Austrian 'tourists' entered Czechoslovakia. The Vienna Domestic Service reported:

During the first half of 1968, 166,000 Austrian tourists visited Czechoslovakia. Compared to the same period of 1967, this means an increase of 20,000 tourists. (MACHER REPORTS ON ULBRICHT'S PRAGUE VISIT, Vienna Domestic Service in German, 11:24 GMT, August 13, 1968. In: Federal Broadcasts Information Service (FBIS), CIA, August 14, 1968, p. 7) (IMG)

Ladislav Bittman, a Czechoslovak intelligence officer who defected to the West and provided intelligence to the Western secret services wrote:

A wave of tourists were flooding the country [in 1968], as they had thronged on the eve of the Munich agreement [in 1938]. (The Deception game: Czechoslovak Intelligence in Soviet Political Warfare, Ladislav Bittman, 1972, p. 195) (IMG)

Furthermore, in the words of a document published by the CIA's 'Woodrow Wilson Center' (also known as the George Kennan Institute):

since the early spring of 1968 ... it was announced that Czechoslovak border guards had dismantled a series of barbedwire and electrical fences along the border with West Germany. (THE PRAGUE SPRING AND THE SOVIET INVASION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA: New Interpretations, COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT BULLETIN, Issue 3, Wilson Center, Mark Kramer, Fall 1993, p. 10) (IMG)

Fascist aggression by the cross-border infiltration of undercover terrorists – history was repeating itself. The Titoist ruling elites in Czechoslovakia opened up the country for a NATO aggression by cross-border infiltration of NATO terrorists. In a critically important memorandum for the US State Department and NATO, George McGhee – a top US intelligence operative, military commander, oil businessman, and at the time, the US ambassador to the Federal Republic of Germany – wrote:

It is inevitable, of course, to recall the Hungarian experience. A major difference in the case of Czechoslovakia, however, is the presence of substantial US forces in Germany. This means that, contrary to the Hungarian case, we could in theory signal our support for the Czech Government by moving our troops closer to the Czech border or, indeed, cross the border to assist the Czechs in warding off a Soviet attack. I cannot, of course, on the basis of my responsibilities in Germany, make any significant contribution to whether this is desirable per se. Not only Germany but NATO would be deeply involved. (11943. Subj: Czechoslovakia. Telegram From the Embassy in Germany to the Department of State, Department of State, Central Files, POL CZECH. Secret; Limdis. Repeated to USNATO, Prague, Munich, USEUCOM, USAREUR, and USAFE, George C. McGhee, Bonn, May 10, 1968. Bold added.) (IMG)

During the ‘Hungarian experience’ of 1956, the Panzerwaffe troops stationed in Yugoslavia were infiltrated across the border into Hungary in order to assist the Horthyite and Nazi Arrow Cross troops to fight off the advancing Red Army troops (see C20S13). The American imperialists were advocating an aggression against Czechoslovakia by crossing the border. In this midst, the Dubcekite policy of liberalizing the borders with the West Germans and the Austrians was nothing short of high treason. Another US military and intelligence document written by US National Security Council (NSC) staff to the US president Johnson’s Special Assistant Walt Rostow, had the following excerpts for the invasion planning:

—Forces for possible intervention in Czechoslovakia could involve 1 U.S. brigade, 2 French divisions, and 2 FRG divisions.

—Employment of anything more than 1 brigade ought to be accompanied by NATO mobilization, which would require six months to reach planned force levels.

As support for the increased potential of a covert Atlantic invasion of Czechoslovakia, the Dubcek regime decided to reduce the troop count of the Czechoslovak military:

The Czechoslovak Army is being reduced by 20,000 troops.... [T]he reduction would involve only support personnel and would not affect the number of tactical units. A reduction in the size of the 195,000-man armed forces was reportedly planned by the Czechoslovak Government prior to the intervention by Warsaw Pact forces, but the size of the cut planned then is not known. (CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, CIA, November 14, 1968, p. 5) (IMG)

Note that the strengthening of the Czechoslovak military would not have helped Dubcek against a Red Army intervention since the main part of troops of the Dubcek group were not the Czechoslovak military units but were rather the NATO terrorists. The Eurasians were concerned about the cross-border infiltration of fascist terrorists via Austria and West Germany:

Soviet concerns about the security of the depots had been growing rapidly since the early spring of 1968, when it was announced that Czechoslovak border guards had dismantled a series of barbed-wire and electrical fences along the border with West Germany. These concerns gave rise by mid-1968 to “deep anxiety and fear” in Moscow about the “laxity of those responsible for Czechoslovakia’s western frontiers.” From then on, Soviet leaders were determined to rectify “the absolutely abnormal and dangerous situation on Czechoslovakia’s borders with the FRG and Austria,” which was enabling “imperialist spies and subversive elements to carry out subversive activities in a region where largescale defense forces of the Warsaw Pact governments are deployed.” (THE PRAGUE SPRING AND THE SOVIET INVASION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA: New Interpretations, COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT BULLETIN, Issue 3, Wilson Center, Mark Kramer, Fall 1993, p. 10) (IMG)

The Zionist agents of the American secret service, having risen to important positions in the leadership of the student/intelligentsia activist movements in Czechoslovakia, provided information to the US spy den (embassy) that they would launch a colour-revolutionary uprising of the intelligentsia in Czechoslovakia in support of the pro-Zionist tendency headed by Dubcek, giving the pro-Zionist tendency in the Czechoslovak government greater leverage. The CIA reported:

Representatives from the Student Parliament of the Philosophical Faculty at Charles University in Prague on 20 June petitioned the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to restore diplomatic relations with Israel. Students parading outside the ministry carried placards which claimed that over 13,000 people had signed the petition. The students also tipped off the US Embassy that they would take this action. The students’ petition again illustrates the popular feeling that the present government should undo the work of the Novotny regime, which broke relations with Israel after the June 1967 War. The Foreign Ministry has modified its stance since January, declaring it recognizes and respects the existence of all Middle East states, including Israel....

(Eastern European Intelligencer, CIA, June 21, 1968, p. 3) (IMG)

Media outlets and intelligence circles in Moscow highlighted the drastic increase in the pro-Zionist sympathies in the Czechoslovak regime. At the same time, the economy was being decentralized even further, and thus the Czechoslovak economy was being sabotaged. This had a negative influence on Czechoslovak relations with the UAR, since socialist Czechoslovakia – when dominated by the communist faction and at the height of Anglo-American and Moscow Titoist sanctions on Czechoslovakia – had provided military support to the UAR. As mentioned before, so vigorous was the Dubcekite tides in Czechoslovakia that well until 1969, some reactionary Titoization ‘reforms’ were taking place, even after the Warsaw Pact intervention. Till, the last days of his rule, Dubcek, the agent of Tito, ensured that maximum damage is inflicted upon the Gamal Abdel-Nasser faction. Richard Nyrop, a political officer of the US State Department in Pakistan, wrote:

The turning point for Egypt came on April 14, 1969, when Czechoslovakia, a heavy supplier of arms to Egypt, announced that its arms shipments would be reduced and that there would be no further arms contracts, concluding with a warning to the Arab states against any moves toward a new war. (Area Handbook for Egypt, Richard F. Nyrop, 1976, p. 46) (IMG)

The halt occurred in 1969 when Yugoslav agent Dubcek and his Titoist friends had not yet been fully ousted despite the Warsaw Pact intervention. In the sphere of political economy, the usual counter-revolutionary pro-bureaucracy policies were implemented. In order to create a dual bureaucracy of the Party and the government both controlling the same fields, the role of the Party was reduced and the role of the government was elevated:

The role of the party in the process of government was reduced, and the National Assembly was directed to assume its constitutional role as the "supreme organ of state power." (NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE SURVEY 18: CZECHOSLOVAKIA: COUNTRY PROFILE, CIA, May 1974, p. 12) (IMG)

Although the intelligentsia dominated the Party, there still existed a contingent of proletarians and kolkhozniks in the Party. The percentage membership of proletarians in communist party cadres was usually more than the percentage composition of the government ministries by proletarians. In the event of continued domination of the Party over the bureaucracy of the economic bodies, such a proletarian and kolkhoznik contingent in the Party could influence the bureaucracy of the economic bodies and to slow down the Dubcekite promotion of the corrupt bureaucrats. Hence, the Dubcek group aimed to weaken the Party, as a means of further weakening the hold of the proletariat and the kolkhozniks over the economy, even though the Party was run by the pro-Dubcekite intelligentsia as the largest membership percentage. Directly correlated with such an anti-Party trend was the project to proliferate bureaucracy and chaos through economic decentralization:

Plans were made to establish a decentralized and market-oriented economy, akin in spirit if not in detail to the Yugoslav model. (NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE SURVEY 18: CZECHOSLOVAKIA: COUNTRY PROFILE, CIA, May 1974, p. 12) (IMG)

The notorious Slovak separatist Gustav Husak (see C15S8) became the deputy head of the country. And:

Gustav Husak was called out of political obscurity to lead a drive to federalize the state. And while the Dubcek regime repeatedly reaffirmed its basic loyalty to Moscow, it delighted its prideful domestic constituency by simultaneously serving notice that Czechoslovakia would thenceforth maintain a less subservient stance. (NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE SURVEY 18: CZECHOSLOVAKIA: COUNTRY PROFILE, CIA, May 1974, p. 12) (IMG)

In this midst, it should become increasingly clear how dangerous the strategic reorientation of Czechoslovakia away from the camp of the anti-colonial national bourgeoisie, the proletariat, and the kolkhozniks onto the camp of the bureaucrats, finance capital, mercantile capital, kulaks, etc. would have been. It is no slander to say that the agenda of the Dubcek group was to subordinate the Czechoslovak homeland to the likes of the Yugoslav-harboured Panzerwaffe troops as had happened in Hungary in 1956. The Titoization agenda of the Dubcek group was paving the way towards a Greater Yugoslav Empire ('Little Entente') subordinate to the West German Nazis the threat of a Little Entente independent of the Soviet political and eventually military sphere of influence, or the threat of a total loss of political influence in Czechoslovakia's internal affairs in connection with predictable changes resulting from the 14th Party Congress.

Or it was a combination of these two threats. The more fundamental cause of the decision was, of course, the perceived loss of Czechoslovakia as a political or military ally, due to the forces of an uncontrolled liberalization that would rapidly drive the country into the hands of the revenge-seeking West Germans. (The Soviet Decision to Invade Czechoslovakia, Advanced Research Paper, Naval War College, Robert M. Guth, 1975, p. 43) (IMG)

No, the socialist and progressive forces in Eastern Europe could not stand by and watch as Czechoslovakia was being converted into another Kosovo. The presence of the Eurasian military and intelligence services in Czechoslovakia was of vital importance for preventing the full seizure of Czechoslovakia by the army of rapists and assassins serving Tito's fascist secret service. It was also vitally necessary to support the presence of the Eurasian army in Czechoslovakia – in a strictly legal and non-aggressor manner – so to deter a covert invasion by hordes of West German hooligans. It was unacceptable to allow the Mossad to influence Czechoslovakia, turning this major center of arms for into a center of arms for the IDF terrorists under the command of the Moshe Dayan faction. The US State Department's high command certainly agreed that Eurasian hesitation on intervention in Czechoslovakia helped US objectives in Eastern Europe and the Middle East:

On the other hand, if the Soviets hesitate and withdraw, allowing the process of liberalization to proceed in Eastern Europe, the political atmosphere should improve fundamentally, in ways most favorable to us. Poland would almost surely follow the Czech example. Ulbricht would be isolated. New possibilities for a settlement in Europe would be opened. We could hope for a toning down of Soviet imperialism in the Middle East and elsewhere. The Soviet leaders responsible for the failure of Soviet policy in Eastern Europe might well be thrown out, as Khrushchev was, to be replaced by leaders who would at least be weaker for a time than the present group. (Memorandum From the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs (Rostow) to Secretary of State Rusk, SUBJECT: Deterrent action with regard to Czechoslovakia, Washington, July 20, 1968. As can be seen, to hesitate was unacceptable. On the other hand the events in Czechoslovakia were going to impact the course of events in the Middle East as well:

The possibility of Russian military intervention in Czechoslovakia is a matter of basic concern to the United States. Ambassador Thompson and others think the risk is increasing. Such an event could well torpedo the NPT and set back the trend towards détente in Europe. Its effect on our relations with the Soviet Union would probably reduce the chance for a peaceful settlement in the Middle East and Viet-Nam.... On net, Soviet armed intervention in Czechoslovakia would probably change the political atmosphere fundamentally in ways that could harm our interests. (Memorandum From the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs (Rostow) to Secretary of State Rusk, SUBJECT: Deterrent action with regard to Czechoslovakia, Washington, July 20, 1968. Source: Department of State, Central Files, POL CZECH-USSR. Secret; Exdis. The source text bears no drafting information but is initialed by Rostow. Although Titoist influence was dramatically increasing in Czechoslovakia, it was not yet so strong as to be able to fully hand that country over to the Atlantic camp. This allowed room for the communist anti-Titoist elements in Czechoslovakia on the one hand, and Eurasian communist anti-Titoist elements on the other, to pressure Dubcek's group into accepting Warsaw Pact military 'exercises' in Czechoslovakia:

shortly thereafter Soviet pressures to permit stationing of troops in Czechoslovak territory became intense to the point where Dubcek had to agree to permit maneuvers on Czechoslovak soil as the lesser of two evils. Protestations by Defense Minister General Dzur that these were long-scheduled and purely staff or communications exercises were contradicted by the sudden arrival in Prague of Grechko with a large party of Red Army generals and marshals. Not long after their departure on May 22, well before the announced dates for the exercises, June 20-30, Soviet, Polish, East German and Hungarian troops were crossing the Czechoslovak borders in sizable numbers. In command was the Commander in Chief of Warsaw Pact forces, Yakubovsky. He evidently had difficulty including the Czechoslovak military forces in the "joint military exercises." According to one later commentator, "Czechoslovak officers were not told what was going on, Czechoslovak journalists were not admitted to press conferences and even the Prime Minister, Mr. Cernik, was told he could contact Yakubovsky only through Moscow. In fact, Czechoslovak officials never learned how many troops were in their country or exactly what was their disposition. Well after the official closing date for the Warsaw Pact maneuvers, reports of Soviet troops in Czechoslovakia were so frequent that Dubcek refused to meet with Soviet leaders in late July until the troops had all cleared out. (The Soviet Decision to Invade Czechoslovakia, Advanced Research Paper, Naval War College, Robert M. Guth, 1975, pp. 20-21) (IMG) Indeed, judging by the location and scale of Soviet troop movements during the crisis, the Pact's "exercises" seem to have been intended, in part, to protect the three sites chosen as nuclear weapons depots. (THE PRAGUE SPRING AND THE SOVIET INVASION OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA: New Interpretations, COLD WAR INTERNATIONAL HISTORY PROJECT BULLETIN, Issue 3, Wilson Center, Mark Kramer, Fall 1993, p. 10) (IMG)

Of course, the exercise of the Warsaw Pact troops were there to establish the Eurasian intelligence and military presence in Czechoslovakia as a counter-weight to Dubcekite-approved imperialist secret service presence, and to counteract the political leverage of the Titoist commanders whom Dubcek's group had installed at the helm of the Czechoslovak military. The exercise was basically an excuse which assisted in the weakening of the Dubcek faction's leverage in negotiations vis-à-vis the Eurasians:

The USSR's full withdrawal [was] accomplished at a snail's pace.... It is generally accepted that their presence was a threat and a form of pressure and at the same time that it served as a rehearsal and as a cover for the subsequent invasion. (The Soviet Decision to Invade Czechoslovakia, Advanced Research Paper, Naval War College, Robert M. Guth, 1975, pp. 21-22) (IMG)

During the first meetings, Dubcek and a Titoist renegade ironically named 'Svoboda' ferociously stood against the Eurasian call for stationing troops in Czechoslovakia. However, as the US Embassy in Czechoslovakia stated, it was possible that during the later meetings, some concessions were secretly given to the Eurasians with regards to Red Army presence in Czechoslovakia. In fact, publicly, Dubcek and Co. agreed to give concessions to the Eurasians regarding censorship against Czechoslovakia's Titoist media (though Dubcek ended up breaking his promises). The following are excerpts of a report from the US Embassy in Czechoslovakia:

1. Dubcek regime can take considerable credit for saving its skin at Cierna and for staring down the Soviet threat of force. We understand this is what actually happened at first meetings, when Dubcek stood up against personal attack and Svoboda said he would resign if Soviets insisted on troop stationing in Czechoslovakia. Czechs also seem to have essentially preserved their ability to pursue their own domestic program.

2. Czechs however paid heavy verbal price in language of Bratislava Declaration (see below), which if nothing else clearly implies that Czechs will hew closely to Soviet foreign policy line. They also agreed at Cierna to hold down anti-Soviet material in media and reportedly agreed to restrict emergence of new political groups; both concessions spell trouble for Dubcek group's relations with progressive domestic allies. Additional concessions may have been made and not yet brought to light, e.g. on Soviet military presence here or on personnel adjustments (either removal of [Dubcekite] [pseudo-]progressives or retention of others).

Since Dubcek and his Titoist allies in Czechoslovakia broke their deal which had entailed a struggle against Titoists in the state and media, Brezhnev had a conversation with Dubcek. Remarkably, regarding what the Eurasians were to do towards the situation in Czechoslovakia, Dubcek responded as shown below:

DUBČEK. Cde. Brezhnev, you should resort to all the measures that your CC Politburo believes are appropriate.

BREZHNEV. But if that's how you're going to answer me, I must say to you, Sasha, that this is a flippant statement.

DUBČEK. I'm not able to answer in any other way. We're working very hard to carry out the agreement. But in these conditions over the last week to ten days we haven't yet fully coped with it. We're not able to do more than what we've been doing. This is a large matter to deal with, and we're not able to complete all our work in just 10-15 days. How could it all be done in such a short time? I'm not able to take responsibility upon myself for doing everything in just five to seven days; this is a complex process, which has encompassed the whole party, the whole country, and the whole nation. And the party must keep control of this process, bringing the nation along with it in the construction of socialism. In this we see our duty, and in this we see our obligation, but it's impossible to do this in as short a time as you are suggesting, Cde. Brezhnev. With full responsibility I am telling you that if you don't believe me, if you believe we are deceiving you, then you should take the measures that your Politburo believes are necessary.

In other words, Dubcek was telling the Eurasians that they could send their troops to Czechoslovakia if they so desire. Since Dubcek had already come under Red Army pressure due to Warsaw Pact 'exercises' in Czechoslovakia, he was giving all these concessions to Eurasians.

During that time period, Eurasian diplomat Valentin Falin headed the 2nd European (British) Department of the Eurasian Foreign Ministry. According to Valentin Falin, on August 16, Dubcek himself asked Brezhnev to send Soviet troops into Czechoslovakia:

Often Leonid Ilyich would come to us in a small room near his office and ask ironically: "Still doing magic?" We insisted that the costs of military intervention would be greater than the profits. The answer was usually: "You don't know everything." Indeed, we did not know, for example, that on August 16, that is, four days before our invasion of the Czechoslovak SSR, Dubcek called Brezhnev and asked him to send in Soviet troops. No matter how hard the Czechs try to silence this fact, the recording of the phone conversation is stored in the archive. (Interview with Ambassador Valentin Falin, Ambassador of the Soviet Union, No. 8 (907), Society and Science, Special project, Itogi Magazine) (IMG)

Falin presents Dubcek's remarks in such a manner that as though Dubcek willingly told the Eurasians to intervene. Of course, in reality, Dubcek would only have invited Eurasian intervention, if politically encircled to the point that he would be compelled to concede and make such a suggestion. The most important factor in the political encirclement and cooptation of Dubcek had been the brief Red Army presence under the pretext of 'exercise' in Czechoslovakia. Had Dubcek not been politically encircled, he would not have made any such concessions. Since Valentin Falin was speaking as a former Eurasian foreign ministry official (albeit he was arrested during Stalin era on imperialist intelligence activity charges and was released when Beria gang took over), his remarks of course cannot be so easily cited as a Western confession. Nonetheless, in terms of the logic of the story, his remarks certainly would make sense so long as one also adds the point that Dubcek was coopted to make such concessions and that he did not make such a suggestion on his own free-enough will.

As mentioned previously several times, the communist faction in the CPSU and the Red Army utilized its cooptee Brezhnev as a vehicle for anti-Titoist communist influence. The strategy of coopting Malenkov against Beria, coopting Khrushchev against Malenkov, and coopting Brezhnev against Khrushchev, was the Stalin-era strategy that was continued by the many comrades of Stalin after his death. After the death of Stalin, coopting Malenkov against Beria and Khrushchev against Malenkov was spearheaded by Genreal Konev, an old comrade of Stalin and a target of Beria and the Doctors' Plot. One of the most prominent figures in this midst was General Shtemenko, also an old comrade of Stalin and a target of the Doctors' Plot. Shtemenko put his support behind Brezhnev to coopt the latter to promote the communist elements in the armed forces. With the rise of Brezhnev's group, Shtemenko became the leader of the Warsaw Pact forces shortly prior to the intervention in Czechoslovakia:

The question of Stalin's place in Soviet history had been fiercely argued since his death, with his contribution clearly receiving more favorable appraisal after Khrushchev was ousted. In June 1968 a book was published entitled The General Staff During the War, by General Sergei Shtemenko, who praised Stalin's wartime leadership. In a review of the book, Krasnaya Zvezda commented that the General Staff had not been so unprepared for the Nazi invasion as some historians believed. The attack had not thrown the General Staff into disarray, thanks primarily to Stalin, who had remained in the Kremlin throughout, refusing to evacuate the Staff headquarters to underground shelters in Kirovskaya Metro. Shtemenko, who had been demoted by Khrushchev for his loyalty to Stalin, was soon to regain some of his former prominence. He was to become the chief of staff of the Warsaw Pact only three weeks before the invasion of Czechoslovakia. (The Kremlin and the Prague Spring, Karen Dawisha, 1984, p. 205) (IMG)

Shtemenko indeed led the intervention. On August 20, 1968, the Warsaw Pact deployed its troops to Czechoslovakia. Since the intervention was upon the invitation – after the partial cooptation – of the Czechoslovak leadership, it was not an invasion according to international law. In the end, the purpose of abiding by international law is not really a communist belief in its sacredness but rather an attempt to showcase one's law-abiding behaviour while exposing the imperialist violations of international law. The Stalin-era USSR intervened in the Baltic areas and overthrew their regimes through such a cooptation-for-invitation strategy. Military intervention should have happened in Czechoslovakia, but it was necessary to do so using loopholes in international law.

Moreover, although from a "bird's eye view," looking at the troop movements from the top, the intervention superficially appeared as an invasion, it did not appear like an invasion at all, on-the-ground. The August 1968 intervention was a mere troop deployment into Czechoslovakia for the purpose of establishing a powerful counter-weight against Anglo-American imperialist secret service and terrorist presence in that territory. In an intelligence report to Washington, US ambassador to Czechoslovakia, Jacob Beam, noted the:

calm determined attitude of population and avoidance of anti-Soviet excesses.... (Telegram from the Embassy in Czechoslovakia to the Department of State, 'Subj: Czechoslovak situation', Jacob D. Beam, Embassy, Prague, August 24, 1968, 1600Z. Source: Department of State, Central Files, POL 27-1 COMBLOC-CZECH. Confidential; Immediate. Repeated to Bonn, London, Paris, Moscow, Munich, USNATO, and USUN. In: 'Foreign Relations of the United States, 1964-1968', Vol. 17, Eastern Europe, US Department of State) (IMG)

Historical experience has shown time and time again that when proletarians hold anti-socialist views, in practice, they 'fight' against socialism like cowardly 'chickens', while creating splits in the anti-socialist camp by acting like 'lions' in the face of capitalism and wrongly accusing the bourgeoisie of not being anti-socialist 'enough'. In practice, those proletarians influenced by anti-socialist propaganda end up not fighting against socialism with much vigour. Such was why, during the Great Patriotic War, the Red Army had an easier time taking over the proletarian-populated Prussian northeast of Germany while not being able to take over the petit-bougerois agrarian southeast of Germany even though the Red Army was geographically proximate to the agrarian petit-bourgeois southeast. In Germany, the proletarians were under the heavy propaganda bombardment of the Nazis and although the pro-communist attitudes were fairly strong among the proletarians of Nazi Germany, inevitably a large contingent of those proletarians would have held Nazi anti-communist views. Yet, the Red Army had an easier time taking over the industrialized proletarian zones. The Czechian proletarians had a reputation for being staunchly pro-Soviet, and felt alienated by the Dubcekite reforms. There is not even the slightest shred of evidence that the Czechian proletarians were opposed to the Red Army. The calm of the population and the avoidance of anti-Soviet activity in Czechoslovakia can be explained by the proletarian-ness of the population there.

Remarkably, Jacob Beam, the head of the US intelligence station in Prague, acknowledged that the Warsaw Pact and Eurasian military presence in Czechoslovakia did not have the characteristic appearances that a military coup or an invasion-and-occupation would have, nor was there much of an active physical resistance against the Eurasian and Warsaw Pact military presence. Jacob Beam wrote:

1. As occupation goes into fourth day, following is situation as viewed from here.
2. This is bizarre kind of occupation. Although occupying forces have taken over key points they have not established martial law (except in some provincial cities), have not imposed military government, and have not yet installed puppet government. Legally constituted government claims to be still in being: 22 out of about 30 Ministers attended Cabinet meeting yesterday, apparently in Hradcany Castle. National Assembly claims to be in continuing session in its own building. Communist Party organs not only continuing to operate but managed to convene Party Congress under noses of occupying forces despite fact that Congress severely complicates Soviets' problems in installing compliant regime. Several district and regional committees have announced they will respect new CC elected by Congress. (...).
4. Population in Prague has conducted itself very well. (...). Actions of population and slogans (including many which equate Soviets with Fascists) are highly provocative, but with few exceptions people have been able to avoid provoking extreme reaction by occupiers. Widespread calls for neutrality represents wishful thinking which could embarrass reformist leaders seeking realistic solution.

Cancellation of mass demonstration late Thursday afternoon with enforcement by young Czechs is best example of self-discipline practiced by population. Silent clearing of streets during general strike at noon yesterday also impressive.

5. Public transportation in Prague is reduced and few private cars are in circulation, probably because of gasoline unavailability (gas stations no longer operating). Most shops remained closed through yesterday but are beginning to open this morning. Prague factories were open yesterday but did not seem to be working. Food still available in limited supplies, for which long queues wait, but we have seen little evidence of obvious hoarding.

6. Scene [Serene?] attitude of Soviets perplexing in many respects. Except for resistance and firing first day in vicinity Prague Radio building (Embtel 3054)³ they have not used much muscle and sporadic apparently aimless firing may primarily be intended as reminder of military presence. At beginning Prague populace inclined to talk to soldiers asking them why they were here but this has stopped and silent contempt treatment may be making troops edgy.

7. Czechoslovakia presents remarkable demonstration of a country running itself without an effective central government. Main direction so far being provided by strong party elements controlling clandestine radios. Interesting Soviets have not used their own means of issuing proclamations and their decisions, which have to be heeded, such as curfew, are carried on resistance radios. In some other cities, notably Pilsen which has been observed, accommodations of mutual non-interference have been worked out between commanders and local party chiefs. Lacking a Quisling administration Soviets were obviously unprepared to take over the country and had not called forward conventional instruments of occupation such as a pervasive secret police and military government commands.

The military intervention into Czechoslovakia was not really an invasion, nor a coup. It did not even immediately topple the Dubcek group.

Years of Titoization in Eastern Europe had resulted in East Germany being almost alone, among the Eastern European countries outside Eurasia, in enthusiastically favoring a Warsaw Pact and Eurasian military intervention into Titoist-dominated Czechoslovakia:

With the exception of East Germany, no Eastern European country appears to favor Soviet military intervention in Czechoslovakia. The Yugoslav counselor in Warsaw reports that the Polish leadership is adamantly opposed to military intervention, while the Turkish foreign minister has said that visiting Hungarian Foreign Minister Peter told him that the Hungarian Government opposes armed intervention in Czechoslovakia. (CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, CIA, July 25, 1968, p. 2) (IMG)

People's Democratic Albania, at the time officially in an 'alliance' with China's Trotskyite terror regime, would not have possibly spoken out in support of the intervention in Czechoslovakia. Since the Chinese regime's Titoists 'opposed' Dubcek and Co. in words but not in deeds, Albania, under Chinese regime influence, followed China publicly. It therefore joined the Chinese regime in denouncing the supposed 'Soviet social-fascist' and 'Soviet social-imperialist' 'invasion and occupation' of Yugoslav satellite Czechoslovakia.

Hoxha himself believed in at least some of the nonsense that the Albanian government parroted from Chinese regime propaganda. Although Hoxha was a communist, he had a poor understanding of some of the concepts of the historical materialist science and dialectics, and thus apparently misunderstood the situation in Czechoslovakia. Hoxha therefore publicly took an anti-communist stance on this issue, and officially supported the Chinese regime's line and hence also the Yugoslav regime's line on the matter, even after the Sino-Albanian 'split'. Although a seriously erroneous line adopted by the Albanian leader, this is not large enough to cause a leap from quantity to quality to transition him from being a communist to a non-/anti-communist, because this pro-Titoist deviation that Hoxha publicly endorsed as result of his apparent misunderstandings, could only be an exceptional deviation from his general anti-Titoist course. On the other hand, Ulbricht took a more correct line on this matter.

Also worth mentioning is the fact that the UAR and Abdel-Nasser himself personally took a stand against the pro-Zionist Dubcek regime and supported the Warsaw Pact intervention. Abdel-Nasser, as mentioned elsewhere in C21S2.1, criticized Tito for the latter's 'reckless' stance on Yugoslavia. Gromyko, in a conversation with Abdel-Nasser thanked him for his stance:

I take the opportunity to confess to your honor what we have said officially, that the leadership in Moscow and the Soviet government highly appreciated your position regarding the events in Czechoslovakia last August, and we considered the position of the socialist countries to be good. (Minutes of President Gamal Abdel Nasser's talks with Andrei Gromyko, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Soviet Union, Cairo, El-Qubba Palace, December 23, 1968, p. 17)

Dubcek's Titoist deputy Gustav Husak was encircled by anti-Titoist agents in a variety of ways, which meant that for his own political survival, he had to take a stand against his own Titoist brethren. Speaking in the usual anti-Eurasian propagandistic manner, the CIA sheds light on the nature of Husak's politics:

The failure of the Soviets to install Novotny or a trusted agent like Indra does not detract from the completeness of their victory. Husak – a man once jailed for nationalism, a man who had preceded even Dubcek on the liberal road, a man with a reputation for independence – is, like Kadar in Hungary and Gomulka in Poland before him, well suited for Soviet control. He has been, as he said at the September Plenum, an involuntary student of history. He will carry out the essential Soviet orders as long as the prerequisites exist. The Soviets have seen to it that they do. (Czechoslovakia: The Problem of Soviet Control (Reference Title: ESAU XLIV), Intelligence Memorandum, January 16, 1970, p. VI) (IMG)

Husak did not carry out the 'orders' of the Eurasians because, as Jacob Beam had stated, the Eurasians did not treat the Czechoslovak Party as though it was a branch of their own military. However, insofar as the above CIA quote means that Husak was compelled to carry out the plans of some of his own anti-Titoist opponents, the US intelligence document quote is correct. Husak turned against Dubcek kind of like how the Anglo-Yugoslav agent and fascist colour-revolutionary Janos Kadar turned 'against' Imre Nagy and opportunistically denounced Yugoslavia.

Thus, the CIA also stated:

Another leader who has emerged in the wake of the invasion is Gustav Husak, an aggressive, outspoken individual who heads the Slovak party. Husak spent most of the 1950s in jail on charges of "bourgeois nationalism," and after his release was politically inactive until this year. When Dubcek took over, however, Husak was one of the first to raise his voice in support of liberal reforms. In the present situation, Husak has become a centrist.... (CZECHOSLOVAK LEADERSHIP FACES UNCERTAIN FUTURE: Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 29, 1968, p. 7) (IMG)

Remember that Huask had been arrested by the Soviet-backed Czechoslovak counter-intelligence service on the correct charges of being a Slovak separatist. The CIA too reported that they were Slovak separatists:

Separatism in Slovakia has resulted from the opposition of the Slovak Communist leaders Husak, Clementis, Novomesky, Okali, [and] Smidke.... (Crisis in the Czechoslovak Communist Party, CIA, December 10, 1951, p. 2) (IMG)

Hindered by the increasing attacks of Slansky and his followers (Geminder, Frank and Koehler), and almost paralyzed in its activities by the dangerously growing Slovak separatism of the Husak group.... (Crisis in the Czechoslovak Communist Party, CIA, December 10, 1951, p. 2) (IMG)

Vladimir Clementis was a prominent Mossad spy in Czechoslovakia. Husak was linked to Clementis through their joint struggle for the partition of Czechoslovakia. Yet, as further evidence of how bad the situation was, Huask, who had been elevated to deputy leadership by Dubcek himself, was supported by the communist agents to replace Dubcek. Undoubtedly, coopting Husak against Dubcek was useful and a correct strategy, but surely from a communist perspective, it was annoying that not a communist hero like Novotny but a Mossad-linked Yugoslav-backed Dubcek agent and Slovak separatist was becoming the leader of 'socialist' Czechoslovakia. Huask was not one man standing on aid but had an entire Dubcekite faction behind him, opposing him insofar as he was coopted by the communists and supporting him insofar as he showed his true Titoist face.

What characterized the Husak leadership was that only partial de-Titoization was to occur, as opposed to full de-Titoization, because full de-Titoization meant the purge of Husak as well, and Husak had been a Titoist Slovak separatist linked to the Mossad agent Clementis. Gustav Husak – an ally of Yugoslavia, and a Mossad-linked Slovak separatist – opportunistically presented himself as a lesser-Dubcekite and thereby was able to replace Dubcek. He did nonetheless implement some anti-Titoist reforms in Czechoslovakia. The US intelligence stated:

Despite the apparent urgency of the need to correct the "distortions" of the Dubcek era, Husak sought to establish a relatively moderate regime, one which would gradually win both popular [read: intelligentsia's] acceptance and support by turning back the clock as gently and selectively as possible. In this, he was hampered to some degree by his own authoritarian bent, a trait which was reflected in his willingness to employ firm and occasionally brutal methods in suppressing the open manifestations of dissent which marred his early months in office. More important, however, his room for maneuver – never very great – shrank markedly as the forced exodus of liberals from public life gradually deemed him the traditional centrist option of playing both ends of the political spectrum against each other. Husak's problems of this score were compounded by the Soviets who, suspicious about his reformist past and true intentions with respect to the future, not only withheld the support he needed to consolidate his domestic position but also actively sought to prevent him from becoming too powerful by giving measured encouragement to his hardline critics. In keeping with this strategy, flattering attention was paid to prominent conservatives, especially to those like Alois Indra and Vasil Bilak who were potential contenders for party leadership, and their willing cooperation was enlisted in keeping a close watch on Husak and in prodding him to further rapid compliance with Soviet wishes.

Because of these pressures, Husak was forced into a series of damaging political retreats. He yielded to his opponents on some key cadre appointments. Bit by bit, he backed away from his early positions on a number of vital issues, including his initial and highly popular contention that the 1968 intervention had been both uninvited and unneeded, his promise that there would be no massive purge of the party membership, and his advocacy of a policy of "reconciliation" with the deposed liberal community. Indeed, as he shifted toward a more orthodox and conservative posture, his policies at times became indistinguishable from those of his hardline rivals.

But Husak's retreat never became a rout. A tough and battle-scarred master of the art of political survival, he yielded just enough to steal his conservative opponents' thunder and to bolster his standing with Moscow. By so doing, he was able to prevent his rivals from converting the party purge of 1970 into a witchhunt that would have deprived the organization of its mass character and reduced it to an elite core of hardliners. He also managed to stave off demands for Stalinist-style political trials and for a wholesale purge of technicians, managers, and other members of the technical intelligentsia.

(NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE SURVEY 18: CZECHOSLOVAKIA: COUNTRY PROFILE, CIA, May 1974, p. 15) (IMG)

The new KSC leadership launched a purge of the intelligentsia. Encircled by communist anti-Titoist elements, Husak partially supported these purges. The US State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research reported:

intellectuals in the cultural-educational sectors and in the mass media were among the hardest hit in the series of purges undertaken by the Husak leadership since April 1969. (World Strength of the Communist Party Organizations, Issue 23, United States Department of State, Bureau of Intelligence and Research, May 1971, p. 66) (IMG)

Although conditions improved during the Husak years, they were far, far from enough. Husak the Slovak separatist saboteur was reflective of his own Party's membership composition which was white-collar majority, but a weaker-than-before majority:

On January 1, 1970, workers comprised 26.1% of the party membership, the lowest in the post-World War II period; 5.2% were collective farmers. (In 1946 workers comprised 58% and farmers 13% of the party membership.) The majority of the party is now made up of white-collar workers (party functionaries, technicians, intellectuals). C22S10. Struggles in Poland, the Ouster of the Gomulka Group  IMG-All-{Poland}

The rise to power of the Brezhnevians in Eurasia created pressures against the Titoist intelligence network in Poland, leading to the mounting of opposition to the Gomulka faction:

Poland: A purge of middle echelon officials is gathering momentum.

Dismissal of a deputy minister of foreign trade and the head of the nuclear energy program probably signals further shifts on this level. Numerous lesser ranking party and government officials have already been fired, A number of working level officials reportedly have not been seen at their regular duties. Trade union functionaries, dissident writers, and academicians have also lost their jobs.

Most of the victims are ... veteran officials who have long been under fire by the party's hardline elements. They probably will be replaced by hard-liner appointees.

New voices are being raised at party meetings and in the press for additional "unmasking" of the "enemies of Poland." The prodding is beginning to take on aspects of a directed campaign and includes hints that some in the upper reaches of the leadership will also be affected. The creation of such a charged atmosphere adds weight to reports of imminent changes in the top levels of the government at a parliamentary session next week.

The situation in Poland, and perhaps even some of the planned changes, may have been discussed at a meeting on 2 April between the Polish ambassador in Moscow and Brezhnev's trouble shooter, Kirilenko,

The purge is being carried out in party leader Gomulka's name, but it appears certain that he is no longer in control of the party elements conducting it. If the process affects Gomulka's supporters, he might become so weakened that he would be little more than a figurehead. (CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, CIA, April 5, 1968, p. 7) (IMG)

Anti-Zionist rhetoric was on the rise in Poland, and the surge in anti-Titoist activity led even Gomulka to officially denounce 'revisionism' even though he himself officially was a revisionist as well:

After they raised the issue of "Zionist" disloyalty, the hard liners played on Gomulka's [official denunciation] of "alien revisionistic" elements. He has been susceptible to this canard, although anti-Semitism as such is not part of Gomulka's make-up – his wife is Jewish. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 6) (IMG)

A number of the targets of the anti-Titoist purges in Poland were Yiddish in national origin. This however did not mean a hostility of the communist anti-Titoist faction towards the Yiddish proletarians. Rather, it entailed the hostility of the communist faction towards the white-collar elements and Titoist agents some of whom turned out to be Yiddish. Because some of them were Yiddish, the Anglo-American media accused the anti-Titoist purges in Poland of being 'anti-Semitic' in nature. No surprise. However, against this slander, the CIA makes an important confession here:

Moczar's forces acquired their anti-Semitic image by exploiting the role of Jews in the Polish Communist movement and the latent anti-Semitism of the Polish people. The campaign they unleashed in the fall of 1967 was not aimed at all of Poland's 30,000 Jews, the remnant of the prewar Jewish population of over 3 million. Rather, it was aimed at removing from party, state, and cultural organizations those influential Jews who were prominent during the Stalinist period and had managed to survive by supporting Gomulka's return in 1956. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 6. Bold added.) (IMG)

The Anglo-American media, which supported the rise of the Gestapo spy Spsychalski and the virulent anti-Semite Gomulka, was in no position to call such purges 'anti-Semitic'. Amongst the Yiddish people, there existed reactionary elements, such as the intelligentsia. The counter-revolutionary Yiddish intelligentsia, the enemies of the Yiddish proletarians, were the natural allies of the Gestapo spy Spsychalski and his henchman Gomulka. It was time, high time, to purge off the intelligentsia, both the Yiddish intellectuals and the Polish intellectuals.

Secondly, as the CIA pointed out, the Moczarists acquired their reputation in the West as 'anti-Semites' when they unleashed the campaign against the Titoist elements among the Yiddish people. Moczar and his gang were indeed anti-Semites, as incontrovertibly evidence by their active and comprehensive promotion of the intelligence presence of the Home Army (AK) pogromists in Poland since as early as the 1950s. When the Moczar gang was actively promoting the MI6-backed AK pogromists in the Polish state security bodies, when the AK pogromists were savagely spilling Yiddish blood in schools, in different neighbourhoods, when the MI6-backed AK operatives were sending letters to the Yiddish households in Poland threatening the Yiddish citizens and their children with total incineration unless those Yiddish families would leave Poland – during such a time, the Anglo-American media outlets were more than deafeningly silent, hardly speaking a word to denounce the atrocities, and only further praising the 'brave' anti-Soviet 'warriors', the AK 'anti-Nazi' 'freedom-fighters'. As soon as the Moczar group was coopted by the communists, as soon as the Moczar group was encircled by communist agents and compelled into action against the Gestapo spy Spsychalski and his henchman Gomulka, only then did the Anglo-American media began to highlight the virulent anti-Semitism of the Moczar group. Even then, in the late 1960s, having been coopted by the communist agents, the Moczar group was forced to drastically reduce its targeting of the Yiddish proletarians and focused mostly on the Yiddish Titoist bureaucrats and intellectuals.

Of course, added to the Anglo-American media was of course the CIA-backed MI6-backed media outlets, the mainstream media, in Israel. Even now, Israel refused to loudly condemn the Home Army terrorists, mainly because the Home Army was backed by the Anglo-American imperialist allies of the Israeli regime. Israeli condemnation of the Home Army has been limited to people like the Yad Vashem Holocaust researcher Yehuda Bauer and other Mapam-linked activists, and Bauer himself condemned the 'collaborationist' policy of the Israeli government on the historiography of the AK terrorists. Back in the 1960s, when the erosion of the influence of the Gomulka gang was occurring, the anti-Titoist purges were condemned as 'anti-Semitic' by the Zionist organizations. This is not surprising in light of the fact that the Zionist agents of the American secret service, the agents of the American imperialist enemies of the Yiddish proletarians, were themselves collaborators with such anti-Semitic terrorist Gestapo spies as Spsychalski. A case in point was the Mossad operative Yitzhak Zuckerman, who, as may be recalled from C16S2, had collaborated with Spsychalski:

As far as I'm concerned, all Spsychalski's later sins in general issues and Jewish matters cannot obscure his sympathy toward us in this case. (A Surplus of Memory: Chronicle of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, Yitzhak Zuckerman, 1993, pp. 665-668) (IMG)

The purges against the Titoists in Poland were partially successful:

Over the years, Moczar's faction became more cohesive and managed to remove [Titoist] Jews from the public security apparatus and, more recently, from the public media. Moczar's control of these sectors ... enabled the hard-line faction to exploit ... various problems, incidents, and crises. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 6) (IMG)

Anti-Titoist and anti-Zionist purges therefore occurred in the military:

Moczar called into question the loyalty of one of the key sectors of Gomulka's system, the military establishment. He exposed the widespread dissent among the military caused by the party leader's strongly [officially] pro-Soviet and pro-Arab policies. Many officers apparently questioned the value of the Polish-Soviet military alliance in the light of the crushing defeat of Moscow's clients in the Middle East. Moczar's campaign, at that time conducted strictly out of public view, ultimately resulted in the removal from key positions of several generals, mainly Jews, and in reported shifts of scores of lesser ranking officers. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 8) (IMG)

So much for the 'anti-Semitism' of the anti-Titoist campaign, the campaign was so threatening that it led Gestapo spies such as Blanka Kaczorowska felt it necessary to escape. The Gestapo spy Kaczorowska, who had been arrested during the Bierut era, had been released after the 1956 colour revolution, had been successfully able to infiltrate the ranks of the Polish intelligence service, and had been elevated to the position of controlling sensitive economic sectors such as CIECh. The purges against the Titoist faction in the late 1960s were so strong that Blanka Kaczorowska had to escape to France:

Naturally, I was curious to see what happened to Blanka Kaczorowska from the moment she decided to emigrate to France in 1968 to the events of the spring of 1984, when her presence in Lailly-en-Val was discovered. (Married to Betrayal: Blanka Kaczorowska and Ludwik Kalkstein, Focus Historia, Witold Pronobis, 2010) (IMG)

Note especially that she emigrated to France in particular. Many imperialist-fascist spies who defected to the 'West' usually settled in France. There are secret service reasons for this. During the Cold War and even much beyond then, the fact that the American imperialists were able to turn France into not a colony but a satellite of the USA meant that imperialist France was forced to submit also to West German imperialism because the US preferred a German-dominated Europe as a bulwark against Soviet and Eurasian influence. This in turn led the French imperialists to covertly ally with the Soviets/Eurasians as means of reducing Anglo-American-German imperialist influence. The deployment of Anglo-American and West German agents into France assisted the CIA in continuing the secret service occupation of that country, for these agents served as the troops and intelligence officers occupying France. Such an occupation increased the Anglo-American and West German lobby and pressure over France, helping to prevent France from pursuing with as great a vigour its desired strategic partnership with the Soviets/Eurasians.

Anyways, from Blanka Kaczorowska to Marian Spychalski, the Gestapo spies one after another were losing their positions. The Polish intelligentsia intuitively felt threatened by a surge of anti-Titoist, anti-Nazi, and anti-Zionist tendencies in the Polish state. The Polish intelligentsia saw themselves as 'anti-Nazi' but like most intellectuals, they had a very poor understanding of the world and refused to see the truth right in front of them. Therefore, they ended up fighting on the same side as the Nazis. The Polish intelligentsia thus launched a colour revolution to compromise the anti-Titoist drive ostensibly 'led by' Moczar:

By the beginning of the year, Moczar was stalemated and the spontaneous student demonstrations from 8 through 23 March must have come as a Godsend. The students, who initially sought redress of genuine academic grievances, were emboldened to widen their demands into the political sphere by events in Czechoslovakia and by the stalwart resistance of dissident intellectuals to regime dictates a month earlier. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 8) (IMG)

Moczar, the agent of the Home Army, was an agent of the MI6, for the Home Army was an MI6 network. The MI6 agent Moczar covertly supported the colour revolution of the intelligentsia as a whole by launching terrorist attacks against its individual members. That Moczar publicly and overtly denounced the Titoist faction does not change the fact that he was on their side in the more covert levels. Indeed, he supported Gomulka by using the police force to launch terrorist attacks on the students so that the students would be provoked into expanding their uprising against the Polish state. And through rallying the young pro-revisionist and pro-Titoist intelligentsia, the communist elements encircling and coopting the MI6 agent Moczar would have been duly compromised, allowing Moczar greater room for maneuver in the favour of the Titoist faction. Thus, by provoking the students into a colour revolutionary uprising, the British agent Moczar was supporting Gomulka and the Titoist faction on the more covert level, helping them to temporarily partially break the anti-Titoist encirclement:

There is abundant evidence that Moczar's use of excessive police force as well as provocateurs among the students was the key to the rapid widening of student resistance. By the end of March, the party was faced with student calls to divest itself of its monopoly of power. The quick end of the demonstrations appears to have been less the result of Moczar's repression than of the student leaders' realization that their movement lacked worker support and was being exploited in the intraparty struggle. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 8) (IMG)

While Moczar was covertly on the side of the intelligentsia's pro-Titoist colour revolution in March 1968, the Moczar faction's agents - if not Moczar himself - were overtly engaged in launching an intra-Party counter-demonstration against the Titoist faction, and hence indirectly against the colour revolution of the intelligentsia. The Moczarist-linked counter-demonstrators within the Polish Party began chanting for Gierek. Gierek, as may be recalled, had been the representative of the Party in the industrialized Katowice area. There, Gierek had amassed around himself technocrats, bureaucrats, and intellectuals, but because he was stationed in an industrialized area, he had come under the pressure of the agents of the proletariat in the industrial zone as well, a factor that coopted Gierek, the agent of the white-collar elements, to be also of some service to the blue-collar contingent. Hence, Gierek was a 'lesser Titoist' when compared to Gomulka, and a Titoist by communist standards. In the 'Salami Tactics' field, Gierek was to be coopted and supported by the communists against Gomulka. Hence, the reason why the Moczarist-backed counter-demonstrators chanted Gierek's name instead of Moczar was that, at the time, installing Moczar at the helm was not feasible, whereas installing Gierek - a lesser-Gomulka allied to Gomulka - was more feasible. By chanting Gierek's name, the Moczarists sought to widen the narrow wedge between Gierek and Gomulka so to pit Gierek more overtly against Gomulka as replacement for Party leader:

[Rolicki:] You mean the memorable rally in the Congress Hall on March 19, when the hall, chanting your name, indicated you as Gomulka's successor. Did this demonstration take place with your permission?

[Gierek:] Believe me, this was a clear provocation. I suspect Moczar of being behind it. This room was overwhelmingly influenced by him and "cooking me" [for replacing Gomulka as leader] in such a primitive way was absolutely so for the partisans.

(The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, pp. 56-57) (IMG)

In addition to his covert alliance with Gomulka, Gierek was indeed overtly allied to Gomulka at the time too. This is why, rather than join the Moczarists, Gierek supported Gomulka:

[Rolicki:] Was March 1968 aimed against Gomulka?

[Gierek:] Undoubtedly yes, that is why I was the first to support Wiesław at the great rally in Katowice, for which Moczar always held a grudge against me.

(The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, p. 68) (IMG)

Note that 'Wiesław' was the pseudonym of Władysław Gomulka during the Polish People's Liberation War and his nickname after the War.

The Moczarists actually succeeded in elevating the position of Gierek against Gomulka, even though Gierek himself covertly and somewhat overtly was on the side of Gomulka:

What is clear is that Gierek's influence on the national level has significantly increased since the "March events," and that, in braking Moczar's drive to power, Gomulka has had to make major compromises with Gierek's forces. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 11) (IMG)

Therefore, while Gierek did not belong to Moczar's immediately surrounding agents, the mere attempt to pit of Gierek's faction on the overt level against Gomulka's inner circle compelled Gomulka to promote a slightly lesser Titoist line. This increased Moczarist influence and hence it increased the influence of the communist agents encircling and coopting Moczar. In late March, therefore, the Moczarists won in widening Gierek's wedge with Gomulka and got Gierek to partially denounce Zionism even though the colour revolution of the intelligentsia helped Gierek to move away from anti-Zionist speeches as well:

Gierek's decision to take the plunge into the factional struggle probably accounts for his strong speech in late March when he appeared to endorse Moczar's ... positions, including the attack on "Zionism." In retrospect, however, it is clear that the speech was an effort to tap many of the same forces of frustrated ambition within the party that had answered Moczar's call. In all of his subsequent public statements, Gierek has ignored the "Zionist" issue.... (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 9) (IMG)

Gomulka's sympathies definitely lied with the colour revolutionary intelligentsia, but, as the head of the Party, he also was under pressure to denounce the revisionists, even though he himself was a revisionist:

Gomulka's ... major speech on 19 March ... absolved the students of blame, but he endorsed the line that "revisionists" were responsible for the outbursts. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 8) (IMG)

The speech demonstrated in many ways, the erosion of Gomulka's authority. The Moczar-controlled press characterized it as a "report of the politburo delivered by Gomulka," an unprecedentedly slighting reference and a clear indication that one-man rule had already been transformed into collective leadership. More importantly, however, Gomulka failed to prevent the subsequent widespread purges of prominent Jews and liberals from nearly all the major spheres of national life. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, pp. 8-9) (IMG)

Nevertheless, 'thanks' to the colour revolutionary uprising of the intelligentsia and Moczar's covert support for it, the purges of the Titoists in Poland was slowed down and almost halted for the while:

Moczar probably estimated that conditions were not yet ripe for a major onslaught on Gomulka.... Although the hard-line faction gained some significant posts in the months to follow, especially that of ambassador to Moscow, the removal of Jews and Gomulka supporters from the bureaucracy was generally limited to those in the middle and lower echelons. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 8) (IMG)

On the net, Titoist influence in Poland relatively declined as a result of these purges, but the colour revolution of the intelligentsia, covertly sponsored by the Moczar gang through provocative terror, helped Moczar compromise the overt anti-Titoist campaign which the communist agents had made him to engage in. Hence, the Gomulka faction still retained some significant influence:

Although Moczar was able to force the removal of many of Gomulka's followers, he was generally prevented by Gomulka and Gierek from placing his own men in the vacated positions. In mid-April, Gomulka's close associate, former defense minister Spsychalski, was shifted to the ceremonial post of head of state, but the other governmental changes neither enhanced Moczar's position nor adversely affected Gomulka's. In the Foreign Ministry, where an entrenched group of Jewish moderates was susceptible to hard-line attack, the situation is yet unresolved, but Moczar's forces have been so far denied a decisive voice in the implementation of policy .

These stalemates apparently impelled Moczar to try for the first time to force changes in the party leadership. Drawing on his strength in the middle and lower echelons of the party organization, he evidently attempted to convene an early central committee plenum. Gomulka, who could still rely on his politburo colleagues but was less confident of his support in the central committee, reportedly resisted these efforts in order to consolidate his forces. When the plenum was finally held in early July, Moczar's gains were substantial but not yet enough to give him control of the party.

Moczar was appointed to the junior (nonvoting) policy making post of candidate politburo member, but the pro-Gomulka majority was maintained by the simultaneous promotion of candidate politburo member Jaszczuk to full membership in place of ailing former head of state Ochab. Similarly, the luster was taken off Moczar's appointment to the party secretariat, where he assumed outgoing party secretary Wicha's security functions, by the dilution of his control over the Interior Ministry, where he was replaced by the deputy minister who reportedly was the least responsive to him. Moreover, the new interior minister is said to be related by marriage to Gierek. If true, this suggests that once again, in return for support, Gomulka had struck a compromise with Gierek's followers.

(POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 11) (IMG)

It is worth mentioning some more details about Gierek's line. Recall that as was mentioned before, Edward Gierek's social base lied in the white collar elements:

Edward Gierek ... draws his strength from his ... administration of Poland's major industrial center, the province of Katowice. Gierek has grouped around him discontented "technocrats," young party bureaucrats, and ideologically unassailable elements seeking economic and social reform. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 4) (IMG)

At the same time, his position in one of Poland's major industrial centers inevitably put upon him the pressure of the Polish proletarians living in that industrialized zone. In other words, this representative of the white collar elements was also significantly under the pressure of, and coopted by, the agents of the proletariat emanating from the Katowice zone. This led Gierek to adopt the line of a 'compromise candidate', the midpoint politician serving as the agent of the bureaucrats but also to a large extent coopted to serve the proletariat. Gierek was a Titoist on the covert level, and a midpoint politician on the overt level. It is worth reminding that in the covert level, in the level of the true cores and essences of things, there lies no midpoint between anti-Zionism and pro-Zionism, no midpoint between anti-Titoism and Titoism, no midpoint between the pro-imperialist and reactionary line and the anti-imperialist and progressive line, no gray zone between the black and white, no third side between the good and the evil. However, in the overt level, in the level of lies, appearances, and superficial matters, of course there are these 'neutrals', 'midpoints', and 'compromise politicians' – and Gierek was one of them. Gierek's semi-Titoist line was not really a case of a 'third opinion' in between the Titoist and anti-Titoist factions, but was rather a case of a Titoist agent of the white-collar contingent being under the pressure of the proletarians in the industrial Katowice region, hence being coopted by the communist agents of the proletariat.

Such was why in 1954, a few months after the purge of Beria, when the camp of the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies were fluctuating in their level of orientation towards Titoism vs. communism, Gierek became a member of the Central Committee, upon the request of Bierut. Bierut would have wanted communist revolutionaries to fill up the Central Committee, but in the face of Titoist opposition and Kremlin Titoists, he had to compromise at times. Gierek the vacillator precisely embodied the fluctuations of 1954 and the compromise that the communist faction in the Party had to make in the face of the Titoist faction:

[Rolicki:] When did you become a party activist at the central level?

[Gierek:] In 1954, more or less at the beginning of the year, I remember, it was winter, Bierut himself called me. Immediately, when the secretary said: "Comrade Bierut will speak," I knew that this was something important, because he was not in the habit of calling ordinary voivodship secretaries, and indeed - he informed me that by the decision of the Politburo I was appointed the head of the Economic Department Of the Central Committee of the party. I tried to dissuade him from this decision, but soon realized it was pointless, and so faced another move in my life.

[Rolicki:] Family matters have always played an important role in your life. From this point of view, the new promotion was probably not desired by the Lord, it must have caused a real family earthquake.

[Gierek:] You guessed it. After ten days I had to come to Warsaw, and after two months I received a devastated apartment, requiring a major renovation, for which the loan was refused. From this I concluded that not everyone liked my transfer to Warsaw. Today I believe that I was a compromise candidate. It was already a period of collapse of the Stalinist system in its classic form, after the escape of Światło, the political situation in the country became very complicated. As the head of the Department of Economics, I was reporting directly to Bierut, who usually called me once a week to discuss the main economic matters.

(The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, p. 40) (IMG)

After the 20th CPSU congress, there was an informal bloc in the Polish Party, called the Natolin group, which contrary to how they are presented in the media, actually endorsed the Titoization program, denounced Stalin, denounced the anti-Titoist purges in Poland, and supported Gomulka's rise to power. There was on the other hand, the Puławy group which was even more militantly Titoist and which denounced the Natolin group as 'Stalinist'. And Gierek lied in between these factions:

I was a relatively new man in Warsaw, not related to the old guard. For Ochab, my neutrality in the ongoing dispute between the "Natolin" and "Puławy" factions was also valuable. (The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, pp. 44-45) (IMG)

As maybe recalled from C20S15, Gierek had actually supported the anti-Stalin slanders and Khrushchev's line. He harboured anti-Soviet views. Yet, Gierek had also been promoted by the comrade of Stalin, Bierut, for Gierek was a man to be coopted against the people much worse than him. Furthermore, in the 1960s, in terms of the overt-level official stance:

Both Moczar and Gierek are trying to wrest control of the party from a leadership they consider anachronistic. Each has used the recent anti-Semitic [read: anti-Zionist and anti-Titoist] purges to his own advantage. The two seem also to stand for many of the same things: clearing deadwood from party ranks, better communication between the rulers and the ruled, recognition of public opinion by the authorities, more decisiveness and consistency in policy, and strong party control of all spheres of national life. (POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 4) (IMG)

Further comparing and contrasting Moczar and Gierek, the CIA further stated:

Nationalism is one of the basic ingredients of Moczar's campaign but is less prominent in Gierek's movement. (...). Though more subtly, Gierek too has evoked the pride of national achievement in the postwar period. The implications of this veiled chauvinism for Polish-Soviet relations are not clear.

Both men have tried to establish their credentials with Moscow. Moczar, however, publicly attacks the "Muscovite" wing of the party, which returned to Poland on the heels of the Red Army, although he also pledges loyalty to the alliance with the USSR. They both espouse a viewpoint that realistically accepts the alliance with Moscow, but at the same time they try to demonstrate that Gomulka's fawning support for Soviet foreign policy needlessly demeans Poland abroad and causes unnecessary problems at home.

(POLISH COMMUNIST PARTY MOVES TO THE RIGHT, Weekly Summary: Special Report, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1, 1968, p. 5) (IMG)

Recall from C20S15 that the Polish proletarians had launched the Poznan uprising against the Titoization agenda pursued in 1956. It is true that the spontaneous character of the Poznan uprising, and the lack of a socialist party leadership of the uprising, created the risk of it being exploited by the imperialists, and to some extent it was exploited. However, it is a fact that overall, the progressive forces held the upper hand in the uprising of the anti-Titoist Polish proletarians, leading to the weakening of the pace of Titoization, thus undermining imperialism. A similar event occurred in the year 1970. In December 1970, the proletarians of Poland rose up not against the Party, socialism, Sovietism, communism, alliance with Eurasia, etc. but against the Gomulka group. The CIA also admitted:

The image of a fallen from among the demonstrators of December 1970 – said to be an 18-year old proletarian named 'Zbyszek Godlewski', he was murdered by the Gomulka gang's fascist agents in the Polish secret service. Photo source: Andrzej Wajda (1981-07-10). "Uzupełniam swój życiorys". Tygodnik Solidarność (2): 11.

The workers' disturbances had no anti-Soviet coloration. Neither the party nor the [fake] socialist system was the main target of attack. The agitation was limited to the skilled workers, who felt they had the most to lose from Gomulka's price increases and changes in work rules. The peasantry, unaffected by Gomulka's proposed measures, was quiet. Intellectuals and the youth also were inactive. Finally, the powerful Roman Catholic Church kept its peace; it merely counseled non-violence. (POLAND UNDER NEW MANAGEMENT: INTELLIGENCE MEMORANDUM, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, April 28, 1972, p. 2) (IMG)

As far as I am aware, the uprising was spontaneous. However, some have argued, possibly correctly, that the workers were agitated into such an uprising by undercover communist agents aiming to oust the Gomulka group. The bestially Sadistic gang of Gomulka savagely massacred the Polish proletarians, but the bloody sacrifices of the Polish proletarians did bear fruition in improving the conditions of the proletarians. The protests bogged down the fascist security forces aligned with Gomulka's terror network, giving the proletarian agents within the Polish state apparatus more room for maneuver against the Titoist faction. The proletarian mass demonstrations are known to have been a direct immediate cause of Gomulka's ouster and replacement by the more proletarian-coopted Gierek. With the support of the communist faction in Eurasia, Gierek was installed as the General-Secretary of the Party:

Since Polish party first secretary Edward Gierek took power from Wladyslaw Gomulka on 20 December 1970, a new style of rule has appeared in Poland. (POLAND UNDER NEW MANAGEMENT: INTELLIGENCE MEMORANDUM, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, April 28, 1972, p. 2) (IMG)

Gierek, being the overt rival but covert ally of Gomulka, partially revealed his covert face again and rushed to slow down the purge of the Gomulka group:

I was aware that I was losing the crowd's applause while protecting Gomulka. However, I preferred to cut myself off from his methods, not accountable to him personally. I was forced to do so, on the one hand, by a sense of decency, for I was unable to sit for fourteen years in the party leadership of the country, never mind whether it was formal or real periods, to pretend that I was born yesterday; (...). Besides, by doing Gomulka a judgment, not even a formal one, but only the press, I would lead to the dismantling of socialism. (The Interrupted Decade, Edward Gierek, Interviewer: Rolicki Janusz, 1990, pp. 91-92) (IMG)

Pay attention to the last sentence from Gierek quote: through a negative judgement of Gomulka in the media – let alone in the court – the way would be paved for the dismantlement of socialism, Gierek argued. Now, to be sure, sometimes one would need to publicly speak in 'defense' of one's enemies for strategic purposes of eventually eliminating those enemies, but Gierek, being the covert and semi-overt ally of Gomulka, bore no such intentions.

Nonetheless, the tide was against Gomulka and he was being ousted. Gomulka certainly did not get the chance to commit crimes as large in absolute terms as those of Hitler, because the material conditions that encircled Gomulka limited him far more than the material conditions that encircled Hitler. However, to the extent that he could continue the path of the Nazis, Gomulka spared no effort. Outwardly, much like the Anglo-Americans, he spoke out 'against' fascism all the while pursuing fascist objectives. Gomulka had harbored and elevated the mortal enemies of the Polish nation; he actively promoted and supported the Home Army terrorists who had murdered the Yiddish citizens and the kolkhoznik Polish peasants, and who had allied with the very same UPA that carried out the anti-Polish genocide in Wolyn; Gomulka collaborated with the Nazi secret service, and had knowing harbored and promoted the Gestapo spy and CIA-Mossad agent Spychalski; he was responsible for expelling Yiddish proletarians from Poland to be sent as cannon-fodder for Moshe Dayan and Ariel Sharon. Gomulka had promoted the Moczar group and allied with them covertly to the end, the same Moczar group that terrorized the Polish students in order to foment colour revolutions to save Gomulka's gang. Gomulka had the blood of the Polish people in his hands. Historical circumstances, fortunately, prevented Gomulka from establishing a full-on fascist regime like the one in Yugoslavia, but the Gomulka group certainly got close to such a target.

Poland's top Hitlerite was finally ousted in the glorious day of December 20, 1970. For the first time after so many years of suffering and terror, the Polish proletarians could celebrate a Christmas devoid of a General-Secretary Gomulka – at least, at last. He was gone for good, and by 1982, he died. Upon his ouster, Titoist influence in Poland decreased, communist influence increased, and the Brezhnev phenomenon partially extended to Poland. Since on the overt level, the new General-Secretary Edward Gierek marked a compromise between the Gomulka group and the Moczar group, there was an effort to partially satisfy the parasitic class forces and to partially satisfy the workers and peasants. The situation in Poland began to improve mildly but nonetheless considerably. Whereas the Anglo-German agent Gomulka had relied entirely on the parasitic class forces inside Polish society,;

Gierek has grasped political power, obtained the cooperation of nearly all strata of the population.... (POLAND UNDER NEW MANAGEMENT: INTELLIGENCE MEMORANDUM, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, April 28, 1972, p. 1) (IMG)

Gierek was a midpoint politician who was compelled to reduce Titoist influence, but did try to ensure that the intelligentsia retain some of their influence:

Gierek has also struck an acceptable relationship with the intellectuals, students, and middle class. Initially, this relationship was ambiguous. These interest groups had fewer economic grievances than the workers, but Gierek must have understood from the beginning that he would need them to mobilize the population at large and to balance the ... influence of the workers on his regime. (...). Most Polish intellectuals, particularly of the older generation, seem inclined to accept the terms of this softer cultural policy. It has permitted many previously banned authors to reappear in print. It also has allowed more foreign travel for intellectuals. (POLAND UNDER NEW MANAGEMENT: INTELLIGENCE MEMORANDUM, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, April 28, 1972, p. 4) (IMG)

Demonstrating his semi-covert Titoism, Gierek continued to surrender Poland to the Vatican mafia:

Gierek's big policy departure ... has been his willingness to reach an accommodation with the Church. Three days after taking office, the new government offered to "normalize" church-state relations, which for decades have alternated between truces and crises. A meeting in early March 1971 between Poland's Primate, Stefan Cardinal Wyszyński, and Premier Jaroszewicz began a dialogue that has since been extended to negotiations between the government and the Vatican. In June 1971 legislation was passed granting the Polish church legal title to former German church property in the territories gained by Poland after World War II. (POLAND UNDER NEW MANAGEMENT: INTELLIGENCE MEMORANDUM, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, April 28, 1972, p. 5) (IMG)

At first, I considered the possibility that the Polish government may have decided to make such a deal with the Catholic Church as means of coopting it, so to minimize its role under the cover of expanding it. However, upon checking other sources, I saw only minimal evidence of cooptation, and overall, the role of the Church seems to have genuinely expanded. This once again would reinforce the view that Gierek was a midpoint politician on the overt level and a Titoist renegade on the covert level.

The policy pursued by Gierek was not a genuinely 'big' departure from Gomulka team's policy line, contrary to how CIA-sponsored propaganda presents it. Gomulka team's approach to the Catholic Church was one of sabotaging the efforts against the Catholic Church, via a pincer approach: on the one hand, Gomulka's team had promoted the Vatican mafia and made it more popular via terrorizing the Catholic Church, and on the other hand he showed liberality and capitulation to the Catholic Church. Every once in a while, Gomulka would be forced to concede to anti-Titoist elements and to pursue a genuinely anti-Vatican policy line.

In economic planning, heavy industry gained slightly greater emphasis in the initial years and some snail-pace measures towards collectivization were undertaken. Kazimierz Poznanski, a Polish scholar and 'former' fellow at the Wilson Center think tank, wrote:

To conclude, in political terms, Gierek's expansionary programme of 'renewal' was an attempt to create a new and dynamic political equilibrium that would synthesize and reorient frequently conflicting forces within Poland's party and state administration. For the party's traditionalists, Gierek offered an ambitious investment programme, a return to collectivization of agriculture, and the rejection of genuine market-based economic reforms. For the upward-moving generation of industrial bureaucrats and state administrators, he provided increased access to sophisticated technology and fewer party/political checks on their exercise of discretion over its selection. ('Poland's Protracted Transition: Institutional Change and Economic Growth 1970-1994', Cambridge University Press, Kazimierz Poznanski, 1996, pp. 63-64) (IMG)

Thus, the Gierek era in its earlier years saw a growth in the economy, especially in heavy industry:

Growth goals for 1971 generally were met or exceeded throughout the economy. Investment grew by 9% and industrial output by 8%, as shown in Table 1. There were no major shifts within industry. The largest gains in output came in machine building, nonferrous metals, and electronics — the only above average increase within light industry was in the clothing industry. There was a healthy growth in agricultural production.... (POLAND: GOMULKA'S ECONOMY IN GIREEK'S HANDS: INTELLIGENCE MEMORANDUM, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, p. 4) (IMG)

Overall, the situation definitely improved in Poland but only mildly.

Note that the Gierek era marked a slight shift away from the politically authoritarian terroristic, economically liberal, and foreign-policy-wise Trotskyite character of the Gomulka era. It implied a shift of Poland slightly towards Eurasia and away from the US-led camp. Polish anti-communists present the Gierek era as better than the Gomulka era, because Gierek era was supposedly more 'pro-Western' than the Gomulka era — when in fact it was less pro-Anglo-American, which is why the CIA's 'Solidarity' movement launched the colour revolution to depose Gierek. While Gierek's covert Titoism was appreciated by the counter-revolutionary networks, his overt semi-anti-Titoism was problematic from the CIA's lens. The 1980 ouster of Gierek helped oust along with him the communist agents that were partially encircling and coopting him.

C22S11. The 1981 Military Coup in Poland

The PZPR had been influenced by bureaucrats and intellectuals. Yet, a significantly large percentage of the PZPR was made up of proletarians (particularly blue-collar elements). The continued dominance of the PZPR over the state apparatus would have allowed the blue-collar contingent in the PZPR to vote for and promote proletarian agents in the state apparatus. Anglo-American finance capital and the bureaucrats in the Polish state opposed such proletarian influence. To this end, the bureaucrats in the Polish state aimed to overthrow the PZPR. In 1980-1981, the Polish General Jaruzelski spearheaded the efforts to overthrow the PZPR and reduce Soviet influence.

Jaruzelski had been an agent of the Berling network, established by Beria and the latter's henchman Merkulov so to increase the influence of the MI6 agent General Anders. Sergo Beria recalled:

The formation of a Polish army in the USSR was approved, but Stalin was extremely reluctant when it came to equipping this army. My father showed no surprise at this attitude. He had even expected it. Eventually, since this army seemed destined never to be used, my father interceded for it to be allowed to leave the USSR in spring 1942. (...). Merkulov nevertheless asked Anders to leave behind a group of officers whom my father planned to introduce into the Polish Communist army led by Berling. ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 73) (IMG)

Jaruzelski's political fortunes had risen 'thanks' to the 1956 colour revolution of the intelligentsia, which increased the influence of Poland's fascist military generals led by Spychalski at the expense of the PZPR. Andrew Michta — a prestigious US military scholar at the US Naval War College, Center for Strategic and International Studies, Hoover Institute and Harvard University — wrote:

Spychalski was on his way out, while Jaruzelski and his group of former junior line officers in the Berling army positioned themselves to move to center stage. ('Red Eagle: The Army in Polish Politics, 1944-1988', Andrew A. Michta, p. 56) (IMG)

More important, the 1956 crisis made the military into an active, if indirect, participant in party politics on the highest level. The army's role in the upheaval and the period of "re-Polonization" of the armed forces under Spychalski laid the foundations upon which Wojciech Jaruzelski would erect the edifice of his political power in the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s. ('Red Eagle: The Army in Polish Politics, 1944-1988', Andrew A. Michta, p. 56) (IMG)

Representing the bureaucrats and kulaks, Jaruzelski launched a military coup overthrowing the PZPR, much to the dismay of the Soviets, and increasing the influence of the Catholic Church over the state. The Jaruzelski gang brought 'moderate' (i.e. decentralization) reforms that were ostensibly aimed at giving the workers a greater voice in managing the enterprise but actually directly repressed the workers and installed the corrupt bureaucrats in charge. Instead of the PZPR was installed a new military junta 'party' called PRON, made up of fascist commanders and liberal intellectuals. The CIA reported:

Pressure is mounting from party hardliners and the Soviets to restore to the Polish United Workers' Party (PZPR) the traditional power and authority it has lost during the last three years. The abolition of martial law has removed any legal pretext for keeping the party from exercising its constitutionally guaranteed right to lead the state. (STATUS OF THE POLISH UNITED WORKERS' PARTY: An Intelligence Assessment, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, October 1983, p. I. Bold added)

The party suffered a severe political decline during the last three years, losing by its own admission more than 25 percent of its membership since August 1980 and being relegated under martial law to a secondary role in political and economic decision making.

There has been growing pressure from hardliners, party bureaucrats, and the Soviets, however, to restore the party and, in particular, to return sole power to its civilian apparatus. (...).

Jaruzelski's selection as party leader in October 1981 (see box) and the subsequent imposition of martial law in December accelerated the party's decline, especially at the lowest levels where, for all practical purposes, the party ceased to function. Although some hardliners probably expected that the party would quickly regain its political primacy under martial law, military men instead moved into many key political and economic posts, ignored the party apparatus, and took over many party supervisory, decision-making, and inspection functions at all levels.

Jaruzelski, in our assessment, ignored the party immediately after the imposition of martial law largely because of his preoccupation with the task of reasserting control. This required heavy reliance on the security apparatus and, of course, the Army – Jaruzelski's political power base. Jaruzelski also appears to have ignored the party out of deep distrust for its ability to run the country. The depth of this feeling among military men was such that Gen. Mieczyslaw Debicki, appointed governor of the city of Warsaw in called the party a "pigsty." Jaruzelski considered disbanding the party and building a new organization, rejecting the idea only out of a calculation that Moscow would not tolerate such a move. After the imposition of martial law, Jaruzelski relegated the party in his speeches to a secondary position, paying only lip-service to its "leading role" in society. He showed little interest in the details of PZPR activity and gave subordinates considerable autonomy in developing socioeconomic policies outside of normal party channels.

(...). As the pressures of long-delayed political and economic business have compelled Jaruzelski to give greater attention to the party, his actions suggest that he is sympathetic to the moderate viewpoint that the PZPR needs to improve its governing style dramatically before it can successfully resume its "leading role" in society. Party moderates have said that Poland can recover from its crisis only by "creative application" of Marxism-Leninism that involves not only political and economic reforms but also a more limited role for the party apparatus. Complaining that the distinction between the party and government bureaucracies had virtually disappeared under Gierek, some moderates have argued in the Polish press that the party should shed its traditional involvement in every aspect of policymaking and implementation and allow government experts [read: bureaucrats] responsibility for the day-to-day running of the country, especially the economy. In line with this view, Jaruzelski has publicly advocated upgrading the qualifications of party officials and bureaucrats, providing for broader discussion of policy options, and giving the government [read: bureaucrats] instead of the party a larger role in making lower level decisions and implementing policy. (...).

We believe that Jaruzelski has taken the advice of his moderate advisers that the party can adopt well-considered policies only by being better informed on popular attitudes and allowing broader discussion of policy options. He has tried, for instance, to improve party reporting of the populace's attitudes by having reports from local organizations sent directly to him rather than through the intervening bureaucratic layers, where information in the past has been altered to reflect favorably on the apparatus.

Jaruzelski, according to his public remarks, also wants the PZPR to take into account during its policy debates the viewpoints of Poland's semiautonomous political parties – the United Peasant Party, the Democratic Party, and the Catholic lay organization, Pax. A joint meeting of the Communist and Peasant Parties in January 1983-the first since 1957-was clearly intended as an example of the consultative process he favors; although the session did not allow the Peasant Party to have significant impact on regime policy. Jaruzelski, also advocated in 1982 that other social groups hold 30 percent of the seats in the parliament after the 1984 national elections. Moreover, Jaruzelski has privately argued that, while the PZPR should have the largest number of parliamentary seats, it should not have an absolute majority. This would force it to take into account the interests of the Catholic, peasant, and democratic groups. Thus far, Jaruzelski has not followed through on these privately expressed views [but he did later].

Jaruzelski has sought to give his new mass organization, the Patriotic Movement for National Rebirth (PRON), some inspection and legislative functions formerly monopolized by the party. Parliamentary legislation according the PRON constitutional status indicates the body will replace the party-dominated National Unity Front in proposing lists of candidates for parliamentary elections. (...). Jaruzelski has also publicly advocated greater participation of local self-governing bodies – the municipal equivalents of worker self-management bodies – in the formulation and implementation of local decisions.

Jaruzelski has sought to lessen the day-to-day involvement of party bureaucrats in running the economy through continued public support for economic reform. As outlined in the Polish press in mid-1983, the reform is aimed at stimulating efficiency and growth by granting enterprises new freedom to make decisions on production, investment, and hiring. Workers would have a voice – although still strictly limited – in enterprise decisions through government-sponsored workers' councils and trade unions. While there would still be central control of prices and, according to US Embassy reporting, provincial party officials would set general guidelines for economic policy, the close supervisory role of the party apparatus would be severely curtailed.

Jaruzelski founded the PRON in the first months of martial law to promote support for his policies and to serve as a surrogate for Solidarity in a dialogue with society. The PRON, while ostensibly representing "society," nonetheless, according to the Polish press, has numerous military men among its members. Despite the expansion of the PRON's national leadership to include non-party intellectuals and artists, the Church's refusal to participate appears to have severely limited movement's support.

(STATUS OF THE POLISH UNITED WORKERS' PARTY: An Intelligence Assessment, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, October 1983, p. 5. Bold added.) (IMG)

What remained of socialism in Poland had been mostly abolished by 1981-1983. The economy was decentralized, a military dictatorship had been established, the influence of Moscow's communist faction in Poland was declining, while the influence of the MI6-backed Vatican agents was increasing. The Polish proletarians were against the military junta regime. Yet, the Polish Solidarity, led by the TKK central leadership, was the notorious CIA front established for the purpose of misleading Poland's proletarians ostensibly into confrontations 'against' the Jaruzelski regime but actually into confrontation with the Soviets. The Solidarity, which shared Jaruzelski's views in support of economic decentralization and marketization and worker 'self-management', did not really represent the Polish proletarians. The CIA reported:

Poland's economic problems are the focal issue in the national debate. The Jaruzelski regime is unable to secure improved economic performance without popular support for its programs, yet popular support will prove elusive without first some improvements in living conditions. Solidarity bases its continued existence on the failure of the regime to solve Poland's economic crisis or to expand workers' rights. The regime, Polish workers, and opposition leaders have different perspective on the problem, so a consensus on solutions will be hard to find. (POLAND: NATIONAL RECONCILIATION REMAINS AN ELUSIVE GOAL, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, December 18, 1986, pp. 5-6. Bold added.)

The opposition has made economic reform the most important plank of its platform. Solidarity probably would lend its backing to wage controls and price reforms aimed at balancing supply and demand on domestic markets only if the regime made significant concessions in the area of workers rights. Specifically, the opposition seeks the right to re-establish independent trade unions and give workers greater input in management. (...). Without some guarantee of union pluralism – which we do not expect – Solidarity will continue to be critical of the reforms and cite any austerity measures as further evidence of the regime's inability to manage the economy. The reform program has not gained acceptance among workers. They resist change because they equate reform with wage controls, price hikes, and possible unemployment. (POLAND: NATIONAL RECONCILIATION REMAINS AN ELUSIVE GOAL, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, December 18, 1986, pp. 5-6. Bold added.) (IMG)

In reality, the Kautskyite and Trotskyite agents in charge of Solidarity were fighting on the same side as the Jaruzelski regime. Again, the Solidarity, a CIA front, aimed to mislead the Polish proletarians ostensibly into confrontations against the Jaruzelski regime but actually against what remained of the communist forces in Poland. Historical experience shows that usually the proletarians do not fall into such fratricidal traps. When they do superficially appear to be launching an uprising 'against' the anti-imperialist state, the uprising ends up actually against the comprador agents. The 1956 Poznan uprising and the 1970 uprising were cases in point. In the 1980s, Poland's proletarians, strongly antagonistic to the Jaruzelski regime, nonetheless intuited that they shall not fall into such a fratricidal trap laid before them by Solidarity and regarded such Solidarity-led protests as counter-productive:

Because of these operating restraints and internal disputes, a visible TKK [Solidarity's central leadership] strategy for challenging the regime has so far not yet emerged. There is every reason to believe that the overwhelming majority of the 10-million-strong membership remains sympathetic to the union and its ideals. But at least so far, the bulk of the blue-collar workers have generally opted for passive resistance as an expression of opposition in part because they believe street demonstrations to be counterproductive.

There are two reasons why the underground appeals have not attracted as much support as the union's former membership might have suggested. First, the industrial workers lined up behind the strikes and the union in 1980-81 because they believed they could extract significant wage and other economic concessions from the regime. They gradually came to realize that most of the wage increases were not covered by consumer goods and that future strikes for economic benefits would be meaningless.

(POLAND S PROSPECTS OVER THE NEXT 12 TO 18 MONTHS: Special National Intelligence Estimate: Memorandum to Holders, CIA, Directorate of Central Intelligence, September 1, 1982, p. 8) (IMG)

Though the aim of the CIA and Solidarity was to mobilize the workers into fratricide, the role of Solidarity ended up being the neutralization of the attempts of the Polish proletarians towards confrontations with the anti-Soviet Jaruzelski regime. That is, Solidarity prevented a proletarian uprising against the Titoist fascist faction of Jaruzelski. The latter gradually liberalized the Polish economy and Catholicized the Polish state, eventually transitioning Poland into an officially anti-communist NATO-aligned state. The '1989 overthrow' of the Polish state actually happened during the 1981 coup; in 1989, there rather simply occurred a mere reform of the Titoist military dictatorship into a more blatantly anti-communist state.

Chapter 23

C23S1. People's Democratic Development in Romania / Resisting Titoization / On Zionist Migration  IMG-All-{Romania}

The Workers' Party of Romania was compositionally proletarianized, i.e. the blue-collar elements held the largest percentage in the Party. This established a powerful backbone assisting Romania's communist faction led by Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej against the aggressive Titoization campaign launched by the Kremlin Titoist assassins and the latter's henchpeople in Romania. The Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress reported:

During the early years of full Communist control, the party considered itself the vanguard of the working class and made a sustained effort to recruit workers. By the end of 1950, the party reported that 64 percent of leading party positions and 40 percent of higher government posts were filled by members of the working class. Efforts to recruit workers into the party, however, consistently fell short of goals.

By 1965, when the name Romanian Communist Party was officially adopted, membership had reached 1,450,000--about 8 percent of the country's population. Membership composition at that time was 44 percent workers, 34 percent peasants, 10 per cent intelligentsia, and 12 percent other categories.

The Kremlin Titoist assassins who had risen to power in 1953 wanted the Peoples' Democracies to remain as backward agrarian societies easy prey to the Anglo-American colonizers. As early as 1953, the Titoist 'New Course' emphasized by the Moscow Titoists inflicted pressure upon the Romanian communists for the latter to slow down the pace of collectivization. In spite of such pressures, the Romanian communists were able to proceed ahead with the collectivization program. Indeed, as confirmed by a publication of the US Information Agency,:

While the new course acknowledged the continuing role of the independent farmers in Rumanian agriculture, the long-standing discrimination in favor of the collective farmers was maintained, though to a lesser degree. The concessions, incentives and advantages offered to peasants in the private sector were always just half those offered to the collective farms, with the agricultural associations holding an intermediate position.

The increased investment fund continued to benefit primarily the so-called socialized sector. Supplementary sums allocated to agriculture in 1953 and 1954 went to provide the collectives with more tractors and machinery, silos and other buildings, and were used in the education of technicians and special cadres for the gostats [state farms] and MTS.

("New Course" in Rumanian Agriculture, Daniel Norman. In: 'Problems of Communism', July-August 1955, Number 4, Vol. 4, United States Information Agency, p. 40) (IMG)

To be sure, the New Course certainly slowed down the pace of collectivization, but it did not stop it. Nonetheless, conflicts between the Romanian communists and the Kremlin Titoists had grown. As may be recalled, Lavrenti Beria and his henchmen had managed to dictatorially force a demotion of the communist leaders in the Peoples' Democracies. Such was the case of Hoxha, Ulbricht, and Rakosi. Such was also the case of Dej. As a result of the New Course, Dej was sharply demoted from leadership of the Party:

When he had to give up the post of secretary general of the Communist Party, it was rumored that Dej would be liquidated because of his [alleged] nationalist leanings. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

Hence,:

Dej is believed to be rather lukewarm about the Soviets. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

In mid-1953, the purge of the Beriites began in the USSR, thus removing a major obstacle for the communists throughout the Peoples' Democracies. The communist faction in Romania was able to proceed ahead again fairly smoothly.

Then came the 20th CPSU Congress in 1956. Romania's communists were uncomfortable with the Titoization agenda launched by Khrushchev and Eurasian Titoists. A paper by the Wilson Center stated:

Based on later statements and extemporaneous confessions, especially on what was revealed during the November-December 1961 CC Plenum, the members of the Romanian delegation to the Twentieth Congress were spending their evenings ... trying to figure out what was going on at the top of the Soviet party.

In short, after the Twentieth CPSU Congress, the Romanian communist leaders were ... outraged; their entire world was falling apart once their former idol had been attacked as a criminal, a paranoid monster and a military non-entity. Whatever his sentiments toward Khrushchev before February 1956, it is obvious that from that moment on, Gheorghiu-Dej deeply distrusted the Soviet First Secretary. For him, as for Thorez, Novotny, or Ulbricht, the disbandment of Stalin's myth was a major strategic and ideological blunder, a godsend for the imperialist propaganda and a concession to Titoist "rotten revisionism."

(Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 15) (IMG)

The Romanian delegation at the Twentieth Congress was headed by Gheorghiu-Dej, and included, Politburo members Miron Constantinescu, Iosif Chişinevski and Petre Borilă. Obviously, the delegation had no idea that such a bombshell like Khrushchev's anti-Stalin attack had been prepared. It is not hard to imagine that Gheorghiu-Dej, undoubtedly a genuine Stalin worshipper, must have been less than enthusiastic about the severe criticism of the former Soviet leader. According to Miron Constantinescu, Gheorghiu-Dej was profoundly upset by the revelations in Khrushchev's Secret Speech. In Gheorghiu-Dej's view, by denouncing the idol of world communism, Khrushchev was committing a historical blunder. In this respect, the Romanian leader shared ... Maurice Thorez's contempt for Khrushchev's "sensationalism." Actually this frustration with the Soviet leader's anti-Stalin initiative can be considered the first step in the development of the Romanian-Soviet dispute. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 14) (IMG)

The Romanian delegation to the 20th CPSU congress obviously had to present a report of what they observed and felt compelled to mention the 'revelations' of the Eurasian 'comrades'. To minimize the effects of this, like most of the other communist leaders in the bloc, Gheorghiu-Dej played the scorched earth strategy and tried to delay the spread of the lies promoted by the Khrushchevians. Not all communists were able to contain this Khrushchevian tide, and not all were able to delay the spread of the lies in their respective parties. Romanian communists were able to do this because they had a strong base in the Party and the state apparatus as well among the Romanian people. In terms of the tactical details of how the process was systematically delayed, the Wilson Center document provides the following:

After having read the full text of Nikita Khrushchev's Secret Speech, the Romanian participants at the Twentieth Congress had to determine how to discuss these documents with the rest of the RWP's leadership. Since the new line adopted at Kremlin personally threatened him, Gheorghiu-Dej had to procrastinate the debates that threatened to develop in the party leadership. Therefore, he invoked the crisis in the Greek Communist Party and his one-month involvement in that party's struggle, alleging that he had no way to direct the RWP's inner party discussions regarding the lessons of the Twentieth Congress. In fact, he was playing for time, cajoling different Politburo members, assessing their attitudes, and calculating the optimal strategy for the imminent discussions. In this, he counted primarily on support from Gheorghe Apostol, Chivu Stoica, Alexandru Moghioroş, Gheorghe Borilă, Emil Bodnăraş, Alexandru Drăghici, and, he had reasons to hope, Nicolae Ceauşescu. (...).

Eventually, in March-April 1956, a series of CC meetings were summoned in order to inform the top apparatus on the Twentieth Congress. These well-orchestrated sessions were meant to be a kind of purifying ritual in which every member of the communist supreme echelon was asked to engage in the notorious Leninist practice of criticism and self-criticism. At the March 23-25 Plenum, Gheorghiu-Dej presented a Politburo report (Dare de Seamă) in which he criticized Stalin and especially the practice of personality cult.

(Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 15-16) (IMG)

I am not sure about Apostol, Borilă, and Drăghici, but I know that the true sympathies of all the other top ranking members who overtly sided with Dej, covertly lied with the Moscow Titoists. The reason why those officials sided with Dej, however, was that most of them had very close organizational contacts with the working class institutions and the communist elements in the army, hence causing them to be sufficiently encircled and coopted by proletarian elements. As such, these officials were coopted to side with Dej. One person on whom Dej could count on at least to some extent was Gheorghe Apostol. He was a leading figure in the trade union movement, a Dej faction stronghold, and stood against the CIA-Mossad faction of the Pauker-Luca group:

Gheorghe Apostol, at present first secretary of the Rumanian Communist Party, comes from the trade union movement. He is a rather energetic person and very ambitious and for this reason is feared many top-level Party functionaries. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

As is so often the case, the victors were unable to divide the spoils and bitter factionalism soon developed. Teohari Georgescu was promptly shelved by his three powerful colleagues who were themselves shortly at odds with one another. Luca attacked the General Confederation of Workers which was directed by Gheorghe Apostol and is the exclusive domain of Gheorghiu-Dej and his supporters. In retaliation Gheorghiu-Dej commenced a campaign against the Hungarian Popular Union, the principal support [base] of Luca. (RECENT PURGES IN RUMANIAN COMMUNIST PARTY, CIA, August 12, 1952, p. 2) (IMG)

It is not completely clear to me if Apostol was a communist loyalist or if he was a communist-coopted Titoist, as the data about him sends mixed signals. What is clear is that, whether out of cooptation or out of genuine belief, he shared many of the stances of Dej.

Another person on whom Dej could rely on in the overt level – but not at all on the covert level – to combat Titoization was the communist-coopted Titoist agent Emil Bodnaras. It is worth examining his case in some details. During the 1930s, Bodnaras had been an adventurer and a terrorist who was released around the same time as when Antonescu's group rose to power in Romania in 1940:

Between 1933 and 1935, he plotted against the life of King Carol II. He was arrested and detained in prison until 1940. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 3) (IMG)

In 1944, he had returned to Romania with the Red Army:

After his release, he went to Moscow where he attended courses at the Soviet Military Academy. In 1944, he returned to Rumania as a general of the Red Army. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 3) (IMG)

At the time, the main figure of the Red Army in Romania was General Tolbukhin, who was an agent of the MI6 agent Beria. Back then, since Romania had switched sides during the Great Patriotic War, much of the Romanian military was dominated by MI6 agents loyal to Antonescu, Radescu, and King Mihai. The Beria agent General Tolbukhin had favorable relations with these MI6-linked anti-Soviet Romanian generals. Sergo Beria recalled in his biography of his father:

So long as he was commander-in-chief of our forces in Romania, Tolbukhin applied the policy advocated by my father, who counted on support from certain Romanian officers (Romania had an excellent officer corps). Tolbukhin had established contacts among these men. (...). But the Romanian Communists found nothing more intelligent than to complain to Stalin that 'reactionary anti-Soviet military men connected with Britain are coming to power.' They were, of course, unaware that my father was behind this policy. He was shaken by Tolbukhin's death because this meant he now had nobody to put his policy into practice. The task was going to be difficult in Romania, whereas the Communists, few in numbers, were fanatical. I think my father had some hope of the Minister of Finance, V. Luka, who later fell victim to the purges. (Beria: Inside Stalin's Kremlin, Sergo Beria, p. 196) (IMG)

Emil Bodnaras was popular among such Romanian army staff:

Bodnaras is very popular in the Rumanian Army because of the reforms decreed by him. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 3) (IMG)

The Romanian army had by then been purged just enough so that the MI6 agents in it would not be able to launch a coup, but still there was a way to go with the purges in the Romanian army. The high command of the Romanian army had come under the influence of communist and communist-coopted generals but the middle ranks of the Romanian army were not necessarily so communist loyalist. The middle-rank generals were numerically larger but politically weaker, which is likely the reason that Bodnaras was popular among many generals but was not able to launch a coup.

At some point, Bodnaras definitely was able to establish positive relations with the Titoist infiltrators in the Kremlin. Certainly, by 1955, the Titoists had risen to power in the Kremlin; as such, Bodnaras's relations with Moscow began to improve back then:

Bodnaras maintains relatively good connection with the Soviets. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 3) (IMG)

Bodnaras was regarded as one of the people aligned with the CIA-Mossad agent Ana Pauker. He :

[Bodnaras's] closest assistants and friends are General Ion Cambrea, Colonel Tudor Sepianu and General Nicolae Fulga. It is believed that the strength of this group in conjunction with Dej's authority has so far saved Ana Pauker's life. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 3) (IMG)

In fact, the ties of Bodnaras with Pauker go back to 1920:

As a Communist [Bodnaras] went to Bucharest in 1920 and there got in touch with Pauker.... (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, pp. 2-3) (IMG)

At the time, Bodnaras was also the defense minister:

Emil Bodnaras, Minister of National Defense and a vice president of the Council of Ministers, is believed to rank only after Chisinevski.... (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, pp. 2-3) (IMG)

Bodnaras, while undoubtedly a suspicious element in the Romanian government, was on the liberal side of the spectrum and thus on the overt level opposed the Trotskyite Chisinevski. Bodnaras had of course been a Trotskyite adventurer in the 1930s, planning a supposed 'assassination' against the King, but like most Trotskyite left-opportunists, he adopted a liberal right-opportunist line later in his life. On the overt level, therefore, he was useful in undermining Chisinevski's group. This is why the CIA stated:

Chisinevski also dislikes Bodnaras, the Rumanian Minister of National Defense, whom he fears because of his great popularity with the Army. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

The 'hatred' of Chisinevski and Bodnaras was unlikely to be real on the covert level, but it did exist on the overt level, in outwardly pretensions. On the overt level therefore, team Bodnaras was a factor that kept team Chisinevski in check.

Anyways, like the rest of the communist parties in the bloc, the Romanian communists reaffirmed their communist anti-Titoism and 'Stalinism' under the cover of 'de-Stalinizing' and Titoizing. According to a document written by the CIA front think tank Wilson Center,:

As for the manifestations of Stalinism in his own party, Gheorghiu-Dej spoke about Romanian Stalinists without mentioning names, but insisted that the RWP had expelled them in 1952, and, therefore, implied that the only Stalinists in Romania had been the demoted Pauker, Luca and Georgescu and, he, Gheorghiu-Dej, deserved credit for having courageously started a de-Stalinization avant la lettre, long before the Twentieth Congress. Also, he emphasized that that the Second Congress of the RWP marked a new phase by the fact that collective leadership was established and democratic centralism was truly governing inner party life. Simply put, Gheorghiu-Dej's game was to invoke the struggle against the expelled [Pauker] faction as an argument for his group's "presciently correct" political behavior. Compared to other East European parties, Gheorghiu-Dej maintained, the RWP leadership managed to avoid the worst excesses associated with Stalin's cult. Whatever needed to be rectified had basically been done as a result of the anti-Pauker purges. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 15-16) (IMG)

Hence, the result of the Politburo discussions was as follows:

The heated Politburo discussions of March-April of 1956 resulted in the decision to keep under strict control the mass party discussions on Khrushchev's de-Stalinization. Official explanations highlighted the righteousness of the party line and any attempt to question it resulted in immediate sanctions. All Politburo members were instructed to oppose revisionism and "liberal-anarchic" tendencies. Leonte Răutu was in charge with directing the propaganda efforts meant to conceal the genuine implications of Khrushchev's de-Stalinization campaign. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 18) (IMG)

The fact that the Romanian communists pretended to be anti-Stalinists does not mean that they actually were such. Romania's communists led by Dej opposed the anti-Stalin slanders of Khrushchev. It is worth reminding that when the junk of the 'Lenin Testament' attacked Stalin as 'rude', Stalin picked up the slander against himself, 'accepted' it, but reinterpreted it around in such a manner to actually help him pursue his 'rude' objectives (see C5S1). Stalin used an anti-Stalinist colouring so to push ahead with his 'Stalinist' agenda. Enver Hoxha as well as the Czechoslovak communists all overtly supported the 'anti-Stalin' nonsense, and used this as a cover with which to continue their 'Stalinist' activity. Dej was doing a similar thing through such fake 'anti-Stalinism'. Thus, in the words of the CIA even as late as 1964,:

Dej ... has given only lip service to Khrushchev's de-Stalinization program.... (RUMANIA'S POSITION IN THE SOVIET BLOC, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 15, 1964, p. 1) (IMG)

Even as late as 1961, which was the time of the second wave of Titoization launched by the Moscow-based Titoists, the Romanian communists rightly claimed to have restored collective leadership in the Romanian Workers' Party by purging Pauker and her immediate associates. Paul Lendvai, a Zionist Hungarian defector to Austria and a journalist who participated in the CIA-backed MI6-backed colour revolution in Hungary, wrote:

At the Central Committee plenum in November-December 1961, Gheorghiu-Dej coped easily with the repercussions of Khrushchev's second de-Stalinization campaign. The Party leader, who since March 1961 had also been President of the republic, asserted that he had been a helpless prisoner of the Pauker group and, by purging them, had restored "collective leadership." (Anti-Semitism without Jews: Communist Eastern Europe, Paul Lendvai, January 1, 1971, p. 337) (IMG)

Enver Hoxha (see Hoxha's 'The Titoites' and 'The Khrushchevites') used to mention that Gheorghiu-Dej was a favorite of the Stalin-era Soviet officials. This makes sense because the Stalin-era Soviets had a Chekist mentality, and Dej embodied the Chekist mentality, for not only was he a purger, but he also was good at camouflaging. Partially for the same reason, Hoxha disliked Dej – Hoxha despised camouflaging, even though Hoxha himself engaged in it at times. The camouflaging skills were manifested by 1956, when, whereas Mao proved to be a boss at being a fake 'anti-revisionist', Dej proved to be excellent at being a fake 'revisionist', a 'Stalinist' camouflaged as 'anti-Stalinist'. Dej also rigidly adhered to historical materialist step-by-step methods instead of rushing. The dialectical concept of the 'negation of negation' is manifested in his entire record of policies, strategies and tactics. The Stalin-era Soviet officials therefore naturally saw much similarity between themselves and the Dej faction in Romania. And of course, as has been mentioned in C15S1, Dej had excellent relations with the Stalin-era Soviet Politburo.

To maximize pressure for Titoization and to install Titoists at the helm of Romania, the Eurasian Titoists joined the Anglo-American imperialists in the blockade against People's Democratic Romania, and imposed economic sanctions on People's Democratic Romania:

No Soviet credit is known to have been extended to Rumania after 1956.... Credits from the more developed East European countries also had been small. (RUMANIA'S POSITION IN THE SOVIET BLOC, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 15, 1964, p. 2) (IMG)

The economic sanctions on Romanian heavy industry had already been partially imposed, 'thanks' to the 'New Course' campaign to pressure the Romanians to prioritize the consumer goods sector. However, they became more severe after the official declaration of Titoization in 1956. The Romanian communists responded much like many of the rest of the freedom forces around the world, by courting China's left-deviationist regime in order to keep the Khrushchevian right-deviation in check:

Gheorghiu-Dej began to court the Chinese; indeed, after 1956, the Romanian communists had more in common in their treatment of the Stalin issue and de-Stalinization with Mao's China and Hoxha's Albania than with Gomulka's Poland. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 14-15) (IMG)

In spite of these measures, the Romanian communists obviously could not fully avoid the inevitable wave of Titoization striking Fortress Romania. The effects of this mighty wave was reflected in Romania's policies towards Israel and Yugoslavia. The Dej faction, despite taking some hits, was able to skillfully block this wave from achieving its big goals. Having purged Ana Pauker and a number of her associates, the communist forces in Romania had enough strength to block and minimize the Zionist migration until the late 1950s. The Israel Defense Magazine, an Israeli magazine on military and intelligence affairs, stated:

During the 1950s, Romanian authorities denied departure approvals to Jews possessing higher education or in-demand qualifications. In those years, the stream of immigrants coming out of Romania was not overly regular or continuous, and immigration often stopped and resumed, for various reasons. ('Romanian-Styled Capitalism', Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

However, the Titoization line promoted by the 20th congress of the CPSU assisted in the release of Zionist leaders in Romania:

A considerable part of Rumanian Jewry ... had left by 1951. For next seven years virtually no exit permits were issued. (...). It was an indication of the unrest and embitterment in the Jewish community that even after Stalin's death in 1954 scores of Zionist leaders were sentenced to long prison terms at secret trials. They were released only during the period of the relative thaw after the Twentieth Soviet Party Congress in 1956. (Anti-Semitism without Jews: Communist Eastern Europe, Paul Lendvai, January 1, 1971, p. 342) (IMG)

As can be seen, the Titoization agenda of the Kremlin Titoists headed by Khrushchev was a score in favor of the Israeli regime. Nonetheless, Romania was able to resist this as well. Years of Stalin-era Soviet assistance had strengthened the communist intelligence agents' presence in that country. Hence, the Romanian People's Democracy had a relatively robust counter-intelligence apparatus that assisted it in surveiling the Israeli employees in Romania, and to impose a freeze on the 'reunion' of Jews in Romania with their respective families in Israel. Indeed, the Israeli intelligence document from the Mossad station in Bucharest stated:

Summary

The East European division informs the Israel legation in Bucharest that they have complained to Chitic about the following:

- 1) The delay in authorising the arrival of the minister, Harel.
 - 2) The following of and spying on the Israeli employees in Bucharest, which interferes with their regular legal activities and which is in contradiction of the Romanians' repeatedly expressed desire for proper and normal relations.
 - 3) The freeze imposed on the reunion of families. Despite the many promises, the government of Romania ignores this humanitarian problem. This inflexible attitude can no longer be ignored and causes growing discontent both in Israel and abroad.
- (Coded Tel. 368, Outg.:130.23/3123/16', East European Division (Jerusalem) to the Israel Legation in Bucharest', February 19, 1957. In: 'DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL', State of Israel Archives, Vol. 12: The Sinai Campaign: The Political Struggle, October 1956 – March 1957, Edited by Nana Sagi, General editor: Yemima Rosenthal, Companion Volume, 2009, pp. 409-410) (IMG{PD – Post-1953 Migration to Israel})

It deserves to be said that Israeli employees do not deserve to be spied on just because of their Israeli background, as that constitutes anti-Israeli chauvinist 'ethnic profiling'. However, it is a fact that Romania was not a destination of Israeli citizens' migration, and many Israelis who worked in Romania were not there to live for the long-term as citizens of Romania, but were rather working there for commercial relations or diplomatic relations between the two countries. I therefore speculate that in the above report, 'the Israeli employees' spoken of were the employees in the commercial/diplomatic organizations and were planning to stay in Romania for only the short-term. I doubt that they were migrants to live and work under a socialist system for the rest of their lives. Certainly, the employees in the commercial and diplomatic bodies subservient to hostile anti-socialist states were the kinds of employees to be carefully monitored, and this was not just limited to Israel but all of the allies of the United States and Britain.

The reason why Romania was able to bloc Zionist migration was that, during the Stalin era, the USSR had assisted communist loyalist intelligence agents to permeate the apparatus of Romania, thus making CIA-Mossad infiltration difficult. Indeed, an Israeli intelligence document sent from the Mossad station in Bucharest stated that the continued existence of the 'old Stalinist officials' was a key reason why Zionist mass migration was not happening:

Summary

Since the Romanians have not permitted any emigration for two months and in light of recent developments in Poland and Hungary, the Israeli minister proposes that he request a meeting with [deputy Foreign Minister] Rudencu and present him with a demand for mass emigration. In addition, he would try to put this claim to government members and in talks with the Russians.

The main reason for this state of affairs in Romania is its complete subordination to the [Stalin-era] Soviet Union, the intransigent political line and the old Stalinist officials. However, even if current conditions are unfavorable, the issue must still be broached.

(Coded Tel. 681, Inc.:130.09/2297/4, 'Israel Legation in Bucharest to the East European Division', December 27, 1956. In: 'DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL', State of Israel Archives, Vol. 12: The Sinai Campaign: The Political Struggle, October 1956 – March 1957, Edited by Nana Sagi, General editor: Yemima Rosenthal, Companion Volume, 2009, p. 215) (IMG{PD – Post-1953 Migration to Israel})

Contrary to the statement of the above excerpt, however, Romania was not 'subordinated' to – as in, colonized by – the Stalin-era USSR. It was however dominated by communists that operated as faithful comrades sharing the views of the communists in the USSR and who were thoroughly aligned with the Soviet comrades. Obviously, this was troubling for the Moscow Titoists, which is why new plots were hatched against People's Democratic Romania.

As always, the communist revolutionary blue-collar faction of the Party faced the pincer assault of the left-opportunists and right-opportunists. The wave of Titoization launched by the Moscow-based Titoists caused the full activation and mobilization of the this pincer assault. Back in 1956, the leading left-deviationist in Romania was the vengefully anti-Romanian Iosif Chişinevschi, who showed 'zeal' in 'supporting' the Stalin-era USSR. Chişinevschi, as confirmed by the CIA media 'Radio Free Europe / Radio Liberty' was a Pauker agent:

Chişinevschi, once a Pauker protege, was a Bessarabian Jew whose command of Romanian was comparable with Luca's, only the accent was Russian rather than Hungarian. ('Stalinism With a Human Face?', Part 3: No 'Nice Jewish Girl', Michael Shafir. In: East European Perspectives, Vol. 3, No. 13, RFE/RL, July 11, 2001) (IMG)

Pauker, as was shown in C15S1, although from a Jewish background, betrayed millions of Yiddish proletarians by pursuing Trotskyite left-sectarian policies aimed at undermining the communist efforts against the Nazis. Chişinevschi was a 'Bessarabian Jew' of the Pauker type, and belonged to her camp. Chişinevschi's vengefully anti-Romanian show of zeal in 'favor' of the USSR was merely the usual Trotskyite diversionary weapon of driving a wedge between the Soviet and Romanian peoples. The CIA reported:

Chişinevschi hated the Rumanians and was waiting for the day of revenge. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 1) (IMG)

On the other hand, according to the Wilson Center document,:

Iosif Chişinevschi represented the pillar of the Soviet influence in the Romanian Communist Party. Born in 1905 in Bessarabia, Iosif Roitman, later on Chişinevschi after his wife's name, played a fundamental role in the Bolshevization, respectively Stalinization, of the RCP in the underground years. Unlike Leonte Răutu, his main disciple after 23 August 1944, Chişinevschi was self-taught: born in a poor family, he entered in the communist movement since his early youth and did not finish high school. However, in his case, the cultural void was compensated by a terrible confidence in the educative virtues of the clandestine communist sect. Ignoring and detesting the real intellectual problems, unaware of the theoretical debates of the Marxist left, Chişinevschi venerated the Stalinist ideological surrogate. (...). The history of the Romanian culture and the drama in the past of this country were not at all his concern.

For Chişinevschi, the attitude toward the USSR was the most important criterion of Leninist orthodoxy.

(Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 24-26) (IMG)

Again, Chișinevschi was never a real supporter of the Stalin-era USSR, but, being a Trotskyite left-deviationist, he certainly posed as such for Trotskyite wedge-driving and opportunistic camouflage purposes. In implementing his Trotskyite pseudo-'Stalinist' terror, Chisinevschi was infamous, for he spared no brutality. He first became a chief of the Romanian counter-intelligence sector:

In 1950, Chisinevschi joined the Rumanian Government as chief of the Rumanian Security Police. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, pp. 1-2) (IMG)

He used to:

humiliate [others] in a ... cruel manner ... in the name of the [communist] cause. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 24-26) (IMG)

Even by 1956,:

Chișinevschi [was] by far the most detested party leader.... (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 24) (IMG)

However, Chisinevschi was:

hoping to cover his own past, full of crimes and abuses. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 24-26) (IMG)

The Trotskyite diversionary Chișinevschi sought to terrorize, not in order to suppress dissent of course, but to provoke more of it and then redirect resentment towards Dej and other communists in the Party by presenting them as responsible for the terror he had committed. For his conspiratorial agenda, Chișinevschi had his own network of agents:

Iosif Chișinevschi has been Vice President of the Rumanian Government and representative of the Rumanian Communist Party with the Cominform since 1952. He is generally called the "eminence grise" of the country and is believed to pull all the political strings, although he likes to stay in the background. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 1) (IMG)

In order to survive the anti-Pauker purges, Chisinevschi had opportunistically turned against his covert boss, Ana Pauker, and thus saw a promotion in official rank when she was purged:

In 1952, [Chisinevschi] became Vice President of the Rumanian Council of Ministers. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, pp. 1-2) (IMG)

Of course, through the purge of Pauker, Chisinevschi's network of influence had weakened, but his official rank did increase through his participation in the anti-Pauker purge. Dej's faction had promoted Chisinevschi against the Mossad spy Ana Pauker and her group but that did not mean that Dej had any good relations with Chisinevschi:

Gheorghiu Dej is not on good terms with Chisinevschi on whom Dej looks down because Chisinevschi was not one of the founders of the Rumanian Communist Party. The antipathy between the two is mutual. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

Chisinevschi, a Pauker agent, had opportunistically denounced his own boss so to survive the purges. Parallel with Khrushchev and Tito who used to praise Stalin to the heavens and then denounce him to mud, Chisinevschi the 'Stalinist' pursued such an agenda, actively and ferociously pursued an anti-Stalinist line, and began to pursue Khrushchev-style Titoization:

Once the Soviet leaders decided to denounce Stalin, Chișinevschi followed the new line with the same zeal he had once applied Stalin's directives. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 24-26) (IMG)

Thus,:

After the Twentieth Congress [Chisinevschi] started immediately to spread insidious critical allusions to Gheorghiu-Dej.... (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 24-26) (IMG)

On the other hand, the Dej faction – which as documented before, had its base on the communist blue-collar workers in the Party – was targeted by the right-deviationist elements headed by Constantinescu, who, like most revisionists of the liberal right-deviationist type, had his social base in the intelligentsia:

The other member of the Central Committee that confronted Gheorghiu-Dej was Miron Constantinescu, one of the very few authentic intellectuals accepted in the hegemonic group of Romanian communism. Partner rather than accomplice for Gheorghiu-Dej, he saw in the de-Stalinization process started by Khrushchev the chance of a lifetime. After 1954, Miron Constantinescu began to intensely cultivate his image as a fighter for liberalization in the party. He initiated a series of meetings with some of the outstanding intellectuals of the interwar period, especially after he was appointed Minister of Education and Culture on 18 November 1956. No less significant was his meeting in February 1956 in Moscow with the leader of Italian communism, Palmiro Togliatti, whose heretical opinions would be disclosed in the following months. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 26) (IMG)

Like Chisinevschi, Constantinescu had been close to the CIA-Mossad agent Ana Pauker. However, once it became clear that she was about to be purged, he overtly distanced himself from her:

Miron Constantinescu was at one time fairly close to Ana Pauker, but he was cautious enough to keep a certain distance and maintain his independence of her. He was thus able to get out from under the crash very cleverly. (HARMONY AMONG LEADING COMMUNISTS IN RUMANIA, CIA, January 28, 1953, p. 1) (IMG)

It must be remembered that although the CIA-Mossad agent Pauker herself was removed from power, she still retained a network within the Party:

Pauker's influence on the other Communist leaders in the country is still so great, however, that her word may still have some weight in the decisions of the Party. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p.3) (IMG)

Constantinescu was a successor to Pauker. In his struggle against the communist faction and the blue-collar elements.:

Constantinescu believed that he could also count on the support of intellectuals within the party, as well as among some major cultural figures that had been thrown to the periphery of social life after the communist takeover. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 16-18) (IMG)

The Trotskyite left-deviationist group of Chişinevschi represented the corrupt bureaucrats in the Party, and the liberal right-deviationist group of Constantinescu the ally of Mossad agent Pauker, represented the intelligentsia in the Party. Team Chişinevschi and team Constantinescu banded together to launch a pincer assault on the Gheorghiu-Dej faction, which had its base in the communist blue-collar worker elements of the Party:

The ... alliance between Chişinevschi and Constantinescu in the spring of 1956 had been dictated by pragmatic considerations. At that time, they believed that Gheorghiu-Dej was so compromised as a result of the revelations about Stalinist abuses, that he should be removed from power. In order to obtain a majority of votes within the Politburo, probably encouraged by Khrushchev, they tried to persuade other members of the Politburo to join in their efforts to topple Gheorghiu-Dej. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 24) (IMG)

In every country, the liberal intelligentsia and the torturers are allies. The alliance of the Chişinevschi and Constantinescu teams is a local case in point demonstrating the worldwide alliance, an alliance naturally emanating from the alliance of the intelligentsia and the corrupt bureaucrats, for the corrupt bureaucrats in the intelligence services are the pool from among whom torturers arise.

One of the covert allies that Chisinevschi had was Moghioros:

On the other hand, Chisinevschi is on good terms with Alexandry Moghioros, a Vice President of the Council of Ministers. (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

However, according to Vladimir Tismăneanu, Moghioros – probably feeling that he had no chance against the Dej faction at the time – decided to overtly denounce his own covert ally. Referring to the Chişinevschi-Constantinescu alliance, Tismăneanu wrote:

Although they were successful in drawing Pîrvulescu, the president of the Party Control Commission, into the conspiracy, they did not manage to win over Alexandru Moghioroş, who informed Gheorghiu-Dej about the plot. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 24) (IMG)

He adds:

Actually, Miron Constantinescu's attempt to enroll Moghioroş on his side backfired: Moghioroş, who had earlier betrayed Vasile Luca and Ana Pauker, went immediately to Gheorghiu-Dej to inform him about the formation of an "anti-party platform." Iosif Chişinevschi went to the less astute Pîrvulescu, who, anyway, despised Gheorghiu-Dej, and tried to attract his assistance in this effort to blame the First Secretary for the abuses. Pîrvulescu either did not understand that Chişinevschi's suggested action amounted in fact to Gheorghiu-Dej's ouster, or pretended that he did not get the message clearly. His failure to inform on Chişinevschi's courting and invitation to "discuss the past in the light of the Twentieth Congress Leninist course" greatly cost him. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 16-18) (IMG)

The Chisinevschi-Constantinescu group thus launched their pincer attack. One of them attacked the 'Stalinists' from the left and the other attacked them from the right:

At this Plenum, Iosif Chişinevschi and Miron Constantinescu, both members of the delegation to the Twentieth Congress, and each for very different reasons, challenged Gheorghiu-Dej's authority, so that the meeting was transformed in a real debate, as there was no other since the purge of the right-wing deviators. This is the reason why from the documents of this Plenum only Gheorghiu-Dej's Report on the Twentieth Congress was published (and even that one in a sanitized version). Constantinescu, supported by Chişinevschi, argued for the "regeneration" of the party in the spirit of the anti-Stalinist line promoted by Khrushchev. They invoked the slogan of the Twentieth Congress about the "restoration of Leninist norms of internal party life" in order to weaken Gheorghiu-Dej's position and restructure the party's leadership. Also, Miron Constantinescu criticized the Securitate, including the fact that secret police operated within Ministries without consultations with top officials, even if those, as it was his case, served on the Politburo.

In Leninist parlance, this was an overall attack, and Gheorghiu-Dej did not miss the point. To Constantinescu's and Chişinevschi's criticism, Gheorghiu-Dej, who was able to combine a seductive personal affability with the icy requests of the Stalinist logic, opposed the theory that the personality cult had indeed existed within the RWP, with abominable and tragic consequences, but all this had come to an end with the elimination of the factionalist villains, the arch-opportunists Pauker, Luca, Teohari. After 1952, Gheorghiu-Dej and his supporters claimed, "collective leadership was re-installed." Later, at the Central Committee Plenum in November 1961, Gheorghiu-Dej maintained, seconded by a cohort of sycophants, that normal party life had started only after 1952, and this was due primarily to the great Leninist militant, Gheorghiu-Dej himself.

It is worth emphasizing that the two main opponents of Gheorghiu-Dej attacked him for very different reasons. In the case of Chişinevschi, it was about his enduring opportunism, his unsurpassed chameleon-type of political conduct materialized in his will to associate himself with the group that was most probable to win the battle. A true follower of Moscow's line, whatever its twist or turn, he grasped an opportunity to undermine Gheorghiu-Dej and re-compose for himself the image of a fighter for intraparty democracy. As Khrushchev seemed to run the show in Moscow, Chişinevschi thought, it was likely that a critical re-assessment of the Stalinist purges in Romania was inevitable. Miron Constantinescu, at his turn, thought that he was the one destined to promote a new political course in Romania, and hoped that he could overthrow Gheorghiu-Dej. Actually, at the next Politburo meeting, he attacked Gheorghiu-Dej directly, saying that, although he acknowledged the merits of the First Secretary, he wanted to underline his defects, considering that the hitherto completely uncritical attitude towards Gheorghiu-Dej was a mistaken, non-Leninist position. (...). Gheorghiu-Dej's main confidants and supporters at that moment were Gheorghe Apostol, Emil Bodnăraş, Alexandru Moghioroş, and Petre Borilă.

(Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 16-18) (IMG)

Further emphasizing the fact that on the overt level, the two allies Constantinescu and Chişinevschi were on different sides of the political spectrum, the Wilson Center document stated:

With regard to this episode, mention should be made of Gheorghiu-Dej's anti-intellectual sentiments, which may explain the particular bitterness and violence of the purge that followed the internal party debates in 1956. No doubt, Miron Constantinescu ... internalized the lessons of the Twentieth CPSU Congress.... Gheorghiu-Dej used Constantinescu's uninspired alliance with Iosif Chişinevschi – by far the most detested party leader – as an argument against the “group.” The two communist leaders were, actually, very different in intellectual background, in the way they understood the relationship with the policy promoted by Moscow, and in the significance they attributed to de-Stalinization. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 24) (IMG)

While the pincer assault against the Dej faction was being spearheaded by the Constantinescu-Chişinevschi bloc, there also came the Red Army intervention in Hungary, a factor which would contribute to the demise of the Constantinescu-Chişinevschi bloc. Like Hoxha, Dej was thanked for pressuring the Moscow Titoists into accepting Red Army intervention into Hungary:

After the crushing of the Hungarian [colour] revolution, Dej appeared to the most conservative among the Kremlin leaders as a trustworthy comrade. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 21) (IMG)

The events of Hungary's colour revolution elevated the position of the communist faction throughout the bloc, after having suffered a wave of Titoization. This elevation of the communist faction was observed not only in Hungary itself but also in Albania, East Germany, and Czechoslovakia. The case of the Romanian communists was no different:

The Hungarian uprising and the Polish crisis in the autumn of 1956 placed Gheorghiu-Dej in an advantageous position in his behind-the-scenes confrontation with the Khrushchev leadership. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 23-24) (IMG)

As mentioned, the rollback of the fascist forces in Hungary in 1956

On the other hand, as a result of the discrediting of Titoization after Hungary's colour revolution,:

Miron Constantinescu, the head of the State Planning Committee, was appointed Minister of Education on 18 November 1956, a decision that covered a degradation of his status. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 21) (IMG)

Due to Eurasian Titoist pressures and Anglo-American sanctions, the communists could not purge the Pauker agent Chisinevschi just yet, but he was gradually demoted over time:

After March 1956, in spite of his renewed declarations of faith to Gheorghiu-Dej, there was no chance for Chişinevschi's political survival; Gheorghiu-Dej surpassed him in ability and duplicity. In June 1957, he was excluded from the Politburo, and in 1960 the Third Congress of the RWP did not reelect him in the Central Committee. (...). Gheorghiu-Dej, Ceauşescu, Maurer, Răutu, Borilă, Moghioroş, Sencovici, Valter Roman, all accused the one whom they had once celebrated as the “brain of the party,” then only the director of the Printing Combinat “Casa Scînteii.” (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 24-26) (IMG)

Parallel with the decline of the Pauker agent Chisinevschi was the decline of his ally, the Pauker agent Constantinescu:

Associated with the tendencies for liberalization inside the party, caught in the traps of Gheorghiu-Dej and Răutu, Constantinescu was ousted from the Politburo at the June Plenum in 1957 together with Chişinevschi for their “attempt to orient the party towards the liberalist and revisionist anarchy.” (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 26) (IMG)

Pîrvulescu too, another member of the Chisinevschi-Constantinescu group, was demoted:

At the June 1957 Central Committee Plenum, Pîrvulescu was severely criticized, at the Third RWP Congress in 1960 he lost his Politburo seat, and at the November-December 1961 Plenum he was criticized for political myopia and opportunism. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 16-18) (IMG)

Nevertheless, the effects of the failed attempt of Chişinevschi-Constantinescu faction to question Gheorghiu-Dej's responsibility for the Stalinist's period misdeeds were felt once again: Constantin Pîrvulescu, one of the party old-timers, lost his place in the Politburo and the Central Committee, as well as his position as chairman of the Party Control Commission (he was replaced by the veteran hard-liner Cominternist, Dumitru Coliu). Clearly, Pîrvulescu's expulsion was related to his attitude toward the Chişinevschi-Constantinescu actions against Gheorghiu-Dej. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 33-34) (IMG)

In short,:

The Plenum of the CC of the RWP on 28-29 June and 1-3 July 1957 played a crucial role in the restructuring of RWP's Politburo and the expulsion of the so-called “factionalist group” Chişinevschi-Constantinescu. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 23-24) (IMG)

The Dej faction coopted Maurer to replace and help purge the Chisinevschi-Constantinescu group. Stoica too was demoted:

Ion Gheorghe Maurer, at the moment nominal chief of state, took his place in the Politburo. One year later, Maurer replaced the notoriously mediocre Chivu Stoica as chairman of the Council of Ministers, a position he held until his retirement in 1974. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 33-34) (IMG)

Never really a communist loyalist, Maurer was coopted by the Dej faction. Maurer later came out as a Titoist agent as well.

At the same time, there was a partial rehabilitation of Stalin. In its historical context, the attack on the personality of Stalin marked the ground zero of propaganda in favor of Titoization, because the plan was that through attacking the personality of the teacher, the teachings of the teacher were to be discredited. By contrast, the loyal comrades of the teacher operated in the reverse way, namely that they first defended the teachings and then later on went for the defense of the personality of the teacher. This makes sense from a historical materialist lens because while anti-Stalin slanders did help in denouncing Stalin's decisions as the 'decisions of an evil dictator', the defense of Stalin's personality in itself could not mark the ground zero of anti-Titoist and anti-revisionist resistance. The reactionary policy implications of the 1956 Titoization speech were to be resisted first. Romania, like some other Peoples' Democracies in which the communist faction was strong enough, successfully resisted much of the Titoization, and thereupon proceeded to defend Stalin as a person in 1957. The Titoist forces in Romania were weak enough that not just Titoist infiltrator Ceausescu but even the Chisinevski agent Moghioros felt compelled to defend the legacy, line, and personality of Stalin in 1958:

One of the most interesting speeches delivered to the Plenum was that of Ceaușescu.... Therefore, Ceaușescu's speech deserves a closer analysis.... Although he [stated] that there were some mistakes in Stalin's activity, Ceaușescu stated that one should be aware of Stalin's major merits, and that his works were worth studying. Ceaușescu further [officially] expressed admiration for Stalin when he bluntly declared: "Actually, we did not proceed like others, who threw away from their homes Stalin's works." This was a direct reference to Miron Constantinescu who had expressed doubts regarding many of Stalin's theses. However, Ceaușescu was not alone in praising Stalin's legacy: in their speeches, both Răutu and Moghioroș referred to conversations they had with workers and, respectively, old-time members of the party who allegedly had asked them not to exaggerate Stalin's mistakes. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 27-29) (IMG)

The year 1958 gave the Dej faction another opportunity for further undermining the Chisinevski-Constantinescu group, because, given pressures from communist elements, there came about an assault from Moscow and even from Khrushchev himself on the Yugoslav regime. Khrushchev did this because he had to concede to pressure. Romania joined in with the attack:

When, in the summer of 1958, ... the Soviets criticized the Yugoslav Communist League's new program as "revisionist," the Romanians completely endorsed the Kremlin's stance. At least officially, the relations between the RWP and the CPSU top leaders had never been warmer. Based on documents from the RCP archives, it appears that this was far from being the complete truth: on various occasions, in private discussions, Gheorghiu-Dej insisted that his party had matured and that relations between socialist countries should be governed by the principles of complete equality and national independence. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 32-33) (IMG)

The renewed attack on Titoism afforded the Romanian communists the leverage they needed for further demoting the Pauker agents Chisinevski and Constantinescu and their network. Chisinevski and Constantinescu both had bases throughout the Party and state apparatus, because they had the support of the terrorist bureaucrats and liberal intellectuals. As such, there began a purge of people whom the Romanian communists accused as associated of the Chisinevski-Constantinescu group:

in June 1957, Constantinescu was accused of many sins ... and, through a typically Stalinist stroke, Gheorghiu-Dej associated him with one of the most compromised and hated Stalinist personalities, Iosif Chișinevski, removing both from their posts. In 1958-59, thousands of party members experienced again the frightful moments of terror from Stalin's years. At Gheorghiu-Dej's order, the Party Control Committee headed by Dumitru Coliu-Ion Vințe (Vincze Janos), started a new wave of ... interrogations that encouraged denouncement and speculated the lowest instincts of upgrading. People who thought that Stalinism was dead in 1956 faced it once again in the years after the Hungarian Revolution. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 22) (IMG)

I of course cannot independently verify if all of those people purged were guilty, but there is no doubt that the intelligence network of Chisinevski's gang had to be purged off and that Chisinevski could not have lasted that long in the Party without having thousands of torturers, bureaucrats, and renegades as his support base. A much-despised traitor like him did not stand on air, after all. Plus, one must remember that the Pauker network in the Romanian Party had not been fully purged and that a large portion of the Pauker network would have backed the Pauker agent Chisinevski. Thanks to the partial denunciation of the Yugoslav regime in 1958, great advances were made in Romania against the network of the Israeli agent Ana Pauker.

The Eurasian Titoists knew that the Red Army was still under a significant though not dominant influence of the comrades of Stalin. The stationing of Red Army in Romania provided for the communist and progressive elements remaining in the Red Army to help that People's Democracy in the face of much larger swathes of intelligence operatives from the CIA, MI6, and Mossad, swathes of operatives whose infiltration Romania could not resist as much alone. The Eurasian Titoists therefore decided to leave Romania almost alone in the face of such a massive intelligence war, and through new waves of Titoization, increased the leverage of Titoist agents who sought to rehabilitate the CIA agent Ana Pauker:

in July 1958, Khrushchev made the unexpected decision to withdraw the Soviet troops that were stationed in Romania. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 31) (IMG)

It was however only after the withdrawal of the Soviet troops in 1958 and in the wake of the Twenty-second Soviet Party Congress in 1961, that the long forgotten Pauker affair became a political factor of prime importance. (Anti-Semitism without Jews: Communist Eastern Europe, Paul Lendvai, January 1, 1971, p. 337) (IMG)

It was no coincidence that in that same year, in 1958, the imperialist media assisted the Kremlin Titoists by trying to isolate Romania from its Arab allies. Hence in 1958, Western media launched a massive propaganda campaign, claiming that there was Zionist mass migration from Romania:

Western sources reported that over a hundred thousand Jews had registered for emigration. (Anti-Semitism without Jews: Communist Eastern Europe, Paul Lendvai, January 1, 1971, p. 343) (IMG)

While a few were able to lobby for emigration permits for Romania during that period, the evidence leaves no doubt that the 'mass migration' of Jews and 'Jews' from Romania was a myth promoted by the media outlets owned by the imperialist-fascist secret services. The accusations of the reactionary media could not possibly be correct, because in fact, in addition to an outright ban of the choosing of Israel as a destination for migration, the Romanian authorities had also placed additional restrictions on Jewish/'Jewish' migration to outside of Romania in general and not just to Israel. The reason for this was that even migration to a Western European country could be exploited by the Mossad as a covert means of having those Jews and 'Jews' to eventually end up in Israel. In fact, regarding this question of Zionist mass migration from Romania, there was:

a secret document sent by the director of the Eastern-European desk at the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs to the office of Minister Golda Meir on December 25, 1958, so that she may present the report to the government.... ('Romanian-Styled Capitalism', Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

The December 1958 document, which demonstrates how the Romanian People's Democracy sought to sabotage the 'Aliyah' plans of the Mossad and its Titoist-Zionist fifth column in Romania, was as follows:

"On December 17, the Israeli Consul in Bucharest received notice to the effect that henceforth, immigration applicants should no longer report to the Consulate to receive their visas. Instead, the Romanian Ministry of Foreign Affairs would send their passports en masse and ask the Consulate to stamp the passports with the visas.

Additionally, the Romanian government will assume responsibility for arranging the medical examinations as well as for obtaining the laissez-passer documents and for organizing transport. The official explanation was that the new arrangements were intended to make life easier for the immigrants and save them a lot of running around between the consulates, as well as to eliminate the risk that owing to the need to obtain various visas, etc., the validity of the passport might expire in the meantime.

The Israeli Consul immediately protested the new 'arrangement', claiming that a state wishing to absorb new immigrants must not be denied the option of seeing the potential immigrants, examining, directing and guiding them. The head of the Consular Department at the Romanian Ministry of Foreign Affairs claimed that the decision had been made by a higher echelon, and that she has no authority to challenge it."

('Romanian-Styled Capitalism', Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

So much for Gheorghiu-Dej's fake 'friendship' with Tito, the Romanians had blocked Jewish/'Jewish' migration 'even' to Yugoslavia, the country that, under Tito's fascist regime, had been a major hub for numerous CIA-Mossad stations. Israeli suggestions of a direct travel to Israel were again flatly rejected. The Israel Defense Magazine, an Israeli magazine on military and intelligence affairs, continued:

The same document [cited above] went on to say that the Romanian authorities began marking all of the immigrants' passports with only one departure station – the train station out of which trains departed for Hungary, so as to revoke the option of transporting the immigrants through Yugoslavia or any option of transporting them by air. Israel's suggestion to organize a direct transport service, by boat, from Constanța (a Romanian seaport on the coast of the Black Sea) was flatly rejected. ('Romanian-Styled Capitalism', Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

Migration to Hungary would have meant migration to an area under the influence of the Red Army and the communist agents it had promoted in the Hungarian state apparatus. That would have made the Mossad's 'Aliyah' activities much harder. The Romanians aimed to retain their correct diplomatic relations with Israel, and expressed their opposition to the Zionist migration through a combination of flat rejection, severe restrictions, excuses, as well as suggestions that are ostensibly meant to 'help' Zionist migration but are actually creating more trouble. The same strategy had been pursued by the Peoples' Democracies for years, as can be seen in C16S2, and has been documented throughout the numerous pages of the documents of the Israel State Archives. The countries of the socialist camp aimed to overthrow the Israeli regime but their opposition to it was not the same kind of opposition of many in the Arab countries; it was an attempt to overthrow the Israeli regime so to install a new Israeli state, Arab-friendly and socialist; it was not a "Destroy the Zionist Entity!" kind of campaign of opposition to Israel. That is the communist factions in the Peoples' Democracies kept expressing a desire for good relations with Israel and provided suggestions to 'help' the 'Aliyah' process when in fact those suggestions were more trouble than 'help'. Out of a desire of not losing contact with the people of Israel, the Romanians were keen to, as much as possible, not give the Israeli regime the excuse to bash Romania for its anti-Zionist policy.

Furthermore, throughout the 1950s, there were Romanian political-cultural campaigns against Zionism:

During that period, [i.e. until the 1950s] the Romanians went as far as holding anti-Zionist rallies at work places, where they encouraged the participants to protest against Jewish immigration and influence those who wished to immigrate to Israel to withdraw their applications. Those who reconsidered were asked to sign letters that were subsequently published in the Romanian press, in which they described "how they had been deceived" and "the dire situation that awaited them in Israel." ('Romanian-Styled Capitalism', Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

The evidence therefore indicates that the CIA-Mossad sensationalist accusations against Romania were baseless. There certainly must have been some scattered, illegal, and low levels of Zionist migration in 1958, but no 'mass migration'. Hence, the Romanian government denied the accusations of CIA-MI6-Mossad media:

On February 25, 1959, the Rumanian Government issued a statement accusing "Israeli and imperialist circles of unleashing a diversionist campaign trumpeting abroad the crude invention that there was a mass migration of Jews to Israel." It denied any suggestion of a "mass migration," assured the Arab nations of Rumanian sympathy, deplored the fact that they had been led astray by a slanderous campaign, and accused the Israeli Embassy in Bucharest of spreading Zionist slogans among Rumanian Jews. (Anti-Semitism without Jews: Communist Eastern Europe, Paul Lendvai, January 1, 1971, p. 343) (IMG)

In 1959, and in response to the lies by the Zionist media, another wave of arrests by People's Democratic Romania against Zionist centers was thus launched:

The regime replied with a mixture of propaganda barrage and a wave of arrests. Dozens of Jews [whom Romanian authorities claimed to be Zionist Jews] were arrested and tried in 1959 on charges of espionage and treason. Within eighteen months three Israeli diplomats were expelled because of "abuse of diplomatic privileges." (Anti-Semitism without Jews: Communist Eastern Europe, Paul Lendvai, January 1, 1971, p. 343) (IMG)

So why would the Mossad media propagate the myth that Romania allowed for Zionist mass migration? The answer is very obvious: to drive a wedge between the Arab nation and People's Democratic Romania. Indeed, such false reports of Zionist mass migration in 1958 resulted in:

Arab protests... (Anti-Semitism without Jews: Communist Eastern Europe, Paul Lendvai, January 1, 1971, p. 343) (IMG)

Romania was aiming to retain friendly relations with Israel as a country without allowing such diplomatic relations to strengthen the CIA-backed pro-fascist tendency in Israel; the Mossad misused the desire for good relations with Israel as a country in order to portray Romania as a hub for promoting Zionist mass migration. Romania was partially isolated from its Arab allies. Not all Arab states would have doubted Romania's anti-Zionist policy line, but the CIA-Mossad media exaggerations certainly increased pressure on Romania's Arab allies to reduce relations with Romania. One person with much knowledge of the Mossad presence in Romania is:

Historian and researcher Shlomo Leibowitz, another one of the founders of "Nativ" who also served as the head of the Eastern-European desk at the Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs for many years, recounts that direct negotiations only began in May 1965. Until then, negotiations had been indirect and covert. ('Romanian-Styled Capitalism', Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

The Mossad official and historian Shlomo Leibowitz stated:

the ambassadors of the Arab countries reported together to the government offices and threatened to leave Romania. ('Romanian-Styled Capitalism', Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

Bendor, the head of the Israeli legation in Romania, reported on his meeting with the Romanian Prime Minister Chivu Stoica in 1960. The following Israeli intelligence document sent from the Israeli legation in Romania to Tel Aviv states:

Bendor reports on his meeting with the Rumanian Prime Minister, who made the following declaration: (...). The Israeli press has also raised the Arab world against Rumania. ('Sh. Bendor (Bucharest) to Y. Shimoni, March 6, 1960. Coded Tel.: 722; Inc.: 130.09/2298/1. In: DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL, State of Israel Archives, Vol. 14, 1960, Edited by Baruch Gilead, Companion Volume, pp. 447-448) (IMG)

Romania was not getting economic, political and military aid from Eurasia, the Titoization waves were being launched by the Eurasian Titoists, and a wedge was being driven between Romania and its Arab allies. These factors weakened the communist faction in Romania, leaving them with fewer funds to wage the secret service conflict against imperialist-fascist intelligence penetration into Romania. This increased the influence of the Titoist faction in the Romanian state, thus allowing for the countries of the US-led camp to begin expanding their economic influence in Romania:

No Soviet credit is known to have been extended to Rumania after 1956, although one probably was promised for the proposed Galati steel combine. Credits from the more developed East European countries also had been small. On the other hand, several West European countries began to expand their markets in Rumania in 1959 by extending small credits for industrial plants – the first provided by the free world in a decade. (RUMANIA'S POSITION IN THE SOVIET BLOC, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 15, 1964, p. 2) (IMG)

A larger share of Romania's economy was taken as captive by the imperialists. Naturally, with the increased influence of the front companies of American finance capital, British finance capital, and German finance capital in Romania, imperialist-fascist secret service penetration into Romania increased. The slight increase in the lobbying power of the Anglo-American finance capital in Romania meant a slight increase in the strength of the lobby for Zionist migration. Khrushchev, who had pursued a Cold War against the United Arab Republic (UAR) (see C21S2.1), wanted the communistic-minded Ashkenazim and Sfaradim of Romania to no longer be the loyal citizens of a People's Democracy but to become the cannon-fodder of Moshe Dayan and Ariel Sharon:

When Nikita Khrushchev visited Romania in the late 1950s, Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej, the leader of the Romanian Communist Party and ruler of Romania until 1965, told him about Israel's proposal - Jews for goods. Khrushchev approved the proposal.... ('Romanian-Styled Capitalism', Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

In this midst, with Khrushchev blocking economic aid to Romania and favouring Zionist mass migration as his suggested 'solution' for Romania's economic problems, and with Anglo-American-German finance capital's influence in Romania increased, the Titoist faction saw an increase in its strength in Romania. As a result of such increased lobbying power of Titoist pro-Zionist lobby, the mass migration of Romania's Ashkenazi and Sfaradi citizens began:

According to Leibowitz, following that incident, the Jews received, over a certain period, visas to various countries in Europe. ('Romanian-Styled Capitalism', Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

Jewish families were granted exit permits provided they gave as their destination any country other than Israel. While most of them proceeded there from Vienna, the Rumanians could in good faith assure the Arab governments that they were not encouraging emigration to Israel. (Anti-Semitism without Jews: Communist Eastern Europe, Paul Lendvai, January 1, 1971, p. 344) (IMG)

Of course, many of those Jews would have ended up travelling from Europe onto Israel eventually. Leibowitz stated:

"They [the Romanian Jews] were flown all over Europe, and from there they travelled to Israel." ('Romanian-Styled Capitalism', Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

In a report to Tel Aviv, the Mossad station in Bucharest, the head of which was Bendor, reported:

Bendor reports that the Rumanian authorities have begun to issue emigration permits to Jews for various countries, but not for Israel. Those who apply for a permit to another country can expect a positive answer within a month, the permit being valid for six months from the date of issue. A number of Jews have already applied for emigration permits to countries like France, Switzerland, Austria, Britain and West Germany. In all cases investigated by the Legation, these people said that their final destination was Israel. Several Jews have requested the Legation to help them in obtaining visas for the countries named, and foreign diplomats have been asking the Legation staff for guidelines. Most of the applicants will not be granted visas without the Legation's help. ('Sh. Bendor (Bucharest) to Y. Shimoni and M. Carmil', January 6, 1960. Coded Tel. 545; Inc.: 130.09/2298/1. In: DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL, State of Israel Archives, Vol. 14, 1960, Edited by Baruch Gilead, Companion Volume, p. 442) (IMG)

To those who criticize Romania for being unable to stop Zionist migration and the lobbying of the CIA-Mossad agents in the Romanian government, it is worth reminding that Egypt during the Abdel-Nasser era, and Syria during the Hafez Al-Assad era in the 1990s, both had a problem of Zionist mass migration as well. Syria during the 1990s was under immense pressure as well. This does not 'prove' 'Zionist-collaborationism' by the dominant factions of those governments; it only proves the presence of a significantly powerful imperialist lobby that allowed for such Zionist-collaborationism.

That the migration policy line was liberalized was ‘thanks’ to CIA-Mossad pressures and increased lobbying, but that the direct migration to Israel was still not allowed reflected the power of the communist faction in creating additional costs for the Mossad in their migration projects. Waves of relatively large mass migration to Israel did begin from that point onwards, albeit the communists in Romania did everything they could to hamper that process. Recall that the influence of ‘the old Stalinist officials’ was cited by the Mossad as the factor for why ‘the Romanians [had] not permitted any emigration’, and, that as shown in C16S2, it was the Dej faction which campaigned against Zionist migration. Recall further that even as late as 1958, the Romanians ‘revoke[d] the option of transporting the immigrants through Yugoslavia or any option of transporting them by air’ – because they knew that Yugoslavia was the center of the Mossad in Eastern Europe – and that ‘Israel’s suggestion to organize a direct transport service, by boat, from Constanța (a Romanian seaport on the coast of the Black Sea) was flatly rejected.’ In fact, the communist faction’s opposition to Zionist influence was the reason that until 1965, the Mossad had to ensure that its operations in Romania was covert, and covert operations are always costlier:

Historian and researcher Shlomo Leibowitz, another one of the founders of "Nativ" who also served as the head of the Eastern-European desk at the Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs for many years, recounts that direct negotiations only began in May 1965. Until then, negotiations had been indirect and covert. (‘Romanian-Styled Capitalism’, Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

May 1965 was approximately two months after the murder of Gheorghiu-Dej, a phenomenon that would be explored in further detail later. Regarding the annual number of Jews and ‘Jews’ migrating to Israel, Mossad official Leibowitz also stated:

“(…). There were ups and downs, it ranged between about 40,000 people annually and only 54 people that were allowed to leave. It was like that all the time. It was never even.

"Shaike had to iron out the difficulties every month to six weeks, by re-discussing the terms. There were never any written agreements.

In the end, there was some kind of paper that no one could understand – it lacked any substance. (…).”

(‘Romanian-Styled Capitalism’, Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

Shaike, as may be remembered by the reader from C16S2, was among the most important Mossad operatives who founded ‘Nativ’. Mossad official Leibowitz also stated:

"No Jews had ever left Romania without payment. (…).” (‘Romanian-Styled Capitalism’, Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

Romania accepted a lot of money for the release of the Jews in its territory. (‘Romanian-Styled Capitalism’, Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

The Mossad’s financial payments for Zionist migration worked like a bribe of local officials. Through providing these financial payments to the local Mossad agent that had infiltrated the ranks of the Romanian government, the Mossad was able to on the one hand get its means of promoting the mass migration, and on the other hand to provide financial backing for the Israeli intelligence infiltrators’ network in the Romanian state. This is likely why Romanian Prime Minister Chivu Stoika stated to Israeli diplomat Bendor that there was no agreement between Israel and Romania with regards to migration to Israel, implying that any Zionist migration promoted by Romanian state officials must have been a crime of local employees:

Bendor reports on his meeting with the Rumanian Prime Minister, who made the following declaration: (…). There is no agreement between Israel and Rumania, and thus no room for cooperation between with regard to emigration. The local employees have broken the law and have confessed to their crimes. (‘Sh. Bendor (Bucharest) to Y. Shimoni, March 6, 1960. Coded Tel.: 722; Inc.: 130.09/2298/1. In: DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL, State of Israel Archives, Vol. 14, 1960, Edited by Baruch Gilead, Companion Volume, pp. 447-448) (IMG)

The strong resistance of the communist faction against Zionist migration is the reason why the Israeli intelligence had to pay very much to win its intelligence war:

Romania accepted a lot of money for the release of the Jews in its territory. (‘Romanian-Styled Capitalism’, Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

The sanctions relatively weakened the Romanian economy, which relatively valued the Dollars, Shekels, etc. and devalued the Romanian currency. This meant that as a result of the sanctions policy, the CIA and Mossad had to pay less by American-Israeli standards whereas the CIA and Mossad payments were regarded as more by the standards of the local Romanian officials. Overall, though, the CIA and Mossad achieved their objectives in Romania at great cost, thanks to communist resistance.

The fact that treasonous Romanian officials accepted money from Israel for helping Zionist migration was of course a bad thing, but the fact of the high costs to be paid by the Mossad is an indication that the strength of such corrupt Romanian officials daring to commit such pro-Zionist betrayals was low, because the existence of revolutionary forces in Romania, belong to the Dej faction, was still strong enough to increase the risk of facing punishment for committing such a crime. As such, the fact that the Israelis had to bear large costs for their subversive activities is a positive sign, for it is a sign of the relative strength of the communist faction in Romania, even in the face of sanctions and sabotage. Clearly, people who condemn People’s Democratic Romania for the fact of Zionist migration from there hugely exaggerate the extent and intensity of the migration, because even in such a phase, when Romania was under the most intense of pressures, Zionist migration was low as Bendor remarked; when Romania was under less pressure, the Zionist mass migration did not exist.

Furthermore, thanks to the Romanian government’s sabotage of the Mossad plans, the rate of migration remained very small even as late as May 1960, when Romania was facing an extremely intense level of foreign pressure. The low rate of migration in fact led the head of the Mossad station Bendor to suggest to Tel Aviv that the Romanian intelligentsia, the stratum which had bourgeois and feudal familial origins and which served as the base for Titoism, to be rallied against the Romanian state:

Bendor remarks that at the present rate of emigration the exodus of Rumania’s Jews will take some fifty years. Efforts should be made to increase the rate and to rescue the maximum number of Jews as long as the present liberal policy lasts. The ban on publicity should be re-examined. Pressure must not be relaxed at any possible point. “Pressure groups” of well known artists and scientists should be organized to persuade the Rumanian authorities to issue emigration permits to all who have applied. These groups should be supplied with instances of people whose applications had been rejected, but no names should be mentioned for obvious reasons. Israel, says Bendor, will be sinning against thousands of Jews if it does not exploit all possible ways to help them emigrate. (‘Sh. Bendor (Bucharest) to Y.L. Gideon, May 11, 1960. Coded Tel. 8; Inc.: 130.09/2298/2. In: DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL, State of Israel Archives, Vol. 14, 1960, Edited by Baruch Gilead, Companion Volume, p. 449) (IMG)

The Israelis were not going to have much success in this regard, because:

Domestically, the post-1958 repressions ensured ... the widespread conformity among the intelligentsia. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 31-32) (IMG)

The Romanian Foreign Ministry upheld the policy of opposing Mossad agitation for 'Aliyah' in the synagogues and warned the Israeli 'diplomats' against Zionist agitation:

Bendor reports on his meeting with E. Majințescu (spelling uncertain), one of the Rumanian Deputy Ministers of Foreign Affairs. The latter protested against the activities of the Legation's staff who create the impression among the hundreds of applicants that the Legation played a role in the implementation of Rumania's policy of the reunification of families. He requests that this activity be stopped, as it goes beyond accepted diplomatic usage. He also protested against the staff's visits to synagogues being exploited for propaganda for emigration, against the distribution of money among inimical circles, and against other activities contrary to diplomatic usage. The administrative body of the Jewish community has received complaints from Jewish citizens about these actions, and has therefore decided to designate one synagogue for the visits of the Legation's staff, who are requested to refrain from visiting other synagogues.

Bendor replied that the Legation is open to all, and the applicants are advised that the decision in their case rests with the Rumanian government. As to visits to synagogues, Bendor rejected the accusations and stressed that the bounds imposed on the Legation's staff contravened diplomatic usage. Following further discussion, it was agreed that the designation of one synagogue for the visits of the Legation's staff should be considered as a wish expressed by the directive body of the Jewish communities in Rumania, and that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs recommends that the Legation's staff honour that request.

('Sh. Bendor (Bucharest) to Y.L. Gideon, July 19, 1960. Coded Tel. 196; Inc.: 130.09/2298/2. In: DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL, State of Israel Archives, Vol. 14, 1960, Edited by Baruch Gilead, Companion Volume, pp. 450-451) (IMG)

It must be noted that the Israeli legation in Romania was a Nativ front, and that the Nativ was a branch of the Mossad:

The entire Israeli embassy in Bucharest was a "Nativ" station. ('Romanian-Styled Capitalism', Israel Defense, Issue 11 of the magazine, February 17, 2013) (IMG)

The following is another case of the Romanian Foreign Ministry officials denouncing Israeli agitation:

Bendor reports on his leave-taking meeting with Dumitrescu, one of the Rumanian Deputy Ministers of Foreign Affairs.

The Deputy Minister utilized the meeting for accusing the Legation's staff of espionage, of Zionist propaganda, of illicit trading in currency and jewelry, and of using their trips and visits to the synagogues for these purposes. He based himself on Prime Minister Stoica warning and pointed to possible grave results if these acts were not sopped. He also repeated the recommendation about visits to synagogues. Bendor categorically rejected these accusations.

('Israel Legation in Bucharest to A. Dagan and Sh. Avigur, December 29, 1960, Coded Tel. 594; Inc.: 130.09/2298/3. In: DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL, State of Israel Archives, Vol. 14, 1960, Edited by Baruch Gilead, Companion Volume, p. 455) (IMG)

The Israeli document continues:

Bendor remarks that Dumitrescu's outburst was puzzling on several points: Why did he deliver such a grave warning on the eve of Bendor's termination of service in Bucharest? What is the reason for such anger at Israel? What exactly are they angry about – is it about the refusal to follow their recommendation about visits to synagogues? Why do they hurl baseless accusations at the Legation's staff? Are they preparing the ground for renewed restrictions on the Legation (travelling visits, blockading the Legation)? Are they about to expel some official? Will they renew their attempts to prevent contacts between the Jews and the Legation staff?

Bendor recommends as follows: His replacement should be dispatched to Bucharest as soon as possible. The possibility should be considered that someone from the Legation would be expelled even before Bendor left the country? Plans should be made for helping the Jews in case their contacts with the Legation are severed. The policy of visits to the synagogues and travel outside Bucharest should be reviewed. Bendor concludes with saying that his impression is that the Rumanians' manifestations of anger will not stop the emigration.

('Sh. Bendor (Bucharest) to A. Dagan, December 29, 1960. Coded Tel. 597; Inc.: 130.09/2298/3. In: DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL, State of Israel Archives, Vol. 14, 1960, Edited by Baruch Gilead, Companion Volume, pp. 455-456) (IMG)

The Romanian Prime Minister Chivu Stoica had also warned against Israeli agitations:

Bendor reports on his meeting with the Rumanian Prime Minister, who made the following declaration: (...). Staff of the Israel Legation distribute money and gather information, perhaps to pass it on to foreign [intelligence] services. The distribution of money by the [Israeli] Legation and chauvinist propaganda have brought most of the Jews to sell off their movables and stop working. Just as the government has not tolerated antisemitism in its country, so will it not tolerate chauvinist Zionist propaganda. ('Sh. Bendor (Bucharest) to Y. Shimoni, March 6, 1960. Coded Tel.: 722; Inc.: 130.09/2298/1. In: DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL, State of Israel Archives, Vol. 14, 1960, Edited by Baruch Gilead, Companion Volume, pp. 447-448) (IMG)

Prime Minister Stoica specifically remarked:

"Let the people return to their work and resume their regular lives." ('Sh. Bendor (Bucharest) to Y. Shimoni, March 6, 1960. Coded Tel.: 722; Inc.: 130.09/2298/1. In: DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL, State of Israel Archives, Vol. 14, 1960, Edited by Baruch Gilead, Companion Volume, pp. 447-448) (IMG)

He further declared that:

The emigres from Rumania are members of the bourgeoisie and the World Jewish Congress exploits them for imperialistic ends and for propaganda against Rumania. ('Sh. Bendor (Bucharest) to Y. Shimoni, March 6, 1960. Coded Tel.: 722; Inc.: 130.09/2298/1. In: DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL, State of Israel Archives, Vol. 14, 1960, Edited by Baruch Gilead, Companion Volume, pp. 447-448) (IMG)

Stoica was not an anti-Zionist at heart, but he was sufficiently encircled by communist officials so to be coopted into an 'anti-Zionist'.

Again, the Romanians opposed Israeli agitation not just in words but also in deeds. As admitted in an Israeli Foreign Ministry document, the Israeli Legation in Romania was severely limited in the travel of its agents to the synagogues:

Y. L. Gideon reports on the meeting of the Minister of Foreign Affairs with Manu, Rumania's Minister to Israel. Mrs. Meir expressed [that] ... she viewed with the utmost seriousness the limitation imposed on the Legation staff's visits to synagogues.... ('Y.L. Gideon (Jerusalem) to the Israel Legation in Bucharest', August 18, 1960. Coded Tel. 247; Inc.: 130.09/2297/10. In: DOCUMENTS ON THE FOREIGN POLICY OF ISRAEL, State of Israel Archives, Vol. 14, 1960, Edited by Baruch Gilead, Companion Volume, p. 451) (IMG)

As mentioned, the Moscow Titoists wanted the Peoples' Democracies to remain as backward agrarian societies so that the Atlantic camp would find it easier to conquer them. The 20th CPSU Congress increased pressure on the Romanian communists with regards to industrialization and collectivization. Nonetheless, given the high strength of the blue-collar elements in Romania, the Romanian communists were able to resist. Khrushchev vigorously pushed for a de-emphasis on heavy industry. People's Democratic Romania resisted the Eurasian Titoist line on this matter:

The importance of the 3rd RWP Congress resides, however, in the launch of the long-term economic program (extending to the year 1965), which focused on the sweeping industrialization of the country, with a special emphasis on metallurgical and machine-building industries. The congress discussed the results of the previous Five-Year Plan and approved the draft of the new Six-Year Plan, and the key priority that stayed at its core: the project of the huge steel plant to be erected in Galați. With regard to the agriculture, Gheorghiu-Dej stated in his report to the congress that 680,000 peasant families, owning 1.8 million hectares, were not yet included into the socialist sector; however, the Romanian communist leader affirmed that the collectivization of Romanian agriculture would be completed in 1965. (...). At the same time, the congress approved the strategy of an unprecedented mass-mobilization for the fulfillment of the economic objectives of the party. In fact, communist Romania's economic policy constituted the starting point of the violent polemic between Bucharest and Moscow, which reached its climax in April 1964, with the Romanians publishing a bold "Declaration" regarding the crisis within world communism and proudly defying the Soviet claim to supremacy within the bloc. For the Romanians, developing their own industrial potential in addition to the agricultural sector was a matter of dignity. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 34-35) (IMG)

The CIA too stated:

Rumania's determination to assert its national economic interests was not revealed fully until 1963, when the leadership successfully opposed efforts to broaden the powers of the Moscow-sponsored Council for Economic Mutual Assistance (CEMA) and disregarded Soviet opposition to the building of the Galati steel plant.

The USSR and some East European regimes, trying to initiate a "new stage" in bloc economic cooperation, had proposed closer coordination of national plans, more joint investment projects, and more extensive product specialization in manufacturing. Moreover, Khrushchev had proposed formation of a joint planning staff for CEMA. The Rumanians feared that a CEMA with greater authority would make decisions which would hamper Rumanian industrialization. Bucharest consequently opposed any change in the organization that would limit Rumanian economic sovereignty.

Other satellites probably were also opposed to the Khrushchev proposal for a CEMA planning staff, but Rumania alone was publicly hostile. Rumania, in addition, refused to accept some new forms of cooperation which were supported by other satellites.

(RUMANIA'S POSITION IN THE SOVIET BLOC, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 15, 1964, p. 2) (IMG)

In spite of the campaign of lies, sabotage, and siege by the Eurasian Titoists, the Yugoslav regime, many NATO member states, and Israel:

In recent years, Rumania has enjoyed political stability and has maintained the highest economic growth rate of the bloc. Progress in industrialization and in the socialization [collectivization] of land – 83.7 percent of arable land is now in the socialist sector – has been continuous in spite of the continuing in spite of the continuing low standard of living and ... poor quality of goods. (Rumanian Regime Reorganization. In: CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, CIA, March 22, 1961, p. 7) (IMG)

There were indications of an increased living standard for the population, the industrial base was expanding, and the collectivization campaigns were continuing. The main tasks were summed up in the strategic goal completing the building of the material and technical base of the socialist formation. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 31-32) (IMG)

By 1964, Romania publicly declared that it would not allow Eurasian Titoist subjugation of the Romanian communists:

The Rumanian regime's now more definitive declaration of its right and intention to act independently in the Communist world came in the form of a resolution adopted by an extended session of the party central committee which met from 15 to 22 April. Bucharest specifically stated that it would not participate in any supranational Communist economic or political organizations, which it considered infringements on the sovereignty of socialist states. It also instated that "there can be no parties which are 'superior' and parties that are 'subordinate'" and that "nobody can decide what is and what is not correct for other countries and parties." (RUMANIA'S POSITION IN THE SOVIET BLOC, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 15, 1964, pp. 3-4) (IMG)

the ... Romanian communist leadership proved to be extremely successful in constructing a platform for anti-de-Stalinization around the concepts of industrialization, autonomy, sovereignty, and national pride. The point for Gheorghiu-Dej was to maintain close relations with the Soviet leaders without emulating their efforts to demolish Stalin's myth. The struggle against the "personality cult" amounted for the Romanians to emphasizing their impeccable internationalist credentials while fostering the image of the leading party nucleus as a stronghold of Leninist orthodoxy. The two main events that took place at the beginning of the 1960s, the Third Congress of the RWP (20-28 June 1960), and the Plenum of the Central Committee (30 November - 5 December 1961) emphasized the focus on rapid industrialization, which would create the basis of the mass support for party's policy and, respectively, strengthen the patriotic, "anti-hegemonic" claims of the Dej team. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, p. 32) (IMG)

Throughout the 1950s and the 1960s, Romania did increase trade ties with the US-led camp, a behaviour that led Western observers to compare Romania's commercial relations to Yugoslavia's commercial relations. Nonetheless, it was clear that Dej-era Romania did not really go as far as Yugoslavia did in this respect, never allowed the volume of trade to become so large as to make it very dependent on Anglo-American trade vs. embargo. The CIA reported:

Although the Rumanian regime in its relations with the Soviet bloc seems to have moved into a position not unlike that of Yugoslavia, it remains ideologically conservative, especially in regard to its domestic policies. There is no evidence of ideological deviation toward the more decentralized Yugoslav economic system, about aspects of which the Czechs and even the Bulgarians have permitted on some public discussion. On the contrary, the Rumanian economic system continues to be characterized by detailed central planning and nearly complete socialization of agriculture. (RUMANIA'S POSITION IN THE SOVIET BLOC, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 15, 1964, p. 4) (IMG)

It is also worth mentioning that increased trade ties with USA during the early 1960s could, if properly managed, be beneficial to the cause of socialism and be devoid of US 'trickery' against Romania, because back then, the Kennedy faction, the agents of the American proletariat disguised as the liberal apologists of American imperialism, had gained a significantly high influence over the US Army, US State Department, and major US security agencies. The Kennedy faction had gone so far as to stage military coups against several CIA puppet regimes and had provided plenty of arms to the states hostile to American imperialism. Therefore, good trade relations with the United States were not necessarily so counterproductive to socialism at the time, and were not necessarily going to lead to a huge abuse of trade relations by the US side, although it was important to retain high vigilance against the CIA attempts to use such trade for its malicious agenda.

Furthermore, Romania boosted ties with China, North Korea, and Albania. Under the pressure of the Eurasian Titoists, many communists in the bloc, such as Ulbricht and Dej had partaken in the denunciation of Albania. Hence, it is true that Dej overtly took a stance against Albania in the early 1960s, but:

during the preparations of the 1964 Declaration, Gheorghiu-Dej confessed to his associates that he had been practically compelled by Khrushchev to take this anti-Albanian (and implicitly anti-Chinese stand). (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 34-35) (IMG)

Therefore, in 1963, relations with People's Democratic Albania were restored, and Romania resisted pressures to partake in activities hostile to China:

Since March 1963, when Rumania sent its ambassador back to Albania after having withdrawn him in late 1961 as had other Soviet bloc states, Rumania has been more reticent than any other Eastern European country – except Albania – in support for Moscow against Peiping. Bucharest ... is apparently even more concerned than Poland or Hungary over the probable effects on its bargaining position with the USSR should Khrushchev carry the dispute with China to a final break.

In recent months, Rumania has printed numerous articles agreeing with Moscow's peaceful coexistence line, but has done little to criticize Peiping for not adhering to this line. It has also failed to support Moscow's plans for dealing with the Chinese. Dej has absented himself from meetings particularly concerned with the dispute, such as occurred during the East German party congress in January 1963, the celebration of German party chief Ulbricht's birthday the following June, and Khrushchev's 70th birthday gathering a month ago.

In February and March 1964, the Rumanian party attempted to prevent the dispute from moving further toward a formal split by making a mediation effort, which included sending a delegation of its leaders to Communist China, North Korea, and the USSR. When this effort failed, the Rumanians made public the details of their attempt and recommended that the international movement form a commission that would include the Soviet and Chinese parties to induce the two major parties to ease tensions.

(RUMANIA'S POSITION IN THE SOVIET BLOC, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), May 15, 1964, p. 6) (IMG)

The counteracting of Titoist pressures in Romania by the communist faction's partially successful efforts to strategically realign Romania with the Sino-Albanian-Korean bloc assisted that country in resisting pressures for Titoization, hence why Romania was able to continue to operate as a socialist state and an economy growing, socializing, and collectivizing.

In my humble opinion, the Romanian communists performed far better than all the other communists in the countries of People's Democracy, and I certainly sympathize with Stalin-era Soviet officials for whom Dej was a favorite and who were happy that the Cominform was based in Romania. The Romanian communists combatted the different deviations, remained pragmatic, and yet simultaneously struggled against revisionism under the cover of being 'revisionists' themselves. They struggled against the Khrushchevians and used their cover of 'sympathies' with Khrushchev as a means of access to the communist anti-Titoist opponents of Khrushchev in the USSR, so to receive the assistance of the communist faction and to more vigorously confront Khrushchev. They posed as friends to Tito's gang, and yet refused to seriously collaborate with that fascist butcher. Romania also industrialized very rapidly, the Party was compositionally proletarianized, i.e. filled with numerous blue-collar elements, and many Titoist agents and Zionist agents were purged. In the end, the Romanian communists advanced greatly towards socialism and the dictatorship of the proletariat. Romania transitioned from a first-stage People's Democracy, a proletarian-led bourgeois-democracy, to a second-stage People's Democracy, a workers' state, even though the bourgeois parties continued to operate in Romania; there is no evidence that the bourgeois parties in Romania had a role much more than the symbolic role; they did have some material influence to be sure, but one cannot exaggerate the extent of such a thin level of material influence. The Party of the proletariat was the real and main party in Romania, and unlike some of the other ruling parties that emerged as the parties of the revisionist intelligentsia and the corrupt bureaucrats, the Party in Romania was compositionally proletarianized and remained socialist.

C23S2. Setting Romania on the Path of Titoization  IMG-All-{Romania}

Rightist circles present communism as a 'disease'; certainly, being a communist does tend to shorten one's life. Dimitrov died when he was 67, Bierut when 64, Thorez when 64, Gottwald when 57, and Choibalsan when 57, not to mention Zhdanov who was proven to have been murdered when 52. During the Slansky trials, it was said that a freemason killer-doctor working for Slansky had plotted to shorten Gottwald's life; during the Doctors' Plot case, suspicion was raised regarding the potential role of the doctors in the shortening of the lives of Dimitrov, Thorez, and Choibalsan; and during the Kostov trials, there was much discussion regarding Tito's plot to assassinate Dimitrov via Yugoslav agent Kostov. And finally, there comes the case of Dej, who died at the age of 64. Dej was vigilant of assassination plots against him. Referring to the assassination plots of the General-Secretaries of the communist parties, Gheorghe Apostol, a prominent official in the Dej government, recalled:

Dej ... knew that ... the leaders of the parties in Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, [and] Mongolia ... were eliminated. (Duplicates: A History of the Intelligence and Security Services of the Communist Regime in Romania (1965-1989), Cristian Troncota, 2003, pp. 28-29. Citing: Gheorghe Apostol's interview with journalist Adriana Oprea Popescu) (IMG)

What is notable about Bierut is that he died when he was in Moscow, and Gottwald died one week after Stalin died after having attended Stalin's funeral. These raised the widespread suspicion that they were murdered by the Eurasian Titoists. Hoxha pointed to this fact in his memoirs 'The Khrushchevites'. Dej too was vigilant of this matter. Nonetheless, according to Cristian Troncota – an intelligence official from the Ceausescu era, who also became a security official in post-1989 Romania – Dej was irradiated in Moscow:

The fact that Gheorgiu-Dej was irradiated in Moscow in June 1963 was also confirmed by a former security officer who wanted to remain anonymous. The argument is shocking, namely, that three of the four officers who provided Dej's personal guard also died of cancer. The sure survivor was the memorialist, who on that mission to Moscow had received protective duties only outside the buildings where Dej had passed. (Duplicates: A History of the Intelligence and Security Services of the Communist Regime in Romania (1965-1989), Cristian Troncota, 2003, pp. 28-29) (IMG)

Having attended Stalin's funeral, Gottwald had returned to Czechoslovakia and there he died. Dej's death reminisces the death of Gottwald. The death of Dej promoted in rank Ceausescu – of all people. Ceausescu was a Titoist agent and a foe of Gheorghiu-Dej, having masqueraded for years as a communist comrade of Dej. The rise of team Ceausescu in the Party led to a gradual rise in the influence of the white-collar elements over the Party. As early as 1968, Ceausescu himself proudly declared:

It is gratifying that among the party there are almost 300,000 intellectuals, a huge force, which far exceeds the total number of intellectuals that the whole of Romania had before the war. I also point out that in some areas, almost 40 percent of the total category of intellectuals, and sometimes even more, are party members. We can be satisfied with the way the party's activity is carried out among the intellectuals and with their contribution to the implementation of the party's policy. (Speech at the Party Assembly at Bucharest, Nicolae Ceausescu, April 26, 1968, pp. 9-10) (IMG)

The CIA too stated that since 1965,:

Young professionals and white-collar workers have nevertheless found admission to the party ranks considerably easier, giving the party new sources of fresh ideas, energy, and strong political support. ('NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE SURVEY 22; RUMANIA; GENERAL SURVEY', CIA, July 1970, p. 92) (IMG)

Major steps in the path of Titoization were taken in Romania. Naturally, it occurred in all sectors and fields, be it in the sphere of political economy – in favor of decentralization and selling the country to the IMF – or in the strategic orientation in favor of Yugoslavia, West Germany, America, the Israeli secret service, and the Dubcek group, and against Eurasia/USSR and the Warsaw Pact.

The Ceausescu agenda was to strengthen the corrupt bureaucrats at the expense of the proletariat. Hence, the Ceausescu faction embarked upon a program of decentralization. In an interview with Marie Rose Pineau of the French Communist Party's (PCF's) L'Humanite journal, Ceausescu admitted that he sought to give greater autonomy to the local enterprises:

if a complete picture of our future concerns has to be given reference to, the development of socialist democracy is a must. Parallel to strengthening and improving economic and social management based on central planning we are concerning ourselves with extending the powers and the autonomy of the economic and administrative units; ('Interview granted by President Nicolae Ceausescu to L'Humanite', Interview by: Marie Rose Pineau (Secretary General of the "L'Humanite" Editorial board), in: Agerpres: Romanian News Agency, From: 'Documents, articles and information on Rumania', No. 17, May 26, 1970, p. 11) (IMG)

The Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress corroborated:

In 1969 the regime launched an ephemeral economic reform that promised to increase efficiency and boost incentives by decentralizing economic control, allowing private enterprise greater freedom, and increasing supplies of consumer goods. (Romania: A Country Study, Federal Research Division of the US Library of Congress, Ronald D. Bachman, July 1989) (IMG)

In another interview, this time with the Yugoslav regime agent Gavro Altaian who was the chief of the Tito regime journal 'Komunist' and published by Ceausescu government's Agerpres Romanian News Agency, Ceausescu provided some greater details on the decentralization of industry. 'ANSWER' is Ceausescu's response and 'QUESTION' is Gavro's question. An excerpt of the interview is as follows:

ANSWER: As I have also pointed out at the Tenth Congress, Romania lays special stress on the organization of a modern industry, based on new technique. We also pay special attention to agriculture as it is one of the basic branches of our economy. We may say that we have obtained satisfactory results on these lines, the present Five-year Plan is being implemented in good conditions.

The growth of industry, of our economy as a whole, posed the problem of improving the managerial and planning patterns for economic activity. On proceeding to the implementation of these tasks, we set out from the necessity of a most rational tie-in of plan-based national and single management of economy, and broad autonomy and independence of the economic units. A set of measures have been taken on this line, while other measures are under way of being made final. These measures refer to more powers to the enterprises, to the setting up of economic centrals or combines to have extensive powers in the matter of planning and management of economic activity of the group of component enterprises. We work for the decentralization of some tasks, improved planning and improved financial activity, increased responsibility of enterprises and of centrals, relieving economic ministries of certain duties.

The results are generally positive, although the activity of the centrals has just started; they were inaugurated less than a year ago. We want to lay more stress within the centrals, on streamlining the enterprises to a large-scale production, to an ample development of cooperation both on a national level and with other states. The organization of centrals or combines, of large economic complexes will create favourable conditions for a broader specialization and cooperation on a national as well as international level, it will ensure the possibility for a faster introduction of modern technique into production, the general improvement of the quality of the entire economic activity.

QUESTION: In the Report delivered to Congress, you said that the Romanian Communist Party proceeds in its activity from the premise that "parallel to the growth of the productive forces the constant improvement of the relations of production must be ensured. In this respect, you have emphasized the necessity of collective management of economic enterprises and of the direct participation of the working people in the conduct of economic activity, and you have insisted upon the development of socialist democracy and the combating of bureaucracy by control performed by the masses over the activity of all bodies of power. Please, refer to these questions.

ANSWER: We have proceeded to the organization and improvement of collective leadership! We have set up management boards in enterprises and council boards in the centrals and combines, which have the task of running the entire activity of the respective units. We have drawn into the managerial bodies of enterprises, which include executives and the finest experts, also exponents of trade unions and representatives of the employees designated at the general meetings of the working people. We have introduced the principle of collective work also in the leadership of ministries, to the effect that a deliberative character has been assigned to their leading bodies, they take decisions on the main problems of economic development.

Within the enterprises, we have assigned an important role to the employees' general meetings - which have to analyse the economic activity of the respective units, to exercise mass control over the work going on in the enterprise for the development of production and, at the same time, to mobilize the efforts of the entire collective for perfecting economic activity. Of course, we are only at the beginning, but experience will help us to steadily improve activity in this respect, I want to add that, in this field, we studied in beforehand the experience of other socialist countries and we continue to study it, we take into account everything that appears to be good in one country or another, e thus strive to constantly improve activity in economy. As to the future, the management of economic activity - the same as in all fields - will proceed upon a more and more democratic basis, with the broad participation of the collectives of working people; e will create a good background to enable broad discussion of the problems of our society's advancement, with a view to seeking out the most suitable ways and means of building socialism.

(‘Interview Granted by NICOLAE CEAUSESCU, General Secretary of the Romanian Communist Party, President of the State Council, to the Yugoslav "Komunist" Journal's Chief Editor Gavro Altaian', November 21, 1969, No. 16, Agerpres: Romanian News Agency, From: ‘Documents, articles and information on Rumania’, pp. 8-10) (IMG)

CIA further explains the decentralization process:

A major feature of the decentralization is the establishment of about 200 economic units — industrial centrals, combines, and groups -- between the ministerial and enterprise level, similar to those in East Germany and Poland [and the USSR]. These units have replaced and taken over the functions of many of the general directorates of the ministries. They have broad control over groups of enterprises and over many of the planning and management functions previously exercised by the ministries. Typically, one of the new units directs several enterprises grouped by product -- vertically, horizontally, or territorially. Many Romanian officials have been moved from the ministries to the new centrals and even to enterprises and agricultural units. (ROMANIA AND THE UNITED STATES: THE COMMAND ECONOMY LOOKS FURTHER WEST: Intelligence Memorandum, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, March 1972, p. 4) (IMG)

The new “Centrals” had so much power that they could conduct foreign trade; they therefore had the power to engage in international markets and commodity production:

The Romanian foreign trade conference held in early 1971 has resulted in some changes in the conduct of foreign trade. Industrial centrals and even certain large enterprises appear to have acquired some additional responsibility for foreign sales and purchases, and producers are to be paid for export shipments only when the Foreign Trade Bank has received payment from abroad. Also, Ceausescu re-emphasized in a recent speech that imports will require greater justification than in the past, and approval of import applications has become increasingly contingent upon a firm's ability to offset imports with exports. (ROMANIA AND THE UNITED STATES: THE COMMAND ECONOMY LOOKS FURTHER WEST: Intelligence Memorandum, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, March 1972, p. 4) (IMG)

The corrupt bureaucratic class which Ceausescu promoted was also naturally allied to parasitic finance capital. In some cases, American finance capital would be indirectly involved in the takeover of a country, through ‘industrial’ front companies. In this case, however, the involvement was somewhat more direct. The Romanian government opened up Romania to the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the front bank of the CIA. The IMF reported:

Romania joined the IMF in 1972.... (‘HISTORY OF THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND: Tearing Down Walls: The international Monetary Fund 1990-1999’, Author: The International Monetary Fund (IMF), James Boughton, 2012, Chapter II- 6-- The Death of Central Planning and the Birth of Markets, p. 255) (IMG)

The opening up of Romania's economy to the IMF allowed for greater influence over Romania by US intelligence, but it also served to smoothen the ties between the corrupt bureaucratic class in Romania and American finance capital, two reactionary class allies.

To transition Romania into a dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie, however, the Ceausescu faction needed to ensure that the comprador bourgeoisie, the corrupt bureaucratic class especially, would secure control over the means of violence, and that the agents of the proletariat lose their influence over the means of violence. As such, one of the first things that Ceausescu did, even well before the economic decentralization, was to criminalize the counter-intelligence measures undertaken by the Dej faction and to decriminalize the Trotskyite and Titoist ‘victims’ of the Dej faction. In particular, Ceausescu embarked upon the path of rehabilitating Patrascanu and Vasile Luca. Hence, reporting on the ‘findings’ of a committee on the rehabilitation of the ‘victims’ of the Dej era, Ceausescu declared:

For the way they fulfilled their entrusted task, the plenary of the Central Committee expressed thanks to the comrades in the commission, to all the activists who worked for the restoration of the truth. Now it is beyond any doubt that the arrest and conviction of Patrascanu have no justification, that in fact a hideous framing took place, that Patrascanu is the victim of an inflicted assassination.

It is worth noting that this happened in 1954, when [as] in other socialist countries, in the Soviet Union, the disclosure of such illegalities and the rehabilitation of their victims had begun. That is why it is even more incomprehensible why exactly then there was this rush to try him and execute him after two days, in a hasty manner, by shooting him in the back. (...).

From the study of other cases and trials, including the trial of [Vasile] Luca, the trial of Canal and others, the unfoundedness of many accusations and convictions ... becomes evident. All these are acts that our party condemns and condemns with full determination. However, they also serve to drastically accuse and condemn those who initiated and committed them. The [findings] accuse and condemn Alexandru Draghici, as organizer and perpetrator of these criminal actions against the party and state assets, and accuse and condemn Gheorghiu-Dej, who initiated and patronized these actions. (Speech at the Party Assembly at Bucharest, Nicolae Ceausescu, April 26, 1968, pp. 16-17. Bold added) (IMG)

The Dej-era Romanian counter-intelligence chief Draghici was either a 'Dejite' communist loyalist or a communist-coopted Titoist engaged in anti-Titoist purges. If a communist, then he surely was going to be a target of the Ceausescu faction purges; if Draghici was a communist-coopted Titoist, the Ceausescu faction still had a reason to demote him, for Draghici's name was closely associated with the 'Dejite' purges and, to the average observer, it would have made little sense to condemn Draghici-era purges but not to demote Draghici.

As may be recalled from C15S1, Patrascanu was correctly regarded by the Romanian communists as Romania's Tito. The CIA too had confirmed that Patrascanu was the Romanian Tito:

Patrascanu, formerly Minister of Justice, headed the intellectual group and adhered to a strict [read: Trotskyite] interpretation of Leninist Socialism. He became more and more critical of the Soviet spoliation of Rumania; he was, indeed, a Rumanian Tito before the advent of Titoism. Toward the end of 1947 he and his adherents were stripped of all political power and his ultimate fate is uncertain. (RECENT PURGES IN RUMANIAN COMMUNIST PARTY, CIA, August 12, 1952, p. 1) (IMG)

By decriminalizing the venomous life and legacy of Patrascanu, the Ceausescu faction was decriminalizing Trotskyism-Titoism. Ceausescu could not so actively push for the rehabilitation of Ana Pauker herself, because Ana Pauker, having opportunistically defected to the anti-Patrascanu camp when Patrascanu's fortunes went down, had loudly denounced Patrascanu. Therefore, instead, the Ceausescu faction rehabilitated Vasile Luca, the close agent of Ana Pauker:

It is because Ana Pauker aspired to real influence within the Rumanian Central Committee that she was eliminated. She tried to form her own group with Luca and Georgescu in the Politburo. (...). The ambitious Luca and Georgescu wished to use Pauker's popularity [among revisionists] but were easily broken by Gheorghie Gheorghiu-Dej.... (INTERPRETATION OF PURGE OF ANA PAUKER, CIA, September 11, 1952, pp. 1-2) (IMG)

Dej's most dangerous antagonist was Vasile Luca.... (BACKGROUND OF TOP LEVEL COMMUNIST LEADERS IN RUMANIA, CIA, March 11, 1955, p. 2) (IMG)

As was extensively documented in C15S1, CIA-Mossad agent Ana Pauker had 'formerly' been a Trotskyite pro-Nazi anti-Semitic traitor to the Yiddish people during the Romania freedom-fighters' anti-Nazi struggle. For her intelligence activities for the CIA and Mossad, and for her Trotskyism, Ana Pauker was purged by the Dej faction.

Ceausescu himself drew a parallel between his own 'rehabilitations' of Dej-era 'victims' and the 'rehabilitation' of Stalin-era 'victims' after the death of Stalin, when Ceausescu said: 'in 1954, [as] in other socialist countries, in the Soviet Union, the disclosure of such illegalities and the rehabilitation of their victims had begun.' Like anti-Stalin denunciations after Stalin's death by the Kremlin Titoists, Ceausescu condemned Gheorghiu-Dej, who, according to Ceausescu, 'initiated and patronized' 'these criminal actions against the party and state assets'.

The decriminalization of Luca, henchman of a CIA-Mossad agent Ana Pauker, means more than its face-value meaning. The criminalization of Draghici and Dej means more than just historiographical revisionism. This Titoization speech by Ceausescu was a pretext for promoting the agents demoted by the Dej faction and demoting the agents promoted by the Dej faction. Such was why Draghici and Apostol, two statesmen who were either communist loyalists or communist-coopted politicians, were sharply demoted by the Ceausescu group. And such was why the CIA and Mossad were able to take over the Romanian intelligence service, with the help of the Ceausescu group. Just as how Khrushchev's 'Secret Speech' against the Stalin faction was a means of purging the communist agents in the Eurasian state apparatus and elevating Anglo-American intelligence agents throughout Eurasia and the Peoples' Democracies, so too did Ceausescu's criminalization of the 'Dejites' and decriminalization of the Pauker agents and Patrascanu result in the elevation of the CIA-Mossad agents in the Romanian intelligence service and in the strategic partnership of Romania with Titoist Yugoslavia against the socialist forces.

Ceausescu was elevating his ally Constantinescu, who was in turn an agent of Pauker. Constantinescu, as will be recalled, was also an enemy of the Dej faction, was an ally of the Trotskyite renegade Chişinevschi, and represented the intelligentsia in Romania. During the years of the Dej era, Ceausescu had disguised himself as a staunch 'enemy' of Titoism, and had denounced the Constantinescu-Chişinevschi group. By the late 1960s, he came out in support of them, elevating Paukerism and the intelligentsia. As the document from the CIA front Wilson Center stated:

It was only after 1965, in the context of the struggle against Gheorghiu-Dej's phantom, that Ceausescu made use of Constantinescu's services. He was again on the list of the nomenklatura, first as Deputy Minister, then as Minister of Education, as Secretary of the Central Committee, candidate member of the Political Executive Committee and, towards the end of his life, president of the Grand National Assembly. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 26-27) (IMG)

With regards to the retaliation against Chişinevschi and Constantinescu, Ceausescu put it clearly: they constituted anti-party elements who exaggerated some shortcomings of the party's activity, misrepresented the activity of the party and its leadership, focused on facts isolated from their context and tried to link all these problems with Gheorghiu-Dej's figure, in order to make him the sole responsible person for the terror unleashed within the party and throughout the country during the entire period that followed the communist takeover. (Gheorghiu-Dej and the Romanian Workers' Party: From De-Sovietization to the Emergence of National Communism, Wilson Center, Cold War International History Project, Working Paper No. 37, Vladimir Tismăneanu, May 2002, pp. 27-29) (IMG)

The well-known CIA-Mossad front 'American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee' (Joint) was in fact invited by the Ceausescu regime to set up its intelligence bases in Romania. The World Jewish Congress, another top CIA-Mossad front, could also establish closer ties with the Romanian Jews since Ceausescu's rise to power. Praising the Ceausescu regime for 'supporting' 'the Jews', Paul Lendvai, a Zionist Hungarian defector to Austria and a journalist participant in the 1956 pogromist 'revolution' in Hungary, wrote:

The [Romanian] Jews ... alone in the Communist world have been allowed since 1965 to have close relations with the World Jewish Congress and outside Jewish communities. In 1967 the Joint was invited by the Rumanian Government to resume its welfare activities. In view of the official Soviet-sponsored myth that the Joint is an espionage agency, this was an action of some political significance. (Anti-Semitism without Jews: Communist Eastern Europe, Paul Lendvai, January 1, 1971, p. 327) (IMG)

The fact that the Ceausescu group invited the CIA and Mossad to establish spy bases in Romania and to promote Zionist migration is no coincidence. The Ceausescu faction used the Yiddish sons and daughters of Romania to stockpile cannon-fodder for Moshe Dayan and Ariel Sharon. In exchange, the Romanian regime received CIA-Mossad financial support as a bulwark against Eurasian influence. Note also that the Romanian government's intelligence service was by then under the heavy influence of the CIA and Mossad, and of this Ceausescu approved. Ion Mihai Pacepa, the long-time chief of the Romanian foreign intelligence service during the Ceausescu era who migrated to the 'Atlantic' zone in 1978, admitted:

Emigration provided Ceausescu with political gain, and he soon decided to use it for financial profit as well, in a highly confidential operation kept so secret that at his direction it was handled only through the [Romanian intelligence service, known as the] DIE.

The DIE initiated discreet contacts in Israel and West Germany and cautiously suggested that, if Rumania could be reimbursed in hard currency for the social and education expenses incurred for the ethnic German and Jewish émigrés seeking to leave Rumania, the emigration process might be accelerated.

Secret unwritten agreements were made with the Israeli foreign intelligence service and with the West German Ministry of Interior. The Israelis and the West Germans paid thousands of dollars for each Rumanian Jew and ethnic German granted an exit visa, in some cases as much as $50,000 per person, depending on his or her level of education and profession.

Over the years, many hundreds of millions of dollars were secretly paid to Rumania, along with low-interest credits issued through the DIE as bonuses for increasing the emigration quotas. For reasons of secrecy, most of the payments were made in cash and only in US dollars.

(THE DEFECTOR'S STORY, Washingtonian, Ion Mihai Pacepa, p. 6. In: CIA Archives. Bold added) (IMG)

Enver Hoxha made note of Ceausescu's activity in support of the Israeli regime and Ceausescu's suspiciously cordial meetings with Israeli regime officials. Hoxha wrote:

Undoubtedly, Ceausescu has undertaken this role and will try to carry it out, because, like all his other attempts at mediation, it might bring him some economic advantage. However, I think that the greatest aid which he is trying to give Israel at these moments and in this situation is to somewhat reduce the indignation of international public opinion towards the criminal anti-Arab and anti-Palestinian policy of Tel Aviv.

This is not the first time that Ceausescu has come out on the side of Israel and he frequently has cordial meetings and talks with the heads of Tel Aviv. Next to Washington, the capital city to which the heads of the Israeli government go most frequently, is Bucharest. The heads of a number of Arab countries go there, too. It is regrettable, however, that Arafat and some others in the leadership of the Palestine Liberation Organization have illusions about these meetings.

(‘CEAUSESCU, THE ARABS AND ISRAEL’, Enver Hoxha, August 17, 1983. In: ‘The Reflections on the Middle East’) (IMG)

Indeed, as Hoxha mentioned, this was not the first time in which Ceausescu was coming out on the side of the Israeli regime. Ceausescu had held cordial meeting with Mossad representatives such as the Donald Robinson, the president of the JDC/Joint, and had expressed support for Zionist mass migration:

President Nicolae Ceausescu of Rumania assured Donald M. Robinson, president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, that any Jew wishing to leave Rumania for family reunion in Israel or any other country would be able to do so, it was reported here today.

The Rumanian leader made the statement during an audience last Friday morning with Robinson, Ralph.

Goldman, JDC executive vice president, and Chief Rabbi Moses Rosen, president of the Federation of Jewish Communities of Rumania. Stefan Andrei, Rumanian Foreign Minister, was also present.

The JDC leaders were in Bucharest for the dedication of the new Olteniei Home for the Aged, a 220-bed facility, and also nursing cases. The home was named The Amalia and Rabbi Moses Rosen Home in honor of the Chief Rabbi's 40 years of service and leadership to the community. Amalia is the rabbi's wife.

Calling the meeting "historic." Robinson said "It was the first time a President of an East European country met with the president of the Joint Distribution Committee for a face-to-face talk on the condition of the Jewish Community and the work of the JDC in that country." The JDC, Robinson said, "spends close to $3.5 million for a variety of social assistance programs aiding over 10,000 of the 40,000 Jews estimated to reside in Rumania.

Ceausescu was very much interested in the "most favored nation" status for his country, Robinson said. He assured Ceausescu that he would present his personal feelings to leaders of the American Jewish community that it should be continued.

(Special to the JTA Ceausescu Says Rumania's Jews Able to Leave for Family Reunion, Jewish Telegraphic Agency, July 10, 1979) (IMG)

The JDC was cooperating with Romania's regime-owned 'Federation of Jewish Communities in Romania' (FEDROM) since as early as 1969. In its history timeline, the JDC wrote:

1969: [JDC] Partners with Federation of Jewish Communities in Romania (FEDROM)

In partnership with the Federation of Jewish Communities in Romania (FEDROM), JDC provides financial and professional support for a network of Jewish institutional and social welfare services in Romania. An extensive social welfare system is established to assist elderly Holocaust survivors. This care includes cash assistance, medical care, home care, food, and support for old age homes.

(History Timeline, JDC Archives, JDC) (IMG)

The JDC, with its history of pro-Axis activities, was in no position to claim to be the friend of the Holocaust victims. Obviously whenever the JDC speaks of 'social welfare', 'humanitarian aid', etc., it is almost always a cover for espionage and fascist subversion on behalf of the CIA.

If the decriminalization of Luca was a pretext for the re-promotion of the CIA-Mossad agents in the Romanian intelligence service, the decriminalization of Patrascanu was a pretext for increased Romanian ties to fascist Yugoslavia. In an interview with the Yugoslav regime media 'Komunist', Ceausescu said:

All along their historical development, they helped each other in order to ensure their independent development. Under the new conditions, when socialism is being built both in Romania and Yugoslavia, – passing over the moments which for a period had cast a shadow on our collaboration – the relations between Romania and Yugoslavia have witnessed a strong development.

We reckon that today the relations between our countries and parties are of the best, that both on an economic, scientific and cultural level as well as in international life, Romania and Yugoslavia promote broad cooperation, making their active contribution to the solving of the problems of world peace and progress.

(‘Interview Granted by NICOLAE CEAUȘESCU, General Secretary of the Romanian Communist Party, President of the State Council, to the Yugoslav "Komunist" Journal’s Chief Editor Gavro Altaian’, November 21, 1969, No. 16, Agerpres: Romanian News Agency, From: ‘Documents, articles and information on Rumania’, p. 11. Bold added.) (IMG)

Ceausescu spoke of Romanian-Yugoslav cooperation ‘in international life’ for ‘solving ... the problems of world peace and progress’. That was not mere default diplomatic talk. Whether out of naivete or out of malicious intent, some would draw ‘equivalence’ between Dej-era post-1956 Yugoslav-Romanian diplomatic relations and the Ceausescu-era Yugoslav-Romanian alliance, arguing that on that issue, the Ceausescu faction ‘continued’ the project ‘initiated’ by the Dej faction. Such an ‘analogy’ is baseless. It is a slander against the Dej legacy, and a red-washing of the Ceausescu group. The Dej-era Romanian ‘friendship’ with the Tito regime bore a ‘Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact’ spirit, in that the communist faction of People’s Democratic Romania engaged in some verbal and symbolic ‘collaboration’ with fascist Yugoslavia, while not practically and materially conceding to the Titoists. The Ceausescu-era Romanian regime friendship with fascist Yugoslavia was a real alliance against the socialist and progressive forces, a joint lifting of a dagger against the back of the liberationist forces of mankind.

A case in point of Romanian-Yugoslav cooperation ‘in international life’ for ‘solving ... the problems of world peace and progress’ was Ceausescu’s support for the reactionary Dubcek group. Although the Czechoslovak proletarians supported the Novotny faction against the Dubcek faction (see C22S9), the liar and propagandist Nicolae Ceausescu swept such a fact under the rug and falsely claimed that the Czechoslovak people support the ‘leadership of the party and the state’ in Czechoslovakia, and implied that such a leadership in Czechoslovakia aimed ‘to ensure the triumph of socialism’. On this basis, as a supporter of the Dubcek faction, Ceausescu condemned the Warsaw Pact intervention in 1968:

Dear comrades. The Plenary of the Central Committee of the Party, the State Council, the Government, the representatives of the management of public organizations, trade unions, youth, women's, creative unions, unanimously decided to express their full solidarity with the Czechoslovak people, with the Czechoslovak Communist Party! (applause, cheers).

Dear comrades. Citizens of the Country of Romania. The penetration of the troops of the 5 socialist countries into Czechoslovakia is a big mistake and a serious danger for peace in Europe, for the fate of socialism in the world! It is unthinkable in today's world, when peoples rise up to fight to defend their national independence, for equal rights, that a socialist state, that socialist states violate the freedom and independence of another state (applause). There is no justification and no reason can be accepted to admit, for a moment, only the idea of military intervention in the affairs of a socialist state. (applause).

Our party and state delegation that visited Czechoslovakia last week became convinced that the Czechoslovak people, that the Czechoslovak Communist Party, the Czechoslovak working class, old people, women, young people, unanimously support the leadership of the party and the state to ensure the triumph of socialism in Czechoslovakia (applause).

The problem of choosing the paths of socialist construction is a problem for every party, every state, every people. No one can become an advisor, a guide of the way socialism should be built! It is the business of every people, and we believe that in order to establish the relations between the socialist countries, between the communist parties, on a truly Marxist-Leninist basis, we must once and for all put an end to interference in the affairs of other states, other parties! (applause)

We are determined to act with all our strength, with all our responsibility, to contribute to finding ways to resolve this situation created by the penetration of foreign troops into Czechoslovakia as quickly as possible, so that the Czechoslovak people can and carry out the activity in silence. We are firmly determined to act so that together with the other socialist countries, with the other communist and labor parties, we contribute to the elimination of differences, to the strengthening of the unity of the socialist countries, of the communist parties, because we are convinced that this is the only way to serve the interests of the people, the interests of socialism in worldwide! (applause)

(Ceausescu Speech on August 21, 1968. Bold added.)

Again, Ceausescu was not just one man but represented an entire faction that had risen to prominence in the command of Romania’s means of violence, through the criminalization of the ‘Dejite’ communists in the Romanian counter-intelligence and the decriminalization of the Titoists, through the changes in the Romanian intelligence service, through the elevation of the bureaucratic oligarchs via decentralization at the expense of the proletariat’s hold over the state, and through the elevation of the intelligentsia in the Party. Fortunately for the communists in Romania, the communist faction had resurged in the Red Army and the CPSU. The Brezhnevian tide had occurred in Eurasia, paving the way for a measure of communist resurgence. Against the Titoist agenda of the Ceausescu faction that dominated the Romanian regime, the Red Army mobilized its forces along the Romanian border. Anatoly Dobrynin, the then Eurasian ambassador to the United States, recalled how the Red Army mobilized in the border against Ceausescu-era Romania:

But nervousness persisted. On August 28 Rusk summoned me urgently to say he had learned of an unusually active movement of Soviet troops along the Romanian borders within twenty-four hours. There had already been speculation in the West about the possibility of a Soviet invasion of Romania, based largely on its refusal to take part in the joint action with other Warsaw Treaty states against Czechoslovakia. Indeed, Moscow was highly irritated with Romania's leader Nicolae Ceausescu, and Soviet troops engaged in demonstrative tactical movements near the Romanian border. But Moscow was not really thinking of invading Romania, because it never doubted the stability of the communist regime there. (‘In Confidence’, New York Times Books, Anatoly Dobrynin, 1995, p. 187) (IMG)

The goal of the communist faction of the Red Army was to menace the comprador Romanian regime and to feed the Romanian communists the excuse to promote a line of pro-communist dovish-ness and capitulation to the Red Army. The presence of a menacing military force along the border is a technique of feeding the capitulationists of the target country the excuse for lobbying for the promotion of dovish policy – in this case, a dovish and capitulationist policy in favour of the communist faction of the Red Army, and at the expense of the Titoist Ceausescu clique. Obviously, threats, as in contrast to action, can only work so far, and the Ceausescu clique, while undoubtedly weakened, was not overthrown.

In the late 1970s, Ceausescu demonstrated his pro-Atlantic orientation. In his memoirs, the prominent Soviet Red Army General Kraskovsky Makarovich recalled how in the late 1970s, he was:

a little confused by the large number of portraits of N. Ceausescu and his attraction to the West. (In the Service of the Unique Motherland: Memoirs, Kraskovsky Voltaire Makarovich. From: militera.lib.ru) (IMG)

In addition to standing with the Dubcek group in Czechoslovakia, Ceausescu sided with the Al-Qaeda fighters in Afghanistan by condemning the Soviet intervention there. Referring to Ceausescu, an article published by Russia’s Sputnik stated:

He condemned the suppression of the Prague Spring and the entry of Soviet troops into Afghanistan, maintained diplomatic relations with Israel and Pinochet, while the USSR and its allies broke them off, and took a neutral position in the conflict between the USSR and China (during the armed clashes on Damansky Island). (30 Years of the Velvet Revolution in Romania: Ceausescu's Main Mistake, Sputnik, Rostislav Ishchenko, December 15, 2019) (IMG)

By the time of the Iran-Iraq War, the Romanian regime joined the CIA and MI6 in providing arms to the Iraqi regime in its fascist war on Iran. The Islamic Revolution Documents Center (IRDC), which is an official center for Iranian archives and government historical research, listed Yugoslavia, Romania, and China as sponsors of Saddam during the Iran-Iraq War:

In addition to the above list, countries such as Switzerland, Sweden, Poland, Yugoslavia, China, Romania, Italy, Singapore, etc. should also be added to the list of Saddam's supporters. (The 80 Countries that Armed Saddam in the War against Iran, Islamic Revolution Documents Center (IRDC), September 22, 2015) (IMG{Titoist-Saddamite Connection})

Referring specifically to the race to arm Saddamite Iraq, the CIA stated:

Romania, in particular, has taken advantage of this opportunity by providing more than $850 million in primary support equipment and ammunition. (IRAN-IRAQ: ARMS PROCUREMENT PATTERNS AFTER TWO YEARS OF WAR, CIA, December 3, 1982, p. 30) (IMG{Titoist-Saddamite Connection})

The regime of Romania also had extensive intelligence cooperation with Saddam's group even in the 1970s when Saddam's faction had not decisively defeated the revolutionary Ba'ath faction of Ahmad Hasan Al-Bakr in Iraq. Examining the topic of Ceausescu regime's cooperation with Saddam in the field of intelligence and terrorist special operations is beyond the scope of this work, however. The Romanian regime's military support for fascist Iraq against the Islamic Republic of Iran comes as not a surprise in the slightest.

In the 1980s, Romania's government was requested by the CIA front bank, the IMF, to pay its debt through imposing austerity measures on its population. The Ceausescu regime, which had the funds to arm Saddam's gang but which somehow allegedly 'did not' have the funds to feed its own people, imposed austerity measures on behalf of the IMF. In the words of a Sputnik article,:

Ceausescu launched a campaign for early repayment of Western loans. By the time of his overthrow, Romania, at the cost of a significant decade of tension and a decline in the standard of living of the broad masses, had fully paid off its debts. (30 Years of the Velvet Revolution in Romania: Ceausescu's Main Mistake, Sputnik, Rostislav Ishchenko, December 15, 2019) (IMG)

I hope that the reader has by now understood why I cited the Russian Federation's Sputnik, because (1) it is an 'Eastern bloc' media, and hence could not be CIA propaganda mouthpiece supporting a CIA colour revolution, (2) there was no Romanian state-owned anti-imperialist media outlet at the time of the 'ouster' of Ceausescu, and (3) at the time of Ceausescu, the Eurasian media was under Gorbachev's influence and so citing Eurasian media would not be regarded as reliable, whereas Putin-era Russian state is more under the influence of the anti-imperialist forces than the Gorbachev-era Eurasian state in 1989-1990 was.

The Ceausescu clique were agents of Anglo-American and West German imperialism, the agents of the corrupt Romanian bureaucratic oligarchs and the reactionary Romanian intelligentsia. Why, then, – some would ask – did the imperialist intelligence services launch a colour revolution to 'execute' Ceausescu and overthrow the Romanian regime? As will be seen, the only provenly correct presupposition of this question asked is that the imperialist intelligence services launched an anti-communist colour revolution in 1989 in Romania. The rest of the presupposed 'facts' in the question are either outright wrong or are problematic.

By the late 1980s, CIA colour revolutions had successfully ousted several of the Eastern European states: Hungary, Poland, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, and Bulgaria. The situation with Romania, a country that was hostile to Eurasia on all fronts, was quite different than the Eurasian-aligned Eastern European states. Romania was a truly unique case in these waves of imperialist-fascist secret services' colour revolutions that swept Eastern Europe. Romania's intelligence service, a comprador secret service, launched waves of terror attacks at Romanian civilians in order to provoke some of them into a colour revolutionary uprising. In the meantime, as is well known, the CIA was engaged in propaganda and agitation for summoning the intelligentsia into a colour revolution. The question is: considering all these services that Ceausescu, his entourage, and the Romanian intelligence service provided by the imperialist-fascist secret services all those years, against whom, then, were the imperialist-fascist secret services launching the colour revolution? What was there about the Romanian state that antagonized the CIA, Mossad, BND, etc.? Was Ceausescu 'another Saddam', a former imperialist agent defecting to the anti-imperialist camp?

Ceausescu was not a defector to the anti-imperialist camp, and the colour revolution was launched neither against him, nor against his entourage, nor against the Securitate, nor against the corrupt comprador bourgeois government that they headed. Rather, in what marked the remarkable uniqueness of the imperialist-fascist colour revolution in Romania, the colour revolution was launched against communist symbolism. It would have been awkward for those Titoist renegades preaching 'communism' and 'anti-imperialism' to go ahead and allow their country to be directly under the jackboots of NATO. It would have been awkward for the corrupt intelligence service bureaucrats whom Ceausescu and Co. had fostered to be openly billionaires and millionaires running the show in Romania. At the same time, it would have been awkward for NATO to openly cooperate with a government that still held 'communism' as its official ideology even though that comprador bourgeois state had betrayed communism decades prior. It would have appeared awkward for the CIA to be ousting all these ostensibly 'Stalinist' governments in Eastern Europe but to allow only Romania to stay there alone as the island of 'Stalinism'. There are volumes of evidence showing that the colour revolutionary upheaval that the imperialists launched in collaboration with the Romanian intelligence service did not target Romania's military and intelligence service, the Titoist party and state apparatus, the fake 'communist' elites, etc. As a matter of fact, the fake 'communists' and corrupt Titoist oligarchs in Romania, were behind the operation that replaced Ceausescu with Ionescu. The Russian Federation's Sputnik article stated:

Even then, many doubted the spontaneity of the uprising that cost Ceausescu his life. Now, virtually none of the responsible politicians or political experts doubt that a well-prepared coup d'etat took place in Romania, organized by people from the party and state elite, including those from Ceausescu's inner circle. (30 Years of the Velvet Revolution in Romania: Ceausescu's Main Mistake, Sputnik, Rostislav Ishchenko, December 15, 2019. Bold added.) (IMG)

It thus becomes clear that the corrupt Titoist oligarchs were not the target of the colour revolution. On the other hand, the imperialist-fascist colour revolution not only did not target the Titoist pseudo-communist oligarchs, it also actually elevated them.

At times, imperialist secret service networks demote some of their agents so that in the future, if the imperialist agents at the helm of the pro-imperialist state would no longer have a stable government, the demoted agents can lead the 'revolt' against the ruling imperialist agents and thus serve as Plan B, as stay-behind agents, for the imperialists. By the accounts of all sides of the political and historical debate, Ion Iliescu, a prominent member of the Romanian 'Communist' Party's Central Committee, had been a Ceausescu agent and collaborator. However, in the 1970s, Ceausescu decided to demote him to a much lower level of the Romanian government. Years later, he did come out as NATO's 'Plan B' 'resistance' official. He, a 'former' Ceausescu agent, led the colour revolution that replaced Ceausescu as head of state, became the corrupt President of Romania, got his country to be controlled directly by NATO, and boosted his Titoist oligarchic cronies from the former 'socialist' Romanian state apparatus. Russia Today reported:

On this day, the capital of Romania turned into an arena of fierce clashes. Part of the army units went over to the side of the rebels. The rebels were supported by Ceausescu's former ally Ion Iliescu, who became president of post-socialist Romania in 1990. ("Carte blanche for any cruelty": how the Ceausescu regime was overthrown in Romania, Russia Today (RT), Alexei Zekvasin, December 16, 2017) (IMG)

The intelligence apparatus of Ceausescu-era Romania, a front for the CIA, Mossad and the BND, is now openly a network of old billionaires participating in Anglo-American imperialist aggressions in the Middle East. The openly comprador capitalist regime in Romania is dominated by the very same apparatus that Ceausescu fostered. The Balkan Insight – an institution funded by the European Union and other Western organizations – reported:

Even the premise that the revolution was contemporary Romania's proudest hour, once an article of faith, is now fiercely disputed. Trials against the perpetrators of the violence that followed Ceausescu's fall on 22 December – which accounted for the lion's share of victims – have been shut down again and again, despite tireless efforts by victims' associations to bring them to justice. The associations and contemporary historians contend that it was largely the Securitate, the Communist police state's cruel enforcers, who shot at civilian demonstrators and army units between December 22–25, killing 940 persons across the country.

Notwithstanding numerous elections and EU membership since 2007, the real winners of Romania's transition to democracy are the security elite – the former members of the Securitate, and their successor generation, who protect their elders' fortunes as they make their own.

(...). Today, nine security services, the heirs of the Securitate colossus, operate behind the scenes in Romania, or, in some cases, openly – to manipulate politics and enrich their members at the expense of ordinary Romanians. The country's main domestic security agency, the SRI, operates with a budget larger than that of Germany's equivalent, the Verfassungsschutz, and nearly 2.5 times that of the equivalent in the Netherlands, the EU country closest to Romania in population. It is estimated to employ 12,000 people – the official numbers are undisclosed, and my requests for an interview were refused – six times more than the 17-million populous Netherlands. Despite a change of generations, Romania's security services are not only lavishly bankrolled but largely unchecked by other government agencies. Although much progress has been made, Romania still has a long way to go to internalize the rule of law.

Denouncing NATO's agenda, a prominent political science academic from the 'Academy of Sciences of the USSR' and Russia's prestigious 'Institute of Scientific Information on Social Sciences of the Russian Academy of Sciences' noted how Ceausescu's secret service, 'which had already' 'changed its orientation', was responsible for 'the implementation of the dark plan' to get the public to believe the propaganda of the colour revolution:

It should also be recalled that it was in Romania in these December days that a disgusting spectacle was first played out, similar to what the West will later cynically play out in Kosovo, ungodly exaggerating the number of victims of "ethnic cleansing" in order to justify NATO's military intervention. And during Ceausescu's farcical "trial", he was found guilty of the deaths of 60,000 people in Timisoara, a city in western Romania. The mixed Romanian-Hungarian population made it possible to provoke violent ethnic clashes here, but there was no question of any "tens of thousands". The 100 bodies that were presented to the press and the public were taken from the anatomical theater of the Medical Institute. Ion Iliescu and Petra Roman needed strong arguments to get the public to accept Ceausescu's execution, and the Securitate, which had already "changed its orientation", took over the implementation of the dark plan. And although two weeks later the truth became known to the Western media, this does not prevent them, as was the case with [their lies against] Russia as well, from spreading the myth of a spontaneous democratic revolution to this day. (Russia and the Last Wars of the Twentieth Century (1989-2000), Ksenia Grigorievna Myalo, Moscow, 2002. From: militera.lib.ru. Bold added.) (IMG)

The colour revolution was aimed towards strengthening the reactionary core of the Romanian regime apparatus at the expense of the 'socialist' façade of the Titoist Romanian regime; until 1989, the 'socialist' façade was an asset, for it allowed infiltration by the CIA and MI6 into the Warsaw Pact; from 1989 onwards, it was a liability, for it served as a cosmetic obstacle against expanded cooperation with NATO and the IMF, against further privatization and proliferation of the bureaucratic oligarchic mafia, etc.

Ceausescu's Titoist secret service ran the show then in Titoist Romania, the Romanian government that was comprador at heart but 'socialist' in appearance, and now in the blatantly comprador capitalist state that has taken off the mask of 'socialism'. Clearly, the colour revolution was not aimed at ousting the corrupt Titoist oligarchy and the intelligence service mafia. The colour revolution was aimed not at the Romanian regime apparatus, but was aimed solely at 'communist' symbolism of the Romanian state. Communist symbolism is an obstacle to cooperation with NATO. Ceausescu, while a Titoist, was nonetheless regarded as a symbol of 'communism' and 'Stalinism' by many. Insofar as Ceausescu was a Titoist, he was to continue his rule, as a result of the colour revolution, but insofar as he was a symbol of 'communism', the imperialist-fascist secret services were to oust him.

According to the mainstream Romanian state media at the time, Nicolae Ceausescu and his wife Elena were arrested, summarily tried and filmed while being 'executed'. The videos 'documenting' the 'execution' were released by the state media. The 'execution' did not happen.

For start, the videos of Ceausescu being 'executed' turned out to be fake, and according to forensic specialists, the bodies shown in the video – allegedly the bodies of the Ceausescus – were dead long before the 'execution'. Furthermore, one forensic specialist Guy Nicholas said that it was not clear if the Ceausescus had died hours prior. The following are excerpts of an AP News report on this matter:

BORDEAUX, France (AP) _ A Romanian government videotape purporting to show the execution of Romanian dictator Nicolae Ceausescu and his wife, Elena, is faked in part, forensic experts here believe.

After examining a 90-minute tape shown last week on French television, the scientists doubt the official claim that the couple was killed by firing squad. Instead, they say the couple was apparently killed hours earlier with gunshots to the head.

Dr. Loic le Ribault, director of a private criminal science laboratory in Bordeaux, said Sunday that the only signs of fatal wounds on the bodies were in the right temples, indicating the Ceausescus had been shot in the head.

In the tape, the Ceausescus, hands tied behind their backs, appear in the video to have been gunned down with automatic weapons. But the camera angle is too low and the lens is obscured by gunsmoke, preventing a clear look at the couple being shot, experts say.

Later footage shows a medic checking Mrs. Ceausescu for signs of life as she lies in a stream of blood pouring from a wound in her head.

Le Ribault and others say the state of the bodies show the [bodies that were believed to be the] Ceausescus died hours before the medic checked them. The corpses were stiff with rigor mortis, and there was virtually no sign of blood on Nicolae Ceausescu.

Also, the bullet holes on the brick wall behind the couple are too low for a firing squad theoretically aiming at the chest, le Ribault said. "It's technically impossible that this film was made immediately after the death of the Ceausescus," said le Ribault. "The fusilade ... is a simulation made solely for the camera."

(...). Guy Nicolas, another forensic scientist working for the French criminal courts, said the evidence of a prior execution is not conclusive.

"I don't think we can draw any definitive conclusions from such mediocre images," he said.

(Ceausescu Execution Video Faked, Experts Say, AP News, April 30, 1990) (IMG)

As stated in the above, there is no evidence that Ceausescu and his wife were executed on the hour of the 'execution', nor any evidence that it happened prior to the hour of execution. Ruxandra Cesereanu, a Romanian historian and journalist, did a review of a number of documents regarding the circumstances of the 'execution' of Ceausescu. While Ruxandra Cesereanu stated in the beginning of her document that Ceausescu was 'executed' in 1989, she nonetheless also provided materials that, contrary to her intentions, indicate that there was no evidence that the man and woman executed were Nicolae and Elena Ceausescu. She wrote:

In Dupa executie a nins, Viorel Domenico interviews the military who got the mission to execute Ceausescu. According to their testimonies and to those of some other actors in the garrison, Elena and Nicolae Ceausescu were shot by tens of bullets, their bodies being riddled (as in an extreme release). They were shot before the order was given; but not only by those who were part of the commando, it was a chaotic outbreak of all those who had guns and who, not being among the ones who were assigned the execution mission, were only spectators. In Dupa executie a nins one can read a series of morbid details about Ceausescu couple's death. For instance, one soldier declares that near the execution wall he picked a bone piece of Elena Ceausescu's skull, in order to keep it. Some other tells about the garrison dog which ate Elena Ceausescu's brain from the pavement. Many soldiers took out bullets from the execution wall as a souvenir; some even dipped a handkerchief in Ceausescu's blood (p. 165, 167).

In Procesul Ceausescu [Ceausescu Trial] (1996), Ardeleanu, Savaliuc and Baiu record some witnesses' statements supporting the idea that the bodies of the two Ceausescus were riddled by tens or even hundreds of bullets and that during the autopsy, Ceausescu's corpse was even mutilated.

(CEAUSESCU'S TRIAL AND EXECUTION, Ruxandra Cesereanu, Metabasis, May 2009, No. 7, p. 4) (IMG)

The bodies were 'riddled' and the alleged body of Elena was torn apart, the skull turned into several shred, and the brain eaten by a dog. Their faces became undetectable, the bodies were mutilated, and the murder and burying happened really quickly in an unfair, unjust manner. There is no evidence that Ceausescu and his wife were executed on the hour of their official 'execution', nor is there any evidence that the 'execution' happened prior to the filming, nor is there any proof that the bodies of the dead were actually the bodies of the Ceausescus. On the other hand, there is every indication that the entire execution of Ceausescus was faked. Why would the murder of the Ceausescus be faked? One can speculate.

This is an old secret service method. For a spy, one way to live on is to 'die'. In the initial years after World War II, it was said that Dr. Mengele was dead. Later it turned out that he was alive and 'well', having escaped via a ratline provided by the CIA and MI6. The public was told that Vice Fuhrer Bormann was dead, but years later it was revealed that he was alive and that he escaped Europe via a ratline provided by the CIA and MI6. As was mentioned before in C15S8, during the purge against the Slansky ring, Jan Bojko, a prominent agent of the Slansky faction, aimed to escape to Yugoslavia by exploiting the false rumours of his 'death':

Bojko was a close collaborator of Gen. Bredich Reicin, executed during the purge of the Slansky group. Bojko, a Slovak, generally believed dead, had actually been concealed by Slansky's followers and was detected trying to reach Austria on the way to Yugoslavia with important documents.

His capture revealed a conspiracy involving the highest circles of Communist leadership and increased Soviet suspicion with regard to Czechoslovak unwillingness to purge unreliable elements. Soviet authorities have placed the responsibility on Dr. Stefan Reiss, a former Minister of Justice, a Hungarian Jew by birth, but considered a Slovak. He is a protégé of President Zapotocky.

(Investigation of Czechoslovak leaders, CIA, February 15, 1954, p. 1) (IMG)

In an operation coordinated by the CIA, SAVAK, and Saddam's Mukhaberat, the MEK Rajavist operative Masoud Keshmiri infiltrated the highest ranks of Iranian intelligence, and then planted a bomb killing the Islamic Republic's President, Prime Minister, and many other officials. MEK agents within Iranian state apparatus then presented Keshmiri as one of the victims of the MEK bombings, fabricated his fake corpse, prepared the coffins, shed fake tears in grief for him, dug his grave, and placed the fake corpse inside the grave – all of this was so to give him the time and chance to escape to Iraq. The Iranian government later found out that the 'dead' Keshmiri was behind the explosion, and went on a hunt for the numerous imperialist agents who had assisted Keshmiri by presenting him as 'dead'; Iranian government efforts failed since the MEK launched another wave of terror operations to prevent the capture of those who had deliberately presented Keshmiri as dead. There are numerous other cases in which agents 'die' so that they can continue to live, and cases in which entire intelligence services are 'abolished' so that they can continue to operate as before.

I readily admit that I have no proof that the Ceausescus escaped through their 'death', but I theorize that this was the case. Accounting for the strong evidence of the fake character of the 'evidence' of the Ceausescus' death, and in light of the continued rule of the Ceausescu faction in Romania even after 1989, there is little reason to believe otherwise. Much as how there was continuity in the rule of the Ceausescuist faction over Romania even long after 1989, as exemplified by the oligarchs and the elites of the security bodies, there was reason to believe in the continuity of the biological life of Ceausescu himself as well. And such a belief is reinforced by the fact that the 'documentary' 'evidence' of Ceausescu 'execution' each turned out to be faker than the other. In this probable conspiracy, Ion Iliescu's group must have been an accomplice, as they were directly involved in the fake 'execution' video, and the other circumstances of the 'death'.

Anyways, the colour revolution ousted the pseudo-communist coloration of the Romanian state, while actually prolonging its core comprador bourgeois essence. The task of communists in 1989 in Romania was to do the opposite of whatever the CIA wanted: (1) to oppose all the colour revolutionary plots, (2) to support the 'communist' symbolism of the Romanian regime, because although doing so would not have directly benefited the working class, it would have been indirectly beneficial because it would have caused more trouble for the CIA, (3) to oppose the covert face of Ceausescu as the imperialist agent he was, (4) to support Ceausescu's overt existence as the official leader of Romania, just to hamper the CIA efforts aimed at ousting the 'communist' symbolism for smoother collaboration with Romania's regime.

C23S3. Class Struggles in the People's Republic of Korea in the era of Titoization  IMG-All-{Korea}

Throughout its history, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) pursued the correct policy of laying emphasis on heavy industry over light industry:

The industrial sector has benefited from Kim's policies. Over 50 percent of state investment went to the industrial sector during most of the 1950s and 1960s, and new industrial plants and equipment accounted for 49 percent of state investment during the Six-year Plan. As a result, industry's share of the combined total of gross agricultural and industrial output (see Glossary) climbed to well over 90 percent in 1980.

At the start of the 1980s the country had a variety of industries, ranging from mining to textile manufacturing, located in nine major industrial centers. The government also had expanded the transportation and communications networks and increased the utilization of domestic energy resources. Per capita supplies of many industrial items were comparable to those of many of the world's middle-income countries, if not to the most technologically advanced nations.

(...). Like the Soviet Union, North Korea concentrated on heavy industry first, while investing only modestly in the light and consumer industries.

(‘North Korea: a Country Study’, Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, Frederica M. Bunge, 1981, p. 119) (IMG)

Nonetheless, there were brief periods in time when the DPRK was forced to prioritize light industry. By the early 1960s, pressure and stabs in the back by the Moscow Titoists was enough to push the DPRK to enact a series of economic policy changes of a revisionist and counterproductive character. The Moscow Titoists did not just defund revisionist China and People's Democratic Albania in 1960-1961, but also defunded the DPRK, and used these funding and defunding mechanism as a carrot-and-stick means with which to lobby for DPRK's shift away from heavy industry and onto light industry / consumer goods. First, through imposing sanctions on North Korea, the Moscow Titoists sought to push North Korea towards the US-led camp ("Free World"). The CIA reported:

In an apparent effort to find alternate sources of supply for goods formerly obtained from the Soviet bloc, Pyongyang embarked during 1963 on a vigorous but so far largely unsuccessful program of trade expansion in the free world. Recent trade agreements with Western suppliers involve some items formerly purchased from the USSR and the European satellites. Pyongyang apparently also desires to develop new sources of capital goods to aid industrial expansion. (‘NORTH KOREA, COMMUNIST CHINA'S INDEPENDENT ALLY’, Special Report, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), March 6, 1964, p. 4) (IMG)

In conditions of economic distress, it would make sense to emphasize heavy industry even more, as Kim Il Sung and his faction would have desired. However, the sanctions imposed by the Moscow Titoists and the Westwards shift of North Korean trade weakened the leverage power of the faction headed by Kim Il Sung, and thus the vacuum was filled by the counter-revolutionary faction in the Workers' Party of Korea (WPK). Hence, the sanctions by Moscow Titoists boosted the lobbying power of the counter-revolutionary anti-Kim faction in the DPRK, allowing for the emphasis on light industry over heavy industry. The CIA reported:

Pyongyang's decision to concentrate on consumer production during 1964 was a drastic shift from its past emphasis on development of heavy industry. During 1963, however, the rate of North Korean industrial development had already begun to slacken. According to statistics released by Pyongyang, the increase in gross value of industrial output for 1963 was only 8 percent. This compares with the 11 percent planned, and 20 percent claimed, for 1962.

The shortfall probably resulted in part from problems in the allocation of manpower. However, it may also have reflected a partial disruption in the flow of Soviet assistance. For example, Moscow has reportedly been stalling on delivery of equipment for key Korean thermal power projects.

Pyongyang has implicitly accused the Soviet Union of using economic aid as a weapon for imposing its political views, and has also publicly rejected the concept of an international division of labor as espoused by the bloc's Council for Mutual Economic Assistance. Pyongyang has labeled it a Russian scheme to perpetuate the backward economic status of some bloc countries and make them mere economic appendages of the USSR. Late in 1962, Pyongyang publicly adopted a policy of economic self-reliance and announced that it was planning to build a self-sufficient economy.

(‘NORTH KOREA, COMMUNIST CHINA'S INDEPENDENT ALLY’, Special Report, CIA, Office of Current Intelligence (OCI), March 6, 1964, p. 3) (IMG)

While the Koreans pursued the correct policy of laying emphasis on the development of heavy industry, they also began a series of policies that were problematic, populist, and left-deviationist, but which they partially mitigated later on. It was called the Tae'an Work System, which ended the efficient and speedy system of one-man management of enterprises, which had been advocated by Lenin, in favour of a kind of a management by technicians, the Party, and the workers in the factory. As always, these kinds of solutions appear beautiful because of their 'democratic' aura and the involvement of the party of the workers and kolkhozniks in the management, but in practice they are demagogical and left-deviationist. A report sponsored by the Headquarters of the US Department of the Army stated:

According to official claims, all management decisions were arrived at by consensus among the members of the party committee. (...).

The Tae'an Work System was a departure from the previous "one-man management system" inherited from the Soviet Union. The purpose of the change was to reinforce the "mass line" (see Glossary) by allowing the workers' active participation in management, in order to inspire increased production and newer and better technology. (‘North Korea: a Country Study’, Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, Frederica M. Bunge, 1981, p. 131) (IMG)

Indeed, emphasizing the Maoist revisionist concept of the mass line in the management of the economy, the North Korean government media stated:

The Tae'an work system created by Kim Il Sung, as a system enabling the masses of the people to give full play to their responsibility and role as the masters of the state and society by combining the Party's monolithic leadership and the revolutionary mass line, is the application of the fundamental principle of the socialist state in its activities. This system is significant not only as a socialist economic management system but also as a political mode by which to manage socialist society as a whole. (Kim Il Sung: Condensed Biography, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Pyongyang, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, 2001, p. 224) (IMG)

Unsurprisingly, the establishment of the revisionist 'mass line' in running the state enterprises did not solve the problems, for worker self-administration was a smokescreen for decentralization and hence chaos and bureaucracy. Fortunately, during the mid-to-late-1960s, when Kim Il Sung's faction in the Workers' Party of Korea began to gain greater strength, some steps were reportedly taken against the Maoist revisionist mass line. At least according to official North Korean government media:

At the Ninth Plenary Meeting of the Fourth Party Central Committee [Kim Il Sung] took steps to abolish the trade unions' old patterns of collective bargaining with factory management and performing the function of supervision and control over the operations of enterprises, and to make them act entirely as organizations of ideological education. He also saw that a new work system was established accordingly. (Kim Il Sung: Condensed Biography, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Pyongyang, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, 2001, p. 233) (IMG)

Such a move against the 'mass line' or worker self-administration in state enterprises was a step in the correct direction. However, unfortunately, there was continuity in the fact of state enterprises being run by a collective body of the party committee and the engineers and managers. North Korean government media admitted:

The Taean work system is the supreme economic management system suited to the intrinsic nature of the socialist system, a system by which factories and enterprises conduct all their management activities under the collective guidance of their respective Party committees. In this system, the economic task in hand is fulfilled by giving priority to political work and rousing the producer masses, the higher echelons are responsible for helping their subordinate units, and the economy is managed and run in a scientific and rational way. (Kim Il Sung: Condensed Biography, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Pyongyang, Democratic People's Republic of Korea, 2001, p. 224) (IMG)

The establishment of a collective body for management led to inefficiency in the management of enterprises. Multi-person-management is objectively less efficient than one-person management. Again, unsurprisingly, this Taean management system which went against the one-person management principle did not really solve the management problems:

Ideally, the Taean Work System should have solved North Korea's management problems once and for all, but repeated references in the press and in Kim's own speeches to difficulties in the "normalization" and "regularization" of industry told a different story. Kim especially criticized the management of materials supply work, equipment maintenance, labor administration, and finance. In 1973 he even went so far as to say "economic guidance functionaries have not made one single definite regulation to administer properly the independent accounting system." As a result, inefficient practices were not penalized and may have been rewarded. The typical response to these malpractices was to launch a campaign to straighten out production and management. ('North Korea: a Country Study', Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, Frederica M. Bunge, 1981, p. 133) (IMG)

According to the report by the US Department of the Army, the North Korean government, in its drive to resolve the problems which the Taean work system was unable to resolve, established another parallel bureaucracy throughout Korea: the special planning departments, which were meant to check the activity of the Taean management. In other words, more bureaucracy was established to counter the negative effects of the Taean system. According to the report:

One measure of the [political] success of the Taean Work System has been its longevity. Only one major organizational change has occurred since its inception. In 1964 the government established special planning departments at the provincial, city, and county agencies, which were responsible directly to the State Planning Committee as well to the local agency where they were based. The government was apparently afraid that some of the problems that had characterized the "one-man management" system were also threatening the Taean Work System. The planning departments were supposed to check the tendency of local agencies to misrepresent their achievements to superior agencies and their hesitancy to risk innovations. Kim praised the accomplishments of the revised system in his report to the Fifth party Congress in 1970 and maintained its importance again ten years later in his report to the Sixth congress. ('North Korea: a Country Study', Headquarters of the US Department of the Army, Frederica M. Bunge, 1981, p. 133) (IMG)

The Taean system emerged as a Titoist-Maoist deviation in economic policy, but was later partially mitigated.

In sum, DPRK pursued a communist line with regards to the question of heavy industry vs. light industry, but pursued an erroneous line with regards to management of enterprises. Of course, the effect of the WPK's revisionist line on the management of enterprises should not be exaggerated. The correct policy of emphasis on heavy industry had a positive impact of a much greater magnitude than the magnitude of the negative effects of the Taean system. Over the years, the heavy industry created the backbone for North Korea's conventional and nuclear weapons program, not only for self-defense but for directly assisting anti-imperialist forces. The heavy industry also created the backbone that paved the way for infrastructure developments, healthcare, education, etc. Such industrialization also enlarged the proletarian class and assisted the mechanization and collectivization of agriculture. The rise of the proletarians and kolkhozniks made it harder for Anglo-American imperialism to penetrate Korea, and helped keep the bureaucrats in Korea in check. By contrast, the Taean system had the effect of promoting decentralization, bureaucratic chaos, officials' corruption, and inefficiency in production, all of which was bad; but in the specific context of North Korea, because of the many other programs, the negative effects of the Taean system were not so big as to stop the general tide of economic development resultant from heavy industry and centralized industrialization. As well, the Taean system was a pro-decentralization deviation from an economy known to be generally very centralized. Therefore, corruption and bureaucracy did not grow much and economic chaos did not greatly ensue in that land.

In countries in the path of centralized industrialization and collectivization, a large population of the proletarians are former peasants. Among these proletarians, some of the vestiges of feudal thinking would remain. At times, this takes the form of the cult of personality around the main leader – a supposed God solves all problems whereas the peasant has to bother himself/herself only with his/her farm. If Kim Il-Sung supported a cult of personality around himself, he sure erred greatly and vacillated away from socialism. I have not seen Kim Il-Sung ever promote a cult of personality around himself, though people in his family and throughout the North Korean state, perhaps or perhaps not at Kim Il-Sung's connivance, did foster such a cult of personality. And these individuals had an obvious social base. Some were careerist bureaucrats playing the usual game of praising to heavens and then denouncing 'the leader' to mud, the way that Khrushchev and Tito had done to Stalin. The forming of a cult of personality also had a base in the ordinary masses of Korean society, however, and was rooted in the continued existence of agrarian petit-bourgeois attitudes in Korea even after the proletarianization of a large segment of these peasants. Take a look at the membership composition of the Korean Party. In 1956, Kim said:

The present composition of our Party ranks is workers—22.6 per cent, poor peasants—56.8 per cent, middle peasants—3.7 per cent, office employees—13 per cent and others—3.9 per cent. Compared with the time of the Second Party Congress, the number of workers has increased by 2.4 per cent and poor peasants, by 3.7 per cent, altogether amounting to 79.4 per cent of the total membership.

The majority (51.7 per cent) of the present Party membership are those who have joined the Party since the outbreak of the Fatherland Liberation War. Not only that, while the Party has many members who have a strong Party spirit and a high level of work qualifications, quite a few members are still below the mark in their political tempering.

(REPORT TO THE THIRD CONGRESS OF THE WORKERS' PARTY OF KOREA ON THE WORK OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, Workers' Party of Korea, Kim Il Sung, April 23, 1956. In: Kim Il Sung Works – Jan-Dec 1956, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Pyongyang, DPRK, 1982, p. 242) (IMG)

Over time, the proportion of the proletarians in the WPK grew:

The proportion of workers in the entire Party membership has risen from 17.3 per cent at the time of the Third Party Congress to 30 per cent today.

This growth of our Party reflects the increase of the revolutionary force of our country's working masses....

(REPORT TO THE FOURTH CONGRESS OF THE WORKERS' PARTY OF KOREA ON THE WORK OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, Workers' Party of Korea, Kim Il Sung, September 11, 1961. In: Kim Il Sung Works – Jan-Dec 1961, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Pyongyang, DPRK, 1983, pp. 230-231) (IMG)

The increase in the hold of the proletariat and the kolkhozniks over the Party, as a replacement for the petit-bourgeois contingent in the Party, undoubtedly strengthened the Korean communist faction in the confrontation with the Titoists at home and abroad. However, although a peasant's class-behaviour would radically shift as a result of the transformation of such a peasant into a proletarian or kolkhoznik, vestiges of petit-bourgeois thinking continue amongst them, as Stalin had pointed out. The continued existence of petit-bourgeois mentality was reflected in the strength of the tendency to form a cult of personality around Kim Il-Sung. Though the significant level of state power exercised by the proletariat and kolkhozniks in North Korea nullified many of the negative trends generated by the reactionary culture of hereditary leadership and thus – contrary to bourgeois media narratives – prevented the rise of a real monarchical tyranny in the East Asian state, it remains a fact that the culture of hereditary leadership, inspired by royalist political culture, persisted, fed the imperialists with anti-socialist propaganda weapons, and yielded its negative cultural impact. The culture of hereditary leadership was not material enough a factor to yield tyranny. Nor was it a factor so material as to nullify the state power of the proletariat in North Korea, but undermined it nevertheless. The abating of Anglo-American imperialist encirclement and concurrent with it the increased influence of the proletariat and kolhozniks over the North Korean state shall undermine the parasitic class tendencies that generate the culture of hereditary leadership, paving the way for the latter's abolition.

There is not enough data for the time period after 1961 concerning the membership composition but it is a fact that a larger portion of the society became proletarians and kolkhozniks and this must have inevitably influenced the membership composition of the Party as well. In the absence of data on the level of the influence of the proletariat over the Party, it cannot be so easily determined whether or not the DPRK did become a dictatorship of the proletariat. Note that like most Peoples' Democracies, North Korea was to go into two stages, the proletarian-led progressive bourgeois-democratic stage, and the dictatorship of the proletariat stage. North Korea certainly made steps towards transitioning from the proletarian-led progressive bourgeois-democratic stage onto the dictatorship of the proletariat stage, but it is not completely clear (at least to me) as to how far they went.

C23S4. The Titoist-Imperialist Cooperation in Afghanistan  IMG-All-{Afghanistan War}

Progressive classes elevate in strength concurrent with the development of the productive forces. Afghanistan was a mountainous country in which the development of the productive forces was difficult, a factor leading to the delay in the rise of the progressive classes. The feudal elites had a high influence over that country, and the majority of the population there was petit-bourgeois. The petit-bourgeoisie were unwilling to take the risk of grand projects in the struggle against imperialism and were thus materially dominated by the reactionary classes, a material domination that translated to ideational (ideological) domination through religious fundamentalism.

A communist revolution in Afghanistan in 1978-1979 was impossible. The anti-communists do not lie when they say that what is referred to as the 1978 'Communist Revolution' in Afghanistan was not really a communist revolution but a coup d'états without popular involvement. A new junta, after the coup d'états, can quickly establish itself as a popularly-backed government. Indeed, there have been numerous progressive coups that brought to power little-known juntas and these progressive juntas quickly became popular due to their revolutionary and progressive measures. The 1978 coup was undoubtedly progressive. The new government was, in the broad definition, progressive as well. It was led by the 'People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan' (PDPA), an amalgam of a number of other parties, the two main of which were the Khalq Party and the Parcham Party.

The Parcham advocated the smuggling of communist ideas into Afghanistan using the cover of 'Islamic socialism' and progressive bourgeois-democracy, rather than a leap to socialism. Once enough industrialization and the proletarianization occurs in Afghan society, the Party can then proceed to drop the 'Islamic' in 'Islamic socialism' and to pursue a scientific socialist line. The Parcham was very pro-Soviet. To the Parcham party belonged Babrak Karmal and Mohammad Najibullah.

The other sub-party in the PDPA was the Khalq Party, a left-deviationist grouping that branded itself as 'anti-revisionist'. This Maoist 'Khalqi' grouping aggressively pushed for a Trotskyite leap to 'socialism', and benefited Al-Qaeda on all fronts. As the Khalq, not the Parcham, came to dominate the PDPA right from the start, it was inevitable that Al-Qaeda would grow in Afghanistan. The Khalq party was able to pursue such a reactionary line which it pursued, because the reactionary forces in Afghanistan were strong and pervasive. The upper hand of the Khalq over the Parcham was itself the reflection of such a mighty presence of the reactionary classes.

Led by the Khalq, the new junta described itself as 'communist' and discard the Islamist and patriotic cover which the Parcham party had spent years to cultivate:

The US Embassy in Kabul believes that, in revealing themselves as Communists and in discarding their Islamic nationalist cover, the coup leaders may have made a serious miscalculation in a deeply religious and traditionalist country. (Afghanistan: New Government.

In: NATIONAL INTELLIGENCE BULLETIN, CIA, May 1, 1978, p. 1) (IMG)

There was no more green coloring in the Afghan flag:

PDPA set out to change Afghanistan quickly. To symbolize their intent, the party leaders eliminated the time-honored green flag associated with Islam and substituted a red flag of the future. (Tribalism Versus Communism in Afghanistan: The Cultural Roots of Instability: An Intelligence Assessment, Foreign Assessment Center, CIA, Information as of October 16, 1979, Written on January 1980, p. 8. In: "MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT FROM STANSFIELD TURNER", January 3, 1980) (IMG)

Once the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan occurred, the red-and-blond flag was replaced by black, red, and green again.

When the Bolsheviks launched their revolutions throughout the predominantly Muslim areas of the Russian Empire, they made sure to antagonize Islam as little as possible and permitted the temporary existence of the 'Islamic socialist' eclectic current in the predominantly-Muslim SSRs, and used such an eclectic current as a means of smuggling socialism into the minds of the conservative Muslim population. The RAND Corporation actually did a useful study of this matter, contrasting Bolshevik policy with Khalqi policy, and examining the many anti-Islamic measures committed by the Khalqis which resulted in an uprising against the Afghan state. The document has been cited extensively in C4S1 in this book. Some of the policies mentioned in this section have been documented by the RAND report. See the following for more details: 'THE SOVIET UNION AND MUSLIM GUERRILLA WAR, 1920-1981: LESSONS FOR AFGHANISTAN: A RAND NOTE', N-1707/1, The RAND Corporation, Alexandre Bennigsen, August 1981.

The development of the productive forces, the class struggles in the sphere of political economy, and struggles for cultural change have to be developed in parallel with each other. Therefore, during its first two years of existence, at the very least, Afghanistan needed to go through a period of New Economic Policy (NEP), some level of political pluralism such that the leadership of the communist party was recognized, and a higher level of religious tolerance. A few years later, concurrent with the shift away from the NEP, Afghanistan could have gone forward and unified the political system into a democratic centralist single-party state, hence to dissolve parties; and in this process, the correct policy would have been a campaign against religion through persuasion, and a crackdown on reactionary elements among religious clerics. In the initial years, Islam and socialism should be portrayed as completely compatible. None of these steps occurred in Afghanistan.

In the Khalq party too there were factional disputes. There was the more pro-Soviet Taraki faction, and there was the Titoist faction led by Hafizullah Amin. Despite the general problems existing in the Khalq party, many progressive reforms were pursued by the faction of Mohammad Taraki:

Taraki, in his role as party elder statesman, decreed the party's major reforms: education was to be secularized and females admitted to all schools throughout the country; the estates belonging to lay and religious families were to be confiscated and the land redistributed to peasant farmers; (Tribalism Versus Communism in Afghanistan: The Cultural Roots of Instability: An Intelligence Assessment, Foreign Assessment Center, CIA, Information as of October 16, 1979, Written on January 1980, p. 8. In: "MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT FROM STANSFIELD TURNER", January 3, 1980) (IMG)

These progressive measures however were not enough to turn the tide against the Trotskyite policy in Afghanistan. Note the similarity of the PDPA's Trotskyite policy with that of Tito during the Yugoslav People's Liberation War, when Tito promoted the red flags thus pursuing a sectarian policy that undermined the popular front policies promoted by the Comintern and drove a wedge between the YCP from its potential bourgeois anti-fascist allies (see C12S1). The Trotskyite elements of the Party were centered around Hafizullah Amin, the brutal head of the security services, who terrorized the Afghan masses so to provoke them into an anti-state rebellion:

Amin, the party strongman, sent military contingents – some with Soviet advisers – party loyalists, and dedicated cadres of young people to the provinces to see that the reforms were enacted. In a land where "no government has ever tried to govern the countryside directly," the vast majority of the population saw a threat to their way of life.

In their efforts to demonstrate their revolutionary authenticity and establish control, the Communists overstepped the limits by which Afghan governments traditionally had legitimated their rule. Although Amin shared his ruthlessness with past rulers, he sought – in contrast to his predecessors – to eliminate, rather than to compromise with, the old elite, to enhance the prestige of the Army over the fighting habits of the tribes, and to diminish the stature of Islam. He ended by affronting the Afghans' pride of national independence by relying on thousands of hated Soviet civilian and military advisers. Although it retreated somewhat (to save face and concentrate on fighting, the regime declared that land and educational reforms had been achieved), the regime brought upon itself tribal wrath and civil war.

(Tribalism Versus Communism in Afghanistan: The Cultural Roots of Instability: An Intelligence Assessment, Foreign Assessment Center, CIA, Information as of October 16, 1979, Written on January 1980, p. 8. In: "MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT FROM STANSFIELD TURNER", January 3, 1980) (IMG)

While reliance on Eurasian civilian and military advisors was useful for Afghanistan's development and for Soviet spying on the Amin faction, poking these advisors onto the people's eyes simply antagonized the tribal nationalist population, thus further undermining the Afghan government. And that was the point, for by promoting anti-Sovietism through such Trotskyism, the Amin faction was helping to weaken the Soviet intelligence presence hence to weaken the presence of those spying on him and his gang. Similarly, the cruelty and terroristic behaviour shown by Amin was further counter-productive, fueling the flames of the insurgency in Afghanistan. By provoking the masses into a rebellion against the Soviet-backed Taraki faction, Hafizullah Amin systematically undermined the Afghan government and ceased power:

Amin, while working in Taraki's shadow, slowly stripped him of his real power. (Tribalism Versus Communism in Afghanistan: The Cultural Roots of Instability: An Intelligence Assessment, Foreign Assessment Center, CIA, Information as of October 16, 1979, Written on January 1980, p. 7. In: "MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT FROM STANSFIELD TURNER", January 3, 1980) (IMG)

Such terrorist and Trotskyite activity by Amin – who sought to shift the blame on Taraki – also annoyed the Soviets:

The Soviets are known to believe that Amin's ruthless and hasty implementation of Marxist "reforms" in Afghanistan was a major mistake, provoking the country-wide insurgency. Most of these reform programs have been halted by the expediency of declaring them "completed." Since the inauguration of the new Amin government, the emphasis has been on "legality, security and justice" and the drafting of a constitution. In this connection, Amin has tried to shift the blame to Taraki for the large numbers of political arrests and executions in the preceding months. However, Amin is widely regarded to have been the strong man in the Taraki regime and the one responsible for its ruthless policies. (SUBJECT: Internal Situation in Afghanistan, Briefing Memorandum From the Acting Director of the Bureau of Intelligence and Research (Mark) to Secretary of State Vance, Washington, December 16, 1979. In: "FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES 1977-1980", Vol. XII, US Department of State, pp. 245-246) (IMG)

While masking his regime as legalistic and constitutional, Amin – just like Tito – continued his terrorist and torturous activities, savagely eliminating critics, and covertly attacking the Soviets:

Amin was a ruthless, dedicated man who liked to be firmly in charge. After the coup, he steadily eliminated competitors and rival centers of power, even risking an extreme reduction of support for the Khalq in the party and military; alleged enemies of the regime were jailed and tortured in ever-larger numbers. With the purging of Taraki and his closest aides – most of whom had already been stripped of their power – Amin surrounded himself with trusted subordinates and placed members of his family in key military and internal security positions. Like many Afghans, he was suspicious and distrustful of the motives of others, including Soviet backers. His absorption in consolidating his own power and his independence finally cost him the support of the Soviets. (Tribalism Versus Communism in Afghanistan: The Cultural Roots of Instability: An Intelligence Assessment, Foreign Assessment Center, CIA, Information as of October 16, 1979, Written on January 1980, p. 8. In: “MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT FROM STANSFIELD TURNER”, January 3, 1980) (IMG)

Another US intelligence document further details the purge of pro-Soviet communists and progressives in Afghanistan:

Of fundamental interest to us will be whether the U.S. can woo, to any degree, Afghanistan away from Moscow’s orbit and can discourage any inclination by Amin to be irredentist....

3. Though Hafizullah Amin has [officially] welcomed the massive support of the Soviets, I believe him nonetheless to be a nationalist – and the only strong Khalqi leader around. Amin ... is also ruthless; otherwise he would not be where he is.

While in part one of this message, I expressed concern that the Soviets may now have a commanding influence in this country, I believe also it would be a mistake to characterize Amin as a Soviet toady. We have lots of evidence that he wants to run his own show, and that Moscow is less than ecstatic over the successive purges which have caused division in and depleted the ranks of the “progressive forces.” (...). Last week, when I asked the [Titoist] Hungarian Ambassador about Moscow’s alleged unhappiness over the purges of Taraki and Watanjar, and the reported coolness between Amin and Moscow, he cautioned against reading too much into this. He said, “As long as Afghanistan does not change its basic policies (read Communism and a pro-Moscow foreign policy), Moscow doesn’t care who is in charge.” From Moscow’s and Amin’s behavior since September 14, I think the Ambassador may be right.

6. This is not to say that the Amin-Soviet relationship has been or will be an easy one. Before Sept 14, there was tugging and pulling on both sides—and now there may be distrust. A few days ago, an Asian Ambassador here aptly described the situation when he said: “They are like a husband and wife who don’t much care for each other but nightly keep climbing into the same bed, because each has compelling needs and no options.”

(Subj: The Position of Amin and Afghanistan’s Independence: Part Two of Two. Ref: Kabul 7326, Telegram From the Embassy in Afghanistan to the Department of State, Kabul, October 9, 1979, 0835Z 7392. In: “FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES 1977–1980”, Vol. XII, US Department of State, pp. 203-204) (IMG)

While Hafizullah Amin was up against the Soviets, he was keen on being on CIA payroll (receiving “material assistance” from US imperialists). Indeed, the following excerpt from a document by US ambassador Archer Blood shows that Amin sought to re-orient Afghanistan’s strategic orientation towards a pro-US direction. The following

3. U.S.-Afghan relations. I had forty minutes alone with President Hafizullah Amin on the morning of Oct. 27. After the photographs were taken, we got down speedily to business. Following the talking points proposed in reftel, I mentioned those recent areas (Ariana DC– 10, narcotics control, etc.) where we had found we could work cooperatively with the DRA in our mutual interest and with a view to improving our bilateral relationship. Amin did not comment on any of the examples I cited, but merely nodded his assent. He then went on, with considerable eloquence, to stress his personal commitment to improving U.S.-Afghan relations, expressing his affection for the U.S. acquired during his residence in our country. Amin made a particular point of drawing my attention to the DRA’s forbearance in refraining from public attacks on the U.S. Even when Afghanistan is attacked by VOA, he said, we have deliberately resisted the temptation to respond in kind. The DRA does not want to do anything to “blacken the name or fame of the U.S.” He said that each country must act in its own interest but was confident that the U.S. and Afghanistan could continue to find ways and means that could serve their own interests but be of mutual benefit.

(...). 5. Development assistance. Amin made a strong pitch for U.S. “material assistance.” Afghanistan, he said, is in desperate need of foreign aid. Even a small portion of the development assistance which the U.S. provides worldwide would be of very great help to Afghanistan. The DRA would be grateful for any assistance, no matter how small. Amin said he would be happy to publicize U.S. aid to Afghanistan, adding that he would like to see more buildings in Afghanistan with plaques denoting that they had been built through U.S. aid. He allowed as how “your philosophy” can make it difficult for the U.S. to help in some areas and “our philosophy” makes it difficult for Afghanistan to accept some kinds of aid. Still, he said, we could doubtless find areas where we could work together.

(...). 12. Impressions. The man is impressive. His survival to date is by itself impressive, as is the air of quiet self-confidence he exudes. Clearly, he is aware of the mortality rate of Afghan leaders; several times he said “even if I am killed tomorrow.” He masks his ruthlessness and toughness quite well by his soft-spoken manner. In remarkable contrast to his turgid public speeches, his private discourse is refreshingly free from Marxist cant and cliché’s. His English is quite good and very easy to understand. Only once did he seem to have difficulty in expressing himself and that was when, perhaps in an attempt to convey great sincerity, he was declaiming how he could never sacrifice Afghan independence to any foreign demands, including from the Soviets.

14. I think he wants an improvement in U.S.-Afghan relations. His reasons could be varied: Soviet coaching; a long-range hedge against over-dependence on the Soviet Union; concern over the trouble which open U.S. animosity can create for his regime; conversely, an interest in bringing about the doubts and confusion which friendlier U.S. relations could sow among the supporters of the insurgency, the Pakistanis, Iranians and Saudis; a genuinely felt need for economic assistance.

The evidence presented shows that Hafizullah Amin was striving to establish – and had much success in establishing – a Titoist regime in Afghanistan, a fascist dictatorship masked as socialist and backed by American intelligence. It is a well-known fact that Taraki had invited the Red Army into Afghanistan in order to help combat the Amin gang and the Al-Qaeda terrorists. The Red Army eventually utilized this invitation as a pretext to deploy troops into Afghanistan so to force the demotion and eventual execution of Amin and to combat the Al-Qaeda. The Red Army brought with itself the Parcham faction, and installed them into the primary leading cadres of the new Afghan government in cooperation with the Taraki loyalists.

C23S5.1. Titoism in China / Mao Zedong, a Titoist agent of Anglo-American imperialism / Ties to American agent Anna Louise Strong / The Purge of the Kao Kang faction / The Deng faction, fascist agents of Anglo-American Imperialism  IMG-All-{China}

Years of colonial terror against China had left that country economically underdeveloped, resulting in the predominance of the agrarian petit-bourgeoisie in the Chinese population. Unlike the proletarians, who have nothing to lose except their 'chains' in the struggle against finance capital, the petit-bourgeoisie have small business which they may lose. At the same time, unlike the national bourgeoisie and the cooperative peasants who have big businesses with which they can take the risk of engaging in a struggle against finance capital, the petit-bourgeoisie do not have such big businesses and therefore cannot afford to take major risks in the struggle against finance capital. The inability of the petit-bourgeoisie to wage a struggle against imperialism results in the areas populated by the petit-bourgeoisie to become easy prey to material domination by finance capital. Such material domination can take the form of direct military and political control, or through indirect secret service influence via the dominance of the pseudo-progressive agents of comprador forces allied to imperialism – the corrupt bureaucrats, counter-revolutionary intelligentsia, etc. all disguised as 'anti-imperialists'. China since the mid-1950s was dominated by precisely these pseudo-progressive and pseudo-communist elements pursuing a reactionary line under the cover of pursuing a 'progressive', 'communist', or 'socialist' line; the pseudo-communist agency for imperialism took the form of both Trotskyite-style left-opportunism and liberal right-opportunism, depending on the context, time period, and location. Either way, however, the fact that since the mid-1950s and until 1989-1990, China was a major hub of opportunism, left- and right-, is irrefutable.

In a predominantly-peasant country, the efforts of the communists must be directed towards the elevation of the proletariat in the communist Party, the subsequent elevation of the Party's proletarian agents over the revolutionary means of violence, and the subordination of petit-bourgeois agents by the Party's proletarian agents. Such was the strategy pursued in the Korean and Vietnamese peoples' liberation war and in the communist-led popular struggles for the liberation of Eastern Europe. By contrast, in China, the Party was too open to the membership of peasants, thus allowing petit-bourgeois agents – rather than proletarian or agrarian cooperativist agents – to take the leadership of the military, resulting in a total disaster.

In a 1949 letter to Mao, Stalin predicted the rise of bourgeois-nationalist pro-US elements in the CPC:

As far as I know in the CPC there is a thin layer of the proletariat and the nationalist sentiments are very strong and if you will not conduct genuinely Marxist-Leninist class policies and not conduct struggle against bourgeois nationalism, ... China may become a dangerous toy in the hands of American imperialists. (J.V. Stalin, Sochinenia, Tom 18, Informatsionno-izdatelskii tsentr 'Soyuz', Tver, 2006, pp. 531- 533. Revolutionary Democracy) (IMG)

It should come as no surprise that Stalin was vigorously pushing for the industrialization and collectivization of China. He was aware of the great potential that existed in China, but also was very wary that China might become an epi-center of fascist subversion by Anglo-American intelligence. Industrialization increases the population of the proletariat. Collectivization would bring kolkhozniks and would sharply reduce petit-bourgeois tendencies.

Yet, the struggle against Titoist subversion and the petit-bourgeois currents could not be regarded as disconnected from the struggle against the Mao group itself, for Mao was a Titoist ally of the United States in the struggle against the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies. This was indeed the correct attitude of Stalin and many of the communist officials in the camp of the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies towards Mao Zedong and his gang. Mao admitted this fact several times. For start, Mao himself admitted that Stalin regarded China's leadership as having a Titoist character:

when fighting did erupt, he took us ... half sceptically. When we won the war, Stalin suspected that ours was a victory of the Tito type, and in 1949 and 1950 the pressure on us was very strong indeed. (ON THE TEN MAJOR RELATIONSHIPS: Speech at an enlarged meeting of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party, Mao Zedong, April 25, 1956) (IMG)

While slandering Stalin with regards to his policy line on China, Mao further admitted that Stalin regarded Mao as a Titoist counter-revolutionary and China as another Yugoslavia:

They [i.e. the Soviets] did not permit China to make revolution: that was in 1945. Stalin wanted to prevent China from making a revolution, saying that we should not have a civil war and should cooperate with Chiang Kai-shek, otherwise the Chinese nation would perish. But we did not do what he said. The revolution was victorious. After the victory of the revolution he next suspected China of being a Yugoslavia, and that I would become a second Tito. Later, when I went to Moscow to sign the Sino-Soviet Treaty of Alliance and Mutual Assistance, we had to go through another struggle. (Speech at the Tenth Plenum of the Eighth Central Committee of the CPC (Sept. 24, 1962), CMTTP, p. 191. (Most of this passage is also in TMT, pp. 146-7.). In: Mao's Evaluation of Stalin, massline.org. Note: the website 'massline' is a Maoist organization.) (IMG)

Mao's own speeches made it absolutely clear that Stalin regarded Mao as bearing a similar character to that of Tito. Hence, this fact has already been confirmed and cannot be doubted. This fact has also been reinforced by a primary source released by the think tank Wilson Center, presenting excerpts of Mao's conversation with the Yugoslav regime intelligence agents. In this conversation, Mao admitted that Stalin:

regarded me [i.e. Mao] as a half-hearted Tito or semi-Titoist. Not only in the Soviet Union but also in other socialist countries and some non-socialist countries were there some people who had suspected whether China's was a real revolution. (Mao's Conversation with a Yugoslavian Communist Union Delegation, Beijing, September 1956, Wilson Center, p. 3) (IMG)

Stalin ... regarded me as a half-hearted Tito. (Mao's Conversation with a Yugoslavian Communist Union Delegation, Beijing, September 1956, Wilson Center, p. 3) (IMG)

The Chinese people's revolutionary struggle was real, but Mao Zedong was never a loyal member of the Chinese revolution. He took leadership of the Chinese revolution in order to mislead it – somewhat like how the Yugoslav people's struggle against the fascists was real but Tito's leadership of such Yugoslav struggle was for the purpose of leading the struggle into the wrong and pro-fascist path.

Stalin was correct to regard Mao as a Titoist because that is exactly what Mao was. Mao did not hide this fact. On the contrary, he denounced Stalin's line regarding Yugoslavia's fascist regime and made it clear that he sided with the Yugoslav fascists. Regarding the break with Yugoslavia, Mao Zedong clarified his views:

My comrades, let me advise you that you should also watch out for this potential. Your industry is much modernized and has experienced a more rapid growth; Stalin made you suffer and hence, justice is on your side. All of this, though, may become your [mental] burden. (Mao's Conversation with a Yugoslavian Communist Union Delegation, Beijing, September 1956, Wilson Center, p. 5) (IMG)

Mao added:

Khrushchev already corrected the mistake concerning Yugoslavia. (Mao's Conversation with a Yugoslavian Communist Union Delegation, Beijing, September 1956, Wilson Center, p. 6) (IMG)

Mao made it clear that he had sided with Tito during the 1948 Split. Enver Hoxha too testified:

At first, Mao Tsetung said that Tito was not wrong, but it was Stalin who had been wrong about Tito. (Imperialism and the Revolution, Enver Hoxha)

The US military confirmed:

That China's Balkan policy has been essentially a derivative of the Sino-Soviet relationship is most clearly attested in the case of Yugoslavia. From 1948 to 1953 Peking followed Moscow's lead in exorcising the enemy of socialism embodied in Belgrade, even failing to acknowledge Yugoslavia's early diplomatic recognition of the PRC in 1949. Then, as Soviet-Yugoslav relations improved following Stalin's death, the Chinese discovered unsuspected virtues in Tito's brand of socialism. (THE SOVIET THEATER NUCLEAR OFFENSIVE, Office of Director of Defense Research and Engineering & Defense Nuclear Agency, US Air Force, Joseph Douglass, Jr., p. 63) (IMG)

Hoxha also wrote:

Mao Tsetung ... expressed his great desire to meet Tito. Tito himself declared recently: "I was invited to China when Mao Tsetung was alive. During the visit of the Chairman of the Federal Executive Veche, Djemal Myedich, to China, at that time, Mao Tsetung expressed to him his desire that I should visit China. Chairman Hua Kuofeng also told me that, five years ago, Mao Tsetung said that he should have invited me for a visit, stressing that in 1948, too, Yugoslavia was in the right, a thing which he (Mao Tsetung) had declared even then, to a narrow circle. But, taking into consideration the relations between China and the Soviet Union at that time, this was not said publicly". (From Tito's speech at the meeting of activists of the SR of Slovenia, September 8, 1978). (Imperialism and the Revolution, Enver Hoxha)

After the murder of Stalin, Anna Louise Strong, the promoter of Titoism and Maoism, was rehabilitated by the Moscow Titoists, as part of the Khrushchev group's attempt to strengthen Titoism-Maoism:

Soviet reversal of charges against Anna Louise Strong seen as gesture to Peiping: Moscow's recent reversal of the charges of espionage made against Anna Louise Strong in 1949 appears to be a gesture to the Chinese [Maoist] [pseuo-]Communists, whose cause she vociferously championed for years.

Miss Strong had frequently proclaimed Peiping's independence from Moscow and had advanced the "Yenan way" as the pattern for colonial Asia. She was arrested and expelled from the USSR in 1949 while attempting to return to North China after a visit to Tito. Prague radio hinted at the time that she was a Yugoslav spy – peculiarly sensitive charge in view of her planned trip to rejoin the Chinese Communists as they made their final push for victory in China.

Miss Strong's exoneration at this time may be intended to show that Moscow is sensitive to Peiping's feeling of independence. It ... may also have been published during the negotiations now being carried on in Moscow between Yugoslavia and Peiping to show that the USSR has no fear of Titoism in China.

(SOVIET REVERSAL OF CHARGES AGAINST ANNA LOUISE STRONG SEEN AS GESTURE TO PEIPING, CIA, p. 1) (IMG)

As confirmed by the renegade Chairman, Stalin enjoyed overwhelming popularity in China. This, Mao noted, was why he could not publicly denounce Stalin the way that Tito did. As he admitted:

You [Yugoslavs] wholeheartedly support Khrushchev's campaign to criticize Stalin, but we [the Chinese leaders] cannot do the same because our people would dislike it. (Mao's Conversation with a Yugoslavian Communist Union Delegation, Beijing, September 1956, Wilson Center, p. 3) (IMG)

Tito was an Anglo-American spy and a fascist terrorist. This fact was the reason behind Stalin's struggle to overthrow the Yugoslav regime and to encircle Tito's gang. For Stalin and communists aware of the crimes of Tito, to state that Mao was China's Tito had very serious implications. Take a look at the cases of the other Titoists. The Czechoslovak Tito, Slansky, was rightly accused of being an MI6-Mossad-UDB agent and was purged. The Bulgarian Tito, Kostov, was rightly accused of being an CIA-MI6-UDB agent and was purged. The Hungarian Tito, Rajk, was accused of being a Nazi agent and a CIA-MI6 agent and was purged. The Albanian Tito, Xoxe, was accused of being a CIA-MI6-UDB agent and was purged. The Romanian Tito, Patrascanu, was purged. They were executed. All of these happened with the approval of Stalin himself. The question then becomes: was Mao the Chinese Tito? Was he an Anglo-American agent and a terrorist hostile to the freedom movements?

For start, Mao made it clear that he had sympathized with Tito's gang in the struggle against the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies. Some may believe that Mao's praise for Tito was merely a series of diplomatic gestures aimed at buying time, or that Mao was under severe pressure from the Khrushchev gang to start embracing Yugoslavia even against his own will. This was indeed the case for some of the communist officials in the bloc, but it certainly does not apply to Mao and his group, for as Stalin rightly assessed, Mao was a Titoist, Mao and his group were allies of Anglo-American intelligence in the struggle against the socialist forces, and China did eventually become another Yugoslavia.

Stalin, the officials of the Peoples' Democracies, and the Yugoslav officials were by no means the only ones aware of Mao's Titoist character. Josephine Adams, a close Browderist friend of Earl Browder, stated that Browder had worked on Mao since as early as the Great Patriotic War, during the tenure of Mao and his group in Yan'an. Browder accurately believed that Mao was a bourgeois-nationalist and a Titoist that would seek to make China separate from the camp of the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies. Josephine Adams briefed the US Congress by stating:

Browder was on very good terms at that time with Mao Tse-tung. He had been interested in China in the past. And, of course, I may say for Browder the first rebellion against Stalin started with him. Tito came later. It was really instigated by Browder and went around the world. That I know, because I watched it happen. He was way ahead of the others. He had insight enough to know. I am bringing this in – it is extraneous, but I believe it has a connection here. Because he thought Mao Tse-tung was going to be the kind of Communist that Tito became, and he was very interested in him. In other words, he thought he would work out some kind of national movement in China that was not as much associated with the Soviet Union. And he was watching him with great interest for that reason. (SCOPE OF SOVIET ACTIVITY IN THE UNITED STATES, Subcommittee to Investigate the Administration of the Internal Security Act and Other Internal Security Laws of the Committee on the Judiciary, Washington DC, February 26, 1957) (IMG)

Mao Zedong remained hostile to the strategic relations and foreign policy line of the Stalin-era USSR. In 1964, he basically admitted that he opposed the Stalin-era USSR's foreign policy and regarded it as social-imperialist in character:

The places occupied by the Soviet Union are very many. In accordance with the Yalta Agreement, the Soviet Union, under the pretext of assuring the independence of Mongolia, actually placed that country under its domination. Mongolia covers an area much greater than that of the Kurile Islands. (...). They annexed a part of Rumania. They cut off a part of East Germany.... They cut off a part of Poland and included it in Russia, and as compensation gave Poland a part of East Germany. The same happened in Finland. They cut off everything that was possible to cut off. (Interview With The Japanese Socialists On The Theory Of The Intermediate Zone, Japanese journal Sekat Shuho, August 11, 1964, MIA) (IMG)

In that same interview, Mao seems to have praised the invasion of the United States and the rape of Vietnam and other East Asian countries by the 'Japanese people':

The Japanese people are a great people. They waged war with the United States, with England and France. They carried out the attack on Pearl Harbor; they occupied Vietnam, the Philippines, Thailand, Malaya, Indonesia. Their advance reached the eastern part of India. (Interview With The Japanese Socialists On The Theory Of The Intermediate Zone, Japanese journal Sekat Shuho, August 11, 1964, MIA) (IMG)

Was Mao supporting the colonization of the East Asian countries by Japan or was he insulting the 'Japanese people' by attributing to them such barbarity? Both? I will let the reader decide. Many years prior, so much for Mao's supposed struggle 'against' Japanese fascism, Mao had aimed to prioritize waging war against the KMT instead of fighting fascist Japan. When Chang Hsueh-Liang (Zhang Xueliang) launched a military coup to coopt Chiang Kai-Shek to abandon the conflict with the CCP and to wage war on fascist Japan, the USSR, Stalin himself included, supported the effort to coopt the KMT for the fight against Japan. Mao, on the other hand, was advocating the killing of Chiang Kai-Shek which would have provoked the prolonging of the KMT-CCP conflict, thus benefiting fascist Japan. Mao was deeply angered at Stalin for that move. This interesting episode in Mao's relations with Stalin in the 1930s and Mao's stance on the fight against fascist Japan is something worthy of further research through the archives.

Anyways, in a conversation with Yugoslav officials, Mao also said:

Before I met with Stalin, I did not have much good feeling about him. I disliked reading his works, and I have read only "On the Basis of Leninism," a long article criticizing Trotsky, and "Be Carried Away by Success," etc. I disliked even more his articles on the Chinese revolution. He was very different from Lenin: Lenin shared his heart with others and treated others as equals whereas Stalin liked to stand above every one else and order others around. (...). After I met with him, I became even more disgusted: I quarreled a lot with him in Moscow. Stalin was excitable by temperament. When he became agitated, he would spell out nasty things. (Mao's Conversation with a Yugoslavian Communist Union Delegation, Beijing, September 1956, Wilson Center, p. 5) (IMG)

Hence, as can be seen, Mao was someone that could be trusted by the imperialists in the efforts to contain the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies for he was hostile to what he portrayed as Stalin-era Soviet 'imperialism' and 'chauvinism'. One person who promoted Mao's group against the USSR was the US intelligence operative Anna Louise Strong. Anna Strong had been famously arrested in the Stalin-era USSR on charge of being an 'American agent'. The media of People's Czechoslovakia indicated that Anna Strong was a Tito agent:

She was arrested [by] the USSR in 1949 while attempting to return to North China after a visit to Tito. Prague radio hinted at the time that she was a Yugoslav spy.... (SOVIET REVERSAL OF CHARGES AGAINST ANNA LOUISE STRONG SEEN AS GESTURE TO PEIPING, CIA, p. 1) (IMG)

Remarkably, staff members in the CIA stated that Strong's Titoist/revisionist anti-Soviet propaganda made her:

a running-dog of American imperialism.... (INTELLIGENCE HIGHLIGHTS NO. 40 16 FEBRUARY - 23 FEBRUARY 1949, CIA, p. 14) (IMG)

There was no quotation marks around that phrase, nor could the quote be semi-sarcastic when one examines the context of the quote. In that excerpt, it was made clear that Anna Strong spread lies against the USSR. Anna Louise Strong promoted propaganda against the USSR and that CIA reference to her as 'a running-dog of American imperialism' came in that context. Anyways, long before her arrest, Anna Strong promoted the concept of the Yan'an Way – the Maoist way – and sought to encourage China to separate from the camp of the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies:

Miss Strong had frequently proclaimed Peiping's independence from Moscow and had advanced the "Yenan way" as the pattern for colonial Asia. (SOVIET REVERSAL OF CHARGES AGAINST ANNA LOUISE STRONG SEEN AS GESTURE TO PEIPING, CIA, p. 1) (IMG)

For further context on Yan'an, it is worth mentioning that during the Second World War,:

In July of 1944, one month after D-day in Europe, the U.S. Observer Group, including the OSS (the World War II precursor to the CIA), U.S. military personnel, and China Hands like John Service, flew into Yan 'an [where Mao was]. At that moment the interests of the Americans and Mao Zedong coincided; (The China Mirage: The Hidden History of American Disaster in Asia, James Bradley)

Officially, Anna Strong was portrayed as an American journalist and a communist sympathizer before being arrested by the Soviets as an American spy. During her visit to China, she spread lies and vicious slanders against the Soviets, lies that have been debunked in C18S2. In the document in which Strong was referred as the 'running-dog of American imperialism', the CIA made the following reports summarizing Strong's reports on Sino-Soviet relations:

According to Miss Strong, the Chinese Communists "acquired an empire in Manchuria" almost solely through their own efforts; while Soviet forces did capture the cities, that contribution was nullified by the fact that they installed his (CHIANG Kai-shek's) appointees ... and protected them there for months." Not content with mere obstructionism, the USSR attempted to sabotage the province economically: Manchuria was blockaded on three sides.... Not only no arms came over, but no even peaceful trade." As if that were not bad enough: "What help did Lin Piao get from the Russians? According to Lin Piao: 'No troops, no weapons, no advisors, nothing!'" Even more scandalous if not downright counterrevolutionary: "From the Russian-protected cities Chiang's officials instigated a civil war against the farmers of the countryside.... They (the Soviets) saved these officials from the Manchurian people." (In fact, the Soviet withdrawal was so managed as to allow the Chinese Communists to occupy Manchuria to ‘capture’ enormous quantities of Japanese materiel. (...) Miss Strong’s version is false.... (INTELLIGENCE HIGHLIGHTS NO. 40 16 FEBRUARY - 23 FEBRUARY 1949, CIA, p. 13) (IMG)

The CIA continues:

Miss Strong’s book makes Soviet designs in the border areas appear particularly nefarious, in that, by her account, the USSR did not assist, in fact impeded the Chinese communists in those regions. In Miss Strong’s reports, the Soviets refused to cooperate even in the operation of the Manchurian railway network in which the USSR is a treaty partner. Miss Strong, asking a group of Chinese railway workers why they did not get lubricants and spare parts from the USSR, learned that “‘We didn’t even ask. We knew they would refuse.’” In addition to the above, which might be construed by a hostile reader as indicating that the workers’ fatherland is both ungracious and pauperized, Miss Strong’s account goes so far as to reflect unfavorably on Soviet economic theory itself. She writes of the moderate Chinese Communist land reform that “‘every family felt the stimulus of free enterprise, knowing that there was freedom at last to advance...’” Still worse, after the Chinese Communist refusal to admit their debt to the Soviet economy, either in fact or in theory, it appears that they would not even grant the supremacy of Soviet military strategy. The Chinese Communist victories have “‘come from a unique organization of the armed forces and a remarkably realistic strategy worked out by Mao Tse-tung...’” Most incredible of all, the Chinese Communists were not always meticulous in acknowledging their obligation to their own spiritual ancestors. At a ceremony celebrating the founding of the Chinese republic there “‘were no pictures of Marx, Lenin, Stalin...’” And to Mao himself Miss Strong attributes a remark which is highly suspect: “‘The fight is between a democracy and anti-democracy, not between Soviet and anti-Soviet.’” (INTELLIGENCE HIGHLIGHTS NO. 40 16 FEBRUARY - 23 FEBRUARY 1949, CIA, p. 14) (IMG)

Another person who could correctly observe that China was on the same path as that of Yugoslavia was the ‘Iranian Tito’ and CIA agent Khalil Maleki who later participated in the 1953 coup (see C17S7). Homa Katouzian, a top scholar on Khalil Maleki, remarked (note: the square brackets in the following quote were by Katouzian):

as early as 1949, Maleki wrote:

I am not concerned with the details of Tito's policies, nor even his major policies which may well be open to criticism and about which I know very little. [I am only concerned with the view] that having regard to one's national self-interest is not in conflict with healthy and proper international relations.

The special reference to the Balkan countries in the above quotation was not accidental, for, surprisingly, Maleki also predicted a rift between Russia and China, despite the apparently solid bond that existed between them at the time, and for many years to come:

The movement that ... Mao Tse-tung now continues, will not in the end remain a satellite of the Soviet Union. Indeed it can be confidently predicted that similar developments to those of Yugoslavia will also take place in China. The forms which these developments will take will doubtless be different from what happened in Yugoslavia. But their substance would be similar resistance against [Soviet] pressures and expansionist behaviour.

(Khalil Maleki: The Human Face of Iranian Socialism, Homa Katouzian, 2018) (IMG)

Among most intelligence circles both in the imperialist camp and in the anti-imperialist camp, it was a well-known fact that Mao’s group would eventually follow the path of Tito’s group although the forms by which Mao’s group presented themselves was going to be different and was going to be in a fake ‘anti-revisionist’ clothing.

One of the key slanders launched by Mao against Stalin-era USSR was as follows;

They [i.e. the Soviets] did not permit China to make revolution: that was in 1945. Stalin wanted to prevent China from making a revolution, saying that we should not have a civil war and should cooperate with Chiang Kai-shek, otherwise the Chinese nation would perish. But we did not do what he said. (Speech at the Tenth Plenum of the Eighth Central Committee of the CPC (Sept. 24, 1962), CMTTP, p. 191. (Most of this passage is also in TMT, pp. 146-7.). In: Mao’s Evaluation of Stalin, massline.org. Note: the website ‘massline’ is a Maoist organization.) (IMG)

In spite of the generous assistance which the USSR had provided the Chinese communists (see C18S1), Mao Zedong slandered Stalin by asserting:

At the time of the War of Liberation, Stalin first enjoined us not to press on with the revolution, maintaining that if civil war flared up, the Chinese nation would run the risk of destroying itself. (ON THE TEN MAJOR RELATIONSHIPS: Speech at an enlarged meeting of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party, Mao Zedong, April 25, 1956) (IMG)

To the Yugoslav officials, Mao also said:

Stalin met with [Winston] Churchill and [Franklin D.] Roosevelt and decided to give the whole of China to America and Jiang Jieshi. In terms of material and moral support, especially moral support, Stalin hardly gave any to us.... (Mao’s Conversation with a Yugoslavian Communist Union Delegation, Beijing, September 1956, Wilson Center, p. 3) (IMG)

In 1964, Mao once again condemned Stalin, this time under the cover of ‘comradely criticism’ of Stalin:

Stalin ... made mistakes in dealing with Chinese problems, and they were no small mistakes. We are a great country of several hundred millions, and he opposed our revolution, and our seizure of power. We prepared for many years in order to seize power in the whole country, the whole of the Anti-Japanese War constituted a preparation. (TALK ON QUESTIONS OF PHILOSOPHY, Mao Zedong, August 18, 1964. In: SELECTED WORKS OF MAO TSE-TUNG, Vol. 9: years 1963-1971, 1st edition: 1994, p. 130) (IMG)

Those are interesting slanders launched by the man who said that China could industrialize only through ‘foreign capital’, particularly American investments and even including ‘the most conservative American businessman’:

Even the most conservative American businessman can find nothing in our program to take exception to.

China must industrialize. This can be done – in China – only by free enterprise and with the aid of foreign capital. Chinese and American interests are correlated and similar. They fit together, economically and politically. We can and must work together.

(Memorandum by the Second Secretary of Embassy in China (Service) of a Conversation With Mao Tse-tung, Yenan, August 23, 1944. In: ‘Subject: Interview with Mao Tse-tung’. Report by the Second Secretary of Embassy in China (Service), No. 15, Yenan, To: Commanding General, Fwd. Ech. USAF-CBI, APO 879, August 27, 1944. In: FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES: DIPLOMATIC PAPERS, 1944, CHINA, Vol. 6, 893.00/9-2844) (IMG)

Regardless of whether or not US economic involvement in China after the Great Patriotic War and during China's early NEP period was going to be beneficial to China, the remarks of Mao about Stalin allegedly seeking to give China to the United States are hypocritical. Mao also accused Stalin of not having faith in the Chinese people:

You [Russians] have never had faith in the Chinese people, and Stalin was among the worst. (Mao Zedong and Pavel Iudin, 22 July 1958 in Westad, ed., Brothers in Arms, pp. 348, 352, and CWIHP Bulletin 6-7 (Winter 1995/1996), pp. 155-159., Cited in: Wilson Center, One Finger's Worth of Historical Facts, p. 11) (IMG)

Mao's remarks are reminiscent of the remarks of his supporters who claim that those who condemn the Mao-era and Deng-era Chinese regime are 'Sinophobe' 'racists', 'orientalists' distrusting the people of China.

Later on, when Mao went to Moscow, Stalin did not receive Mao. In an interview with Feliks Chuev, Molotov said that Mao after having arrived in Moscow:

talked about meeting Stalin and when it would be convenient. (Molotov Remembers, Feliks Chuev, p. 81) (IMG)

Due to the disrespectful behaviour of Mao behind Stalin's back, the Soviet leader did not receive Mao:

Stalin hadn't received him for some days after he arrived. Stalin told me, "Go and see what sort of fellow he is." (Molotov Remembers, Feliks Chuev, p. 81) (IMG)

Mao himself stated:

Stalin ... was not willing to sign a treaty. After two months of negotiations he at last signed. When did Stalin begin to have confidence in us? (Speech at the Tenth Plenum of the Eighth Central Committee of the CPC (Sept. 24, 1962), CMTTP, p. 191. (Most of this passage is also in TMT, pp. 146-7.). In: Mao's Evaluation of Stalin, massline.org) (IMG)

Later, when I went to Moscow to sign the Sino-Soviet Treaty of Alliance and Mutual Assistance, we had to go through another struggle. (Speech at the Tenth Plenum of the Eighth Central Committee of the CPC (Sept. 24, 1962), CMTTP, p. 191. (Most of this passage is also in TMT, pp. 146-7.). In: Mao's Evaluation of Stalin, massline.org. Note: the website 'massline' is a Maoist organization.) (IMG)

It was Washington's goal to liquidate communists and to replace them with Titoists. China's ruling clique pursued such an agenda of American imperialism so as to stabilize the influence of the Titoist faction in China. Within China, the clash intensified between the communist faction headed by Kao Kang and Rao Shushi and the Titoist faction led by Mao Zedong, Zhou Enlai, Liu Shaoqi, and Deng Xiaoping. Mao himself admitted:

Some people opposed Lenin, saying that he was a dictator. Lenin's reply was straightforward: better that I should be a dictator than you! Stalin was very fond of Kao Kang and made him a special present of a motor car. Kao Kang sent Stalin a congratulatory telegram every 15 August. (Talks at the Chengtu Conference, Mao Zedong, March 1958) (IMG)

Mao told the Soviet Ambassador Pavel Yudin in 1954, that:

The basic content of the letter [to Stalin] was that apart from Gao Gang [alternative name for Kao Kang] himself, there wasn't a single good comrade in the Central Committee. Of course, Gao Gang was leading Kovalev when he characterized some members of the CC as pro-American in inclination and the others as anti-Soviet. It is clear that Gao Gang has had intentions of that sort for a long time. (From the Journal of Ambassador Pavel Yudin: Memorandum of Conversation with Mao Zedong, March 26, 1954) (IMG)

Kao Kang correctly noted to Stalin that the Central Committee of the CPC were Titoists. Mao accused Kao Kang of being a Soviet agent:

Are there such people in our country who provide foreigners with information behind the back of the Central Committee? I think there are. Kao Kang is a case in point. Many facts have proved this. (Speech at the Second Plenary Session of the Eight Central Committee of the Communist Party of China, November 15, 1956, Mao Zedong) (IMG)

In terms of the intra-Party power struggles in China, Mao Zedong's Cultural Revolution was famously launched and directed ostensibly 'against' Chinese revisionists Zhou Enlai and Liu Shaoqi – ostensibly. Kao and Rao sought to purge those whom Mao himself agreed were the main figureheads of Chinese Revisionism: Liu and Zhou. Yet, Mao's record shows that he rushed to defend those right-deviationists. Kao and Rao were planning to form an overt-level 'alliance' with Mao Zedong to combat Zhou Enlai and Liu Shaoqi. Understanding this, Mao sided with Zhou and Liu. According to the memorandum recording the conversation of the Soviet Ambassador with Mao:

Typical was this: having returned from Moscow Gao Gang did not go home, but immediately headed for the Beijing Hotel, where party workers who had come from the provinces on business were staying, and began to work on them. The Gao Gang-Rao Shushi anti-party group adopted this tactic for its underground activity: to avow support for Mao Zedong and Lin Biao, but struggling in the first instance against Liu Shaoqi and then against Zhou Enlai. "But of course," Mao remarked, "it's not a matter of names, but of the party and its unity." To my response that this was the usual tactic of factionalists, that to act openly against Mao was beyond their power, Mao replied that by hiding behind his name the factionalists had deceived many comrades and that was precisely why he (Mao Zedong) must swiftly and clearly state his point of view and show where he stood, otherwise "an epidemic of factionalism would quickly spread inside the party." When the Gao Gang affair was revealed, the majority of party members correctly understood the actions of the CC, but some of them could fairly charge it with sluggishness. In this connection Mao Zedong, half in jest, said, "Mao Zedong proposed Gao Gang for membership in the Politburo, and he named him as deputy chairman of the central government. Now the comrades are having to approve all sorts of measures in relation to the Gao Gang affair, and they are asking why the CC overlooked this matter. Mao replies that evidently it was because he was blind. Then the comrades ask how Mao can work if he has gone blind—to which Mao replies that he has now recovered his sight." (From the Journal of Ambassador Pavel Yudin: Memorandum of Conversation with Mao Zedong, March 26, 1954) (IMG)

When the Stalin faction was still dominant over the Soviet state, the USSR was able to strengthen the Kao Kang faction, whose social base was the industrial and hence proletarianized areas in China's north, to encircle and co-opt Mao Zedong into supporting Kao Kang's rise. With the decline of the Stalin faction, Mao 'recovered his sight' and was able to take action against his long-time foe.

Kao and Rao were purged. Officially, they were said to have committed suicide.

However, according to a Red Guard pamphlet during China's Cultural Revolution, Kao Kang:

was put to death... (Politics and Purges in China: Rectification and the Decline of Party Norms, 1950-1965, Frederick Teiwes, p. 526) (IMG)

Subsequently, Mao rewarded Liu Shaoqi with more power:

In the reorganization of the party structure at the Eighth Party Congress in September 1956, Mao Tse-tung delegated a substantial amount of political power to Liu (as the senior Vice-chairman of the newly established Standing Committee of the Politburo) and to Teng (as head of the Secretariat charged with "attending to the daily work of the Central Committee"). (FACTIONALISM IN THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE: MAO'S OPPOSITION SINCE 1949 (Reference Title: POLO XXVIII), CIA, p. II) (IMG)

Hence, the high-ranking Chinese 'Stalinists' were murderously eliminated after Stalin's death, and the Chinese Titoists headed by Mao, Liu, Zhou, and Deng emerged victorious. China was on the road of joining American Imperialism. In the absence of a strong Soviet support for the Chinese communists, the Titoization of China, at the time a predominantly agrarian petit-bourgeois country, was not very difficult.

In 1956, when Khrushchev had already given his infamous 'Secret Speech', Mao said:

During [Stalin's] time people's minds were so tightly controlled that even the feudalist control had been surpassed. While some enlightened feudal lords or emperors would accept criticism, [Stalin] would tolerate none. (Mao's Conversation with a Yugoslavian Communist Union Delegation, Beijing, September 1956, Wilson Center, p. 6) (IMG)

After the Sino-Russian Split, in order to contrast himself with his new Russian enemies led by Khrushchev, Mao opportunistically went so far as to adopt the banner of defending Stalin's legacy. To be fair, Mao did defend Stalin on some minor issues – but so did Khrushchev in his Secret Speech. Khrushchev defended Stalin on the anti-Trotsky campaign:

We must affirm that the party had fought a serious fight against the Trotskyites, rightists and bourgeois nationalists, and that it disarmed ideologically all the enemies of Leninism. This ideological fight was carried on successfully, as a result of which the party became strengthened and tempered. Here Stalin played a positive role. (The Crimes Of The Stalin Era, Special Report To The 20th Congress Of The Communist Party Of The Soviet Union, Nikita Khrushchev, p. 13, underline added)

The two leaders denounced Stalin as a dictatorial figure. In his famous piece to supposedly 'defend' Stalin, Mao said:

Stalin ... failed to rely upon the working class and the masses in the struggle against the forces of capitalism.... (On Khrushchov's Phoney Communism and its Historical Lessons for the World, Mao Zedong, July 1964, MIA) (IMG)

Mao completely distorted the picture, promoted strawman's fallacy, and denounced his opponents as 'dogmatic':

There are two kinds of Chinese: one kind is a dogmatist who completely accepts Stalin's line; the other opposes dogmatism, thus refusing to obey [Stalin's] instructions. (Mao's Conversation with a Yugoslavian Communist Union Delegation, Beijing, September 1956, Wilson Center, p. 3) (IMG)

Yet, as Mao admitted years prior to the Sino-Eurasian split, the Chairman's praise for Stalin was fake, and in reality, he never believed in his praise for the Soviet leader:

I have written altogether three pieces praising Stalin. The first was written in Yanan to celebrate his sixtieth birthday [21 December 1939—ed.], the second was the congratulatory speech [I delivered] in Moscow [in December 1949], and the third was an article requested by Pravda after his death [March 1953—ed.]. (...) When I was in Moscow to celebrate his birthday, what else could I have done if I had chosen not to congratulate him? Could I have cursed him instead? After his death the Soviet Union needed our support and we also wanted to support the Soviet Union. Consequently, I wrote that piece to praise his virtues and achievements. That piece was not for Stalin; it was for the Soviet Communist Party. As for the piece I did in Yanan, I had to ignore my personal feelings and treat him as the leader of a socialist country. Therefore, that piece was rather vigorous whereas the other two came out of [political] need, not my heart, nor at my will. Human life is just as contradictory as this: your emotion tells you not to write these pieces, but your rationality compels you to do so. (Mao's Conversation with a Yugoslavian Communist Union Delegation, Beijing, September 1956, Wilson Center, pp. 5-6) (IMG)

In 1956, Mao had said:

Some people have asserted in the past that China has no intention to be friends with other countries [of the Eastern Bloc], but wants to split with the Soviet Union, thus becoming a troublemaker. Now, however, this kind of people shrinks to only a handful in the socialist countries; (Mao's Conversation with a Yugoslavian Communist Union Delegation, Beijing, September 1956, Wilson Center, p. 4) (IMG)

Mao in fact did split with China's northern neighbour, contrary to Mao's earlier promisory remarks. What was the reason for this split? The narrative that Mao split with Khrushchev over Khrushchev's revisionism is a hoax. Mao actually agreed with Khrushchev on all the key questions of revisionism. For start, they were both strategically aligned and supportive of the Anglo-American agent Tito and the Yugoslav regime. On the economy and foreign policy, their position were very similar to each other's.

What follows is a documentation of the Mao clique's collaboration with Anglo-American imperialism and the Deng faction's expansion of such imperialist-collaborationism.

Mao's group was in cahoots with the Iranian regime, the regime of the SAVAK, the regime of the Shah. The martyr Bizhan Jazani, the founder and one of the primary theorists of the Organization of Iranian People's Fedai Guerrillas (OIPFG) and a former Tudeh Party activist, wrote:

After the establishment of relations between China and Iran, after the telling [as in: signifying something beyond the superficial] trips of the members of [Iran's] Royal Family to China and the observation of their welcoming, and in short after People's China outpaced the USSR in flirting with the horrific dictatorship of Iran, [the Maoists] tried to justify the new policy of China in the region by promoting the concept of 'the grave dangers of social-imperialism'.

When China announced that the menace of 'social-imperialism' is greater than imperialism and presented 'social-imperialism' as the number one threat to the world, when [China] ... calls for closer relations between Iran and Pakistan, when Chinese aid to Yemen, the Zofar movement, and the Eritrean movement ceases and in correlation with it, the Iranian armed forces take on the role of the gendarmerie in revolutionary Zofar at the behest of the imperialists, the apologists of China are faced with the task of choosing in between the anti-imperialist popular struggle and the continued acceptance of this incorrect policy line [promoted by China].

The government of China, for the purpose of its own interests and rivalry with the Soviet Union, a rivalry that has reached the point of enmity, seeks to reduce Soviet influence in the region via an alliance with the imperialists and their [comprador] allies. Now, under such a policy, what are the tasks of the peoples of the region? Are we under the yoke of 'social-imperialism' or are we under the yoke of America, England, and the others?

(A Struggle against the Shah's Dictatorship as the Major Imperialist Force and the Gendarme of the Region, Bizhan Jazani, Date: some time between 1971 to 1975, p. 79) (IMG)

In a 1972 conversation with Kissinger and Nixon, the Shah noted that Mao Zedong wanted a stronger Iranian regime and that Maoist China was a 'reliable friend' of the Iranian regime as shown in Pakistan (in which China, Iran, and USA collaborated against Bengalis and Indians):

"So you ascribe your success to staying ahead of the discontent?" the President asked. The Shah said "yes. Our farmers own their own land. As for the universities, we just put subversives into jail." The Shah even thought Mao wanted a strong Iran; he had the impression that the PRC preferred to have good ties with Iran. The Chinese were reliable friends, as they proved in Pakistan. The Empress was going to visit Peking. (Memorandum of Conversation, Tehran, May 31, 1972, Participants: Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, Richard Nixon, Henry Kissinger. In: 'FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES, 1969-1976', Vol. E-4, DOCUMENTS ON IRAN AND IRAQ, 1969-1972) (IMG)

For what it is worth, a memorandum of conversation between Ruhollah Khomeini and Arafat confirms the Chinese regime's support for the Shah. In this conversation, Ruhollah Khomeini told Arafat:

The Shah too relied on the United States, Britain, China, Israel, etc. But such a support could not possibly be strong. The only thing that can be so strong that one can rely upon it is Allah. God is the fulcrum. And I always advise him [i.e. Yasser Arafat] and my nation and his nation, to always keep God in mind.... Do not trust in material things, but trust in the divine. (Memorandum of Conversation with Yasser Arafat on the Victory of the Islamic Revolution and the Situation in Palestine, February 17, 1979) (IMG)

The Chinese regime's collaboration with the Iranian regime for support for Pakistan against India goes back to China's own history of strategic partnership with the ultra-reactionary pseudo-Islamic fascist government of Pakistan back in the 1960s:

In a report to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union on Sino-Pakistani relations on February 14, 1964, Mr. Suslov said: "The leadership apparatus of China, in addition to deteriorating its relations with India to an extraordinary level, has reached a point which, as you are aware, while not being a member of any official military pact, is practically an ally of Pakistan, a member state SEATO and CENTO, military pacts that pose a danger to the peace and security of the nations of Asia. The fact is that the leaders of China, by throwing away "all the revolutionary statements" of their own, have gone down a road which cannot be reconciled with the principled approach of the united front of the socialist countries in the struggle against the imperialist blocs. What can be said? The methods of the Chinese leaders about choosing their friend and ally is very strange. A question must be asked:

How can they dishonor and tarnish the socialist countries and the communist parties, and at the same time to flatter the reactionary regime of Pakistan right in front of the whole world? It is really incomprehensible. Would there be anyone who would believe that close relations with Pakistan is rooted in the interests of the progress and the development of the revolutionary struggles of the nations of Asia against imperialism, about which the Chinese leaders have stirred up controversy?"

(Suslov's Report, Persian translation, p. 27)

Indeed, what can be said! We ask, in particular, Mr. Suslov and the Central Committee of the Tudeh Party, which justifies Soviet policy: does anyone believe that approaching the Shah's regime and providing military and economic assistance to the Iranian government and political and propaganda support for the monarchy results in the advancement of the interests and the development of the struggle of the Asian nations against imperialism?!

(The Problems Facing the Iranian People's Anti-Colonial and Liberation Movement & the Most Critical Tasks of Iran's Communists in the Current Conditions, Bizhan Jazani, Autumn 1967. Reprinted by the: The Organization for the Unity of the Iranian People's Fedayeen, Winter 2003, pp. 13-14) (IMG)

During that time period, China had gone to war against India in order to overthrow the anti-imperialist government of the Nehru faction. Such hostile behaviour by the Chinese regime, the alliance with ultra-reactionary Pakistan and the hostility to the progressive bourgeois-democratic India, are cases in point demonstrating the criminal and pro-imperialist collaborationist character of Chinese strategic relations. China's alliance with Pakistan in the 1960s was an alliance with American imperialism. China's excuse for aggressing India was that India maintained relations with the Dalai Lama. The fact that India had diplomatic relations and diplomatically courted the Dalai Lama is not a legitimate reason for China launching an invasion against it, nor is it any 'proof' that India was behind the colour revolutionary agitations in Tibet in the 1950s. On the contrary, India was the country that advocated China's cause in the UN, lest one forgets. India's cultural and diplomatic relations with the Dalai Lama was an excellent opportunity to crack down on the pro-fascist and feudal forces which the Dalai Lama led in Tibet, for China could utilize India's soft power influence over and relations with the Tibetan religious reactionaries as a channel for intelligence penetration into the Tibetan reactionary forces. This is much like how the Stalin-era USSR rightly exercised its soft power influence and established excellent diplomatic relations with Israel as a channel for supporting the Arab-friendly progressive Israeli generals that had been catapulted into the ranks of the anti-Arab and reactionary Israeli regime. Through diplomatic relations with the Dalai Lama, India was not really 'siding' with the Tibetan rebels against China, just like how the USSR, by having relations with Israel, was not stabbing the Arabs in the back. In any case, by allying with the CIA-backed Pakistan, China allied with the CIA itself since the early 1960s. By the 1970s, China's alliance with American imperialism only became more official. In collaboration with the SAVAK and the CIA, China funded the regime of Yahya Khan, the regime that infamously launched a campaign of mass-slaughter of an estimated 3 million Bengalis and a rape of an estimated 400,000 Bengali women:

Prime Minister Chou: He also told us that he was taking good care of him and protecting him, and that if he didn't do so, some other generals would want to take care of him (Yahya) differently.

Of course we don't want to interfere in others' internal affairs, but Yahya really did not lead his troops in East Pakistan well. Even though we assisted with armaments, we didn't send a single military personnel, what the Soviet Union calls military adviser. We only sent some people to train in the use of the planes and guns we sent, and afterwards brought those people back. At the time of the ceasefire they (the Pakistanis) still had 80,000 troops in East Pakistan. It was not a situation in which they couldn't keep fighting.

Bourguiba, a staunch foe of Gamal Abdel-Nasser, hailed the Chinese stance on Pakistan:

Dr. Kissinger: We had a letter from Bourghiba expressing approval of your stand on India/Pakistan.

Prime Minister Chou: Even Bourghiba, who is considered to be a rightist, has supported Pakistan. As Chairman Mao mentioned yesterday, sometimes it is a good thing to be on the right.

For what it is worth, Sadeq Tabataba'i, a close relative of Ruhollah Khomeini and an official of the Islamic Republic of Iran, recalled that the SAVAK was promoting the views and ideas of Mao Zedong as early as 1970. The following is an excerpt of his memoirs published in the Islamic Republic's official website on the life of Ruhollah Khomeini:

THE SAVAK IS THE PROPAGATOR OF MAO'S VIEWS

SAVAK did not cease its activities. In 1970, a newspaper called "Parcham e Sorkh" ['Red Flag'] was published promoting Comrade Mao's ideas. In this publication to the differences comrades, it was strongly encouraged in the various and diverse communist organizations. Although the newspaper's affiliation with SAVAK was soon exposed, both through the type of content and through organizations affiliated with the confederation, it showed that the regime was also involved in creating organizations. The term has become popular and communist. The affiliated organizations mentioned above, although they competed and were hostile to each other, knew each other, so they were soon able to find traces of SAVAK in the "Red Flag". Another of SAVAK's activities was an incident that took place during the tenth congress of the Confederation (December 26, 1969 to January 5, 1970) in Karlsruhe. The congress was attended by about 400 representatives of the Confederate affiliates. The Union of Islamic Students Associations has sent a message to the above Congress; And appreciated the organization's struggles in support of the Muslim people of Iran and their struggles under the leadership of Ayatollah Khomeini.

(The Socio-Political Memoirs of Dr. Sadeq Tabataba'i, pp. 257-258) (IMG)

The case of the Maoists' espionage for the SAVAK is a very large case to examine and will not be examined here, but will be explored more in another book. However, it is worth mentioning that there have been numerous books written (in Farsi) about the espionage activities of the Maoists for the SAVAK. The espionage activities of the Maoists for the SAVAK goes back back to as early as the mid-1960s. During the 1970s, the SAVAK dispatched its intelligence agents to Lebanon via a Palestinian organization that was not officially self-described 'Maoist' but had very clear and explicit Maoist tendency. One of the major bases of the Maoists was Saddamite Iraq. The numerous Maoist grouplets and terrorist gangs were based in Iraq since the mid-1970s. The Iranian Maoists moved their main base to Iraq by the time of the 1979 revolution, although they cultivated a close alliance with Abu Nidal Organization and Saddam's Mukhaberat long before the 1979 revolution.

One of the most horrifying Maoization programs engineered by the SAVAK is with regards to the 'Shia Socialist' eclectic terrorist organization, the 'Mojahedin e Khalq' (MEK). Not many people are aware that the MEK used to be a secular Maoist organization for a while. In an operation often referred to as 'THE IDEOLOGICAL REVOLUTION', the SAVAK engineered a bloody terrorist campaign in which the MEK for a while became a 'secular' 'Marxist-Leninist' organization of the Maoist type. Through this program, the Maoists and Trotskyites jointly and systematically slaughtered the Shia Islamist anti-Shah warriors in the MEK. One of these Shia Islamist fighters murdered was a man named Sharif Waqefi, after whom the top Iranian university, the 'Sharif Institute of Technology', is named for his martyrdom. Later on in 1979, Mas'ud Rajavi, a SAVAK spy who pretended to oppose the Maoization of the MEK, was dispatched from the SAVAK prison and established another 'Shia socialist' eclectic terror organization, also named the MEK. Rajavi's MEK was parallel to the Maoist MEK. After the Islamic Revolution, the main intelligence base of the Maoists, the 'semi-Maoists', and the Rajavists was fascist Iraq, even though Maoist presence in fascist Iraq goes back to years before 1979.

No, the Maoist espionage for the SAVAK was not an aberration away from 'true Maoism'. It was and remains true Maoism itself. Nor was the SAVAK's extensive sponsorship of Maoism a coincidence. It reflected Mao's and China's collaboration with the Iranian regime.

The expansion of the Sino-American intelligence cooperation goes back to long before 1971. Note that during the 1960s the Kennedy Administration and the Johnson Administration both had many progressive-minded officials affiliated with the Roosevelt faction of the Democratic Party. There is no doubt that the influence of the pro-communist F. D. Roosevelt faction in the Democratic Party served as an obstacle against the Sino-American alliance. The rise of the Nixon-Kissinger group, which was under the minimal pressure of the Roosevelt-Kennedy-type Democrats, facilitated the consolidation of the Sino-American alliance. Had the Nixon-Kissinger group been in power since the early 1960s, the alliance with China would have come much earlier than 1970-1971.

Anyways, 1971 certainly marked a new stage in this process:

the White House in November 1971 set up a "back channel" to China through the Chinese delegation to the United Nations in New York. From that point until May 1973, Kissinger traveled secretly to New York about 20 times for talks with the head of the delegation, Huang Hua, later foreign minister. (INTELLIGENCE TIES ENDURE DESPITE U.S.-CHINA STRAIN, The Washington Post, George Lardner Jr., R. Jeffrey Smith, June 25, 1989) (IMG)

The Chinese and the Americans expanded military and intelligence cooperation with each other as early as 1972:

They usually met, Kissinger wrote in his memoirs, "in a CIA-provided 'safe house' in mid-Manhattan, a seedy apartment whose mirrored walls suggested less prosaic purposes." In the fall of 1972, Chinese military officials in New York, sources said, initiated another important contact, with Michael Pillsbury, a Mandarin-speaking U.N. bureaucrat who soon joined the Rand Corp. to work on highly classified research for the Air Force and Defense Department. He kept up his contacts with approval from the think tank and high-level U.S. officials, a fact that sources say had to be established at one point for skeptical FBI agents who kept watch on the Chinese delegation. Pillsbury met regularly with the Chinese -- a three-star general and his aides -- until 1976, sending a stream of still-classified memos to a select circle of U.S. officials, including Kissinger's office. (INTELLIGENCE TIES ENDURE DESPITE U.S.-CHINA STRAIN, The Washington Post, George Lardner Jr., R. Jeffrey Smith, June 25, 1989) (IMG)

In February 24, 1973, Mao met with Henry Kissinger. Mao made it clear that he supported the US military occupation of Europe:

Dr. Kissinger: Yes, but we will do our best to strengthen European defenses and keep our armies in Europe.

Chairman Mao: That would be very good.

(My Meeting with Chairman Mao, Memorandum for The President from Henry A. Kissinger, February 24, 1973. I would like to thank my friend Lorant Szabo for sending me the source for this.) (IMG)

Zhou Enlai ('Chou Enlai') too supported NATO and the US agenda throughout the world including in Chile:

—[Chou] thought we should come closer to Japan on defense matters (i.e., the nuclear umbrella) and indicated he agreed that it was preferable for us to join the Japanese in Siberian development than to leave them alone. I emphasized the importance of keeping the Japanese tied to us and not subjected to too many pressures.

—Chou criticized Allende's rashness in Chile and Che Guevara's adventurism. In response to my comments, he in effect said that the PRC would not cause trouble in Latin America.

—I went over our Soviet strategy in some detail, including our rationale for the agreement which you had used during the Middle East alert. He continually sounded their by now familiar preoccupations.

—Chou strongly supported NATO and our troop presence in Europe. He said he would continue to educate European leaders, beginning with Heath who will visit Peking soon.

(SUBJECT: My Visit to China: Memorandum From the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs (Kissinger) to President Nixon, Washington, November 19, 1973. In: 'China, 1973-1976', US State Department, p. 438) (IMG)

China formed an alliance with the US, Japan, and pro-American countries in Europe:

Confirmation and deepening of the close identity between you and the Chinese leaders' strategic perspectives on the international situation. As I pointed out after my February 1973 trip, we have become tacit allies. We share essentially the same views about the Soviet strategy (though the Chinese are firmly convinced of Soviet hegemonial ambitions while we still hold out the possibility that our combination of firmness and negotiation can steer Moscow on a constructive course); the necessity of a strong American world role and defense capability; and the strategic importance of Europe, Japan, the Middle East, and the Near East–South Asia axis. (SUBJECT: My Visit to China: Memorandum From the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs (Kissinger) to President Nixon, Washington, November 19, 1973. In: 'China, 1973-1976', US State Department, p. 431) (IMG)

Indeed, Mao seemed basically optimistic about containing the Soviet Union, citing his familiar axis of potential or tacit allies in China, Japan, the United States, Europe and the Near East–South Asia axis. He again stressed the importance of our working closely with these countries—maintaining close ties with Japan; keeping our military presence in Europe; and countering Soviet influence in the Middle East (as we were now doing), Pakistan, Iran, India, the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean. I outlined our efforts to support these various countries; offset Soviet influence; maintain a strong national defense; keep forces in Europe; anchor Japan securely, etc. (SUBJECT: My Visit to China: Memorandum From the President's Assistant for National Security Affairs (Kissinger) to President Nixon, Washington, November 19, 1973. In: 'China, 1973-1976', US State Department, p. 436) (IMG)

China's regime and the Anglo-American imperialists fostered military relations with each other since the Mao era, not since after Mao's death. The British military provided the arms to Mao-era China in 1975 and the Americans did not veto this deal:

Before leaving office as secretary of state, Kissinger took the first steps toward sharing, persuading President Gerald R. Ford in 1975 not to veto a $200 million British deal with China for military jet engines and in 1976 secretly approving a U.S. sale of two advanced computers with military applications. (INTELLIGENCE TIES ENDURE DESPITE U.S.-CHINA STRAIN, The Washington Post, George Lardner Jr., R. Jeffrey Smith, June 25, 1989) (IMG)

Mao and his gang were indeed militarily sponsored by the MI6. Not for nothing did Stalin regard Mao as a Titoist, and China as another Yugoslavia.

China and Yugoslavia were allies. Hoxha testified:

Mao Tsetung ... expressed his great desire to meet Tito. Tito himself declared recently: "I was invited to China when Mao Tsetung was alive. During the visit of the Chairman of the Federal Executive Veche, Djemal Myedich, to China, at that time, Mao Tsetung expressed to him his desire that I should visit China. Chairman Hua Kuofeng also told me that, five years ago, Mao Tsetung said that he should have invited me for a visit, stressing that in 1948, too, Yugoslavia was in the right, a thing which he (Mao Tsetung) had declared even then, to a narrow circle. But, taking into consideration the relations between China and the Soviet Union at that time, this was not said publicly". (From Tito's speech at the meeting of activists of the SR of Slovenia, September 8, 1978). (Imperialism and the Revolution, Enver Hoxha)

A document declassified by the US State Department confirmed Hoxha's remarks on the Sino-Yugoslav alliance:

Minister Huang: President Tito is the only survivor of the leaders of the Second World War, who led the people in the fight against fascism. Now he is already 85. President Tito expressed the desire to visit Chairman Mao long ago. Chairman Mao had high regard for President Tito. When the Foreign Minister visited China, in 1975, Chairman Mao passed his high regards to Tito. His name means the same as iron, and Mao described him as strong as iron. So, when President Tito came, we paid him a warm welcome. (SUBJECT: Secretary's Dinner for PRC Foreign Minister Huang: Memorandum of Conversation, New York, September 28, 1977. In: 'Foreign Relations of the United States: Diplomatic Papers, 1977-1980', Vol. XIII, US State Department, p. 248) (IMG)

The alliance between Mao's group and Tito's group goes back to as early as 1956 when Mao explicitly endorsed the Yugoslav regime's efforts against the USSR. However, China and Yugoslavia for a while posed as 'enemies' – until 1968. In 1968, China joined the butcher of Kosovo in condemning the Warsaw Pact intervention in Czechoslovakia. A document co-written by Colonel Donald W. Bernier – the former Director of Foreign Intelligence Office of the Assistant Chief of Staff for Intelligence in the US Department of the Army – stated:

Chinese-Yugoslav relations remained [ostensibly] hostile until mid-1968 when the Peking government suddenly quieted its anti-Yugoslav propaganda. In early 1969 the Chinese invited Yugoslavia to send representatives to Peking to discuss the restoration of political and economic relations, and in February the two countries concluded a trade agreement. Belgrade sources indicated that the resumption of full diplomatic relations was imminent in mid-1970. Initiated by the Chinese, the reconciliation came at a time when both governments were under renewed pressure from the Soviet Union. (Area Handbook for Yugoslavia, Gordon McDonald, Donald Bernier, September 1970, p. 285) (IMG)

A document by the US Air Force confirmed that China and Yugoslavia cultivated ties for a military alliance:

since 1969 Chinese leaders have come to value Belgrade's tenacious independence. (...). The resumption of Sino-Yugoslav contacts in the spring of 1969 through the medium of trade was clearly prompted by anti-Soviet motives, and the cessation of Chinese polemics and a generally warmer atmosphere soon led to the exchange of ambassadors in June 1970.⁸⁸ Just one year later, the Yugoslav Foreign Minister Mirko Tepavac visited Peking. The process of normalizing Sino-Yugoslav relations has been marked by the exchange of economic and cultural delegations, including the perhaps inevitable table tennis teams. By October 1974 things had improved to the point where a Yugoslav army delegation led by Lt. General Branko Jokovic, Vice-Chief of the General Staff of the Yugoslav People's Army visited Peking to "enhance cooperation between the armies of Yugoslavia and China and friendship between the two peoples."" A year later, in October 1975, Premier Djemal Bijedic visited China amidst a flurry of publicity. Mao Tse-tung received the premier and even conveyed his regards to Tito. Vice-Premier Teng Hsiao-p'ing's welcome speech lauded Yugoslavia's adherence to a policy of nonalignment.... (THE SOVIET THEATER NUCLEAR OFFENSIVE, Office of Director of Defense Research and Engineering & Defense Nuclear Agency, US Air Force, Joseph Douglass, Jr., p. 63) (IMG)

Some would argue that Mao Zedong was 'forced' by the 'revisionist majority' in the Politburo, Central Committee, etc. to make 'concessions' to the American imperialists, that by the early 1970s, Mao had become a 'puppet' of Zhou Enlai and Deng Xiaoping. This kind of an argument reflects a poor understanding of how being a puppet looks like. First of all, had Mao been opposed to collaboration with American imperialism, then Mao would not have survived until 1976. He would have died a 'natural' death. Such a massive level of collaboration with American imperialism could only possibly occur with the agreement of a large part of the Chinese state apparatus with the CIA, and such a pervasive CIA influence would have annihilated the first alleged 'obstacle' to the CIA-collaborationists: the allegedly 'anti-imperialist' Mao Zedong. This would have taken either the form of Mao resigning due to 'poor health' or 'aging'. Alternatively, it would have taken the form of Mao being given an extra-'exalted' position devoid of any real power. Alternatively, it would have taken the form of Mao dying 'naturally' or in an 'accident'. None of these occurred, and Mao survived politically and physically all the way until 1976; a 4-5 year period (from 1971-1972) is way too long a survival for an anti-imperialist leader so highly encircled by pro-imperialist elements.

A supplementary point to mention is that when a leader disapproves of the other government officials' treasonous collaboration with the enemy, such a leader would often refuse to meet the enemy officials who have arrived to one's country; or if having to meet with these officials, such a leader would deliberately signal his/her unease to the world media through facial expressions that signal unease or anger. Mao showed no such signals. On the contrary, he was extremely happy as demonstrated by Kissinger's memorandum and by the photos. If the 'revisionist majority' were able to 'force' Mao to even signal such a great approval of the treasonous collaboration, then again, the 'revisionist majority' would have certainly been so powerful as to ensure that Mao gets demoted or dies. This point about signals does not prove anything, for signals are not concrete evidence. Nonetheless, the point about signals is useful as a supplementary point for the remarks about how Mao survived for so long until 1976.

Nor could there be any motivation on the side of Deng and Zhou to keep Mao in his official position for the purpose of pursuing their agenda while 'hiding behind' Mao's 'charisma'. Deng and Zhou had no shame in pursuing their agenda out in the open, and Mao by then lacked charisma due to such anti-Chinese crimes as the 'Great Leap Forward' and the 'Cultural Revolution'.

Describing the mood of Mao Zedong in the meeting with Henry Kissinger, Kissinger reported:

Mentally [Mao] was extremely impressive, improving his previous performances. He led the conversation, covered all major international issues with subtlety and incisiveness and an unerring knack at striking the essential chords in a seemingly casual way. By the time he was finished he had sketched their strategic vision comprehensively and laid down the essential elements of their policies region by region. He went from issue to issue in an ostensibly random, but always purposeful, manner. And all of this was done without a single note of his own or prompting by Chou, who once again was clearly deferential in his presence.

The Chairman obviously enjoyed himself. Throughout he employed his earthy phrasing and bawdy humor to illustrate a point or color a tone; the females present laughed easily, almost coquettishly and were again at ease in his presence. After the conversation had gone beyond one and three quarters hours, several on the Chinese side looked at their watches and made tentative moves to close out the meeting, but Mao prolonged the talk and toward the end engaged in exchanges on philosophy.

Indeed one of the striking aspects of the visit was the fact that this time Mao presented the bulk of the Chinese positions while Chou generally stuck to details and asking questions and making comments on our positions. Before, Chou had taken his cue from Mao but made extensive substantive presentations of his own.

The Chairman was vigorously supportive of you as I have reported. He praised your strong policies, singling out the recent alert and Middle East policy generally. He found your actions much firmer and steadier than the Cuban missile crisis scenario. Another argument that some seek to push for in order to justify Mao's crimes is that China needed the approval of the US for replacing Taiwan as the legitimate representative of China. Helping the CIA in destroying so many countries just to prove to America that China, a very large country, is more worthy than a small island in the Pacific – there are no words available to describe the pettiness and foolishness of such a 'justification' of the crimes committed by China's government. However, even if in the impossible-case scenario, such a point was legitimate, it is still not so empirically correct, because the issue with regards to China was not and could not have been Mao's main priority. Kissinger recalled:

Mao was both patient and somewhat inscrutable on Taiwan and diplomatic relations. He said that the Taiwan issue "is not an important one; the issue of the overall international situation (i.e., the Soviet Union) is an important one." the PRC would not rush us on this question or that of diplomatic relations, he stated. (SUBJECT: My Visit to China: Memorandum From the President's Assistant for

Left: Mao with Kissinger – as Kissinger correctly described, Mao was exhilarated for his meeting with Kissinger. To the world media, Mao was not facially signalling disapproval of Zhou's or Deng's meetings with the US officials.

National Security Affairs (Kissinger) to President Nixon, Washington, November 19, 1973. In: 'China, 1973-1976', US State Department, p. 436) (IMG)

Mao's priority was not Taiwan. Mao's priority was with regards to assisting Anglo-American finance capital, the kulaks, the corrupt bureaucrats, etc. to conquer the world; to this end, he collaborated with American imperialism. The favorable attitude towards the CIA goes back to decades earlier when he sympathized with Tito's cause in the fight against the Soviet Union. The military collaboration with Anglo-American imperialism expanded from the 1960s, since the time of China's alliance with comprador Pakistan and its hostile action against India.

Nor did the Eurasians seek to launch a nuclear strike on China; recall the following excerpt of a CIA document:

In the strongest public threat to use nuclear weapons against China ever made by Khrushchev, he warned that it would be "dangerous" to encroach on Soviet borders "given up-to-date weapons of annihilation" in the Soviet arsenal (speech of 15 September 1964). His policy was thus now to "rattle" nuclear weapons toward China, as he had done in the past to many other countries.

However, Mao and his lieutenants were able, given this clearly marked pattern of Khrushchev's behavior, to distinguish a bluff from a real threat of imminent attack. Chinese perception of the credibility of a Soviet threat was highly context-dependent, keyed to the positioning of Soviet forces. Khrushchev had failed to frighten the Chinese into ceasing their border probes because he had not made his threats sufficiently credible, either by deploying tactical nuclear weapons or by a big conventional buildup of regular forces on the frontier.

(THE CHINESE ASSESSMENT OF THE SOVIET MILITARY THREAT, CIA, April 1975, pp. 5-6) (IMG)

Baseless is the argument that the Soviet 'plan' to launch a nuclear-strike on China 'forced' Mao to collaborate with American imperialism. Lastly and above all, Mao's pro-American views are proven by his hostile attitude towards the Stalin-era USSR and his favorable attitudes towards the CIA-MI6 agent Tito and the latter's fascist gang; such attitudes existed in Mao as early as the 1940s and came fully out in the open by the 1970s; the policies of Mao in the 1970s are mere reflections of Mao's views in the 1940s.

Until the early 1990s, China's regime was dominated by the comprador classes – such as bureaucrats and kulaks – allied to finance capital, the Titoist spies of the American secret service. China was allied to all the CIA-sponsored fascist forces in Latin America, including the Pinochet junta. China was allied to the regimes of Sadat, Mubarak, and Nimeiri, to the South African Apartheid and the Titoist gang of Siad Barre, to NATO and the West Germany dominated by the Nazi BND, and to the MI6. One needs not mention China's invasion of Vietnam and the support for the Khmer Rouge. All of these facts have been confirmed by Fidel Castro. Interestingly, ignorant of Fidel Castro's stance on China's regime, the modern-day apologists for Deng also have acknowledged Fidel Castro as an anti-imperialist. Hence, the remarks of Castro will be presented here as evidence (and after reading this, the apologists for Deng will probably denounce Fidel Castro as 'pro-imperialist' 'Hoxhaist' 'orientalist' 'Sinophobe' and 'CIA agent'). Fidel Castro remarked:

We would not be honest if we denied that the progressive and revolutionary movement itself is in serious trouble. The disgusting betrayal of the cause of internationalism perpetrated by the Chinese leaders, their insane political conduct and their shameless alliance with the imperialist powers have been a severe blow to the progressive forces of the world.

Viet Nam, Angola and Cuba, small countries that gained a solid and recognized prestige in the world for the heroic pages they wrote and still write in their determined, firm and unwavering struggle against imperialism today suffer brutal attacks, hostility and slander campaign of the treacherous Chinese leadership. In the case of our own homeland, after almost 20 years of aggression and harassment by the United States, which failed to bring it to its knees, we see today the incredible and infamous fact that the current Chinese leadership justifies the economic blockade of Cuba and the presence of a Yankee naval base in our territory.

Between the imperialist cable [news] agencies [such as CNN] and those of China, there is absolutely no difference in their foul and intriguing language, in their perfidious and vicious arguments to attack Cuba. Soviet collaboration, which was so decisive for the consolidation and survival of the Cuban Revolution in its most critical years, when the imperialists seized the sugar markets from us and cut off our supplies of food, medicine, fuel, spare parts and essential raw materials, is vilely maligned [in Chinese regime media]. Together with the decisive economic support received, we Cubans will never forget that the weapons with which we defended ourselves in Girón against the imperialist aggressors were weapons supplied by the Soviets (APPLAUSE). And if the United States could not commit genocide against Cuba, with direct aggression, this is largely due to the solidarity and support of the USSR. The historical facts cannot be so blatantly denied. The human word was devised for more noble ends.

The internationalist policy of Cuba, the unlimited generosity of our people, whose children fought in Angola against South African racists to prevent them from taking away from their people the independence they won with 15 years of heroic struggle, and our solidarity in the fight against the Ethiopian Revolution against foreign aggression, promoted by the United States, the NATO powers and the Arab reaction, are described by the Chinese leaders in the same crude, vulgar and even worse terms than those of the [official] spokesmen of imperialism, in ways more subtle, less downright liars.

(...). Ever since they turned a ridiculous mortal [Mao Zedong] into a god in the People's Republic of China, destroyed the party and its best cadres in the days of the mad adventure of the Cultural Revolution and allowed themselves to be carried away by the petty bourgeois spirit and great-power chauvinism, which led them to betray internationalism and to the conversion of a socialist state into a nepotic satrapy, where the rulers' wives and sons-in-law became members of the Political Bureau, everything was made possible.

What surprise is there that the Chinese government today supports the fascist and bloodthirsty regime of Pinochet and the repressive and reactionary military governments of Latin America?

What surprise is there that [China's government] collaborated with Mobuto and with NATO interventionist forces? Why be surprised that it joined South Africa against Angola; Somalia in its aggression against the Ethiopian Revolution; [the Sadat-Mubarak regime in] Egypt in its policy of separate peace and surrender; to the conservative and reactionary forces of England [i.e. MI6] and the Federal Republic of Germany; to NATO in Europe; to Yankee imperialism everywhere; and to bet rudely and dangerously [China's role in] the inevitability of a third world war?

But of the crimes of the Chinese leadership, the most reprehensible is its hostility to Viet Nam. Everyone knows that behind Cambodian extremism is Maoism and the Chinese ruling clique. No one is unaware that they are behind the provocations against Viet Nam. Nobody ignores that it is they who are behind the artificially-created so-called 'Hoa problem'. A whole great chauvinistic propaganda campaign is currently being developed in China against the Vietnamese and all economic collaboration has been suspended. In this criminal and unscrupulous way the Vietnamese effort to rebuild the country cruelly devastated by the imperialist war is sabotaged.

These attitudes of the Chinese government remind us of the Yankee arrogance against Cuba. In the first years of the Revolution, the imperialists also tried to bring ships without our authorization to transport Yankee citizens; They promoted the emigration of tens of thousands of Cubans, essentially professionals, specialists, and skilled workers; They launched a colossal smear campaign against Cuba and adopted severe economic blockade measures.

Viet Nam, the homeland of the most modest and consistent Marxist-Leninist of our time, the unforgettable and beloved Ho Chi Minh (applause); Viet Nam, the a thousand times heroic people whose patriotic and revolutionary feats astonished the world, is also today a victim of Chinese aggression and betrayal.

Days ago the cables reported violations of the Viet Nam border by squadrons of Chinese military aircraft. If the criminal hand is not stopped in time, we will witness more serious military provocations and aggressions by China against the heroic Viet Nam. That is why we must offer the people of Viet Nam our most determined solidarity and support (EXTENDED APPLAUSE). Our Party intends to reactivate the Solidarity Committees with Viet Nam against the threats of imperialist aggression, implemented this time, however absurd it may seem, through its new and brand-new allies in the field of counterrevolution.

Contempt for peoples, norms and principles has to have a limit, it has to stop at some point, it has to really meet a resistance in the universal conscience.

Not even Albania, a small socialist country that supported it in the initial days of the division of the revolutionary movement, follows China today. The economic collaboration was also withdrawn from her.

The Chinese people themselves, hardworking, combative, self-sacrificing, heroic and revolutionary, will sooner or later settle accounts with the traitors who have laid down their beautiful internationalist flags at the feet of imperialism.

That China's regime was extensively collaborating with the CIA-backed fascist forces around the world is voluminously backed up and corroborated by CIA-sponsored sources, by the Islamic Republic of Iran, and other sources.

To knowingly and willingly allow the CIA to establish a base for military intelligence-gathering in one's own territory constitutes a form of espionage for the CIA. This Deng Xiaoping and his group pursued wholeheartedly. In collaboration with Joe Biden, the American spy Deng Xiaoping and his group promoted the presence of the CIA bases in China as part of the efforts for gathering military intelligence on the Soviets and on any pro-Soviet opposition force that could exist in Chinese territory:

However, a senior administration official, speaking on condition that he not be identified, said in an interview last week that intelligence-sharing has been part of a substantial U.S. "investment" in China since President Richard M. Nixon's historic 1972 visit opening new ties to the West. The official said both countries had profited from this investment and "it is that which we have to balance against our current, justified outrage" over recent Chinese actions. A number of diplomats, legislators and officials said they think the U.S.-China intelligence connections are relatively secure, barring a full-scale trade embargo or a break in diplomatic relations. "The relationship has been mutually useful," said one retired U.S. diplomat. "Both sides have taken care to isolate that cooperation from the ups and downs" of political ties. Knowledgeable sources, who assert that the United States gains more than China does from the intelligence ties, praise President Bush for his relatively low-key reaction to the executions in China and his emphasis on maintaining the U.S.-China "strategic relationship." They said a less measured response could jeopardize the arrangements. But several congressional sources familiar with the ties contend that they are not important enough to muzzle official U.S. criticism of Beijing's behavior, partly because the United States in recent years has developed alternative sources for some of the information. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), for example, declined to discuss any aspects of the partnership but said, "Whatever military or intelligence arrangements may or may not exist, they cannot add up to a sufficient rationale for failing to act swiftly and on principle with the Chinese government." It was Biden's 1979 conversation with senior Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping during a visit to Beijing that showed Deng's willingness to permit the U.S.-equipped listening posts to help monitor Soviet compliance with the proposed SALT II arms limitation treaty. Deng, The Washington Post reported at the time, made clear that the monitoring stations would have to be run by the Chinese and that Beijing would share the collected data with Washington. The tapes are analyzed in the United States. White House and State Department spokesmen have declined in recent weeks to comment directly on the status of the listening posts or other intelligence ties. At a news conference June 5, however, Bush characterized U.S. Ambassador James R. Lilley as "one of the best listening posts we have in China." Lilley, an old friend of Bush, was the Central Intelligence Agency station chief in China in the mid-1970s when Bush headed the U.S. liaison office there. Several sources indicated that U.S. experts are working at the stations in tandem with their Chinese counterparts and that there now may be more than two stations. "It depends on how you count them," a longtime intelligence expert said. And a former defense official said, "It may very well be that there are principal stations and lesser stations." The intelligence expert said the Chinese "may be doing the low-tech while we do the high-tech" functions. He added: "They might tell us to get out. We have lost facilities in other countries because of political change. But I think it would be one of the last relationships {with China} to go. It was one of the first to arrive." U.S. intelligence-sharing with China goes back to 1971 when Henry A. Kissinger, then White House national security adviser, secretly flew to Beijing to pave the way for Nixon and showed "internal {U.S.} studies" to Premier Zhou Enlai. After the 1979 overthrow of the Iranian regime, the CIA and NATO intelligence bases that existed in Kapkan, Iran, were transferred to China for espionage against the Soviets. In particular, the CIA bases were established in Xinjiang. A Military Review journal based in the Russian Federation stated:

Special mention should be made of the EWS radar located on the outskirts of the town of Korla in the Xinjiang Uygur Autonomous Region. Very interesting history the appearance of this object. After the overthrow of Shah Mohammad Riza Pahlavi in January 1979, American intelligence stations in Iran were eliminated. In this regard, amid the aggravation of relations between the USSR and the PRC, the Americans secretly proposed to create posts in China to monitor Soviet missile tests conducted in Kazakhstan. In Soviet times, this Union republic was home to the Sary-Shagan missile defense range and the Baikonur cosmodrome, where, in addition to launching launch vehicles, ballistic missiles and anti-missile systems were tested.

The official agreement between the two governments was concluded in 1982. Initially, the United States offered to place American stations on Chinese territory on lease terms. The Chinese leadership insisted that the joint facilities be managed by the PRC, and the operation was conducted in complete secrecy. CIA stations were based in Korla and Tsitai. Missile launches were tracked using radars and by intercepting radio telemetry signals. After the events in Tiananmen Square in 1989, Sino-American cooperation in this area was curtailed, but the intelligence stations, which now functioned only in the interests of China, continued their work.

The Washington Post stated:

The electronic listening posts, at Qitai and Korla in Xinjiang Autonomous Region, were set up in 1980 after the loss of two in Iran. CIA Director Stansfield Turner nailed down some final details on a secret visit to Beijing, complete with disguise, shortly before leaving office. The stations produce better information than those in Iran did concerning Soviet missile tests at Tyuratam and Saryshagan, the sources said. John Pike, an analyst at the Federation of American Scientists, characterized the Saryshagan weapons research center roughly 700 miles to the northwest as "right across the street, electronically speaking." The Reagan administration, despite initial tensions over Taiwan, extended its cooperation to arms sales and dual-use technology. The sources said that China, meanwhile, began selling the CIA most of the small arms it needed for the Afghan rebels. U.S. officials declined to say whether the Bush administration has been holding up its end of the intelligence-sharing relationship since the Tiananmen Square massacre of students three weeks ago. But a knowledgeable source stated without hesitation that "I don't have a high level of concern" about a possible halt in cooperation because of recent official U.S. criticism. "That's not a front-burner issue between our governments and nothing has happened {so far} to push it there," said the official, who is privy to current intelligence reports on the subject. U.S. intelligence-sharing and military ties with China developed slowly, in part because of the Watergate scandal that engulfed Nixon. The espionage relationship between Deng's group and the CIA was of course in continuation of the project initiated by Mao Zedong and his gang for the purpose of promoting CIA interests in China. During their intelligence activities for the United States, the American spy Deng and his fascist group were also sponsored militarily by the United States. The US Arms Control and Disarmament Agency confirmed:

We are now in the seventh year of American military exports to China—exports which began in 1981 as a result of an overall liberalization of U.S. trade policy toward Beijing and continued in 1986 with the signing of a multi-million dollar avionics package to upgrade the Chinese F-8 air defense interceptor.

Until the 1980s China was proscribed by U.S. policy from receiving any military items whatsoever. Americans had spilled blood in combat against Chinese forces in Korea, had fought in part to contain China in a long and bitter war in Vietnam, and were not about to assist militarily a real or potential enemy. By the late 1970s, however, what had begun years earlier with the Sino-Soviet split and the subsequent opening to China under the Nixon Administration, crystallized into a major strategic realignment of China. Beijing not only normalized relations with the United States and other Western nations, but also further distanced itself from Moscow in wide areas of human endeavor-political, economic and military.

These sweeping changes soon impacted strongly on American arms transfer policy. In March 1980, the Department of State issued Munitions Control Newsletter No. 81 (MC81), opening the People's Republic of China for the first time to exports of combat support equipment such as trucks, recovery vehicles, certain cargo/personnel-type aircraft and helicopters, some training and communications equipment, and airborne cameras. The following month, the licensing of civilian goods with possible military use (so-called dual-use items) was facilitated by the creation of a new and unique category, P, for China under commodity control export regulations administered by the Department of Commerce.

The new policy permitted exports at a significantly higher level of technology than those for most other communist countries, although certain important restrictions were established:

Approval is not likely when the potential military application is so significant that the export would present an unacceptable risk regardless of the stated end-use. Of particular concern are technologies that would make a direct and significant contribution to nuclear weapons and their delivery systems, electronic and antisubmarine warfare and intelligence gathering.

In subsequent years, the liberalization process continued, highlighted by the removal of China in 1981 from the list of those countries for which it is U.S. policy to deny approval for munitions list exports....

(Underlying Patterns of American Arms Sales to China, Henry J. Kenny, reprint of an essay originally published by the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in its report, World Military Expenditures and Arms Transfers, 1986, dated April 1987, p. 61) (IMG)

The military and espionage collaboration with the CIA was in part aimed at assisting US intelligence in its war against the Red Army and the central government in Afghanistan. Through this military intelligence cooperation, the American spy Deng actively aided Afghanistan's Al-Qaeda terrorists:

Soviet-U.S. relations worsened in December 1979 when the Soviets invaded Afghanistan, on the eve of a projected trip to China by Defense Secretary Harold Brown. Deng had already made his public offer of Chinese-operated listening posts and, sources said, Brown picked up the discussion on his arrival in January 1980. Another goal of Brown's visit was to win what one official described as a "significant acceleration" in Chinese shipments of arms and military equipment to the Afghan rebels, shipments that continued to grow under President Ronald Reagan. Washington considered the shipments of Soviet-style arms highly valuable because they afforded "deniability" for what was then a largely covert U.S. operation. Both China and the United States bought small arms for the rebels, sources said. They said the United States initially paid to transport China's supplies of arms to rebel bases in Pakistan, and beginning around 1983, the CIA began purchasing most of its own supplies directly from Beijing. The two governments agreed to establish the seismic monitoring posts as part of an "earthquake prediction" program supervised by the U.S. Geological Survey, but funded largely by the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency. A 1986 Pentagon budget document said the stations would improve identification of underground Soviet nuclear blasts and estimates of their explosive force. Construction of five primary stations, including one that is closer to the Soviet test site than any other in the world, and four secondary stations began in 1984. The construction was completed by 1987. Tapes are mailed every two weeks from the $3 million stations to Beijing, where they are copied by the Chinese and carried to the embassy for transport to a research center in Albuquerque under diplomatic seal. In 1979, the Deng gang launched the invasion against Vietnam in order to sponsor the Khmer Rouge headed by the Yugoslav agent (see C23S7) Pol Pot. This too was at the instigation of the CIA:

President Carter's National Security Advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski has admitted, "I encouraged the Chinese to support Pol Pot. . . . Pol Pot was an abomination. We could never support him but China could." But the U.S. did support Pol Pot covertly, including whitewashing his crimes. As Ben Kiernan points out in an indispensable Yale University Law School monograph entitled "Genocide and Democracy in Cambodia," the CIA in May of 1980 "denied that there had been any executions in the last two years of the Pol Pot regime." In fact, half a million innocent people were killed during that period. Even well after the "killing fields" were unearthed, the U.S. continued to legitimize the Khmer Rouge, voting at the U.N. Geneva Conference in 1981 to defeat an ASEAN proposal that the Khmer Rouge be disarmed. (In the Dock With Pol Pot: Uncle Sam, Los Angeles Times, Robert Scheer, June 24, 1997) (IMG) national security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski kept pressing for closer ties and scored a breakthrough on a 1978 visit to Beijing, assuring Deng that the United States would accept Chinese conditions for severing relations with Taiwan. (INTELLIGENCE TIES ENDURE DESPITE U.S.-CHINA STRAIN, The Washington Post, George Lardner Jr., R. Jeffrey Smith, June 25, 1989) (IMG)

The Deng regime invaded Vietnam, thus rolling back communist influence in that country while strengthening the leverage power of the Titoist agents of the CIA. Vietnam's government as a result became heavily influenced by CIA-collaborationist Titoist elements that assisted the American imperialists in the efforts to contain the post-Deng anti-imperialist Chinese government.

China's murderous terror regime also supported all the anti-Arab and anti-Shia forces in the Middle East and North Africa. For example, it is a well-known fact that the Sudanese regime headed by the notorious Mossad spy Ja'afar El-Nimeiri and the Sadat-Mubarak group in Egypt fostered a close alliance with China on all fronts, be they military, economic, political, etc. As Castro had stated, China was supporting 'Egypt in its policy of separate peace and surrender'. China's regime also was a sponsor of Saddam's fascist war against Iran. The Islamic Revolution Documents Center, which is an official archives center of the Islamic Republic of Iran, listed Romania, China, and Yugoslavia as three of the sponsors of Saddam's fascist regime in the war:

In addition to the above list, countries such as Switzerland, Sweden, Poland, Yugoslavia, China, Romania, Italy, Singapore, etc. should also be added to the list of Saddam's supporters. (The 80 Countries that Armed Saddam in the War against Iran, Islamic Revolution Documents Center (IRDC), September 22, 2015) (IMG{Titoist-Saddamite Connection})

The CIA reported:

China is the major new entrant into the Iraqi arms supply sweepstakes. Beijing has signed contracts for fighter aircraft, tanks, artillery, ammunition, and spare parts totaling almost $3 billion. Several reports indicate that China is committed to supply 2,000 tanks over the next five years, some of which have already arrived. Its equipment is attractive because they are similar to much of Iraq's Soviet-supplied arsenal. This avoids the loss of combat effectiveness that would occur if Western equipment were substituted too rapidly for Soviet items. Arms ordered from Egypt, Poland, Romania and Yugoslavia provide a similar advantage.... (IRAN-IRAQ: ARMS PROCUREMENT PATTERNS AFTER TWO YEARS OF WAR, CIA, December 3, 1982, p. 29) (IMG{Titoist-Saddamite Connection})

Also well-known is the Chinese regime's support for Yugoslavia:

The revisionist leadership of China is loyally carrying out this "will" of Mao Tsetung. Hua Kuo-feng seized the opportunity of Tito's visit to China, and especially of his own visit to Yugoslavia, to eulogize Tito, to present him as a "distinguished Marxist-Leninist", a "great leader" not only of Yugoslavia but also of the international communist movement.

In this way the Chinese leadership also openly endorsed all the attacks of the Titoites on Stalin and the Bolshevik Party, on the Party of Labour of Albania, the international communist movement and Marxism-Leninism. The close political and ideological relations of the Chinese revisionists with the Titoites, "Eurocommunists", like Carrillo and company, the backing they give the anti-Marxist, Trotskyite, anarchist and social-democratic parties and groups, show that the Chinese leaders, inspired and guided by "Mao Tsetung thought", are setting up a common ideological front with the renegades from Marxism-Leninism, against the revolution, against the interests of the peoples' liberation-struggle.

(Imperialism and the Revolution, Enver Hoxha)

A Chinese state media article documented the Chinese regime's hailing of Tito as follows:

Tito's most outstanding characteristic is that he upheld the truth and defied brute force, said President Li Xiannian when he was interviewed by Momcilo Stefanovic of the Yugoslav daily Politika. Li Xiannian also characterized Tito as far-sighted, broad-minded, optimistic and ready to seek truth from facts.

Li described Tito as a great Marxist who made outstanding contributions to the communist movement and the national-liberation movement.

"Tito had profound feelings for the Chinese people. Through his visit to China in 1977, relations between the Parties of China and Yugoslavia were resumed, laying a solid foundation for the steady development of relations between the two countries. Tito was a great friend, and will always live in the hearts of the Chinese people," the President said.

(Li Xiannian Gives Impression of Tito, Beijing Review: A Chinese Weekly of News and Views, Vol. 26, No. 36, September 5, 1983, p. 9) (IMG)

Lest one forgets that Pol Pot had worked for Tito's gang in the 1950s, and that China was sponsoring Pol Pot's group in the 1970s and the 1980s. The Deng faction were the enemies of communism. In a 1988 speech, Deng Xiaoping explicitly said:

None of the works of Karl Marx or of Lenin offers a guide for building socialism in China, and conditions differ from one country to another, each having its own unique experience. (We must emancipate our minds and think independently, Deng Xiaoping, originally: May 18, 1988, published online in China Daily: October 10, 2010) (IMG)

No doubt one should not be dogmatic about applying the scientific ideas of Marx and Lenin but to say that none of the works of those gentlemen offered any guide to the construction of a socialist society in China is to grossly exaggerate, and is an indication of Deng's real intention, namely class struggles in favor of the anti-socialist forces.

Fidel Castro also had remarked in that speech cited above: 'What surprise is there that the Chinese government today supports the fascist and bloodthirsty regime of Pinochet and the repressive and reactionary military governments of Latin America?'. Indeed there is no surprise. There was also military collaboration between the Pinochet junta and the Chinese regime. A research paper by the US State Department confirmed that Dengist China provided military support for Pinochet Junta:

Shortly after the coup, China announced that it would continue to support strongly Chile's sovereignty claim over the Antarctic. In 1982, with Chile's acquiescence, China built a base in the Antarctic inside Chile's officially-claimed territory. There was even an attempt at a joint venture for producing military weapons through a negotiation between NORINCO (China North Industries Cooperation) and FAMAE, the Chilean army's weapons company. The venture did not prosper, but according to our sources, General Pinochet was very much interested in reducing Chile's military dependence on the United States, particularly after an arms embargo established by the Carter administration against Latin American dictatorships known for violating human rights. Not surprisingly, after leaving office General Pinochet twice visited China as Commander in Chief of the Army, invited by his Chinese counterpart. China's social-fascists hailed the settlement of borders between fascist Chile (ruled by the Pinochet junta) and Argentina as a means of containing 'Soviet social-imperialist' designs and Cuban 'infiltration' in the region. China's regime media stated:

The border dispute affects not only the two countries but also peace and security on the South American continent as a whole, and Soviet and Cuban infiltration into southern Africa has made Latin American countries quite uneasy. If armed conflict occurs between Latin American countries, it could present the Soviet social-imperialists with openings to exploit. So the agreement to settle the two countries' border issue through peaceful means is not only welcomed by the people of Argentina and Chile, it is also conducive to maintaining peace and security in this region. (Soviet Strategy in Asia, Beijing Review, No. 3, January 19, 1979, p. 27) (IMG)

Of course, that regime media article did not come out directly hailing the Pinochet junta, but the kind of rhetoric they used did reflect the pro-Pinochet attitudes which they harbored. China's regime also provided funding to Nicaragua's fascist 'Contras':

Nicaraguan contra leader Adolfo Calero has confirmed to us an astonishing development that had long been rumored: Arms purchases from communist China help the guerrilla war against the Marxist regime in Managua.

"We have obtained weapons from the People's Republic of China," Calero told our reporter in Central America, Jon Lee Anderson. "In fact, the SAM-7s [antiaircraft missiles] we got were not Soviet, as everybody thought; they were Chinese."

(Red China Sells Arms to Contras, Washington Post, May 5, 1986) (IMG)

In that speech cited previously, Fidel Castro also stated that China collaborated with South Africa. Castro said: 'What surprise is there that [China's government] collaborated with Mobutu and with NATO interventionist forces? Why be surprised that it joined South Africa against Angola...?' The claim of Chinese collaboration with fascist South Africa is proven by the declassified documents. Denouncing the Chinese collaboration with the Apartheid regime, a modern-day South African newspaper presented the documents on collaboration and commented:

In this case, the weapons were sent from China's state-owned arms company, the military industrial behemoth Norinco [i.e. North Industries Corporation], to the South Africans. From there it was distributed with the complicity of the Chinese state to Pretoria's allies: Unita in Angola and Renamo in Mozambique. The list of weapons paints a morbid picture and in one recorded deal included rocket launchers, AK47s, 20,000 rounds of ammunition, and 200 bombs weighing 250kg each.

To hide the trade from prying eyes, and to allow both parties to keep a discreet distance, a middleman was needed. They found a mutual friend in Mobutu Sese Seko's Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo, DRC). Mobutu a renowned kleptocrat, was an ally of Unita's Jonas Savimbi's, close to Washington and Paris and enjoyed a good relationship with Pretoria's military intelligence.

A classified Foreign Affairs memo dated 2 March 1983 details how the conduit was set up. Zaire, with Mobutu's sign-off and for a fee, provided the end user certificates fraudulently identifying Zaire as the final destination for the weapons. In order to complete the ruse, an Armscor front company registered in Geneva, named Adam Export, was used to obscure South African involvement. Zaire agreed to allow two South Africans, through Adam Export, to act on Zaire's behalf in contracting with Norinco.

The newspaper article cited above provided many documents on such collaboration. Some of these documents have been attached to the end of this book in the 'Screenshots' section. I checked the declassified top secret military intelligence documents from fascist South Africa. The documents largely match the claims made by the South African newspaper article cited above. While the larger part of the documents has been attached in the 'Screenshots' section of this book, a screenshot of the list of the types of weapons supplied by China in this case is provided here.

Both Mao-era and Deng-era China collaborated with American imperialism in all directions in space, in every region of the world. China's reactionary pro-fascist regime very much was the East Asian equivalent of Titoist Yugoslavia. There is no doubt that they who defend the legacy of Deng Xiaoping are objectively supporters of Titoism, international fascism, and Anglo-American imperialist designs.

C23S5.2. Mao-era Chinese Economic Revisionism Decimates China's Economy

Imperialist pro-fascist powers at times create infrastructure (such as railroads) in the colonized zones so to further facilitate the destruction of the productive forces surrounding the imperialist-built infrastructure, but such infrastructure investments do not in the least imply imperialist support for the development of the productive forces; rather, they merely reflect the imperialist-fascist forces' sober analysis that the destruction of productive forces in a colonized zone requires the limited development of the military infrastructure in the colonized zone as a launching pad for the destruction of other productive forces. It is in the nature of finance capital and its comprador allies to seek the dismantlement of the industries and rollback of the productive forces of the colonizable zones. In correlation, it is in the nature of imperialist finance capital to seek the advancement of the industries it dominates in the imperialist heartland to create the mighty industrial backbone at home for imperialist military programs abroad. Hence, the Maoist reactionaries that dominated China, representing the comprador classes allied to Anglo-American finance capital, desired the undermining of China's industry, for with the rollback of industry in China the progressive classes that advance in correlation with industrialization would be rolled back, allowing for the reactionary classes to dominate for longer.

The pro-fascist imperialist powers aim to conquer and colonize territories, not to develop their productive forces. A comprador regime allied to American finance capital will seek to develop its military in order to embark upon pro-imperialist agendas on behalf of its American imperialist allies. Yet, that same comprador regime hinders the development of the productive forces, the industrial backbone that could assist the development of its comprador military. How is such a contradiction to be resolved? It is to be resolved by the fact that such a comprador regime has much more to lose from the numerical rise of a proletarian class in its own territory, whereas economic underdevelopment will prevent the advancement and rise of the progressive classes in the society ruled by the comprador state. The comprador state can expand its military without developing its economy's productive forces – the expansion of the military can occur through purchases of arms from the imperialist powers. Such is part of the reason as to why American finance capital does not develop the productive forces of the countries it colonizes. For the same reasons, China's government could be comprador, aggressively hostile to the communist forces in the Red Army, while still hindering the development of the productive forces in China. The Mao-era policies decimated China's economy. Strategically to this end, Mao Zedong slandered the Stalin-era USSR by claiming that the Soviets gave "everything" to the central authorities and gave no decision-making power to the local authorities. Clearly, this was a lie, since not "everything" regarding the economic planning was in the hands of the central authorities. By slandering the USSR and presenting the Soviet model as lacking the proper balance between central and local authority, Mao fed himself the excuse to render China's economy more decentralized than what the Stalin-Era Soviets would have advised:

The relationship between the central and the local authorities constitutes another contradiction. To resolve this contradiction, our attention should now be focussed on how to enlarge the powers of the local authorities to some extent, give them greater independence and let them do more, all on the premise that the unified leadership of the central authorities is to be strengthened. This will be advantageous to our task of building a powerful socialist country. Our territory is so vast, our population is so large and the conditions are so complex that it is far better to have the initiative come from both the central and the local authorities than from one source alone. We must not follow the example of the Soviet Union in concentrating everything in the hands of the central authorities, shackling the local authorities and denying them the right to independent action.

(...). In short, if we are to promote socialist construction, we must bring the initiative of the local authorities into lay. If we are to strengthen the central authorities, we must attend to the interests of the localities.

At present scores of hands are reaching out to the localities, making things difficult for them. Once a ministry is set up, it wants to have revolution and so it issues orders. Since the ministries don't think it proper to issue orders to the Party committees and people's councils at the provincial level, they establish direct contact with the relevant departments and bureaus in the provinces and municipalities and give them orders every day. These orders are all supposed to come from the central authorities, even though neither the Central Committee of the Party nor the State Council knows anything about them, and they put a great strain on the local authorities. There is such a flood of statistical forms that they become a scourge. This state affairs must be changed.

(ON THE TEN MAJOR RELATIONSHIPS, Speech at an enlarged meeting of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party, Mao Zedong, April 25, 1956. In: Selected Works of Mao Tse-Tung, MIA) (IMG)

Mao also said:

Even industries directly under the central authorities need assistance from the local authorities. And all the more so for agriculture and commerce. (ON THE TEN MAJOR RELATIONSHIPS, Speech at an enlarged meeting of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party, Mao Zedong, April 25, 1956. In: Selected Works of Mao Tse-Tung, MIA) (IMG)

No reasonable individual disagrees with the notion that some level of local economic authority would have been needed for the material conditions of China. For the material conditions of China, furthermore, China could not swiftly leap to becoming as centralized as the Stalin-era USSR in its economy; centralization needed to happen gradually, but China was not ready to be as centralized in its economy as the USSR.

However, notice what Mao does with regards to the Soviet economic model. He first slanders the Stalin-era Soviet economic model by portraying it as unreasonable and saying that the Soviet system gave everything to the central authorities. And then Mao presents an economic argument that would have been reasonable if and only if his slanderous remarks against the Stalin-era USSR had been correct: China should not follow Stalin-era USSR in centralizing 'everything' into the hands of the central government. In practice, this would mean that China would deviate profoundly from central planning model because unlike what Mao slanderously said, the Stalin-era USSR did not give everything to the local authorities. Such remarks by Mao were a subtle way to promote decentralization and to launch an ideological assault on the central planning system. Mao was so blatantly revisionist.

The Chinese media admitted that the regime has pursued the Yugoslav-style "self-administration" in industry, which was a highly demagogical policy aimed not only towards undermining the efficiency of the management of industry, but was also aimed at decentralizing the economy, hence creating more bureaucracy, under the guise of fighting bureaucracy. China's Premier Po I-Po (Po Yibo) wrote for the Peking Review:

To develop industry at high speed, it is necessary that ... centralized leadership be combined with large-scale mass movements. In 1958, because large-scale mass movements to run industry and to smelt iron and steel were launched, because mass movements in large enterprises with modern methods of production went hand in hand with mass movements in small enterprises with indigenous methods of production, the dreary situation in which a handful of people were relied upon to run industry was brought to an end. and a new, vigorous situation in which the entire people run industry has arisen. This "all the people run industry" movement did more than bring big advances in output; it has also enabled large numbers of people to acquire industrial and technical training and to participate in physical labour, and contributed to the tempering of the people in the course of steel-making. At the same time it has brought about closer integration between industry and agriculture, and between town and countryside. (INDUSTRY'S TASKS IN 1959, Po I-Po, January 6, 1959. In: PEKING REVIEW, January 6, 1959, No. 1, p. 10) (IMG)

The strengthening of the bureaucratic class would entrench the influence of the reactionary forces over the state, at the expense of the influence of the proletariat. The increased influence of such a comprador class would thereby further entrench imperialism. Again, the imperialist-fascist finance capital is often not very keen on developing the industrial backbone of the military of the country it colonizes, for fascist finance capital finds it more efficient to concentrate industry in its own heartland and then to export weapons to the comprador states of the colonized zones. Therefore, it is not at all 'strange' that the comprador forces in China were hindering that country's industrial development.

The Mao faction decentralized the industrialization into the hands of the local communes, and got the Chinese peasant households to establish home-made blast furnaces in their backyards, resulting in the production of extremely poor-quality "iron" and "steel," as opposed to producing such metals in state factories. While denouncing Mao Zedong as a non-communist, Molotov corroborated:

Mao ... was far from a Marxist, of course – he confessed to me that he had never read Marx's Das Kapital.

Only heroes could read Das Kapital. When I was in Mongolia talking with the Chinese ambassador – he was nice to me – I said, "You want to create a metals industry quickly, but the measures you have planned – backyard blast furnaces – are improbable and won't work." I criticized the Chinese, and our people reproved me later. But it was such obvious stupidity! ... Backyard blast furnaces to produce worthless metals – nonsense.

(Molotov Remembers, Interviewer: Feliks Chuev, Interviewee: Vyacheslav Molotov, p. 81) (IMG)

The Chinese media admitted that it pursued such a policy of decentralizing the production of iron and steel:

Fenghuangwo ("Phoenix Nest") is the name of a small iron and steel complex operated by the "May 4" People's Commune in Central China's Hupeh Province. It is among the first to turn out rolled steel produced by small local iron and steel works in the country. This heralds the beginning of a new phase of development for the local steel industry which grew out of the national drive for steel, i.e. the formation of small integrated iron and steel works that combine indigenous and modern methods in the mining of ores, the production of fuels, refractory materials and steel products in addition to pig iron and steel.

An on-the-spot conference was convened in December by the Ministry of Metallurgical Industry in Macheng County, Hupeh Province, where the "May 4" People's Commune is located, to popularize the methods employed there. Small iron and steel complexes that combine indigenous and modern methods are now being set up in many parts of the country.

The Fenghuangwo steel complex has four small blast furnaces, three low-temperature steel-making furnaces, rolling mills, forging hammers, wire-drawing machines, and nail-making machines. It has already produced square sections, strips, round bars, sheets, wire and nails. The rolled steel produced has been used to make diesel engines and electric motors by a local machine-building plant.

This is the culmination of a series of developments in the local iron and steel industry. In August 1958, iron-smelting furnaces employing indigenous methods began to spread like a prairie fire throughout the country as the nationwide battle for steel got under way. They were followed two months later by numerous home-made steel-making furnaces to turn the pig iron produced into steel. As experiences accumulated, the inefficient furnaces were eliminated and those that had stood the test began to be grouped together to form integrated iron and steel making systems and rolling mills and other equipment were introduced.

In this way, production has become normalized and rationalized, the large quantities of steel produced from home-made furnaces can be processed locally and a reliable source of supply has been found for rolled steel and machines urgently needed by the people's communes. This is helping to lay the material foundation for the gradual industrialization of the communes and the mechanization and electrification of agriculture.

(ROUND THE WEEK. In: PEKING REVIEW, January 6, 1959, No. 1, p. 10) (IMG)

The CIA too reported:

By late 1958, according to Chinese Communist propaganda, 6 million new industrial enterprises had been established by rural communes, and as much as one-third of the rural labor force was engaged in such industrial efforts as the ill-fated drive to produce iron in native blast furnaces. (ECONOMIC ASPECTS OF COMMUNIST CHINA'S COMMUNES 1959-60, Economic Intelligence Report, CIA, Office of Research and Reports (ORE), October 1960, p. 29) (IMG)

The decentralization of industrial "development" to the local communes resulted in the production of useless metals, and hence sabotaged the economy. The promotion of Yugoslav-style self-administration created chaos in the economy and prevented the development of industry, and hence prevented heavy industry from coming to the rescue of agriculture. The result of such reactionary, revisionist 'Great Leap Forwards' policies was the disastrous famine in China, which the Chinese regime media downplayed as a "natural" famine, the likes of which had not been seen for "a hundred years past":

China's agriculture suffered extremely serious natural calamities in 1960. Of the more than 1,600 million mu cultivated land in the country, 600 million mu were affected in 1959 and 900 million mu — more than half the total cultivated land — were affected in 1960. The damage done to 309 to 400 million mu was particularly serious last year. Natural calamities of this order have been unknown for a hundred years past. The damage inflicted and the losses have been to a very great extent reduced due to the fact that we have further consolidated the people's communes, which possess great vitality, carried out large-scale construction of water conservancy projects on the farmland and organized the forces of industry and in other fields in an overall way to support the battles against natural calamities and for rehabilitation; and particularly, because the peasants throughout the country waged an intense, stubborn and fearless under the leadership of the Party. Nevertheless, the damage is still very serious. The 1960 production plans on agriculture and light industry which relies on agriculture for its raw materials have not been fulfilled. ('Unite, Rely on the Masses and Struggle For New Victories for World Peace And in Building Socialism at Home'. In: PEKING REVIEW, January 6, 1961, No. 1, p. 8) (IMG)

The famine began "[s]hortly after [the] establishment" of the communes, and the ostensibly-"natural" famine lasted for three consecutive years, according to Chinese media:

Shortly after their establishment, the rural people's communes underwent the severe test of three consecutive years of extremely serious natural calamities. (Collectivization of Agriculture in China, Written for "Cuba Socialista" of Cuba, Liao Lu-Yen. In: PEKING REVIEW, November 1, 1963, No. 44, pp. 13-14) (IMG)

Centralizing agricultural holdings into kolkhozes through the voluntary process is undoubtedly a necessary measure for bringing economic growth, because economic centralization increases efficiency in whichever sector it occurs. However, the collectivization of agriculture would need to occur within the correct pace. Aggressive, forceful, and hasty 'collectivization' of agriculture is a reactionary Trotskyite policy that undermines the economy and brings collectivization into disrepute. The Mao regime refused to acknowledge this fact, and thus launched a Trotskyite leap not into kolkhozes, but into mega-'collectives' that were referred to as the 'People's Communes'. The 'People's Communes' were excessively large pseudo-'collectives' into which the peasants had gotten — and since there was great haste into entering them, suspicion should be raised that the peasants were forced into these so-called 'People's Communes'.

The large-scale economic sabotage and famine inflicted on China resulting from the revisionist decentralization policy of Mao's group, handed Mao the leverage he needed for countering the Lenin-Stalin thesis in support of the prioritization of heavy industry. In his infamous 'critiques' of Stalin's book 'The Economic Problems of Socialism in the USSR', Mao explicitly denounced Stalin's theses which entailed the prioritization of heavy industry over light industry and the prioritization of technological growth. In order to promote his own idealist notion of 'mass line', Mao also slandered Stalin for allegedly not caring about the masses at all. Mao said:

Stalin emphasized only technology, technical cadre. He wanted nothing but technology, nothing but cadre; no politics, no masses. This too is walking on one leg! And in industry they walk on one leg when they pay attention to heavy industry but not to light industry. Furthermore, they did not point out the main aspects of the contradictions in the relationships among departments of heavy industry. They exaggerated the importance of heavy industry, claiming that steel was the foundation, machinery the heart and soul. Our position is that grain is the mainstay of agriculture, steel of industry, and that if steel is taken as the mainstay, then once we have the raw material the machine industry will follow along. (Concerning Economic Problems Of Socialism In The USSR, Mao Zedong, November 1958, Source: Long Live Mao Zedong Thought, a Red Guard Publication) (IMG)

A few years later, what Mao wished for, i.e. the de-emphasis on heavy industry, was implemented. By 1960, when the Chinese economy was greatly damaged, when the development of the productive forces and the rise of a proletarian class in China was hindered, it became easier for the Mao faction to lobby for the further rollback of what remained of the scientific socialist economic policies. Indeed, again, Mao stated that the de-emphasis on heavy industry for which he had long fought, was "truly put into effect in 1960," and — in contrast to the scientific socialist line which promoted the allocation of not only money but also goods (e.g. steel) for the development of more heavy industry — proudly boasted that China prioritized the allocation of steel to agriculture as opposed to allocating steel to the development of more heavy industrial infrastructure:

38. Priority Growth in Producing the Means of Production;

Concurrent Promotion of Industry and Agriculture

On page 466 the problem of priority growth in producing the means of production is addressed.

Priority growth in producing the means of production is an economic rule for expanded reproduction common to all societies. If there are no priorities in producing the means of production in capitalist society there can be no expanded reproduction. In Stalin's time, due to special emphasis on priority development of heavy industry, agriculture was neglected in the plans. Eastern Europe has had similar problems in the past few years. Our approach has been to make priority development of heavy industry the condition for putting into effect concurrent promotion of industry and agriculture, as well as some other concurrent programs, each of which again has within it a leading aspect. If agriculture does not make gains few problems can be resolved. It has been four years now since we proposed concurrent promotion of industry and agriculture, though it was truly put into effect in 1960. How highly we regard agriculture is expressed by the quantity of steel materials we are allocating to agriculture. In 1959 we allocated only 590,000 tons but this year (including water conservancy construction) we allocated 1.3 million tons. This is truly concurrent promotion of industry and agriculture.

Here the text mentions that between 1925 and 1958 production of the means of production in the Soviet Union increased 103 times, while consumer goods increased 15.6 times. The question is, does a ratio of 103:15.6 benefit the development of heavy industry or not? If we want heavy industry to develop quickly everyone has to show initiative and maintain high spirits. And if we want that then we must enable industry and agriculture to be concurrently promoted, and the same for light and heavy industry.

Provided that we enable agriculture, light industry, and heavy industry to develop at the same time and at a high rate, we may guarantee that the people's livelihood can be suitably improved together with the development of heavy industry. The experience of the Soviet Union, no less than our own, proves that if agriculture does not develop, if light industry does not develop, it hurts the development of heavy industry.

(A Critique of Soviet Economics, Mao Zedong, originally published in: 1967. Translated version published by: Monthly Review Press, Translated by: Moss Roberts, Annotated by: Richard Levy, With an Introduction by: James Peck, New York and London, 1977) (IMG)

This revisionist and reactionary policy continued on in China, with Mao's full support. As late as 1964, Mao remarked:

Whom is Industry to serve? It should be made to serve agriculture. Of course, there is the question of interrelationship between sectors of heavy industry, but the whole spectrum of industry should be made to serve agriculture. (SOME INTERJECTIONS AT A BRIEFING OF THE STATE PLANNING COMMISSION LEADING GROUP, Mao Zedong, May 11, 1964. In: SELECTED WORKS OF MAO TSE-TUNG, Vol. 9: years 1963-1971, 1st edition: 1994, p. 85) (IMG)

On the surface, Mao's claim is obviously 'true'. After all, as Mao rightly claimed, industry should indeed serve agriculture; however, agriculture should serve industry as well, since the economic sectors are interconnected. So why was Mao making such an obvious point? The policies pursued by the Chinese regime shed light on Mao's intentions from stating this. The reason why this kulak-minded intellectual was making such a point was to promote his reactionary line against the emphasis on heavy industry over light industry, and to subordinate the process of industrialization to the agricultural communes. In its context, the phrase 'Industry ... should be made to serve agriculture' really meant subordinating industry to the agricultural communes, and emphasizing the role of agricultural light industry over heavy industry. In doing so, Mao could demagogically promote self-administration in industry, since the self-management principle was the principle by which communes were run, hence to systematically decentralize industry. In doing so, Mao could also prevent the prioritization of heavy industry, and thus to prevent the rapid industrialization of China. This is why at that time period:

All industrial sectors are now going over to following the policy of taking agriculture as the foundation of the national economy, and an industrial system in the service of farming is gradually being set up. (Collectivization of Agriculture in China, Written for "Cuba Socialista" of Cuba, Liao Lu-Yen. In: PEKING REVIEW, November 1, 1963, No. 44, p. 13) (IMG)

C23S5.3. The Great Anti-Proletarian Anti-Cultural Counter-Revolution

China was burning. As though inspired by Goebbels's book-burning campaign and the Mongol invasion, Maoist barbarians launched a campaign of savage terror to turn libraries into ashes, ransack houses, humiliate as they please, etc. During that time period, Albania had pursued the correct policy of temporarily allying with China's left-deviationist regime in order to counter the right-deviations advocated by the Kremlin Titoists. As a country that was officially friends with China, the Albanians were not uncritical, however. In a speech to the Central Committee of the Party of Labour of Albania in October 1966, Comrade Hoxha remarked:

The "Red Guards" are changing the names of the streets and restaurants, because they had a reactionary content, writing dazibaos and criticizing anyone just as they please, ransacking houses and putting the dunce's cap on kulaks and reactionaries and parading them through the streets and squares; it is said they are wrecking the graves of foreign imperialists and, what is more dangerous, they are attacking party committees, burning libraries and paintings, destroying old monuments, etc. (Some Preliminary Ideas about the Chinese Proletarian Cultural Revolution: Speech to the 18th Plenum of the CC of the PLA, Enver Hoxha, October 14, 1966. Source: Text from Enver Hoxha. Selected Works Vol. IV. Toronto: Marx, Engels, Lenin, Stalin Institute. 1983. pp. 94-114. MIA) (IMG)

At the instigation of Mao Zedong, Maoist barbarians started a civil war in China, attacked China's military sites, "badly battered" the supposed 'capitalist-roaders', and thus sowed anarchy in China. They were assisted in this process by the Mao regime's military force, the "People's Liberation Army," and thus launched a Trotskyite military coup against local party committees, all in the name of fighting revisionism. The Chinese state media reported:

PROLETARIAN revolutionaries are uniting to seize power from the handful of persons within the Party who are in authority and taking the capitalist road. This is the strategic task for the new stage of the great proletarian cultural revolution. It is the decisive battle between the proletariat and the masses of working people on the one hand and the bourgeoisie and its agents in the Party on the other.

This mighty revolutionary storm started in Shanghai. The revolutionary masses in Shanghai have called it the great "January Revolution." Our great leader Chairman Mao immediately expressed resolute support for it. He called on the workers, peasants, revolutionary students, revolutionary intellectuals and revolutionary cadres to study the experience of the revolutionary rebels of Shanghai and he called on the People's Liberation Army actively to support and assist the proletarian revolutionaries in their struggle to seize power.

Chairman Mao's great call received an immediate enthusiastic response from the revolutionary masses and the commanders and fighters of the Peoples Liberation Army. The proletarian revolutionaries who have formed a mighty force are capturing one citadel after another in certain places and units, where the handful of persons within the Party who are in authority and taking the capitalist road have been entrenched, and are then consolidating these captured positions one by one. The storm of the "January Revolution" is now sweeping the whole country.

The ranks of the handful of persons within the Party who are in authority and taking the capitalist road have been badly battered.

(On the Proletarian Revolutionaries' Struggle to Seize Power, In: Peking Review, Vol. 10, No. 6, Feb. 3, 1967, pp. 10-15) (IMG)

To combat the right-deviationist, revisionist, Titoist, and/or "capitalist-roader" elements in the Party, the correct policy would have been to purge the Central Committee through socialist legality and strong counter-intelligence operations. Rallying the workers and peasants into the streets to create pressure from below so to force the right-deviationists to back down would have also been a useful means of pursuing the purges. Such methods would have been employed had there been a communist leadership. However, Mao's group were not communists, but more so reminisced the Mongol invaders. Mao's group instead got the masses into the streets, not so much to create pressure from below for pursuing legal purges, but to launch a unique combination of a colour revolution, a series of local military coups, and a civil war. At a time when China was not even remotely resembling the dictatorship of the proletariat, Mao's group launched a colour revolution against the people of China. China's state media, reporting on the remarks of Mao Zedong, stated:

Our present revolution – the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution is a revolution under the dictatorship of the proletariat, and we have launched it ourselves. This is because a portion of the structure of proletarian dictatorship has been usurped and no longer belongs to the proletariat, but to the bourgeoisie. Thus, we had to make revolution. The Central Committee Cultural Revolution Group must ponder over it and write articles. This is called “Revolution Under the Dictatorship of the Proletariat.” This is a very important theoretical problem. (Talks At Three Meetings With Comrades Chang Ch’un-ch’iao And Yao Wen-yuan, February 1967. In: Selected Works of Mao Tse-Tung. SOURCE: Long Live Mao Tse-tung Thought, a Red Guard Publication. In: MIA) (IMG)

Additionally, in line with the ‘Cultural Revolution’ agenda, Mao seemed to be implying that people coming from bourgeois or feudal family backgrounds should be named publicly. Mao said:

Class identifications should be drawn in all units, factories, streets, schools, and official organs. (SOME INTERJECTIONS AT A BRIEFING OF THE STATE PLANNING COMMISSION LEADING GROUP, Mao Zedong, May 11, 1964. In: SELECTED WORKS OF MAO TSE-TUNG, Vol. 9: years 1963-1971, 1st edition: 1994, p. 85) (IMG)

Was this a campaign of naming-and-shaming people just because of their bourgeois or feudal family background? To analyze an individual’s personality and motivations, an examination of the individual’s class roots is very important; however, to publicly name and shame swathes of individuals exclusively for their family class roots, and without regard to whether or not the individuals’ behaviour and actions are in line with their class roots, is a disgracefully left-opportunist measure. One may hope that the parasitic kulak-rooted left-opportunist intellectual Mao Zedong was intending no such a disgraceful move.

C23S5.4. The Sino-Eurasian Split / China’s Social-Chauvinist Aggression against Eurasia  IMG-All-{China}

The Bukharinites and Trotskyites were overtly ‘hostile’ to each other but covertly allied in a pincer secret service assault against Soviet power. There is much evidence that the Maoist left-opportunists of China and the Khrushchevian right-opportunist administration in Eurasia were overtly ‘hostile’ but covertly allied, so to engineer a split in the international communist movement. One thing is for sure and well-documented: the Mao clique and the Khrushchev group were both agents of the Yugoslav regime. Hence the avenue of the covert alliance, the key link, between the Mao clique and the Khrushchev group was via Yugoslavia. Not all secretly-allied ostensibly-‘contradicting’ reactionary forces foster their secret alliance via secret direct connections. Sometimes, they add an additional layer of covertness, by having an intermediary – such as Yugoslavia – serve as the bridge linking them. Furthermore, throughout their careers, both the Mao clique and the Khrushchev group supported the same agendas. The Khrushchev group and the Mao clique both supported an alliance with USA, both denounced Stalin, both praised Tito and supported Yugoslavia, both supported the Sino-Eurasian split (and no, neither side’s contribution to the Sino-Eurasian split was unintentional), both supported economic decentralization, both supported the shift of emphasis away from heavy industry onto light industry, both supported the partition of Eurasia, both supported de-budgeting the Red Army, and both opposed the Peoples’ Democracies in Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Romania, and Cuba. Deceptively, however, they divided their tasks such that one side pursues such agenda through left-deviation and ostensible ‘anti-revisionism’ whereas the other side pursues such an agenda through right-deviation and blatant revisionism. I do not seek to imply that either of Khrushchevian Eurasia and Maoist China were at the time anywhere as dominated by the reactionary forces as the regimes of Israel and Saudi Arabia, but I also cannot avoid seeing a major functional analogy in one respect: the Saudi regime and the Israeli regime, both allied to the United States, vehemently denounced each other, aiming to polarize the Middle East situation into ‘Ishmaelite’ anti-Semitism vs. Zionist anti-Arabism; analogously, the Chinese leadership was virulently Maoist left-opportunist, whereas the ‘enemies’ of the Maoists – the Khrushchevians – were sickening right-opportunists, and these two reactionary currents – both allied to the Yugoslav regime, the number fifth columnist state of the Anglo-American imperialists – were aiming to split the anti-imperialist camp through such polarizations into the left-opportunist and right-opportunist ‘poles’. Critics would say that this is a conspiracy theory. Actually, in light of the evidence that both China and Eurasia were allied to Yugoslavia and both fought for Titoism, one from the left flank and the other from the right flank, the mainstream media narrative that the Maoist-Khrushchevian dispute was ‘genuine’ sounds all the more conspiracy-theoretic. I ask such critics: in light of Peking’s and Moscow’s alliance with Yugoslavia and their pursuit of a Titoist agenda worldwide, what evidence do you have that the Maoist-Khrushchevian dispute was any more real than the many fake ‘disputes’ and fake ‘conflicts existing between the many CIA-backed factions worldwide? The evidence for the Maoite-Khrushchevian connection via Yugoslavia and the service both of them to the same reactionary causes has been provided throughout this chapter. This all the more exposes the fake character of the Mao-Khrushchev ‘dispute’. The split between Eurasia and China was very real, but the ‘split’ between Mao and Khrushchev was not – both of those men and their respective cliques were, through Yugoslav intelligence, allies in engineering such a real Sino-Eurasian split. It is the turn of the critics to provide evidence supporting their hypothesis that the Maoite-Khrushchevian ‘dispute’ was real.

Note that the Khrushchevians are not to be confused with the Brezhnev-era Eurasians. During the Brezhnev era, the communist faction saw a partial resurgence in its influence, and hence the Sino-Eurasian conflict became a real thing. However, before the Brezhnev era, there is not even a shred of evidence of seriousness in the ‘fight’ between the Khrushchev group and the Mao clique.

Khrushchev definitely needed an excuse with which to expel China from the bloc; the excuse he had was given to him by Mao’s fake ‘anti-revisionist’ stance.

Khrushchev’s group served American interests through blatant advocacy for capitulationism and liberality, whereas Mao’s group served American interests through left-wing sectarianism. Mao and Khrushchev both had open friendly contacts with the CIA operative Anna Louise Strong. Khrushchev’s group would blatantly bash Stalin, whereas Mao’s group would – under the cover of ‘comradely criticism’ – slander Stalin as a pro-American tyrant worse than the feudal lords. Khrushchev’s group would seek to hand Czechoslovakia, East Germany, and Romania over to the West through capitulationism and ‘liberalism’, whereas Mao’s group would conspire to give those countries over to the West by slandering their parties as ‘revisionists’, renegades, ‘cliques’, etc. That the Kremlin Titoists headed by Khrushchev ended almost all Eurasian economic cooperation with China was certainly beneficial to Mao’s group, firstly because it gave the latter greater leverage for pushing China into the camp of the United States – as it finally happened all the more blatantly in the 1970s – and also helped them severely cut China’s economic ties to the ‘revisionist’ ‘clique’ of the Czechoslovak communists headed by Novotny, and hence to undermine the ‘revisionist’ Czechoslovakia (see C22S9). The ceasing of Eurasian economic cooperation with China also helped undermine the DPRK, whom the Chinese regime frequently insulted since the 1960s. Hoxha recalled:

Many a time later I have turned back to this period of the history of the Communist Party of China, trying to figure out how and why the profoundly revisionist line of 1956 [adopted by the Chinese] subsequently seemed to change direction, and for a time, became “pure”, “anti-revisionist” and “Marxist-Leninist”. It is a fact, for example, that in 1960 the Communist Party of China seemed to be strongly opposing the revisionist theses of Nikita Khrushchev and confirmed that “it was defending Marxism-Leninism” from the distortions which were being made to it, etc. It was precisely because China came out against modern revisionism in 1960 and seemed to be adhering to Marxist-Leninist positions that brought about that our Party stood shoulder to shoulder with it in the struggle which we had begun against the Khrushchevites.

However, time confirmed, and this is reflected extensively in the documents of our Party, that in no instance, either in 1956 or in the '60s did the Communist Party of China proceed or act from the positions of Marxism-Leninism.

In 1956 it rushed to take up the banner of revisionism, in order to elbow Khrushchev out and gain the role of the leader in the communist and workers' movement for itself. But when Mao Zedong and his associates saw that they would not easily emerge triumphant over the patriarch of modern revisionism, Khrushchev, through the revisionist contest, they changed their tactic, pretended to reject their former flag, presented themselves as "pure Marxist-Leninists", striving in this way, to win those positions which they had been unable to win with their former tactic. When this second tactic turned out no good, either, they "discarded" their second, allegedly Marxist-Leninist, flag and came out in the arena as they had always been, opportunists, loyal champions of a line of conciliation and capitulation towards capital and reaction. We were to see all these things confirmed in practice, through a long, difficult and glorious struggle which our Party waged in defence of Marxism-Leninism.

(The Khrushchevites, Hoxha)

With the rise of the Brezhnev faction, Titoism saw some – albeit not total – decline in Eurasia and some of the right-deviations by Khrushchev's group were checked. Since Mao's group could no longer so easily attack Brezhnev from the left, Mao's group decided to attack from the right and thus in 1971 unmasked itself as the ally of US intelligence that it had always been. Failing to distinguish between the People's Republic of China and the leadership of the People's Republic of China, some naïvely think that US conspiracies against China meant US conspiracies necessarily against Mao's group. In fact, contrary to what some naïvely think, during the first years of the People's Republic of China, when the Anglo-American intelligence services hatched plots against that country, waging bloody battles against it, the People's Republic of China undoubtedly would have seen damage from such US actions, but Mao Zedong, Liu Shaoqi, and Deng Xiaoping – representing the anti-Soviet kulak elements in the Chinese Party and state apparatus – would have benefited from US hostility towards revolutionary China, for it would have allowed them to weaken the leverage of the 'Stalinist' Soviet intelligence agents in China, hence to leave greater leverage for the enemies of 'Stalinism', namely Mao, Liu, Deng and other Titoists who had their social base in kulak reaction. There is no doubt that US action against China helped Mao's group in their secret service conflict to reduce 'Stalinist' Soviet influence in China.

Nikita Khrushchev desired to make extreme threats against China so to increase leverage for Titoist elements in China so that the latter can push China farther and faster into America's camp. This is why Khrushchev made his famous nuclear threats against China:

In the strongest public threat to use nuclear weapons against China ever made by Khrushchev, he warned that it would be "dangerous" to encroach on Soviet borders "given up-to-date weapons of annihilation" in the Soviet arsenal (speech of 15 September 1964). His policy was thus now to "rattle" nuclear weapons toward China, as he had done in the past to many other countries.

However, Mao and his lieutenants were able, given this clearly marked pattern of Khrushchev's behavior, to distinguish a bluff from a real threat of imminent attack. Chinese perception of the credibility of a Soviet threat was highly context-dependent, keyed to the positioning of Soviet forces. Khrushchev had failed to frighten the Chinese into ceasing their border probes because he had not made his threats sufficiently credible, either by deploying tactical nuclear weapons or by a big conventional buildup of regular forces on the frontier.

(THE CHINESE ASSESSMENT OF THE SOVIET MILITARY THREAT, CIA, April 1975, pp. 5-6) (IMG)

The CIA and RAND Corporation official Myron Rush wrote:

Moreover, despite the heightened tension between the Soviet Union and China in the early 1960s, Khrushchev made no serious effort to build military power along the Soviet border with China. This began only after Brezhnev came to power. (The Soviet Military Build-up and the Coming Succession: A Review Essay. Reviewed Work: 'Stalin's Successors: Leadership, Stability, and Change in the Soviet Union' by Seweryn Bialer. Review by: Myron Rush. Source: International Security, Spring, 1981, Vol. 5, No. 4 (Spring, 1981), p. 183. Published by: The MIT Press) (IMG)

While engaging in nuclear threats against China, Khrushchev did nothing to actually build up the Red Army presence in the border with China – and that was the point; the whole point of Khrushchev's nuclear threat-statements was not to actually bully the Chinese regime but to rather strengthen it, by giving it the excuse to boost its CIA-backed hostility towards Eurasia. The nuclear threats were not for the purpose of suppressing China, but were rather aimed at wedge-driving and division-sowing, so to push China further away from Eurasia and onto the US camp. Again, if that was not the case, then why did Khrushchev not build up and militarize the Eurasian border against China? If Khrushchev was so serious about confronting the Chinese, so serious and fanatical as to 'plan' a nuclear attack on China, then why did he act as an obstacle to the militarization of the border against China? Some would say that Khrushchev did not militarize the border because that would have strengthened his communist rivals in the Red Army, but that only goes on to reaffirm the strong positive correlation of the interests of the Khrushchev faction and the Mao faction exemplified in their pincer opposition to the communist faction of the Red Army – they both were hostile to the communist faction of the Red Army, and were thus fighting on the same side of history.

On the other hand, the rise of the communist-coopted Brezhnevian group meant that Khrushchev's nuclear threats against China would be abandoned:

By contrast, the post-Khrushchev Soviet leadership avoided threatening China with a nuclear strike.... (THE CHINESE ASSESSMENT OF THE SOVIET MILITARY THREAT, CIA, April 1975, p. 6) (IMG)

By refusing to make these nuclear threats, the communist-coopted Brezhnevian group also refused to hand the Mao-Liu group the excuse for pushing China further into America's camp. This helped Eurasia weaken imperialist influence in China. At the same time, knowing that the Chinese regime was a Trotskyite state and a covert satellite of Yugoslavia, the communist-coopted Brezhnevian group strengthened Eurasian defenses against China. Referring to the Brezhnev Administration, the CIA stated,:

The Soviet leaders were willing, however, to make moves which were more costly in terms of committing military manpower and resources to the border area. (THE CHINESE ASSESSMENT OF THE SOVIET MILITARY THREAT, CIA, April 1975, p. 6) (IMG)

Recall that Myron Rush too had remarked:

serious effort to build military power along the Soviet border with China ... began only after Brezhnev came to power. (The Soviet Military Build-up and the Coming Succession: A Review Essay. Reviewed Work: 'Stalin's Successors: Leadership, Stability, and Change in the Soviet Union' by Seweryn Bialer. Review by: Myron Rush. Source: International Security, Spring, 1981, Vol. 5, No. 4 (Spring, 1981), p. 183. Published by: The MIT Press (IMG)

The Eurasians therefore pursued the correct policy of strengthening their defenses against Yugoslavia's East Asian satellite and ultra-reactionary Pakistan's ally, China:

Since 1966 the Soviets have more than doubled the total number of tactical aircraft opposite China. A new tactical air was created in the Transbaykal MD Mongolia area which now has 300 aircraft, making it the second largest Soviet tactical air army. Another 230 combat tactical aircraft are in the Far East. These numbers continue to grow. Over 30 airfields have been either renovated or constructed along the Chinese border. Eight of these are in Mongolia and are as yet unoccupied. Most of the newly activated tactical air regiments are equipped with older model aircraft (MIG-17 and IL-28). These aircraft are better suited for ground attack and reconnaissance missions than for air defense. The air forces opposite China have a much higher percentage of the new Mi-8 helicopters than do those opposite NATO. (THE SOVIET BUILDUP AGAINST CHINA: DIMENSIONS AND IMPLICATIONS: SPECIAL MEMORANDUM, CIA, Board of National Estimates, May 6, 1969, p. 5) (IMG)

The communist-coopted Brezhnev group militarily confronted China's regime while minimizing nuclear threat-statements, whereas the Khrushchev group maximized provocative nuclear threat-statements without a tough military stance against China. The communist-coopted Brezhnev group materially contained the Mao group, whereas the Khrushchev group opposed the material containment of the Chinese regime and phrasemongered in a manner ostensibly 'opposed' to, but practically beneficial to, the Chinese regime.

Deng Xiaoping and Zhou En-Lai both began to covertly promote the narrative that China will go to war with Eurasia:

The Chinese were aware of the Soviet buildup, and they seem to have had an increased sense that a war with the USSR, including the engagement of major ground forces, was a real possibility. This view was privately expressed by Chou En-lai in early 1966 and by Teng Hsiao-ping (among others) in mid-March. However, they still apparently did not perceive the threat of a major war as imminent: they spoke only of an "eventual" or an "inevitable" war with the USSR. Nevertheless, the USSR in fact had become the PRC's principal enemy, although not yet in official statements and documents. (THE CHINESE ASSESSMENT OF THE SOVIET MILITARY THREAT, CIA, April 1975, p. 6) (IMG)

China's leaders, hypocritical opportunists as ever, suddenly began to trumpet the narrative that China would be nuclear-attacked by the 'Soviet social-imperialists', just when the Eurasians gave up on their nuclear threats:

Chou and Teng in early 1966 had been speaking about Soviet conventional forces, but shortly thereafter, the Chinese for the first time seemed to take seriously the possibility that the Soviets would use nuclear weapons against them, whether in escalation of the border conflict or in a massive disarming strike. This new assessment was reflected in a public interview given by former Foreign Minister Chen Yi, who declared that:

Soviet missiles may one day fly from Moscow to Peking. Peking is already an atomic target. (Quoted by a Uruguayan newsman in Marcha, 1 May 1966.)

(THE CHINESE ASSESSMENT OF THE SOVIET MILITARY THREAT, CIA, April 1975, p. 6) (IMG)

With regards to China's military-industrial complex vis-a-vis the Eurasians and the Red Army, the Maoist infantile left-deviationists in China actually played an ironically progressive role. While the Chinese regime's so-called 'Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution' was overall reactionary, it did have a progressive aspect to it: it weakened China's military-industrial complex vis-a-vis Eurasia. The Mao-Deng group represented comprador bourgeois elements serving American imperialists under the cover of 'socialism'. One must remember that later on, Mao's group launched an aggression against the Eurasians by ambushing and terrorizing the Red Army troops. It follows that embracing damage to China's military and economy for that time period, far from being a chauvinist stance, is actually anti-chauvinist because China, a Yugoslav satellite, was pursuing an aggressively pro-American and anti-Eurasian chauvinist agenda. Whether out of opportunism or out of naivete, they who argue against the infliction of material damage upon the Maoist Chinese military are promoting a chauvinist line. Make no mistakes! Insofar as it damaged China's military-industrial backbone, the so-called 'Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution' was objectively great, proletarian and revolutionary in character.

By undermining China's economy and military at the time, the so-called 'Great Proletarian Cultural Revolutionaries' also unintentionally punished the Chinese regime for its violent, aggressive, and hostile stance against India, the country that had allied to Stalin-era USSR and which had assisted the UAR in hijacking Tito's 'Non-Aligned Movement' and which had refused to join the Moscow Titoists in slandering Abdel-Salam Aref for his non-existent 'genocide' 'against' Kurds. China's aggressive measures against India in 1962 had assisted the CIA in boosting its direct intelligence presence in India and thus had severe repercussions in the South Asia region. It is interesting to note that China's aggression against India took place around the same time as Morocco's invasion of Algeria and the Saudi regime's war on pro-Nasserist fighters in Yemen. On the surface, these three wars of aggressions may appear as irrelevant. In reality, they are very relevant, for they were all wars launched against the trade partners and allies of the United Arab Republic, and were in part aimed at containing and bogging down the UAR on several fronts. They had a direct role in causing inflation and severely weakening the Abdel-Nasser faction in Egypt by 1965. The social-chauvinist Mao-Deng group had the blood of so many Indian and Eurasian troops on their hands.

The CIA and DIA had differing intelligence assessments with regards to how much China had militarily recovered from the 'Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution', but they both agreed that the 'Cultural Revolution' had indeed damaged China's military:

The upheavals of the Cultural Revolution interfered with military training and degraded the combat capabilities and readiness of the Chinese Armed Forces. But the extent of this degradation and the degree of its persistence up to the present time is in dispute. CIA and INR believe that the level of training is still well short of normal in the army because of continued heavy involvement in non-military activities and that progress in extricating the People's Liberation Army (PLA) from these tasks will be slow. DIA and NSA, on the other hand, believe that training in the army approached normal levels in 1968 and that any residual degradation in combat readiness and effectiveness is slight. (...). In conventional combat against a modern opponent, however, each branch of the PLA would have critical weaknesses. Army units are believed to be seriously deficient in motorized transport and heavy armament; the air defense system probably lacks an adequate communications and data processing capability and could not withstand a large-scale, sophisticated air attack; and China's navy, while growing, is still little more than a coastal defense force. (...).

Air Forces. All elements of China's air defense apparently have been improved. Command and control capabilities have probably increased, more and better radars have been deployed at an increasing rate, and Mig-19 production probably has recovered from the Cultural Revolution. SAM deployment, however, has been proceeding slowly and we are increasingly uncertain about Chinese plans for producing the Mig-21. There is some evidence that an aircraft of native design based on the Mig-19 has been produced in China. (...). Naval Forces. With few exceptions, naval shipbuilding programs appear to have recovered fully during 1969 from the Cultural Revolution, and current expansion of shipyards indicates that new programs could be planned. Greater emphasis is being placed on production of larger, longer range ships capable of extended patrols. Construction of R-class submarines now averages about two units a year, and China has begun to build destroyers. Old destroyers are being converted to carry cruise missiles.

Why did the Red Guards and other student pseudo-revolutionaries end up decimating China's comprador military force? A 'cultural revolution' instigated by such comprador forces as Mao Zedong would have normally been organized very well by the CIA such that it would not undermine China's military, the enemy of the Red Army. And yet, the Red Guards or student 'revolutionaries' ended up undermining China's military. Why? It was because the students came from cooperative peasant family backgrounds, a factor which pitted them against imperialism, against the enemies of the Red Army. They may well have praised the Chinese military, but ended up unable to escape their own class behaviour, and thus damaged the Chinese military which they may have praised. Owing to their class origins, they were susceptible enough to agitation by the agents of the proletariat to engage in such sabotage against China's reactionary armed forces.

Unfortunately though, the Chinese army and Zhou En-Lai eventually succeeded in establishing stability in that country's military-industrial complex:

2. The prestige and authority of the Party have been damaged, but dissolution has stopped short of wrecking the Party's machinery; the concept of revolutionary communes, which Mao seems earlier to have envisaged as supplanting the Party, has been shelved. "Three-way alliances" are a far cry from "Paris communes," and are consonant with Chou's policies of stability and reason.
3. The damage to industry and agriculture is doubtless considerable, but will probably not be ruinous if present efforts to restore order are successful. Much depends upon peasant — and Army — reaction to increased Army participation in production. We should know more about the extent of damage in another month or so.
4. As expected, the Army is playing the crucial role in the Revolution's apparent denouement. The Army earlier would not back Mao's revolutionary rebels' take-overs, but is now backing Chou's efforts at preservation of nationhood and attention to the economy.
5. "Regionalism" is not a likelihood: the Army wouldn't have it.
6. The Army's crucial loyalty proved to be ... to stability — to the status quo. Most elements of the society seem to be preponderantly of like mind — and the status quo is "creeping revisionism."
7. However, the battle is far from over. The prestige of Mao himself is probably still high; support for Maoism is obviously less, but of unknown proportions.

(Memorandum From Alfred Jenkins of the National Security Council Staff to the President's Special Assistant (Rostow), Washington, March 6, 1967. In: Johnson Library, National Security File, Country File, China, Vol. 9. Secret. In: 'Foreign Relations of the United States, 1964-1968', Vol. 30, US Department of State, p. 527) (IMG)

Zhou had the support of both of the two extremes: Mao's left-deviation and Deng's right-deviation. Under his influence, stability was returning to China's reactionary army. It was therefore natural that he would be having an increase in his power. The following excerpts of a communication between Taiwan leadership and US Secretary Rusk provides the related information:

Answering a question of Secretary Rusk's about Chou En-Lai, the Vice President doubted that Chou could ever become a "third force" in the Communist hierarchy. He was well-known to many GRC leaders, and he was clearly identified as a man who always tried to side with the winner. He had once been close to Teng Hsiao-ping, the No. 2 man in the Liu group. Then he had wavered when he thought the Liu group was losing ground and had gone over to the Mao side. He had then tried to exercise a mediating influence between the Red Guards and the Communist Party elements. He had then been subjected to some censure. He did not have the strength to emerge as a third force. Yen thought Chou would be used by Mao as long as the struggle continued, and that he would lose favor with Mao after the eventual purge of Liu. He would have a place of some importance during the struggle.

('SUBJECT: Meeting of Chinese Vice President C.K. Yen with the President: Review of Events on Mainland China; Sino-Soviet Relations; Viet-Nam', Memorandum of Conversation, Participants: His Excellency Yen Chia-kan (Vice President/Prime Minister of Republic of China), Chow Shu-kai, (Ambassador Chinese Embassy), Li Kwoh-ting (Minister of Economic Affairs, Republic of China), Liu Chieh (Ambassador to the United Nations), Sampson C. The damage inflicted by the 'Cultural Revolution' of course was not enough to prevent China from invading Eurasia, but it did weaken it in relative terms, delaying and sabotaging its advance. Therefore, in spite of this progressive aspect of the 'Cultural Revolution', China clearly was able to recover enough to be able to aggress Eurasia in 1969.

Whereas the Chinese regime presented the 'Soviet social-imperialists' as the aggressors in the war, the CIA, a foe of the communist faction resurging to dominance in the Red Army, admitted:

The Chinese leaders in 1969 tested the degree of Soviet tolerance of provocation as they carried out a policy of forward patrolling to contest Chinese defined "disputed" areas, keeping the probes down to small-scale encounters. Mao and his aides undoubtedly calculated that they had leeway to engage in such encounters with conventional weapons without provoking a major Soviet attack against China.

They seem to have anticipated retaliation by small Soviet conventional-force units only. They guessed right about the level of Soviet retaliation.

Between 2 March and mid-August, every Soviet riposte to Chinese patrol probes was carried out with such conventional ground weapons as artillery, tanks, armored personnel carriers, and automatic rifles. No aircraft were used, nor did the Soviets expand the conflict from the immediate areas of the skirmishes. Soviet conventional weapons, and the mobility supplied by their armored personnel carriers were sufficient to defeat each of the Chinese border units they were used against. (...).

The Chinese ambush of a Soviet border guard unit on Chen Pao Island on 2 March was a definite escalation. Mao and his aides appear to have chosen that particular Ussuri River island which provided them with the strongest case of Chinese ownership: Chen Pao was not only on the Chinese side of the main navigational channel in the Ussuri, but also 'was virtually a part of the Chinese bank. The opposing Soviet border guard unit at least twice previously (in late January and early February; in the latter instance, riflebutts were used by both sides in a fight) had come out across the river ice to the Chinese side onto Chen Pao to order Chinese forces to withdraw. Mao undoubtedly had been angered by this bullying.... The ambush of Soviet forces at Chen Pao escalated the dispute to a major shooting incident. In subsequent engagements at Chen Pao and other points along the border, the Soviets used their superior firepower to effectively defeat Chinese units entering Soviet-controlled territory.

(THE CHINESE ASSESSMENT OF THE SOVIET MILITARY THREAT, CIA, April 1975, p. 8) (IMG)

While some apologists for China like to denounce Fidel Castro as a 'social-fascist' 'puppet' of 'Soviet social-imperialism', some of the other apologists for China rightly acknowledge that Fidel Castro was an anti-imperialist and far from a 'Sinophobe' or 'orientalist'. It is therefore worth examining what Castro said about China. Referring to Mao as 'a ridiculous mortal', Fidel Castro denounced the 'great-power chauvinism' of China's nepotist regime and 'the mad adventure of the Cultural Revolution':

they turned a ridiculous mortal into a god in the People's Republic of China, destroyed the party and its best cadres in the days of the mad adventure of the Cultural Revolution and allowed themselves to be carried away by the petty bourgeois spirit and great-power chauvinism, which led them to betray internationalism and to the conversion of a socialist state into a nepotic satrapy, where the rulers' wives and sons-in-law became members of the Political Bureau.... (SPEECH MADE BY FIDEL CASTRO RUZ, PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF CUBA, IN THE NATIONAL CENTRAL ACT FOR THE XXV ANNIVERSARY OF THE MONCADA BARREL ASSAULT, HELD IN THE SCHOOL CITY "26 DE JULIO", SANTIAGO DE CUBA, ON JULY 26, 1978, "YEAR OF THE XI FESTIVAL". (SHORTHAND VERSIONS - COUNCIL OF STATE), cuba.cu) (IMG)

Maoist left-opportunists exaggerate the extent of the influence of the counter-revolutionary forces in Eurasia, and argue that the correct thing to do was to pursue a war against Eurasia, as Mao's Trotskyite gang did in 1969. The left-opportunists refuse to acknowledge the incontrovertible fact that communists still retained some influence in Eurasia as a large minority, and that exaggerating the level of the influence of the counter-revolutionary elements would undermine the communist minority while playing into the hands of the counter-revolutionary majority. Such was why the Vietnamese communists opposed the Kremlin Titoists, while still maintaining relations with Eurasia; such was why Abdel-Nasser launched a Cold War against Khrushchev's group while still maintaining positive relations with Eurasia; such was why the Romanian communists confronted the Khrushchevians while also retaining relations with Eurasia; such was why even the Albanians loudly denounced the revisionists in Moscow all the while strategically reorienting trade away from China onto Eurasia's Eastern European allies in the late 1960s when the Brezhnevians rose to power. By launching their 1969 social-fascist aggression against Eurasia, the Maoist Chinese armed forces were waging a war of terror against not the Titoist reactionaries but against the resurgent communist faction in the Red Army, the faction of the comrades of Stalin, the faction of the generals Shtemenko and Vasilevsky.

C23S5.5. Deng Faction Sabotages China's Economy

By 1985, the communist faction in Eurasia had already become very weak. The Chebrikov-Gorbachev group, the leaders of the Titoist faction, had risen in strength. The communist faction was no longer able to strongly pressure Titoist China, a factor which gave the Deng faction much greater leverage at home. No longer did the funds available to the Titoist Deng faction have to be spent as much on countering the menace of the communist faction in Eurasia. Rather, the funds could be used for waging the secret service conflict against the communist faction in China. The Deng faction thus was able to win further in the struggle for control over the so-called "Chinese Communist Party", to elevate the white-collar contingent in the Party. The conference of September 1985 was a great victory for the Deng faction. The CIA reported that the National Conference of the Chinese 'Communist' Party in September 1985 had resulted in a drastic change in the cadres of the Party in favour of the Deng faction:

From 12 to 24 September, the Communist Party of China held an unprecedented series of meetings that together constitute a major milestone in Deng Xiaoping's decadelong struggle to restructure the party leadership. In two plenary sessions of the Central Committee and an extraordinary conference of party delegates, Deng managed to significantly weaken the conservative party old guard, promote his allies to the top party organizations, reduce the influence of China's senior military officers, and win a new party endorsement of economic reform.

Specifically:

- One-quarter of the 210-member Central Committee, including 10 of the 27 members of the Politburo, resigned.
- Ninety-one younger leaders were named full or alternate members of the Central Committee.
- Six new members joined the Politburo – five for the first time and one promoted from alternate – and five were added to the Secretariat.
- The Central Committee approved guidelines for the 1986-90 Five-year Plan that strongly reaffirm the reformist course of economic policy.

We believe Deng accomplished most of his short-term objectives at the meetings:

- The balance of forces in the Politburo and the Central Committee has shifted to the reformers.
- The influence on decision-making of the party's old guard, and especially its military contingent, has been significantly reduced.
- The leading reformers placed proteges on both the Politburo and Secretariat. Hu Yaobang put three on each body and Zhao Ziyang one.
- Serious economic performance problems, and growing conservative criticisms of reform policies, were not allowed to derail the economic development program approved in 1984.

(CHINA'S PARTY CONFERENCE: THE WANING OF THE ANCIEN REGIME, CIA, November 1985, p. III) (IMG)

Deng Xiaoping said in his speech during the Conference that a shake-up had occurred in the Party cadres:

A number of veteran cadres have taken the lead in abolishing the system of life tenure in leading posts, furthering the reform of the cadre system. This deserves mention in our Party's annals.

The members newly elected to the Central Committee as well as ministers and provincial Party committee secretaries who were recently appointed are comparatively young. They are generally in their fifties, with some just over forty. In the early days of the founding Of the People's Republic, many of the ministers and provincial Party committee secretaries were in such age groups.

(Deng Xiaoping's Speech At the CPC National Conference. In: Beijing Review, September 30, 1985, pp. 17-18) (IMG)

Indeed, reports by the Beijing Review, China's state media, confirmed the CIA claims that the Dengist reformers had the upper hand in the National Conference. During the Conference, the Central Committee of the Chinese 'Communist' Party provided its proposal for the Seventh Five-Year Plan. Excerpts of the document, which leaves no doubt as to the fact that the pro-decentralization 'reformer' current spearheaded by Deng Xiaoping emerged triumphant in the policy-making, are as follows:

48. To ensure the successful fulfilment of the Seventh Five-year Plan and sustained and balanced economic growth beyond that period, the most important thing is for us to restructure the economy, prudently but steadfastly, in accordance with the decision of the Third Plenary Session of the Twelfth Central Committee and in the next five years or more to lay the foundation for a vigorous socialist economic structure with Chinese characteristics.

49. Building a new type of socialist economic structure depends primarily on successes in the following three related areas. First, further stimulating all enterprises, and especially the large and medium-sized ones owned by the whole people, so that they will work efficiently as socialist producers and distributors of commodities, each enjoying relative independence and full power of management and bearing complete responsibility for profits and losses. Second, further expanding the socialist planned commodity markets, and gradually improving the market network. And third, gradually reducing state management of enterprises from direct to indirect control, and supervising and regulating economic activity mainly by economic, statutory and, if necessary, administrative measures. Focusing on these three areas, we must introduce a series of mutually reinforcing reforms in the planning system, the pricing system, the fiscal system, the banking system and the labour and wage system so that these mechanisms will function together, integrating planning with market regulation, and micro-flexibility with macro-control. Accomplishing this will lead to a satisfactory handling of various economic relations, making it possible to harmonize the interests of the state, the collectives and individuals, to achieve greater uniformity in the speed, proportion and efficiency of economic development and to bring about self-sustained growth in our national economy as a whole.

50. Invigorating enterprises is the key element in the economic restructuring with its focus on the cities. We must implement the decision and regulations issued by the Central Committee and the State Council for expanding the decision-making power of enterprises and continue to adopt measures, both inside and outside enterprises, to enhance their vitality, especially that of the large and medium-sized ones. These measures should include the following: 1) Further streamline administration and delegate more power to lower levels. With the exception of certain departments and trades where conditions are somewhat unusual, ministries of the central government, the provinces and autonomous regions should no longer directly control enterprises. In the cities, we must also draw a clear distinction between the responsibilities and functions of government and those of enterprises, reduce the intermediate levels, and grant enterprises the managerial power to which they are entitled. 2) Gradually reduce regulation taxes on large and medium-sized enterprises, lighten irrational burdens on them and gradually improve management policies and the taxation system for collective and individual businesses to allow all enterprises to compete with each other on an equal footing. 3) Systematically reduce mandatory planning to give enterprises greater decision-making power over production, supply and marketing and over the use of manpower and financial and material resources. At the same time, improve microeconomic mechanisms to enable enterprises to shoulder full responsibility for their own management. 4) Exercise control over total social demands, maintain a balance between demand and supply and bring the pressure of market competition to bear upon enterprises, so as to encourage them to improve their management and achieve better economic results. 5) See to it that all enterprises do their best to perfect various forms of the responsibility system. It is particularly important to reform the personnel system and promote to leading posts persons of ability and political integrity. Depending on specific conditions in each enterprise, this may be done through appointment after observation, democratic election, self-recommendation and recommendation, recruitment by advertisement and examination or through invitation. The responsibilities and power as well as rewards and penalties for such administrators as managers and factory directors must be clearly defined to give full scope to their initiative and pioneering spirit. Efforts should be made to strengthen democratic management, to encourage the workers and administrative staff to play their part as masters of the enterprises and to make best use of their intelligence and talent. 6) Turn some of the small state-owned enterprises over to collective or individual management, by contract or lease.

51. In order to invigorate enterprises, barriers between different departments and between regions must be broken down, and provinces, autonomous regions, cities of all sizes and all rural areas should open their doors to each other and expand their commodity markets, under the guidance of planning. We must not only continue to expand the consumer goods market, but also gradually reduce the varieties and quantities of means of production allocated by the state, so as to expand the market for them as well. To meet the needs of market expansion, we should gradually open up or expand the market of funds and of technology and encourage a rational flow of labour. Only by establishing an integrated network of markets under the guidance of state policies and plans and by improving market management can we enable competitive forces to play their role in selecting the superior and eliminating the inferior and allow economic levers to perform their regulatory function to fundamentally improve economic efficiency in enterprises and society as a whole. As the market network steadily improves, we must gradually reduce the scope of mandatory planning in favour of guidance planning, strive for an overall balance and shift the emphasis of planning to exercising indirect but more comprehensive macro-control through various economic policies and measures.

52. The key to the gradual establishment and perfection of the market system is reform of the pricing and price control systems. Except for a few major commodities whose prices should continue to be determined by the state, price controls on everyday consumer goods should be systematically relaxed and replaced by market regulation. As for major means of production, we should gradually reduce the proportion of goods whose prices are set by the state, increase the proportion of those whose prices are determined by the market, and steadily readjust planned prices so that the disparity between the planned and market prices will gradually diminish. The increase in production costs due to the rising prices of major means of production should be offset as much as possible by raising labour productivity, reducing consumption of energy and materials and making full use of enterprises' potential. We must strictly control the extent of price increases. The fees charged by certain major public utilities and service trades should remain under state control and should be readjusted in a planned way. Price controls in tertiary industry should in general be gradually relaxed. Through these reforms, we will establish a pricing system that combines uniformity and flexibility by controlling prices on a few commodities and services and allowing prices for most of them to float. Thus we will expand the regulatory role of prices as the most important and efficient economic lever in production, distribution and consumption. In reforming the pricing and price control systems, we must consider the capabilities of the state, the enterprises and the people and maintain the basic stability of overall price levels to avoid excessive social repercussions. This is a principle we must strictly observe. Industrial and commercial administration departments must enforce rigorous control over prices. All state-owned industrial and commercial enterprises, supply-and-marketing departments and co-operatives should accumulate enough materials and economic means to take an active part in regulating the market and in keeping prices stable through purchases and sales. This is indispensable to the smooth progress of price reform, and is an essential element in the planned commodity economy.

(Proposal of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party for the Seventh Five-Year Plan for National Economic And Social Development – Adopted at the National Conference of the Communist Party of China, September 23, 1985. In: Beijing Review, October 7, 1985, pp. 18-20) (IMG)

There is no doubt that the Deng faction held the upper hand in the Conference, for otherwise, the pro-market and pro-decentralization ‘reforms’ which the Deng faction advocated would not have been pursued as the Party line. However, in case there is need for a direct quote to affirm that Deng did support the ‘accomplishments’ of the National Conference, here it goes:

Comrades,

This National Conference is a very good one. It has successfully accomplished the scheduled texts.

(Deng Xiaoping’s Speech At the CPC National Conference. In: Beijing Review, September 30, 1985, p. 15) (IMG)

The National Conference strengthened the Deng faction’s already-existing policy of getting China into massive debt. Proudly boasting of China’s selling of bonds as though bonds are some kind of a real product made in China, the Beijing Review reported:

International Bond Flotations

In the first five months of this year, the China International Trust and Investment Corp. (CITIC) and the Bank of China issued bonds in Tokyo, and Hong Kong and Singapore, totalling an equivalent of 60 billion yen and US$200 million. Between 1982 and April 1987, China floated 25 bond issues valued at US$2.789 billion on the international financial markets, as an important means of raising foreign exchange.

In January 1982, CITIC issued individual bonds of 10 billion yen on the Japanese market for the first time. Over the last few years, more and more foreign exchange has been required in China, and as a result, the flotations have also grown.

Year	Bond values (US$ million)
------	-------------------------------

1982	43.58
1983	20.23
1984	83.17
1985	786.46
1986	1,255.53

The Bank of China floated 9 bond issues of US$1.317 billion in Tokyo, Frankfurt and Singapore; CITIC, 10 bond issues worth US$1.03 billion in Tokyo, Hong Kong and Frankfurt; the Investment Enterprise Co. of Fujian Province, 3 bond issues of US$ 120 million in Tokyo and Singapore; the trust and investment corporations of Guangdong Province, Shanghai and Tianjin one issue each in Tokyo with a value of US$129 million, 131 million and 61.73 million respectively.

The Bank of China and the Investment Enterprise Co. of Fujian Province are making preparations for issuing new bonds. (Beijing Review, June 15, 1987, p. 29) (IMG)

Two years later, the government was forced to admit to being on the verge of a debt crisis. Calling the ‘bold’ borrowing policy ‘A Knife Cutting Both Ways’, an article titled ‘China’s Borrowing: The Key to Preventing a Debt Crisis’ published by the Beijing Review stated:

Ten years ago, China neither external nor internal debts. However, through the pursuit of the policies of opening and reform, China has rapidly learned how to raise foreign loans and make [alleged] effective use of them. (China’s Borrowing: The Key to Preventing a Debt Crisis, Chen Jian (Renmin Ribao Correspondent). In: Beijing Review, April 3-9, 1989, p. 23) (IMG)

At the same time, China faced a massive inflation in 1989. The Deng faction’s ‘solution’ for such an inflation problem was to call for “a 649-million-yuan budget cut,” a massive reduction of spending on the development of the productive forces:

The Chinese have declared war on public enemy number one--inflation--calling for a 649-million-yuan budget cut. Finance Minister Wang Bingqian said that governments, both central and local, will have to balance their books to stop state deficits pegged at 7.4 billion yuan this year. The chopping of 8.1 percent from government spending announced March 21 at the Second Session of the Seventh National People’s Congress (NPC) continued Beijing’s rectification programme. Wang’s report hit out at government overspending for being a “contributing factor in inflation” -- the worst since liberation (1949), that has disrupted economic stability by chewing into the limited savings of common people. The exceptions to these cuts include increased payments to the farm community as well as wage increases to workers and staff members of administrative organs and public institutions. The State Council has also decided to increase subsistence allowances for retirees in these public and state-owned enterprises at an opportune time this year. Overall, Wang said, this year’s budget will pursue a financial policy of retrenchment, curb demand for funds, reduce expenditures and control deficits. Plans will also be made to build up revenues. The state budget projects revenues of 285.68 billion yuan, an increase of 10.4 percent over last year, and expenditures of 293.08 billion yuan, a 9.8 increase. Revenues in the budget include domestic receipts of 269.18 billion yuan and foreign loans of 16.5 billion yuan. And expenditures in the 1989 budget include 276.58 billion yuan covered by domestic funds and 16.5 billion yuan by foreign loans. Major items of expenditure include aid to rural production and other operating expenses for agriculture, 17.396 billion yuan, 1.886 billion yuan or 12.2 percent more than in last year; expenses for culture, education, science and public health,

51.388 billion yuan, an increase of 3.481 billion yuan or 7.3 percent; capital construction, 62.792 billion yuan, an increase of 843 million yuan; servicing the internal debt, 2.548 billion yuan and the foreign loans, 7.02 billion yuan. The increase of expenditure for salary and wage readjustments in administrative organs and institutions will be 3.5 billion yuan. NPC representatives have won concessions from the State Council to include specific budget breakdowns on both the central and local levels in the future, said the Finance Minister. Total expenditures in 1988 came to 266.831 billion yuan with revenues totalling 258.782 billion yuan, leaving a deficit of 8.049 billion yuan, said Wang. The figures might change when the final accounts comes out, but the deficit is not likely to exceed the estimated amount. (Thrift Policy Holds Inflation. In: Beijing Review, April 3-9, 1989, p. 6) (IMG)

All of the economic problems which Deng-era China was promoting could have been avoided, and all the problems that arose could be easily resolved, provided the existence of political will, of course. As confirmed by China's Ministry of Commerce, in 1986 and 1989, the GDP growth saw a slow-down, and 1988 saw a double-digit inflation:

3. Disordered investment behavior will cause economic fluctuations: After the implementation of the opening-up policy, economic fluctuations have become a common phenomenon. This two-decade growth cycle occurs frequently. The slowdown in GDP growth in 1986 and 1989 and the double-digit inflation in 1988 and 1993-95 were the result of the business cycle. While these fluctuations in growth and inflation may be caused by temporary imbalances in certain sectors, they do not appear to have a significant impact on the economy as a whole. These imbalances are most likely caused directly or indirectly by investment anomalies. (Rapid Development and Fluctuation of China's Economy (1980-1999), Ministry of Commerce of the People's Republic of China, July 17, 2002. Bold added.) (IMG)

As confirmed by China's Ministry of Commerce, unemployment grew from 1985 onwards all the way till 1990, the main years of the Deng period: Imprecisely, its trending direction should suggest the orientation of unemployment. Figure 1.h shows that the unemployment rate bottomed out around 1985, then turned to rise until it reached equilibrium during 1990-93. (Rapid Development and Fluctuation of China's Economy (1980-1999), Ministry of Commerce of the People's Republic of China, July 17, 2002) (IMG)

Furthermore, there were recessions in 1986 and 1989, and there were economic fluctuations rather than rapid growth:

These time curves show economic fluctuations rather than rapid growth. Fluctuations in real GDP growth rates show the chronology of business cycles over the past two decades. Figure 2.a shows that the business cycle peaked in 1984, 1987 and 1992, and troughed in 1986 and 1989-1990 (these records are consistent with the findings of Liu Xiucheng in the 1995 Blue Book). The recessions of 1986 and 1989 were short-lived and the economy rebounded quickly. (Rapid Development and Fluctuation of China's Economy (1980-1999), Ministry of Commerce of the People's Republic of China, July 17, 2002) (IMG)

The double-digit inflation, the great debt, the recessions and unemployment, and the corruption all arose out of the economic Titoization reforms undertaken by the Deng faction. Decentralization, the promotion of the market, and the de-emphasis of heavy industry all directly contributed to getting China on the verge of economic collapse.

From the text of the previously-cited excerpt of the economic plan adopted by the Chinese 'Communist' Party in the 1985 conference, this quote is particularly astonishing:

We must not only continue to expand the consumer goods market, but also gradually reduce the varieties and quantities of means of production allocated by the state, so as to expand the market for them as well. (Proposal of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party for the Seventh Five-Year Plan for National Economic And Social Development – Adopted at the National Conference of the Communist Party of China, September 23, 1985. In: Beijing Review, October 7, 1985, pp. 18-20) (IMG)

In other words, the Chinese 'Communist' Party was arguing that in order to expand the consumer goods sector, the state should reduce the allocation of the means of production to the consumer goods sector. And the interesting aspect of this point by the Party is that it is within the context of the Party emphasizing consumer goods (light industry) over producer goods (heavy industry):

To ensure rapid growth of the consumer goods industry, we must continue to give it priority in procurement of loans, access to foreign exchange. the use of energy, raw and semi-finished materials and transport services. Price differences must gradually widen between ordinary products and brand-name, high-quality and new products, in order to encourage greater variety, better quality and the manufacture of new products. (Proposal of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party for the Seventh Five-Year Plan for National Economic And Social Development – Adopted at the National Conference of the Communist Party of China, September 23, 1985. In: Beijing Review, October 7, 1985, p. 10) (IMG)

In other words, the Party line was to 'prioritize' light industry over heavy industry but not to provide the light industry sector with the factory pieces for growth, because, the Party alleged, the allocation of factory pieces to the light industry sector will prevent the market from providing the factory pieces! Basically, the argument of the Party was as follows: "We should make the consumer goods sector grow, but we, the state, should not help it grow, because if we help it grow, the share of the market in making consumer goods grow will reduce." Not only is that a next-level clownish neoliberal argument, it is a policy of systematic industrial sabotage committed against the Chinese proletariat. The decline of China's heavy industry, the massive corruption and double-digit inflation were completely natural results of this policy along with other decentralization measures.

The CIA is infamous for its promotion of liberal economic reforms and decentralization. And yet, despite its massive campaign of propaganda in favour of decentralization, even the CIA could not hide the fact that economic decentralization actually results in a failing economy struck by corrupt bureaucracy, heavy debt, and inflation, amongst other economic ills. No, citing the CIA on the economic damage inflicted upon China due to Dengist decentralization is far from being CIA 'propaganda'. On the contrary, it debunks the CIA propaganda narrative that decentralization in China boosted that land's productive forces, when in fact, contrary to CIA propaganda, and as admitted by declassified CIA internal documents, decentralization decimated the Chinese economy.

The CIA confirmed that China's 'conservatives' were correct in stating that decentralization had caused China's massive inflation:

Conservatives have cited China's inflation, excessive investment, budget deficits, and foreign exchange shortfalls to criticize reformers for economic mismanagement, arguing that relaxed central controls are responsible for the economic dislocations. They are probably particularly alarmed by State Statistical Bureau figures showing that China's inflation rate has increased each month since April. Conservatives may argue that social stability is jeopardized because living standards for about one-fifth of urban workers have fallen this year; wage gains for some workers have not kept pace with inflation.

Conservatives are correct in believing that by relaxing central controls Beijing has increased inflationary pressures. Since the early 1980s, Beijing has broadened enterprise autonomy – particularly by allowing state factories to retain a larger share of their revenues and permitting them to sell overquota production of industrial goods at "negotiated," above-plan prices. However, it has not implemented effective measures to make enterprise managers accountable if funds are used inefficiently.

Judging from past responses to economic problems, we believe conservatives want to strengthen administrative controls over economic decision making and increase reliance on central plans. Conservatives would also like to lessen enterprise discretion over investment, and tighten controls over prices, wages, land use in the countryside, and foreign trade.

(China: A Look at 1987: Background Papers for the US Delegation of US-PRC Joint Economic Committee 16-18 November 1987, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, October 23, 1987, p. 8) (IMG)

A solution to an issue like inflation is to pursue the policy of 'material balances', according to which the inputs and outputs would be measured so as to correspond to each other – e.g. X amount of rubber for Y amount of tires for Z number of cars. The 'material balances' system ensures that the amounts of inputs and outputs are carefully calculated, centrally, so as to minimize waste and maximize production. This system of material balances, of course, required central planning, something to which the Deng faction was hostile.

The neoliberal model of the economy relies on monetary policy for 'improving' the conditions of industry and bringing about economic 'growth'. Actually, reliance on 'monetary policy' is reliance on the supply of pieces of paper and some thin air. Idealistic is the belief that changes in the supply and demand of pieces of paper can somehow be so great in effect as to be able to boost production. Reliance on the supply of pieces of paper in order to determine the level of the production of iron and steel – such is the idealism of the neoliberal model, not much better than the Maoist policy of 'producing' metals using blast furnaces. The Deng faction pursued the neoliberal model of the economy, relying on 'monetary policy', within the context of a decentralized market, for 'developing' the productive forces. There should be no surprise as to the fact that China's economy was devastated. The CIA confirmed that the strengthening of the local governments, resultant from decentralization, had prevented even the market mechanisms from easing inflation – as if the market, fiscal, and monetary policy was ever going to ease inflation. The CIA further confirmed that the empowering of the local governments had disabled the Chinese central government from blocking local governments' excess spending on low-priority construction projects. The CIA reported:

Political infighting this year, however, has prevented reformers from effectively using monetary and fiscal policies to ease inflationary pressure. Beijing [i.e. central government] has been unable, for example, to stop spending by local governments on low-priority construction projects, such as hotels and municipal halls:

Branches of China's central bank are ignoring head-office directives to limit credit and continue to fund whatever projects local officials want.

Previous reforms gave local governments a greater share of tax revenues, making them less dependent on funds from central coffers.

(China: A Look at 1987: Background Papers for the US Delegation of US-PRC Joint Economic Committee 16-18 November 1987, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, October 23, 1987, p. 9) (IMG)

The centralization of the economy in practice means a tighter coordination of the different sectors of the economy, as information from different local sectors is collected, centralized, and used for a central plan. Economic decentralization, by contrast, results in the empowering of local enterprises such that these local enterprises fail to coordinate with each other for production. The chaos resultant from the lack of coordination is precisely the key factor that allows for so much corruption and mafia, as was seen in Dengist China and elsewhere. The CIA further confirmed that the Chinese bureaucrats were using the loopholes resultant from the decentralization reforms as a means of filling their pockets:

Some Chinese bureaucrats, for example, are exploiting loopholes in reform policies by using their connections to purchase goods at low in-plan prices and resell them at much higher market prices. Public cynicism toward reform reportedly has begun to grow because many of the people involved are the children of senior officials. (China: A Look at 1987: Background Papers for the US Delegation of US-PRC Joint Economic Committee 16-18 November 1987, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, October 23, 1987, p. 10) (IMG)

Mao Zedong was a believer in the decentralization of the industrial sector. Deng Xiaoping pursued Mao's policy to as extreme as he could, and thereby proliferated a huge corrupt bureaucracy that produced millionaire and billionaire oligarchs in the Party and state, oligarchs that generate their profits through increasing corruption, 'biting' from production rather than expanding production, and in brief, sabotaging the economy. The Dengist right-deviation presents the corrupt oligarchs as the class force behind economic growth, as a national industrial bourgeoisie, when in fact such oligarchs have been a comprador bourgeoisie, a saboteurial and diversionary bourgeoisie allied to finance capital, an anti-industrial bourgeoisie. Only in the heartland of imperialist powers allied to the reactionary classes do the corrupt bureaucrats serve to expand military-industrial production. 'Thanks' to decentralization, the central government of China did not have a consolidated record of local finances:

With the compartmentalism of the Chinese bureaucracy, in any case, Beijing does not have a consolidated record of all the borrowings of its regional and state agencies. (China: A Look at 1987: Background Papers for the US Delegation of US-PRC Joint Economic Committee 16-18 November 1987, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, October 23, 1987, pp. 20-21) (IMG)

The 'conservative' faction in China had a difficult time reasserting central government control over the decentralized finances:

Leaders who are counting on local officials to carry out broader reform objectives have rejected proposals to restrict provincial control over bank loans and taxes, according to US Embassy contacts. (China: A Look at 1987: Background Papers for the US Delegation of US-PRC Joint Economic Committee 16-18 November 1987, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, October 23, 1987, p. 9) (IMG)

As explained in C1S6, the collectivization of agriculture was necessary for economic growth. However, the "Peoples' Communes" system in China was a left-deviationist policy that, in contradiction with the policy of collectivization, aggressively pushed the kolkhoz peasants into so-called 'communes' at a suspiciously too a high pace. Such an excessively high pace and such a leap from small farms and farm collectives into large communes was undoubtedly a left-deviationist policy that decimated the welfare of the Chinese people. The Deng regime undid the so-called 'People's Communes', and moved from the reactionary left-deviationist policy of the Mao era to the reactionary right-deviationist policy of de facto opposition to collectivization. It was inevitable that during the transition from this left-deviationist policy onto the right-deviationist policy, there would – for a very brief period of time – be a period of moderate economic policy as the transitional midpoint in between the Maoist left-deviationist and the Dengist right-deviationist policy lines. The moderate line that lies in between the left-deviationist and right-deviationist lines, is the line that brings economic growth. And this brief period of moderate policy, in the swing from left-opportunism to right-opportunism, did yield some acceleration in economic growth initially. However, the transition to the right-deviationist policy of opposition to collectivization inevitably boosted the parasitic kulak class that corrupted China's agriculture.

The policies of the Deng faction concerning the ‘Cultural Revolution’ bore some analogy to its agricultural policy in that it marked a swing from left-opportunism onto right-opportunism. Yes, the ‘Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution’ was a reactionary Maoist left-opportunist policy line that was damaging the Chinese people’s economic welfare. Yet, so is it also true that the excess cultural liberality promoted by the Deng faction emboldened and agitated the counter-revolutionary intelligentsia, allowing the imperialist-fascist secret services to freely agitate for one student colour revolution after another, of which the protests in Tiananmen were only the most infamous. Prior to Tiananmen, the student colour revolutions were occurring, which the CIA admitted was the result of the ‘liberal rhetoric of the spring’:

Moreover, the student demonstrations in December, which were encouraged by the liberal rhetoric of the spring, aroused fears of instability and lent credence to conservative arguments that excessive liberalization was undermining party control. (China: A Look at 1987: Background Papers for the US Delegation of US-PRC Joint Economic Committee 16-18 November 1987, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, October 23, 1987, p. 3) (IMG)

Even in the recent years, China has suffered from the student colour revolutions. Therefore, while the left-opportunist ‘Cultural Revolution’ was something from which to liberate China, no doubt, the Deng faction’s right-opportunist cultural liberality also promoted the CIA-backed student colour revolutions. And much as how the left-opportunist Red Guards were disrupting China’s production, so too did the right-opportunist liberal Chinese student protesters – and the Dengists certainly deserve the blame for the latter if not also the former.

Double-digit inflation, massive debt, unemployment, recessions, a decentralized economy that wastes massive amounts of resources, student colour revolutions resultant from a liberal cultural policy and disrupting the economy, a corrupt bureaucratic class made up of millionaires sucking the wealth of the economy without contributing to production – such was the ‘economic growth’ which the Deng Xiaoping faction brought to China. The Dengist intellectuals babbled the reactionary narrative that China was an exception, that decentralization in Eastern Europe and the USSR was pro-imperialist and anti-proletarian, but that somehow it was not pro-imperialist and anti-proletarian when applied in China. The Dengist intellectuals parroted the reactionary narrative that somehow, decentralization and pro-market policies by the Deng Xiaoping faction ‘grew’ China’s economy. No such a thing ever happened. Such severe economic problems in China were entirely avoidable, provided that there was political will to resolve them. The solution, as was mentioned in greater detail before, was to re-centralize the economy. However, the Deng faction were hostile to such an idea.

C23S5.6. CIA agent Deng Supports CIA-backed Tiananmen Colour Revolutionaries

Slowly, as a result of the growing manifest opposition of the Chinese proletarians to the proliferation of bureaucracy and double-digit inflation by the Deng faction, the anti-imperialist forces in the Chinese ‘Communist’ Party were gaining greater power in their struggle, at the expense of the Deng faction. One of Deng Xiaoping’s henchmen was of course Zhao Ziyang. Zhao’s career as a Premier of China and a General-Secretary of the Party was directly correlated with the rise of the Deng faction. When the Deng faction saw an elevation in influence, Zhao too was promoted in his rank as a Chinese regime official. Furthermore, Zhao Ziyang shared Deng Xiaoping’s views of economic Titoization ‘reforms’. Take for example the following remark by Zhao in which he declares support for the reactionary Titoist ‘Socialism with Chinese Characteristics’ and endorses a drastic economic decentralization and the expansion of the role of the market. Zhao said:

The period of the Seventh Five-year Plan is a crucial one for general reform of the country's economic structure. We must give the reform top priority if we want to lay the foundation, over the next five years and beyond, for a vigorous socialist economic structure with Chinese characteristics.

The restructuring of the national economy with focus on the cities is a tremendous, complicated task of social systems engineering. A new economic structure should serve to develop a planned commodity economy based on public ownership. To this end, we must do the following three things. First, further invigorate enterprises, especially state-owned large and medium-sized ones, and make them socialist commodity manufacturers and dealers that are relatively independent in management and responsible for their own profit and loss. Second, further expand the planned socialist commodity market and gradually improve the marketing system. And third, gradually relax the state's direct control over the economic operation of enterprises in favour of indirect controls, in the form of economic, legal and, if necessary, administrative means. All three things must be well coordinated.

(Explanation of the Proposal for the Seventh Five-Year Plan — Made at the National Conference of the Communist Party of China, Zhao Ziyang, September 18, 1985. In: Beijing Review, October 7, 1985, p. 10) (IMG)

The above remarks were a part of Zhao’s proposals in the Chinese Party conference for economic ‘reform’ in 1985, the reforms, adopted by the Party in that conference, that produced the double-digit inflation, unemployment, recession, corruption, etc. Yet, as confirmed by the CIA, Zhao Ziyang, who had the support of Deng Xiaoping and was a major ally of Deng, saw a slow erosion of his influence thanks to the rise of the anti-imperialist (‘conservative’) faction, the faction backed by the Chinese proletariat, in the Party:

Perhaps the single most important issue will be how Zhao Ziyang proves himself in his new position as party head. Zhao has many advantages – he is respected by both sides, has a generally successful record as premier, and has a personal political style much better suited to Chinese politics than was the abrasive Hu Yaobang's. He also has Deng Xiaoping's support, crucial to his success but a two-edged sword – he will have to find a way to establish himself as heir without alienating Deng. On the down side, Zhao is constrained by the continued influence of powerful conservative elders; he also has a decision-making machinery not entirely of his own choosing and not entirely in sympathy with his ideas. Ironically, this is especially true in economic policy bodies that Zhao once dominated. Finally, Zhao as party chief must deal with sensitive and messy issues such as the party's role under reform, or the ideological legitimacy of progressive economic proposals, that, as premier, he generally tried to avoid. If Zhao successfully manages the next few months, however, the long-term advantage is with him, view, as age will erode the ranks of prestigious party elders. (China: A Look at 1987: Background Papers for the US Delegation of US-PRC Joint Economic Committee 16-18 November 1987, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, October 23, 1987, p. 4) (IMG)

Despite the weight of argument in the favour of the so-called ‘conservative’ faction, the latter only slowly increased its influence in the Chinese state apparatus, with ups and downs in this current:

Conservative criticism of reform policies received a boost when reformers encountered problems in the economic area – inflation, a growing budget deficit, foreign exchange shortages – that forced a slowdown in implementation of economic reforms. Conservatives had warned against some of these problems, which lent weight to their arguments that reform had moved too fast and it was time to retrench. (...).

The marked conservative shift has been moderated somewhat since last May. We believe the turning point came when some conservative leaders overplayed their hand and attempted to push the "anti- bourgeois liberalization" campaign into the economic sphere. Deng moved against this threat to his reforms, and the balance began to shift. Ideological pronouncements once again praise reform and promise continued experimentation, but they are still careful to stress the socialist nature of reforms--providing an opening for conservative pressure.

Recent evidence indicates that Deng and his allies have had to settle for a patchwork of compromises that includes a Politburo younger in average age but evenly balanced between reformers and conservatives. While reformers have made some gains in staffing party organs, conservative influence on economic policy making has increased. Political structural reform--a reformist code term for further reduction of party influence over government and economic decision making--seems stalled at the "general discussion" stage. In the months after the congress, we look for continued tensions and jockeying for power as leaders, including recently "retired" party elders seek to consolidate their positions and press their advantages.

(China: A Look at 1987: Background Papers for the US Delegation of US-PRC Joint Economic Committee 16-18 November 1987, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, October 23, 1987, p. 3) (IMG)

By 1989, the anti-imperialist faction was seeing yet another boost in its influence, as the Chinese proletarians expressed discontent towards the state of affairs in the Dengist economy and increased pressure against the Deng faction. Against the tide in favour of the anti-imperialist ('conservative') faction, the CIA and its allied comprador forces in China mobilized the Chinese intelligentsia to launch the Tiananmen colour revolution. The Anglo-American media propagates the myth that Deng Xiaoping was the main figure behind the suppression of the counter-revolutionary intelligentsia in Tiananmen. Not true. The Tiananmen colour revolutionaries, far from contradicting the Deng faction, were the combat units confronting the anti-imperialist faction of the Chinese Party, the faction opposed to the Deng gang. There was no reason for the CIA-backed Chinese intelligentsia to contradict the fascist spy for the CIA, Deng Xiaoping. As a matter of fact, the key agent linking the Deng group with the student colour revolutionaries was none other than Zhao Ziyang. The Deng henchman was regarded by the CIA-backed student colour revolutionaries as the leader of the Tiananmen protests. Prominent Human Rights Watch (HRW) and Amnesty International official Andrew Nathan admitted that the Western narrative that Deng was the main figure behind the 'crackdown' on Tiananmen was false. Nathan wrote:

The Tiananmen papers show that during the crisis Deng participated intimately in every important decision. His personal aide, Yang Shangkun (whose formal position was head of state but whose real job was Deng's business manager within the leadership), attended all important Politburo meetings. The most important decisions were made at Deng's house. It was Deng's idea to label the demonstrations "turmoil." He made the decision to declare martial law, he accepted the resignation of Zhao Ziyang, he engineered the selection of Jiang Zemin, he gave the order for the military to move on the Square, and after the crackdown he set the policy direction of trying to continue the ten-year project of economic reform and opening to the West despite the setback dealt to those projects by the events of the spring. Deng did not play this role happily.

(The Tiananmen Papers, Compiled by: Zhang Liang, Edited by: Andrew J. Nathan, Perry Link, Orville Schell, 2002, p. XXXV) (IMG)

Indeed, the primary source documents presented by Nathan show that Deng Xiaoping was not so powerful, and had been compelled to nod on the decisions during the time of the confrontation against Tiananmen protesters. To his friend Yang Shangkun, Deng Xiaoping complained:

These last few days I've been thinking. I've never been formally number 1 in the Party, but everybody keeps hanging around me, showing me deference. I have to give the nod on every important decision. I carry too much weight, and that's not good for the Party or the state. (Deng Xiaoping's sense of injury, Excerpt from memoranda of conversations supplied by a friend of Yang Shangkun who cannot be further identified. In: The Tiananmen Papers, Compiled by: Zhang Liang, Edited by: Andrew J. Nathan, Perry Link, Orville Schell, 2002, p. 288) (IMG)

Deng added:

You know that I've taken a lot of heat inside the Party since this whole thing broke out. After Zhao's speech to the ADB, Xiannian told me this was the voice of a second headquarters inside the Party, and he wanted me to say something about it. Later Chen Yun, Xiannian, and others telephoned me with their views time and again. In their view, the students went to Tiananmen because the Center let it happen, and we should do something about it. (Deng Xiaoping's sense of injury, Excerpt from memoranda of conversations supplied by a friend of Yang Shangkun who cannot be further identified. In: The Tiananmen Papers, Compiled by: Zhang Liang, Edited by: Andrew J. Nathan, Perry Link, Orville Schell, 2002, p. 287) (IMG)

Deng was referring to the immense pressure of the anti-imperialist faction in the Party to compel Deng and his group to denounce their own henchman Zhao and the latter's subgroup. In any case, as a means of undercutting Deng Xiaoping's base of support in the Party, and as a means of dismantling the network led by the Deng group, the proletarian-backed anti-imperialist faction, the so-called 'conservative' faction, spearheaded the anti-Zhaoist purges. Anti-Zhaoist purges were really in practice anti-Dengist purges, since Zhao was Deng's close henchman. The George H. W. Bush advisor Richard Baum confirmed:

In the face of strong conservative pressures to prosecute Zhao Ziyang, spearheaded by Chen Yun and supported by Li Peng and Yao Yilin, Deng Xiaoping refused to be drawn into an anti-Zhao vendetta. Counseling caution and restraint in the handling of Zhao's case, China's senior leader once again revealed his underlying concern for carefully counterbalancing fang and shou [i.e. opening and closing]. "Let us not get tangled up in who is responsible for what right now," he said on 16 June; "Let those questions be raised two or three years from now." Deng prevailed, and no formal charges were filed against Zhao; however, for the next several months the former general secretary remained confined to quarters, living in relative comfort at Hu Yaobang's former residence in Fuqiang Lane, Beijing. Although Deng's personal intervention enabled Zhao to avoid criminal prosecution, CAC old comrades nonetheless went forward with their attempt to root out remnant Zhaoists within the Party apparatus. At the end of June 1989, the CDIC, under Peng Zhen protege Qiao Shi, launched a new rectification drive, in the course of which all Party members in Beijing and other cities were required to undergo investigation and reregistration in connection with their attitudes and behavior during the six weeks of turmoil.

('The Road to Tiananmen: Chinese Politics in the 1980s', author: Richard Baum. In: 'The Politics of China: The Eras of Mao and Deng', Cambridge University Press edited by: Roderick MacFarquhar, 1997, p. 466) (IMG)

The Chinese anti-imperialist forces and the agents coopted by them in China's 'Communist' Party resisted opening up to the Anglo-American imperialists as advocated by the faction of the CIA agent Deng.

The purge against the Zhaoists weakened Deng's influence over the Party. This is corroborated by the Boston University scholar on Chinese history, Joseph Fewsmith, whose work was published and edited by Roderick MacFarquhar, the former Parliamentary Private Secretary to the minister of state at the UK Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Fewsmith wrote:

Tiananmen shook the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) to its core. The charge leveled against former general secretary Zhao Ziyang was that "[a]t the critical juncture involving the life and death of the Party and state, he made the mistake of supporting turmoil and splitting the Party, and he bears unshirkable responsibility for the formation and development of the turmoil. The nature and consequences of his mistakes are very serious." The issues the Party faced, however, ran far deeper than even this charge suggested. Tiananmen threw open a whole series of questions that had been simmering just below the surface for years.

The most fundamental of these was the nature of reform itself. Tiananmen, many Party leaders believed, was the inevitable denouement of the reform program that Zhao led and symbolized; more important, the content of that reform program was inextricably intertwined with Zhao's patron, senior leader Deng Xiaoping. The question raised by Tiananmen, then, was the nature of Deng's leadership and thus whether or not the Party should continue reform as Deng had defined it. Many believed it should not.

(‘Reaction, resurgence, and succession: Chinese politics since Tiananmen’, author: Joseph Fewsmith. In: ‘The Politics of China: The Eras of Mao and Deng’, edited by: Roderick MacFarquhar, 1997, p. 472) (IMG)

The denunciation of Zhao would have served to question the level of Deng's vigilance against Anglo-American intelligence conspiracies against China, and would have raised the question of whether Deng was linked to counter-revolutionary forces, which he obviously was. As Baum said, this ‘Zhao question’ would have questioned Deng's leadership:

The question of how to deal with Zhao Ziyang was inevitably linked with the question of Deng Xiaoping's leadership, not just because Zhao's selection first as premier and then as general secretary now seemed to reflect poorly on Deng Xiaoping's judgment, but because Zhao had been implementing a political-cum-economic line long supported by Deng. Deng clearly recognized that dismissing a second successor (following former general secretary Hu Yaobang's ouster in January 1987) would raise doubts about his own judgment, and he was determined to salvage as much advantage as he could by denying the fruits of victory to the winners. (‘Reaction, resurgence, and succession: Chinese politics since Tiananmen’, author: Joseph Fewsmith. In: ‘The Politics of China: The Eras of Mao and Deng’, edited by: Roderick MacFarquhar, 1997, pp. 473-474) (IMG)

Fewsmith also noted the deep division in the Party over Zhao's counter-revolutionary sympathies with the Tiananmen oppositionists:

The Fourth Plenary Session of the Thirteenth Central Committee, which convened on 23-4 June 1989 following a three-day enlarged Politburo meeting, confirmed Deng's decision to name Jiang Zemin as general secretary and added him, veteran planner Song Ping, and Tianjin mayor Li Ruihuan to the PSC. Li Ruihuan and Ding Guan'gen, Deng's bridge partner, were added to the Secretariat in partial replacement of Zhao associates Hu Qili, Rui Xing wen, and Yan Mingfu, who were removed. On the critical question of Zhao, however, the plenum could not come to a final resolution. Having judged Zhao's actions harshly, the conclave nevertheless could only declare that the party would "continue to investigate his problem."

The plenum's failure to conclude Zhao's case reflected the depth of division within the Party. Obviously, some within the Party wanted to pursue the issue of Zhao's guilt, perhaps even to the point of criminal prosecution, a course that would have had profound implications for Deng Xiaoping and the continuation of reform. For instance, Yuan Mu, the hard-line spokesman for the State Council and protege of Premier Li Peng, stated that Zhao's case would be handled "in accordance with the criterion based on law," suggesting the possibility of legal prosecution. Some Party elders were blunter. PRC president Li Xiannian allegedly called Zhao the "root cause of the riots and rebellion," while Party elder Peng Zhen accused Zhao of "attempting to topple the Communist Party and wreaking havoc with the socialist system in coordination with hostile powers at home and abroad."

(‘Reaction, resurgence, and succession: Chinese politics since Tiananmen’, author: Joseph Fewsmith. In: ‘The Politics of China: The Eras of Mao and Deng’, edited by: Roderick MacFarquhar, 1997, p. 475) (IMG)

Anyways, the Party, against the wishes of the Deng-Zhao clique, finally put down the Tiananmen colour revolutionaries. A report by the Political Officer (POLOFF) of the US intelligence den in Beijing provided a thorough description of the CIA conversation with the Pinochet-era Chilean second secretary Carlos Gallo and his wife. The following are excerpts of the intelligence report, which confirm that there was no bloodshed in the Tiananmen square itself, despite the fact that there was bloodshed elsewhere in Beijing:

1. CONFIDENTIAL - ENTIRE TEXT.

2. SUMMARY DURING A RECENT MEETING, A LATIN AMERICAN DIPLOMAT AND HIS WIFE PROVIDED POLOFF AN ACCOUNT OF THEIR MOVEMENTS ON JUNE 3-4 AND THEIR EYEWITNESS ACCOUNT OF EVENTS AT TIANANMEN SQUARE. ALTHOUGH THEIR ACCOUNT GENERALLY FOLLOWS THOSE PREVIOUSLY REPORTED, THEIR UNIQUE EXPERIENCES PROVIDE ADDITIONAL INSIGHT AND CORROBORATION OF EVENTS IN THE SQUARE. THEY WERE ABLE TO ENTER AND LEAVE THE SQUARE SEVERAL TIMES AND WERE NOT HARASSED BY TROOPS. REMAINING WITH STUDENTS BY THE MONUMENT TO THE PEOPLE'S HEROES UNTIL THE FINAL WITHDRAWAL, THE DIPLOMAT SAID THERE WERE NO MASS SHOOTINGS OF STUDENTS IN THE SQUARE OR AT THE MONUMENT. END SUMMARY.

3. DURING A RECENT MEETING, CHILEAN SECOND SECRETARY CARLOS GALLO AND HIS WIFE (PLEASE PROTECT) PROVIDED POLOFF AN ACCOUNT OF THEIR MOVEMENTS ON JUNE 3-4 AND THEIR EYEWITNESS ACCOUNT OF EVENTS AT TIANANMEN SQUARE. ALTHOUGH THE GALLO'S ACCOUNT GENERALLY FOLLOWS THOSE PREVIOUSLY REPORTED, THEIR UNIQUE EXPERIENCES PROVIDE ADDITIONAL INSIGHT AND CORROBORATION OF EVENTS IN THE SQUARE. (...).

8. GALLO EVENTUALLY ENDED UP AT THE RED CROSS STATION, AGAIN HOPING THAT TROOPS WOULD NOT FIRE ON THE MEDICAL PERSONNEL THERE. HE WATCHED THE MILITARY ENTER THE SQUARE AND DID NOT OBSERVE ANY MASS FIRING OF WEAPONS INTO THE CROWDS, ALTHOUGH SPORADIC GUNFIRE WAS HEARD. HE SAID THAT MOST OF THE TROOPS WHICH ENTERED THE SQUARE WERE ACTUALLY ARMED ONLY WITH ANTI-RIOT GEAR--TRUNCHEONS AND WOODEN CLUBS; THEY WERE BACKED UP BY ARMED SOLDIERS. AS THE MILITARY

CONSOLIDATED ITS CONTROL OF THE SQUARE'S PERIMETER, STUDENTS AND CIVILIANS GATHERED AROUND THE MONUMENT TO THE PEOPLE'S HEROES. GALLO SAID WOUNDED, INCLUDING SOME SOLDIERS, CONTINUED TO BE BROUGHT TO THE RED CROSS STATION.

9. THE TROOPS BEGAN A SLOW ORDERLY APPROACH TO THE MONUMENT FROM THE NORTH WITH SOLDIERS ON FOOT PRECEDING APCs. FROM WHAT HE COULD SEE, GALLO FELT THAT MOST OF THE TENTS ON THE SQUARE WERE EMPTY WHEN THE ARMORED VEHICLES ROLLED OVER THEM. THE FIRST LINE OF TROOPS TO REACH THE MONUMENT AREA, PASSED BY THE RED CROSS STATION AND IGNORED THE MEDICAL PERSONNEL AND WOUNDED. AS A SECOND LINE OF TROOPS APPROACHED, THEY CIRCLED THE RED CROSS STATION AND BEGAN YELLING AND THROWING STICKS AND DEBRIS OVER THE HEADS OF THE PEOPLE AT THE STATION. THE MEDICAL PERSONNEL PANICKED AND FLED, LEAVING BEHIND THE WOUNDED. MOST PEOPLE, INCLUDING GALLO, FLED TO THE MONUMENT AREA WHERE THE STUDENTS WERE GATHERED.

10. ALTHOUGH GUNFIRE COULD BE HEARD, GALLO SAID THAT APART FROM SOME BEATING OF STUDENTS, THERE WAS NO MASS FIRING INTO THE CROWD OF STUDENTS AT THE MONUMENT. WHEN POLOFF MENTIONED SOME REPORTEDLY EYEWITNESS ACCOUNTS OF MASSACRES AT THE MONUMENT WITH AUTOMATIC WEAPONS, GALLO SAID THAT THERE WAS NO SUCH SLAUGHTER. ONCE AGREEMENT WAS REACHED FOR THE STUDENTS TO WITHDRAW, LINKING HANDS TO FORM A COLUMN, THE STUDENTS LEFT THE SQUARE THROUGH THE SOUTHEAST CORNER. ESSENTIALLY EVERYONE, INCLUDING GALLO, LEFT. THE FEW THAT ATTEMPTED TO REMAIN BEHIND WERE BEATEN AND DRIVEN TO JOIN THE END OF THE DEPARTING PROCESSION. ONCE OUTSIDE THE SQUARE, THE STUDENTS HEADED WEST ON QIANMEN DAIJIE WHILE GALLO HEADED EAST TO HIS CAR. THEREFORE, HE COULD NOT COMMENT ON REPORTS THAT STUDENTS WERE AMBUSHED AND SLAUGHTERED IN THE ALLEY JUST WEST OF THE SQUARE NEAR THE BEIJING CONCERT HALL.

(LATIN AMERICAN DIPLOMAT EYEWITNESS ACCOUNT OF JUNE 3-4 EVENTS ON TIANANMEN SQUARE, 89BEIJING18828_a, from: US intelligence, to: US Commander in Chief of the US Pacific Command, US Secretary of State, US Secretary of Defense, US Information Agency, July 12, 1989) (IMG)

The bloodshed that existed elsewhere during the 1989 colour revolution could only mainly be because of either of the following: (1) the provocative terrorist agents of Deng and the CIA inside the Chinese security apparatus aimed to assist the CIA-MI6 colour revolutionaries by terrorizing civilians so to provoke civilians into an uprising against the Chinese state; the uprising against the Chinese state would have undermined those elements that resisted the Dengist reforms and would have strengthened Deng's leverage in liberalizing China enough so that China gets partitioned; for years, the PLA and Chinese intelligence had cooperated with the CIA in espionage against Eurasia, in funding Al-Qaeda in Afghanistan, in waging war on Vietnam, etc.; hence the PLA and the Chinese intelligence were infiltrated by enough CIA-MI6 elements so that the mentioned outcome (i.e. provocative terror aimed at expanding the colour revolution) would inevitably happen. (2) Chinese colour revolutionaries engaged in violence against anti-Dengist elements in the Chinese security forces, so that the Deng faction could become stronger against the anti-Dengist elements in the Chinese security apparatus; hence, in response, the anti-Dengist elements in the Chinese security engaged against the colour revolutionaries and 'spilled the blood' of the pro-Deng colour revolutionary terrorists.

As a result of the purge of the Zhaoists, the influence of the Deng faction began to diminish, and correlated with this was the diminishing of the influence of US intelligence. The influence of US intelligence in China began to decline since 1989 but the decline was very slow, contrary to what the right-deviationists would have their readers believe. This is demonstrated, for example, in the fact that the CIA was still able to operate freely in China for the purpose of gathering military intelligence against the Eurasians (and against the anti-imperialist faction in China):

Trucks with highly classified tapes from two U.S.-built listening posts are still traveling from remote sites in western China to the U.S. Embassy in Beijing, despite a steadily worsening relationship between the two nations' governments, according to informed sources. At the same time, Chinese scientists have assured their U.S. counterparts that they will continue to furnish unique information on Soviet nuclear tests and other seismic disturbances recorded at nine other stations built by the United States in China, other sources said. In short, they said, the Chinese government has not allowed its public anger over the sanctuary provided to dissident Fang Lizhi at the U.S. Embassy or the U.S. cutoff of military sales and diplomatic contacts to interfere with a secret partnership that began more than a decade ago. (INTELLIGENCE TIES ENDURE DESPITE U.S.-CHINA STRAIN, The Washington Post, George Lardner Jr., R. Jeffrey Smith, June 25, 1989) (IMG)

In replacement of Zhao Ziyang and Deng Xiaoping, the anti-imperialist faction coopted and promoted Jiang Zemin. Jiang Zemin was a distant agent of Deng Xiaoping. An ally of Deng, he had been elevated during the Deng era, but was not in Deng's immediate entourage and did not have much power. As such, the anti-imperialist faction promoted him in exchange for him being a coopted yes-man. Chen Yun was not necessarily a loyal fighter for the progressive anti-imperialist cause and did not always promote a socialist revolutionary line, but he was coopted by the progressive anti-imperialist faction and thus was compelled to promote correct stances on many issues. In spite of promoting many Dengist right-deviations, he was nonetheless coopted to be the leading Party official spearheading the campaign against the Maoist 'Cultural Revolution', the 'Great Leap Forward', and the Trotskyite pseudo-collectivization of agriculture into 'Communes', while also campaigning against Deng-era cultural liberality, supporting the suppression of the student colour revolutionaries, denouncing many of the decentralization measures of the Deng group, and supporting confrontation with the United States. Admired by the Chinese proletarians for many of the correct stances he was coopted to adopt, he was one of the most influential leaders of the Party in the 1980s and the 1990s. It was he who engineered the rise of Jiang Zemin against the will of Deng:

At a preliminary meeting on the issue on May 21, Chen Yun and Li Xiannian favored Jiang Zemin, a career factory boss, while Deng Xiaoping and Deng Yingchao proposed Li Ruihuan, a nationally well-known model construction worker. Wang Zhen voted for Li Peng, the son of a revolutionary martyr and a career technocrat, while Yang Shangkun supported Qiao Shi, the only candidate with extensive experience in the party center (Party Central Office Secretariat 2001a). Although multiple candidates emerged at that stage, Jiang Zemin might have been the front-runner even then due to backing from two major groups in the party, the central technocrats led by Chen Yun and the New Fourth Army faction represented by Wang Daohan (Gilley 1998: 3 5). Because Li Xiannian and most of the FFA voted with Chen Yun, Jiang also obtained the support of FFA veterans along with Chen Yun's support. The others were backed by smaller coalitions. (Coalitions of the Weak, Cambridge University Press, Victor Shih, 2022) (IMG)

China's economy was saved thanks to the rise of the 'conservative' faction, really the progressive anti-imperialist faction, in China's so-called 'Communist' Party. Had the 'conservative' faction not increased its influence, had the Deng faction not seen such defeats in its factional conflicts, had China not began to reassert central economic controls over the localities, had the liberal cultural policy not been curbed, all such factors would have resulted in China being a country like how Afghanistan was for so many decades. The 'conservative' re-centralization drive, and the 'conservative' anti-Dengist/anti-Zhaoist purges saved that country from partition and destruction. And all of this was thanks in part to the pressures inflicted upon the Deng faction by the Chinese proletariat in the favour of the anti-imperialist faction which had coopted the Chen Yun group. In describing the ideology of present-day China, Chenyunism (Chen-Yun-ism) is a more accurate term than Dengism, as Dengism would have resulted in the partition of China into several CIA-backed comprador warlord regimes. Dengism would have done to China what Dengism (China's funding of Al-Qaeda in the 1980s) did to Afghanistan.

Due to the influence of the progressive-coopted Chen Yun group, China transitioned from a comprador state to an anti-imperialist state by the early 1990s. The anti-imperialist 'conservatives' in China's Party, not the CIA-backed Dengists, have been the force behind China's strategic partnership with the Russian Federation and the Iranian anti-imperialists. Forget not that as confirmed by Iran's archives center, Dengist China was a major supporter of the Iraqi regime, Iran's foe, in the Iran-Iraq War, and forget not that Dengist China was hostile to Eurasia, to which Russia is the successor. All the more naturally, the rise of the anti-imperialist 'conservative' faction since the late 1980s resulted in China being closer to the Russian Federation and the anti-imperialist faction of Iran's regime. Some two decades later, China emerged as the primary financial supporter of the Russo-Iranian military and intelligence campaigns against the Anglo-American imperialists, thanks not to the fascist Dengist reaction but to the 'conservative' re-centralizers.

Understand this: owing to the predominance of the petit-bourgeoisie in China and the small percentage of the proletariat, the corrupt bureaucrats could easily take over the Chinese state while meeting minimal resistance. The petit-bourgeoisie tend to not risk losing their businesses in a fight against the parasitic class forces. China's 'collectivization', done excessively quickly in the 1950s, appears all the more fake, leading me to believe that real collectivization did not actually take place in China. Owing to the continued predominance of the petit-bourgeoisie in that land, the parasitic classes take over China easily, a factor which led to that country being dominated by opportunists – left-opportunists as manifested in the form of Maoism, and right-opportunists as manifested in the form of Dengism. Both were reactionary pro-fascist comprador currents directly allied to Anglo-American finance capital. The opportunism was not spontaneously generated; it had a historical explanation, which was precisely the predominance of the petit-bourgeoisie in China. All the opportunist intellectuals around the world hail the opportunists in China, either in the form of Maoism or Dengism, and all such opportunist intellectuals whine and babble such identity politics terms as 'orientalism' and 'Sinophobia' in order to condemn scientific and legitimate criticism of the regime dominating China until the late 1980s. In reality, by supporting Mao Zedong group, the gang that via decentralization inflicted a pseudo-'natural' famine on the Chinese people, or by supporting the Deng group – the terror gang that brought double-digit inflation, unemployment, recession, corruption, and CIA-backed liberal student colour revolutions to China – the willing supporters of Chinese-style opportunism only prove their own vicious hostility to the Chinese proletarians and to China's existence as a country.

Due to the outbreak of the Dengism disease in 'communist' parties in recent years, some scores must eventually be settled with the Dengists outside of China as well. Not out of an outburst of rage and excess passion, but out of a coldest of calculations, and armed with a wealth of personal experience, I say: almost all of the Dengist intelligentsia are hopelessly reactionary, and there should be no waste of effort to persuade them to ideologically change, for almost all of such intellectuals cannot escape the influence of their parasitic class roots over the depths of their psyche. The proletariat, not the intelligentsia, will determine the course of history in favour of communism. In time, the might of the proletariat will circumvent the venomous influence of such arrogantly opportunistic intellectuals and will force them to recant and submit to the will of the workers' state. Hence, in attempting to 'change' the poisoned minds of such 'innocently ignorant' right-opportunist intellectuals, waste your time not, I advise. When, under the influence of the anti-imperialist 'conservative' faction, even China itself – at a snail pace, but steadily nonetheless – continues the process of dismantling the legacy of Deng Xiaoping and his fascist terror gang, that is when it becomes clear that the Deng-loving intellectuals stand no chance.

Whereas anti-Dengism is the new anti-Bukharinism, anti-Maoism is the new anti-Trotskyism. It is crucial that Maoist terrorist espionage networks be ruthlessly exposed by communists around the world. It is crucial that the Maoist spies and assassins in the payroll of the imperialist-fascist secret services be exposed, and that the sincere believers who have been misled into adopting such a reactionary ideology, be helped, if at all mentally capable of and susceptible to receiving such help, in freeing themselves from such left-opportunist reaction. The attacks on both Maoism and Dengism have to be done in a responsible manner, because while the Maoists and Dengists are covertly on the same side, they 'oppose' each other on the overt level; such an overt-level 'hostility' between Maoism and Dengism must be exploited in order to gradually annihilate both of them. The left-opportunists are useful for speeding up the pace of the revolution and the right-opportunists are useful as anti-leftist antidote when pace is too high, when things begin to go too far, when left-deviationist excesses begin to emerge.

C23S6. The Shehu Faction after Official Sino-Albanian 'Split'  IMG-All-{Albania}

While trade with the West was not a bad thing in itself, a reorientation of commercial relations towards mostly the West would have given imperialist-fascist front companies a dramatic increase in economic leverage over Albania, thus strengthening the hand of the traitor Shehu. This is why:

Hoxha insisted on maintaining the principle of self-reliance, whilst Shehu argued for more economic interaction with the West. (The Albanians: A Modern History, Miranda Vickers, 2014) (IMG)

As mentioned before, Hoxha's insistence on self-reliance did not mean full-on autarky, however, because Albania began to reorient trade with the Eurasian-aligned states in Eastern Europe in the late 1960s.

The decline in the influence of the Trotskyite/Titoist regime in China meant a decline in the influence of the anti-Albanian renegade Mehmet Shehu, who, as mentioned in C13S1.3, had been a brutal intelligence official pursuing Trotskyite terrorist measures in Albania, against Hoxha's will. Hence,:

In April 1980 [Shehu] was relieved of his duties as minister of defence during a government reshuffle, but managed to retain the post of prime minister. As Albania faced mounting social problems and economic slowdown in the wake of the break with China, Hoxha had apparently decided that Ramiz Alia was better equipped than Shehu to carry the heavy responsibilities and burdens that his own successor would inherit. Alia was seen as less unpredictable and extremist than Shehu. (The Albanians: A Modern History, Miranda Vickers, 2014) (IMG)

Ramiz Alia was a right-deviationist, but at the time, he was useful for containing Shehu's Trotskyism. Subsequently, a part of the military and the intelligence service was purged:

Since Shehu's main power base had been the military and the Sigurimi, Hoxha quickly instigated sweeping purges of a number of military and Sigurimi officers who were supporters of Shehu. (The Albanians: A Modern History, Miranda Vickers, 2014) (IMG)

Shehu was later found 'dead' under mysterious circumstances. Vickers of the Soros-funded ICG remarked:

According to his nephew, Luan Omari, Hoxha was badly shaken for several days following Shehu's death. (The Albanians: A Modern History, Miranda Vickers, 2014) (IMG)

The 'death' of Shehu was indeed a real tragedy; had he been captured by Albania's counter-intelligence, Shehu could be duly interrogated and have his accomplices in the crimes against Albania be revealed. For this reason, Shehu was silenced. Of course, Western media blames Hoxha, claiming that Shehu was murdered by him. Then, almost a year after Shehu's death Hoxha announced to a bewildered Albanian populace that Shehu had all along been a multiple agent, in the pay of the British, Yugoslav, American and [Titoist elements in the] Soviet secret services. (The Albanians: A Modern History, Miranda Vickers, 2014) (IMG)

C23S7. The Vietnamese Freedom-Fighters against Titoism / Pol Pot, a Yugoslav agent  IMG-All-{Vietnam-Cambodia}

Tito's regime assisted the US in containing the Vietnamese freedom fighters. According to Mao Zedong,:

When U.S. imperialism stepped up its intervention in Laos in January 1961, the Tito clique spread the view that the United States "is really concerned for the peace and neutralization of Laos". When U.S. imperialism engineered political assassinations and armed conflicts in Laos in May 1963, the Tito clique attacked the Laotian patriotic forces for "putting all the blame on the United States." (Is Yugoslavia a Socialist Country?, Mao, 1963, MIA)

The Vietnamese Communist Party was one of the signatories to the 1960 declaration in Moscow which denounced the fascist regime in Yugoslavia. The text of the 1960 declaration is as follows:

The Communist Parties have unanimously condemned the Yugoslav variety of international opportunism, a variety of modern revisionist "theories" in concentrated form. After betraying Marxism-Leninism, which they termed obsolete, the leaders of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia opposed their anti-Leninist revisionist program to the Declaration of 1957; they set the L.C.Y. against the international Communist movement as a whole, severed their country from the socialist camp, made it dependent on so-called "aid" from U.S. and other imperialists, and thereby exposed the Yugoslav people to the danger of losing the revolutionary gains achieved through a heroic struggle. The Yugoslav revisionists carry on subversive work against the socialist camp and the world Communist movement. Under the pretext of an extra-bloc policy, they engage in activities which prejudice the unity of all the peace-loving forces and countries. Further exposure of the leaders of Yugoslav revisionists and active struggle to safeguard the Communist movement and the working-class movement from the anti-Leninist ideas of the Yugoslav revisionists, remains an essential task of the Marxist-Leninist Parties. ('STATEMENT OF 81 COMMUNIST AND WORKERS PARTIES MEETING IN MOSCOW, USSR', 1960, Source: Statement of 81 Communist and Workers Parties Meeting in Moscow, USSR, 1960. New York: New Century Publishers, 1961. MIA)

In a highly diplomatic manner, the Vietnamese Communist Party also criticized the Moscow Titoists for their favorable stance towards the Yugoslav regime. The CIA, which records foreign media statements declassified its 'Foreign Radio Broadcasts' 'Daily Report', which contained a massive load of copies of media broadcasts and statements from different countries around the world. The CIA published the full text of a top article by the Vietnamese Communist Party's Hac Top Editorial in 1963, in which the Yugoslav regime was denounced. By now, it should become clear enough that citing the CIA for exposing Tito's hostility to the communist movement does not generate bias, but on the contrary reduces it, because Tito and his gang were indeed CIA agents, as has been clearly proven by the Stalin-era Soviet statements and mildly even by the Khrushchev-era Moscow statement in 1960 cited above. In that respect, therefore, using a CIA source for exposing the hostile attitude of the Vietnamese communists towards the CIA agent Tito is not an act of spreading imperialist lies. More importantly, citing the CIA source is actually a way of defending the Vietnamese communists against the imperialist media accusation that Vietnam's communists had 'friendly' relations with Yugoslavia. Anyways, here are excerpts of the statement by the Vietnamese communists' Hac Top editorial:

The attitude toward the Tito revisionist clique is one of the most important questions which have caused differences in the international communist movement. Concerning the Tito group, the 1960 statements of the conferences of representatives of communist and workers parties pointed out:

"The Communist parties have unanimously condemned the Yugoslav variety of international opportunism, a variety of modern revisionist theories in concentrated form. After betraying Marxism-Leninism, which they termed obsolete, the leaders of the League of Communists of Yugoslavia opposed their anti-Leninist revisionist program to the declaration of 1957; they set the League of Yugoslav Communists against the international communist movement as whole, severed their country from the socialist camp, made it dependent on so-called 'aid' from the United States and other imperialists, and thereby exposed the Yugoslav people to the danger of losing revolutionary gains achieved through a heroic struggle.

"The Yugoslav revisionists carry on subversive work against the socialist camp and the world communist movement. Under the pretext of an extrabloc party, they engage in activities which prejudice the unity of all peace-loving forces and countries. Further exposure of the leaders of the Yugoslav revisionists and active struggle to safeguard the communist movement and the working class movement from the anti-Leninist ideas of the Yugoslav revisionists, remains an essential task of the Marxist-Leninist parties."

The question of the attitude toward the Yugoslav revisionist clique is a question of principle of the Moscow documents. It is a question of choosing either Leninism or revisionism, a question of either strictly following the two Moscow statements or cancelling them.

At present, a number of persons are claiming that the analysis of the Tito clique by the 1960 statement is wrong. They eulogize the Tito clique. They take up Tito and draw his group into the ranks of the Marxist-Leninist parties in the world to create more conditions for it to undermine in the international communist movement. Meanwhile, they seek every means to isolate a number of the true Marxist-Leninist parties. They declare that Tito's Yugoslavia is a member of the great family of socialist countries. In fact, the 1960 Moscow statement pointed out that the Tito clique "severed its country from the socialist camp." Yugoslavia is not on the list of socialist countries mentioned by the 1960 statement. (...).

These two statements constitute the common program of the international communist movement. They have defined the strategic and tactical principles of the communist movement, the rules governing the relations among the communist and workers parties, and the methods to overcome the differences through meetings and consultations if they arise among the parties. All communist and workers parties have an obligation to abide strictly by all provisions of the statements which they have recognized.

Vietnamese communists have strictly respected the provisions set out in the two statements.

The Vietnamese communists pursued the correct policy of criticizing Nikita Khrushchev's gang while remaining wary so as to not completely sever relations with Eurasia because that would have actually cut off relations with the communist faction in Eurasia and would have benefitted the Moscow Titoists in forcing Vietnam into America's hands. For this, the Vietnamese freedom-fighters were denounced by the Moscow Titoists. Regarding the mistreatment of the Vietnamese comrades by the Kremlin Titoists, Enver Hoxha recalled:

From a number of reliable sources, we are hearing what occurred in Moscow with the delegations of China, Korea and Vietnam, which had gone «to celebrate» the great anniversary of the Revolution with the «Soviet brothers» and «to assist the Soviet comrades». It is said that these delegations were humiliated by the Soviet revisionists.

Only Kosygin, quite alone, reluctantly received the delegation from Vietnam, having previously warned it that he could spare it no more than one hour. Kosygin received it coldly and disdainfully, listed the aid which the Soviets had provided for Vietnam, and then criticized them because their papers published anti-Soviet materials. In regard to the question of Khrushchev, he barely mentioned it and said that the Soviets were not changing their line one iota.

The same arrogant and humiliating behaviour with the Korean delegation, too, indeed with it he cut down the time of the meeting, because the Vietnamese had taken up fifteen minutes more than Mr. Kosygin had deigned to reserve for them.

(THE DEFEAT OF CHOU EN-LAI IN MOSCOW, Enver Hoxha, November 21, 1964. In: Enver Hoxha Selected Works, Vol. 3: June 1960 to October 1965, Published by Decision of the Central Committee of the Party of Labour of Albania)

The Vietnamese communist-led anti-fascist forces launched a war against 'Titoism with Cambodian Characteristics'. Among Tito's agents, Pol Pot was perhaps the cheapest of all – literally. In 1978, Pol Pot not only declared his camaraderie with Yugoslavia's fascist dictator but also confessed that he traveled to Yugoslavia to work for Tito for free. When thousands of Yugoslavs were hunted by the regime and taken to work as slaves for the anti-Soviet military-economic construction projects in the Belgrade-Zagreb Highway, Pol Pot was busy working as a volunteer for Tito's fascist regime during 1950 – that is two years after Tito's group had been unmasked by the Cominform. The following excerpts of the Khmer Rouge regime media are instructive:

At 08:30 on 17th March 1978 at the state guest house, Comrade Pol Pot, Secretary of the CPK Central Committee and Premier of the Democratic Cambodian Government, received and answered questions in an interview with the Yugoslav press delegation which is now on a visit to Democratic Cambodia.

First of all, our Comrade Party Secretary said to the journalists from the friendly country: We are very pleased with the Yugoslav press delegation's visit to our country. The visit of our comrade Yugoslav journalists will further strengthen the ties of friendship between our two peoples and countries. Like our Democratic Cambodia, Yugoslavia is a non-aligned country which has adhered to the position of preserving independence. Friendship between our two countries is therefore based on the same principle. We have always esteemed and respected Comrade President Tito and the friendly Yugoslav people. Comrade President Tito and the Yugoslav people have always supported and helped us. We have sympathy for them and wish to express our thanks to Comrade President Tito and the friendly Yugoslav people. In 1950, I went to Yugoslavia to work in a work unit in the Zagreb area. I have sympathy for President Tito and the Yugoslav people. Comrades, you come to our country as friends.

(Pol Pot's Interview with Yugoslav Journalists: Journal of Contemporary Asia, Vol. 8, No. 3. Phnom Penh Home Service, March 20, 1978, 23:00 GMT. Description: 'Text of report of interview given on 17th March by the Cambodian Premier, Pol Pot, to a visiting Yugoslav press delegation'.) (IMG)

There were reports that whenever Yugoslav humanitarian aid was sent to the Pol Pot regime in Cambodia, Yugoslav arms also arrived at the Pol Pot regime territory in Cambodia at the same time, indicating that the Yugoslav regime was providing military support for the Cambodian regime under the cover of 'humanitarian' aid. However, as the reports do not explicitly confirm that Yugoslav arms were sent under 'humanitarian' cover, they cannot be cited as concrete evidence of Yugoslav regime military support for the Cambodian regime. One such report is by the Chicago Tribune:

Sok Pha said her job in Thor Maroy was to cook and prepare rooms for special guests of such Khmer Rouge officials as Ieng Sary, one of the Khmer Rouges most senior leaders,. She said the guests included Chinese and Yugoslav officials, who came in groups of 10 to 20 every month or so. "The Chinese and Yugoslavs wore military uniforms," she said through an interpreter. "Every time they came, new shipments of ammunition came too."

Although the Chinese have long been known as the Khmer Rouges main military backer, the only previously known Yugoslav aid to the Khmer Rouge has been "humanitarian" aid such as baby food, pencils, medicine and sports shoes.

Yugoslavia has given similar aid to the Khmer People's National Liberation Front and the forces of former Cambodian leader Prince Norodom Sihanouk. Those noncommunist groups are united with the communist Khmer Rouge in fighting the Vietnamese-backed regime in Cambodia.

(KHMER ROUGE ISLAND REPORTEDLY AN ARMS BASE, Chicago Tribune, Mary Kay Magistad, April 12, 1989) (IMG)

In the eyes of most reasonable observers aware of the truth about fascist Yugoslavia, it would seem utterly naïve to believe, even for one second, that the outreach of Yugoslav 'humanitarian' aid to the Cambodian 'Khmer Rouge' fascists – completely simultaneous with the arrival of arms and Yugoslav military advisors to the Cambodian 'Khmer Rouge' fascists – could be anything but a case Yugoslav military aid, under the cover of 'humanitarian' aid, to the 'Khmer Rouge' fascists.

C24S1. The Titoist Role in the Fall of Yugoslavia as a Country  IMG-All-{Partition of Yugoslavia}

The imperialist-fascist reaction, which promoted the territorial integrity of Yugoslavia as a bulwark against Soviet and later Eurasian influence until 1989, saw 1989 as the year in which to abandon such a policy of territorial integrity and to pursue the partition of Yugoslavia. The year 1989 was the year in which the Eastern European allies of Eurasia were collapsing one by one, and thereupon, from the lens of NATO, the territorial integrity of Yugoslavia was of use no more, and rather was detrimental to the imperialist camp. As such, the Anglo-American and German imperialists unleashed a policy of supporting the partition of Yugoslavia.

It may appear as though the elevation of the much-slandered Milosevic faction, the anti-imperialist faction, to the 'leadership' of Yugoslavia was the rise to dominance of the anti-imperialist faction in the Titoist fascist regime; it is true that the Milosevic faction was anti-imperialist, but the truth is that the Milosevic faction never at any point in time dominated Yugoslavia, never reaching anywhere close to even a 50% stake in control over the Yugoslav state apparatus. The 'balance' of power in Yugoslavia continued to decisively remain in the hands of the Titoist fascist forces throughout the 'Milosevic era'. For Anglo-American finance capital, by 1989, a territorially disintegral Yugoslavia was far more useful. Hence, all of the Titoist agents who had been striving to bring about a territorially integral powerful fascist Yugoslavia until 1989 suddenly went for weakening Yugoslavia and making it a territorially disintegral fascist-occupied territory. Such was why in Croatia, the Ustase faction of the notorious Tito agent Franjo Tudjman was in charge. Such was why in Bosnia, although the Libyan-backed Iran-backed anti-imperialist Alija Izetbegovic faction was ostensibly in charge, in reality Bosnia was taken over by the Afghan Al-Qaeda terrorists whom Tito had endorsed many years prior. In Serbia, although the Milosevic faction held the upper hand, much of the power was in the hands of the Staniscic faction, Staniscic being the Titoist UDB agent who rose to be the leader of the Serbian intelligence service and carrying out anti-Albanian pogroms so to provoke CIA-backed Kosovar Albanian rebellions. In Kosovo, the anti-Titoist warrior and Kosovar Albanian hero, Adem Demaci, along with his comrades, unofficially supported a strategic partnership with the Milosevic faction against NATO, but the Demaci faction was quickly sidelined in the KLA and the narco-terror gang of the UDB-backed KLA commander Hashim Thaci retained its decisive upper hand over the KLA. Until 1989, the Titoists dominated a territorially integral Yugoslavia. From 1989, the Titoists dominated a territorially disintegral Yugoslavia – no change in the fact of the Titoist domination.

In this section, the case of the Ustase operative and Titoist commander Franjo Tudjman as well as the case of the UDB official Jovica Staniscic and UDB-backed KLA commander will be explored, documenting their works as accomplices of the Titoist fascist secret service and their role in the collapse of Yugoslavia as a country.

The USSR Information Bulletin, the media of the Soviet embassy in the United States, reported in 1952:

Ruthlessly dealing with genuine patriots of the Yugoslav people, the Tito-Rankovic clique flung open the of the officers corps and the army to the enemies of the people – fascist and bourgeois nationalist elements – reactionary officers of the old royal army, Chetniks and Ustasi. Senior and higher officers are promoted from their midst; crimes against the people are their common bond with the Titoite clique. (The Tito Clique Has Turned Yugoslavia Into a Military Camp, V. Nemchinov, June 9, 1952. USSR Information Bulletin, Vol. 10, No. 11, p. 352) (IMG{Titoist Yugoslavia})

Recruiting from the army of the ancien regimes was something that the USSR did too. However, the USSR recruited these elements while remaining vigilant so to eventually purge the reactionary infiltrators into the army and to replace these infiltrators were communists and pro-communist sympathizers, whereas the Tito regime exterminated communists and pro-communist individuals in Yugoslavia. As may be recalled from the reader from C15S5, the Tito regime and the Ustase officials collaborated for the purpose of colonizing Macedonia in the post-war years. Tito and the Ustase were both backed by the Gestapo and later the CIA and MI6, the Yugoslav regime's secret service headed by Rankovic was made up of Gestapo officers, and the Yugoslav regime military was open to the Ustase elements. Let us not forget that Franjo Tudjman, an Ustase terrorist who rose to become a prominent military official in Croatia during the Tito years, was and remained an Ustase terrorist and tried to partially re-establish Ustase rule in Croatia in the 1990s.

In the 1960s, Franjo Tudjman went to the academia in order to agitate for Titoism and fascism there:

In 1961 Tudjman gave up his army career, and moved to Zagreb to become the director of the Institute for the History of the Working-Class Movement in Croatia, commanding a team of more than 200 researchers. In 1963 he was also appointed professor of history at the Zagreb University Faculty of Political Sciences, the only applicant without the usual prerequisite of a Ph.D. (Tito: And the Rise and Fall of Yugoslavia, Richard West, pp. 300-301) (IMG)

However, by the mid-1960s, it became ever more obvious that Tudjman was associated to the Ustase terrorist networks. Yet, Tito continued to support Tudjman, knowing that Tudjman was a vicious enemy of the Yugoslav people. Evidence of the collusion of Tito with the Ustase terrorists lies in the fact that Ustase leader Franjo Tudjman was saved from prosecution upon the personal intervention of Tito:

During the mid-1960s, Tudjman became involved in Matica Hrvatska, especially in its relations with the Croats of diaspora, and in 1967 he signed the declaration about the language. For this he was thrown out of the party and stripped of his two official positions. During the crackdown on nationalists in the winter of 1971-2, Tudjman was arrested and charged with espionage, presumably because of his contacts with Croats abroad. However, Tito intervened to drop the more serious charges, and Tudjman spent only ten months in gaol. (Tito: And the Rise and Fall of Yugoslavia, Richard West, p. 301) (IMG)

During the late 1960s, the partial resurgence of communist influence in Eurasia had given greater leverage to the communist 'Cominformists' in Yugoslavia in the secret service conflict against the Tito faction. Such was why by the 1970s, Tudjman was arrested. However, Tito's gang still retained dominant influence, a key factor that allowed the release of Tudjman, the Ustase general that would later destroy Yugoslavia. Tudjman, an agent and protégé of Tito, later on by the 1990s became the leader of the Ustase terrorists and established the new 'independent' state of Croatia, waging the Anglo-American and German imperialists' war against the Milosevic faction in Serbia. Patriotic Serbian scholars have already written plenty with regards to the Tito-Tudjman connection and Tudjman's role as Ustase leader in the 1990s.

Considering such an extensive cooperation between Tito's regime and the Ustase criminals, there is no way that the Ustase terror attacks launched on Yugoslavia would have occurred without the approval of the Tito regime. The dialectical laws of history dictate that since there was such a vast network of intelligence cooperation both directly (in the case of Macedonia) and indirectly (through CIA, MI6 and Gestapo) between the Tito regime and the Ustase, the case of the terror attacks by the Ustase could only have been with the – at best, tacit – approval of Tito and his fascist secret service. The goal of such operations was obvious: to terrorize the Yugoslav population into submission to the Yugoslav regime, to make the real opposition – i.e. the 'Cominformist' opposition – appear as being on the same side as the Ustase, and to perhaps also eliminate some persons regarded as potential threats to Tito's regime in the process of such Ustase terror operations. As for the Bosnian branch of Al-Qaeda, lest we forget that Tito officially condemned the Soviet 'invasion' of Afghanistan, and that Tito supported the Afghan 'resistance' against the Soviet Red Army; those same Al-Qaeda terrorists returned to Bosnia later and prevented the Libyan-Iranian agent Alija Izetbegovic from pursuing his anti-NATO agenda. Less known than the case of the Ustase leader and Titoist commander, Franjo Tudjman, are the cases of UDB chief Jovica Stanisic and the UDB-backed KLA commander Hashim Thaci, and their roles in the destruction of Yugoslavia.

The UDB had recruited a man named Jovica Stanisic in 1975:

Stanisic joined the Yugoslav service in 1975, when the country was still under the communist rule of Josip Broz Tito. He was never regarded as an ideologue or rabid nationalist. But he had a rare aptitude for espionage.

"Stanisic was not an ordinary intelligence officer," said Dobrica Cosic, a writer and former dissident who was president of Serbia in 1992 and 1993. "He is an intellectual, not a radical policeman. He was educated and skilled, and he knew how to organize that service." (Serbian spy's trial lifts cloak on his CIA alliance, Los Angeles Times, Greg Miller, March 1, 2009) (IMG)

Naturally, since the Yugoslav intelligence service was a front for all the imperialist-fascist enemies of Milosevic, the latter had to choose not between good and evil but between the evil and the lesser evil. Hence, Milosevic felt no choice but to appoint Stanisic as the head of the Serbian secret service, because although Milosevic never really trusted the imperialist-fascist spy Stanisic, the latter was nonetheless enough of an intellectual to be easier to control:

Milosevic made Stanisic his top spy, despite long-standing distrust between the two. (Serbian spy's trial lifts cloak on his CIA alliance, Los Angeles Times, Greg Miller, March 1, 2009) (IMG)

That Stanisic was easier to control of course did not mean that the Yugoslav intelligence service which Tito-Rankovic founded was going to be less of a CIA-MI6-Mossad front. Stanisic simply continued his service to the CIA as early as 1992, the year in which he became the chief of the Yugoslav intelligence service, and he provided all kinds of services to the NATO enemies of Milosevic:

in 1992, as the former Yugoslavia was erupting in ethnic violence, ... a wary CIA agent made his way toward the park's gazebo and shook hands with a Serbian intelligence officer.

Jovica Stanisic had a cold gaze and a sinister reputation. He was the intelligence chief for Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic, and regarded by many as the brains of a regime that gave the world a chilling new term: "ethnic cleansing."

But the CIA officer, William Lofgren, needed help. The agency was all but blind after Yugoslavia shattered into civil war. Fighting had broken out in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Milosevic was seen as a menace to European security, and the CIA was desperate to get intelligence from inside the turmoil. (...). So on that midnight stroll, the two spies carved out a clandestine relationship that remained undisclosed: For eight years, Stanisic was the CIA's main man in Belgrade. During secret meetings in boats and safe houses along the Sava River, he shared details on the inner workings of the Milosevic regime. He provided information on the locations of NATO hostages, aided CIA operatives in their search for grave sites and helped the agency set up a network of secret bases in Bosnia.

At the same time, Stanisic was setting up death squads for Milosevic that carried out a genocidal campaign, according to prosecutors at the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, which was established by the U.N. Security Council in 1993 to try those responsible for serious human rights violations in the Balkan wars.

Now facing a trial at The Hague that could send him to prison for life, Stanisic has called in a marker with his American allies. In an exceedingly rare move, the CIA has submitted a classified document to the court that lists Stanisic's contributions and attests to his helpful role. The document remains sealed, but its contents were described by sources to The Times. (...). This account is based on dozens of interviews with current and former officials of U.S. and Serbian intelligence agencies, as well as documents obtained or viewed by The Times. Among them are official records of the Serbian intelligence service, and a seven-page account of that bloody period that Stanisic wrote while in prison in The Hague.

In that memo, Stanisic portrays himself as someone who sought to moderate Milosevic, and who worked extensively with the CIA to contain the crisis.

"I institutionalized cooperation with the U.S. intelligence community in spite of the notoriously bad relations between our two countries," Stanisic writes. That collaboration, he continues, "contributed significantly to the de-escalation of the conflict." (...). In spring 1993, at CIA prodding, Stanisic pressured Ratko Mladic, military commander of the breakaway Serb republic in Bosnia, to briefly stop the shelling of Sarajevo.

Two years later, Stanisic helped secure the release of 388 North Atlantic Treaty Organization troops who had been taken hostage, stripped of their uniforms and strapped to trees as human shields against NATO bombing runs. In his own written account, Stanisic said he negotiated the release "with the support of agency leadership."

That same year, Stanisic tried to intervene when French pilots were shot down and taken captive. Mladic "refused to admit that he was holding the pilots," Stanisic wrote. But "my service managed to discover the circumstances and location of their captivity," and shared the information with the CIA and French authorities.

By then, the Clinton administration was engaged in an all-out diplomatic push to end the war. Stanisic accompanied Milosevic to Dayton, Ohio, for peace talks, then returned to Serbia to carry out key pieces of the accord.

It was left to Stanisic to get the president of Bosnia's Serb republic, Radovan Karadzic, to sign a document pledging to leave office. And Stanisic helped the CIA establish a network of bases in Bosnia to monitor the cease-fire.

Doug Smith, the CIA's station chief in Bosnia, recalled meeting with Stanisic and a group of disgusted Bosnian Serb officials in Belgrade. As Stanisic instructed them to cooperate with the CIA, Smith said, the assembled guests "shifted uneasily in their seats."

Smith began meeting with Stanisic regularly, including once on a boat on the Sava. In typically dramatic fashion, Stanisic arrived late at the docks.

"He emerged out of the darkness with bodyguards" and spent much of the evening talking about his boss, Smith said. "He intensely disliked Milosevic. He went off on how awful Milosevic was -- dishonest and crooked."

(Serbian spy's trial lifts cloak on his CIA alliance, Los Angeles Times, Greg Miller, March 1, 2009) (IMG)

Stanisic set up death squads throughout Yugoslavia in order to terrorize the different ethnic minorities. The international judicial bodies decided to prosecute Stanisic but the CIA rushed in to protect its agent. However:

The chief prosecutor, Dermot Groome, says that Stanisić's actions to help the CIA and counter Milosević only underscore the power he had. In his opening argument, Groome said that the "ability to save lives is tragically the very same authority and the very same ability that [Stanisić] used . . . to take lives."

(...). At one point, Groome introduced a videotape showing images of Muslim men and boys -- their hands bound with wire -- being led into the woods and shot, one by one, by members of the Scorpians.

"Jovica Stanisić established these units," said Groome, an American lawyer. And Stanisić made sure "they had everything that they needed, including a license to clear the land of unwanted people, a license to commit murder."

(Serbian spy's trial lifts cloak on his CIA alliance, Los Angeles Times, Greg Miller, March 1, 2009) (IMG)

The goal of such terror by Stanisić though was not to commit genocide against the ethnic minorities but to rather provoke those ethnic minorities into revolting against the central government of Yugoslavia in order to bring about the partition of that country. The intelligence service that Tito's fascist gang established launched campaigns of terror until 1989 in order to suppress the voices that called for freedom from Titoist yoke. From 1989, however, the intelligence service was engaged in terror attacks not to suppress but to provoke. This was in addition to the vast economic inequality and the countless years of socio-economic oppression of ethnic minorities that Tito's fascist gang established in Yugoslavia. Stanisić's use of terror operations as a means of provoking Kosovar Albanian rebellions against the Milosević faction was no coincidence. On the contrary, it was a part of the broader effort of the UDB network in Yugoslavia to support the Al-Qaeda terrorists and drug lords that made up the dominant faction of the KLA. Stanisić's henchman in the KLA was the infamous Hashim Thaçi, the drug lord and bloody assassin, savagely betraying the Kosovar Albanian people. Years of the repression of the Kosovo national liberation movement by the Titoist fascist regime in Yugoslavia had resulted in the jailing or killing of Albanian revolutionaries and had allowed the elevation of fascist UDB agents in the ranks of the Kosovo Albanian militants organizations. One person backed by the Titoist UDB agent was none other than the notorious Hashim Thaçi. Stanisić's UDB fascist secret service promoted Hashim Thaçi, the head of the KLA, thus assisting the KLA war effort against the peoples of Serbia and Kosovo. Naim Miftari – a former KLA commander and a former special agent of the post-socialist Albanian regime's intelligence service, SHIK – confirmed that Hashim Thaçi was backed by the Titoist fascist UDB. Indeed, Thaçi's connections to the UDB have been documented by:

Former KLA superior and former SHIK agent Naim Miftari.... ('Naim Miftari: Gjykata Speciale e çliroi Kosovën nga regjimi i profiterit dhe përcarësit të luftës Hashim Thaçit', Bota Sot, Interview with SHIK official Naim Miftari, July 20, 2022) (IMG)

One of Thaçi's comrades-in-arms, Naim Miftari, [who] has explained in chronological order, all the tricks and political bargains in which he was involved. He also mentioned the fact that Thaçi has been accused many times of murder, not only of LDK members, but also of his associates. "Hashim Thaçi, neither today nor in the future, can escape conspiracies or games behind his back, since he himself came to power with the help of games, where he is sometimes accused of many murders, not only of LDK members, but for most of his former colleagues. Let's go back before the war. (...)" ('Thaçi i lidhur me UDB –ën, tradhëtoi UÇK-në?', Bota Sot, Interview with SHIK official Naim Miftari, March 13, 2016) (IMG)

Indeed, in the interview with Bota Sot, Naim Miftari, the SHIK agent and KLA official, noted that a senior UDB official had helped Hashim Thaçi 'escape' from the UDB prosecution and go to Switzerland:

Hashim Thaçi was a bad student, then after a while he was punished in absentia because he was a member of the KLA. With those "convictions" missing, he and some friends secure political asylum in Switzerland, where the main help is provided by the statements of B-S [abbreviated name], a senior member of the Serbian UDB in Belgrade.... Surprisingly, H[ashim] Th[açi], with their own group, are sentenced in absentia, as they surprisingly escape the arrests of the UDB, but Nait Hasan's group is arrested and some are killed in an ambush, like Zahir Pajaziti, and some are killed by torture in prison.... ('Thaçi i lidhur me UDB –ën, tradhëtoi UÇK-në?', Bota Sot, Interview with SHIK official Naim Miftari, March 13, 2016. Bold added.) (IMG)

Baton Haxhiu, an agent of the UDB and of Jovica Stanisić, was a liaison officer linking Thaçi to the UDB. Documenting the UDB-Stanisić-Haxhiu-Thaçi connection, Miftari said in an interview with Bota Sot:

"When Sali Berisha mentions the connections between Hashim Thaçi and Baton Haxhiu and Serbia ... he is completely right. Let's not forget that Sali Berisha has been the main man of the Albanian government for many years and had access to the military intelligence service and SHISH, so these are very serious words. I justify it by the fact that our data from the ZKZ (G2) of the UÇK and TMK, then the Kosovo Police and the SHIK show that there is no doubt that Baton Haxhiu was before the war a collaborator and coordinating postman of Jovica Stanisić, the head of the Serbia [branch of] UDB, SDB, mediator of the meetings in Brezovica by the head of the UDB and the former communist leaders of Kosovo, so Batoni was important and is still important for the UDB (BIA) and a professional friend of Hashim Thaçi", Miftari said. ('Policia e Kosovës, ZKZ (G2) dhe SHIK-u kishin të dhëna se Baton Haxhiu ka qenë bashkëpunëtor i Ivica Stanishiçit', Bota Sot, Interview with SHIK official Naim Miftari, December 8, 2018) (IMG)

As can be seen, the UDB from 1989 launched terror operations against Kosovar Albanian civilians in order to provoke riots, and simultaneously supported the 'escape' of Thaçi in order to make a 'hero' out of him. Thaçi was protected by the Titoist secret service agency, UDB.

As mentioned before in C12S6, the Yugoslav Titoists were master pan-chauvinists. They supported the Albanian terrorists that massacred Serb civilians, while also supporting Serbian terrorists massacring Albanian civilians. There should be no surprise that the bourgeois-nationalists were stabbing their own nations in the back, through such bloody reign of terror, for such a thing as 'nationalism', in its classless meaning, bears no material reality, unless in extremely rare accidents. The question is not whether or not 'nationalism' is good or bad; the question is whether it exists beyond just one's imaginations. And the truth is that nationalism, in its classless sense, has never materially existed, unless by accident. For almost all of the time, there have been two types of 'nationalists': (1) proletarian pseudo-nationalists, really just proletarian internationalists with a spirit of socialist patriotism instead of rootless cosmopolitanism, and (2) bourgeois-nationalists (not to be confused with national bourgeoisie), imperialist agents who preach the greatness of their own nation while allying with the chauvinist terrorists savagely massacring the nation whom the bourgeois-nationalists ostensibly uphold; the most cited case of bourgeois-nationalist betrayal of their own people has been the Zionist anti-Arab chauvinist collaboration with the Nazi anti-Semites, but the truth is that the Nazi-Zionist connection is only one out of thousands of cases in point. Such an alliance of seemingly 'contradictory' chauvinisms is rooted in the fact that the chauvinists or bourgeois-nationalists of different ethnicities are all agents of the same reactionary parasitic classes, and have the same class interests, making them natural allies despite appearances to the contrary.

The history of Yugoslavia goes on to prove the point made by the Cominform in 1949: that the Titoists were not 'nationalists'. The Titoists were not loyal to Yugoslav 'national' interest, but were rather agents of imperialist-fascist finance capital, committing a betrayal of even the narrow national interests of Yugoslavia. The very same Titoists that promoted a Balkan fascist 'federation' when the US-led camp needed it against the USSR and Eurasia, began to push for the crumbling of Yugoslavia when the Anglo-American imperialists needed a crumbled 'Yugoslavia'. Added to Tito's fascist secret service were the fake 'anti-Titoists' and the fake 'communist' 'anti-revisionists' (e.g. the Maoists, as well as countless – though not all of – the 'Hoxhaist' parties) who were deafeningly silent on the genocide in Kosovo by Tito's gang, preferring instead to launch operations against those whom they called 'Soviet social-imperialists', but who suddenly 'woke up' in 1989 and started supporting the partition of Yugoslavia just when the territorial integrity of Yugoslavia was necessary. There are also of course those who are nostalgic towards the 'glorious' days of His 'Eminence' the Marshal of the Renegades Tito, when Yugoslavia resembled an inferno. Many in this category will continue to slander anti-Titoists as 'pro-imperialist' and 'pro-NATO', much as how Tito himself several times in his speeches slandered Stalin-era USSR and the Cominform as being in cahoots with NATO, the MI6, and the Italian Fascists. In reality, these Titoism apologists – and they are numerous – are at best useful idiots, and at worst fascist agents, of NATO, MI6, CIA, etc.

C24S2. Some Last Remarks on Titoist Yugoslavia in this Book

It may come as a surprise to future generations reading this book; however, the fact is that, at the time of writing, Tito is loved and romanticized by the overwhelming majority of 'communists', the majority of the self-described 'staunch supporters' of Stalin-era USSR, and also the majority of Serbs, new generations of Yugoslavs systematically brainwashed to worship the sanguivore that made long streams off the blood of their grandparents. These facts speak volumes about the terrifying propaganda power which Tito's gang obtained. Tito's fake 'friendship' with Abdel-Nasser and Nehru cultivated around the Yugoslav tyrant an image of a 'freedom-fighter' and 'proletarian internationalist', whereas NATO's fascist nuclear assaults on Yugoslavia fostered the infantile feeling of nostalgia for the years of Titoist fascist occupation, with many foolishly ignorant of the fact that the Yugoslav Titoist agents assisted NATO in the war effort against Yugoslavia in the 1990s. Increasingly dominated by intellectuals rather than proletarians, the 'communist' parties have been Titoized in recent years. Yet, handled carefully, this global Titoist propaganda dominance in the communist movement's discourse can be broken, torn asunder, scintilla by scintilla. Armed with evidence and reason against Titoist propaganda, the communists worthy of the name can wage the class struggle to oust the intelligentsia and bureaucrats from communist parties and to increase the percentage membership of proletarians and cooperativists in these parties, so to pave the way for the de-Titoization of the communist movement. Worldwide, the thousands of fake 'communists' join the CIA propaganda bullhorns in preaching the myth that Tito's regime was 'more democratic' than the USSR and the Peoples' Democracies, that Tito's regime was a 'democratic' 'federation' of different nationalities living with each other peacefully, that religious minorities were 'tolerated', that the Yugoslav regime stood up 'heroically' against 'both' the 'totalitarian Soviet Union' and the 'imperialist West'; that there were 'improvements' in the conditions of women, that 'worker self-management' allowed for 'lower' bureaucracy and greater 'workplace democracy', that Tito was 'a benevolent' leader 'popular' among Yugoslavs, that the slavery and feudal modes of production were 'eradicated'; that Tito was a 'anti-fascist' and that he made the situation in Yugoslavia 'less hellish'; that the Yugoslav regime was 'simultaneously' 'tolerant towards the Ashkenazim and Sfaradim at home' and 'anti-Zionist' and 'favorable to Arabs abroad'; that the denouncers of Tito are 'pro-NATO', 'pro-American', 'Zionist apologists', 'pro-imperialist', 'CIA propagandists', and 'Trotskyite'; and that the supporters of the Cominform's line are all 'too radical' 'left-sectarian' 'petit-bourgeois' 'Maoist' 'lunatics' when denouncing Tito's regime as the fascist regime it actually was. The CIA portrayed Titoist Yugoslavia as every infantile leftist's dream country. Yugoslavia's fascist regime was able to cover up its genocides and crimes against humanity with the façade of 'democratic' and 'federative' 'non-aligned' 'socialism'. Certainly, there are many well-meaning individuals who are misled into genuinely believing this junk about Tito's gang, and while they deserve much criticism for their low vigilance, they should not be condemned for making such an error; however, there are those fake 'progressives' who push for such junk vigorously and aggressively, and it is essential that these elements be ruthlessly exposed, isolated, and quarantined, so that their venomous influence may be contained. Apologetics for Tito is better than apologetics for Himmler only and only because Tito has not yet been unmasked before the whole world. Shame be on those fake 'communists' and fake 'Yugoslav patriots' who continue to support, even when faced with so much evidence, the virulent legacy of this massive club of Nazi assassins. When different places in the territory of former Yugoslavia are named after Tito, Rankovic, Kolisevski, etc., such namings should spark worldwide outrage and should receive international condemnation; alas, the cries of them who suffered are completely ignored, and so many in the territory of former Yugoslavia have been brainwashed on the Titoism question. There are those who are aware of such crimes, but who show a soft attitude towards these crimes; they too have no place in the anti-imperialist movement in the long-term. The case of Yugoslavia also has much to teach not only to the present generations but also to the future generations who may face such a propaganda bombardment. It is essential that they understand the way that 'Third Force' propaganda was utilized in the Yugoslav context as a cover for imperialist intelligence penetration into the anti-imperialist camp. It is also important that they learn to remember the cries of the peoples of Yugoslavia who were subjected to such terror and the fact that so few people actually exposed such massive crimes, so many were deafeningly silent, and instead believed the lies of the CIA's media mercenaries and the thousands of pseudo-'communist' helpers of the CIA.

C24S3. The Titoists' Second Coming

One can split the history of Titoism in post-Stalin USSR/Eurasia into two phases: the Khrushchevian Titoism and the Andropovian-Gorbachevian Titoism. We know that although Brezhnev himself was a Titoist 'at heart', so encircled and coopted he was by the communist forces that the Brezhnev era saw a resurgence of communist influence at the expense of the Titoists. Already, there were improvements in the composition of the CPSU, and a dictatorship of the proletariat had been restored by around the year 1980. What, then, resulted in the tide to be turned again? What caused the communist faction to go on the decline yet again, while the Titoist faction saw an increase in its influence in the early 1980s? The answer to this question lies in the campaign in Afghanistan, the military campaign in which the Red Army lost, hence resulting in the communist faction in the Red Army to have to reallocate some of its funds away from the secret service conflict against the Titoists and bureaucrats at home and onto fighting Al-Qaeda and the H. Amin gang in Afghanistan.

This then begs the question of why the Red Army began to lose in Afghanistan in the first place, why the Afghan communists were in so weak a condition that they had to invite the Soviets. And the answer to this question lies in the Algiers Accord of 1975, by the time of which the Ahmad Hasan Al-Bakr faction of Iraq had gone on the decline and Vice President Saddam had become the main leader of Iraq. By 1975, a coup d'etats had occurred against the King Faysal faction, allowing the United States to more firmly control Saudi Arabia, while the Saddam faction ascended to de facto dominance in Iraq, and the Shah in Iran was able to crush the anti-Shah guerrilla movement. With Iran, Saudi Arabia, and Iraq under the control of the Anglo-American imperialists by 1975, most of the petroleum of the world was in the hands of the allies of the American imperialists; such an advantage in turn gave an advantage in financing the military spending by the allies of the American imperialists. Iran and Iraq, by then allies, went ahead and began setting the Middle East on fire, starting from the Sadat group gaining the full upper hand in 1975, the PLO terror bombing of Lebanon in 1975, the boost in Muslim Brotherhood rebellion in Syria in 1976, the Yitzhak Rabin team's influence over the state reducing in 1976, the Abdel-Fattah Al-Ismael faction in South Yemen beginning to decline in 1976, the MEK forces in Iran becoming completely a SAVAK front by 1975, the Fedai guerrillas in Iran being crushed in 1976, etc. Throughout the Middle East and North Africa, there came either a temporary decline or a collapse of the revolutionary forces. The huge shake-up affected Afghanistan too. Despite the rise of the progressive forces there in 1978, the new communist-led progressive government was fragile right from the start. There, Al-Qaeda, allied with the Titoist faction headed by Hafizullah Amin, was reducing communist influence. Then occurred the rest of the story, the military defeat of the Red Army, the strengthening of the leverage of the Gorbachevian Titoists, etc. The Titoists' "Second Coming" in the 1980s was 'thanks' to American imperialism, but the key strategic turning point in favour of American imperialism, which offset the chain reaction resultant in the Titoists "Second Coming" was the 1975 Iran-Iraq alliance, which caused American imperialist control over all the major oil resources of the world outside Eurasia (and Libya), hence an advantage in financing military spending. Such an upper hand in military spending resulted in the defeat of the Red Army in Afghanistan, which yielded the Titoists' "Second Coming" in the forms of Gorbachev, Andropov, Chebrikov, Yeltsin, Primakov, etc., causing the 1989-1991 collapses.

C24S4. Anglo-American Spy Gorbachev and his Henchpeople  IMG-All-{Gorbachev}

Mikhail Gorbachev was a British spy, providing top secret nuclear-military intelligence to the MI6. In his 1990s memoirs, Gorbachev confessed:

I laid out in front of the British Prime Minister a large map on which all stocks of nuclear weapons were drawn in thousandths. And each of these cells, I said, is quite enough to destroy all life on Earth. This means that all living things can be destroyed by the accumulated nuclear reserves 1000 times! (Life and Reform, Mikhail Gorbachev, Chapter 8) (IMG)

The Gorbachev group helped entrench the corrupt bureaucrats in the Eurasian state, while allowing the Gorbachev faction to suppress the proletariat. Such class struggles were reflected in the strengthening of the Titoist faction at the expense of the communist faction in Eurasian institutions. Under the guise of fighting the corrupt bureaucracy, the British spy Gorbachev embarked on a project of systematically expanding bureaucracy, hence to expand economic corruption and the wealth of the oligarchs. Under the guise of fighting the chaos and the corrupt mafia, Gorbachev expanded the very things he pretended to oppose. This is confirmed by Gorbachev's own neoliberal economic advisor at the time, Yuri Maltsev, who defected to the United States in the late 1980s, served on such US government agencies as the United States Institute for Peace (USIP), and provided advisory on national security and economic matters to the US Congress. Maltsev wrote:

The budget cuts appeared to be a reality when Gorbachev sacked 600,000 bureaucrats from central operations of the ministries — which amounts to 30 percent to 50 percent of each department. Alongside that, however, he also created a set of new mega-enterprises to substitute for the ministries. A study I did of these new enterprises at the time showed they hired 720,000 people, most of them just-fired bureaucrats, but with a generous 35 percent salary increase. Gorbachev's "cuts" actually represented a twenty percent increase in the managerial sector of the Soviet State, which was exactly the point of the move. The old structures of the command economy began to evaporate with all these changes, reversals, and talk of creating a market. But since no market was actually set up, everything [in terms of the corrupt bureaucracy] came to a standstill. (Requiem for Marx, Ludwig von Mises Institute, Yuri N. Maltsev, 1993, p. 22) (IMG)

Maltsev continued:

Thus Gorbachev's new "market" ... piled new regulations and ministries on top of the old... (Requiem for Marx, Ludwig von Mises Institute, Yuri N. Maltsev, 1993, p. 22) (IMG)

Gorbachev also created a privatized corrupt bureaucratic mafia structures which he falsely named 'cooperatives' to make them appear socialistic. Maltsev wrote:

The Law on Cooperatives – a new regulation allowing pseudo-private ownership – seemed to be a step in the right direction. But in fact, the newly created cooperatives became an organized mafia themselves, extracting and paying out bribes at an unprecedented rate. As soon as a person would start a business, the fire department would arrive to close everything down and then wait for bribes. A person could sue the fire department, but he would have to pay a bribe to the judge. In the Soviet Union, people learned that it is better to pay bribes directly. (Requiem for Marx, Ludwig von Mises Institute, Yuri N. Maltsev, 1993, p. 22) (IMG)

The cooperatives, which were ostensibly meant to benefit the consumers, largely did not sell to the consumers hence further driving the process of consumer goods up, making Soviet people poorer, and expanding the profits of the mafia oligarchs:

During 1986-88 the Soviet Government passed legislation legalizing a wider range of individual private enterprise and encouraging the formation of cooperatives, particularly in the area of consumer goods and services. (...). These measures allowed the emergence of a new group of high-income earners.

Although cooperatives did provide some consumer goods and services, this boost was smaller than hoped for because of a series of restrictive amendments to the Law on Cooperatives, changing tax laws; supply difficulties, obstruction from local officials. and negative popular reaction to private activity. Many cooperatives simply ... stole cheap state goods and resold them at much higher prices. Other cooperatives avoided harassment by tying themselves closely to state-controlled firms and producing goods and services for these enterprises rather than directly for the early 1991, public. According to [CLASSIFIED CIA SOURCE], only 15 percent of what the cooperatives produced was sold directly to the public.

Growing shortages and higher incomes encouraged growth of legal and illegal private economic activity, which diverted more goods away from state stores. High prices and high profits transferred money from workers to entrepreneurs. black-marketeers, and racketeers. Private incomes began to dwarf state wages.

Even with more rapid wage increases, the average state worker's wage still trailed that of the average cooperative member. Moreover, much private and shadow-economy business transferred to a hard currency basis, promoting the development of a de facto parallel currency that further devalued the rubles earned by state workers and pensioners.

(WINNERS AND LOSERS: INCREASING SOCIAL STRATIFICATION IN THE FORMER SOVIET UNION, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1991, p. 2) (IMG)

The Gorbachev-engineered mafia promoted inflation:

Even with more rapid wage increases, the average state worker's wage still trailed that of the average cooperative member. Moreover, much private and shadow-economy business transferred to a hard currency basis, promoting the development of a de facto parallel currency that further devalued the rubles earned by state workers and pensioners. (WINNERS AND LOSERS: INCREASING SOCIAL STRATIFICATION IN THE FORMER SOVIET UNION, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1991, p. 2) (IMG)

The Nazi Germans supported Russian chauvinism as means of driving a wedge between the Russian people and the other ethnicities in the USSR, hence to partition the USSR and isolate the very Russia they pretended to support; Tito's gang picked up Hitler's mantle and Yugoslav spies in the USSR promoted Russian chauvinism so to drive this wedge and pave the way for the partition of the USSR. Gorbachev and Eurasian Titoists continued the legacies of Hitler and Tito and privileged the Slavs over the Caucasian and Central Asian populations, hence driving a wedge between these nationalities and provoking bourgeois-nationalist separatist sentiments:

Under Gorbachev, income differences among the republics increased. The change in average monthly wages since 1985 shows that the Slavic and Baltic republics were clear winners, while the Caucasus and Central Asian republics, whose wages were already below the country average, slipped even further behind. In addition to relative differences among republics in wage compensation, income differences within republics also widened. Differentials tend to be the widest in Central Asia and the Caucasus, where the mean wage is low and the shadow economy is particularly active. (WINNERS AND LOSERS: INCREASING SOCIAL STRATIFICATION IN THE FORMER SOVIET UNION, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1991, p. 4) (IMG)

The economy was Balkanized, and bourgeois-nationalist officials were able to promote their own region's 'interests' over the rest of the Eurasian Heartland, hence widening the gap between nationalities, paving the way for partition:

The devolution of economic authority to republic and local governments and the economic decline led to a Balkanization of the union market that helped to increase regional disparities in the supply of food and consumer goods. To protect their own consumer markets, local officials created barriers to trade, forbidding the export of certain deficit goods or limiting the purchase of some items to local residents only. Agricultural regions increasingly preferred to use their output locally or barter it for scarce consumer goods rather than sell it to the state for devalued rubles. The Soviet Union's former "showcase" cities, Moscow and Leningrad (St. Petersburg), and centers of heavy industry in the Urals suffered most. With a weak local agricultural base, few attractive goods to barter, and panic buying by the population, these cities became the most poorly stocked of urban centers. (WINNERS AND LOSERS: INCREASING SOCIAL STRATIFICATION IN THE FORMER SOVIET UNION, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1991, pp. 2-3) (IMG)

USSR: Average Monthly State Wages by Republic,
1985 and 1989

(WINNERS AND LOSERS: INCREASING SOCIAL STRATIFICATION IN THE FORMER SOVIET UNION, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1991, p. 4)

To summarize:

Economic policies introduced under the banner of perestroika resulted in a general slide in Soviet living standards and a growing inequality between socioeconomic groups. (WINNERS AND LOSERS: INCREASING SOCIAL STRATIFICATION IN THE FORMER SOVIET UNION, CIA, Directorate of Intelligence, November 1991, p. III) (IMG)

With the 'need' for medical 'humanitarian aid' in Moscow as her excuse, Raisa Gorbacheva received money from the United States in the 1980s. As the New York Times reported:

Raisa M. Gorbachev, wife of the former Soviet President, ... helped secure thousands of dollars worth of Western aid. (Medical Care in Russia Seems Near Collapse, New York Times Archives, May 9, 1992) (IMG)

One of the CIA operatives providing financial aid to the Gorbachevs' 'humanitarian' project was Sun Myung Moon. Sun Myung Moon was a South Korean CIA spy arrested in 1947 by the North Korean government and released in 1950 during the Korean War. He subsequently founded the Unification Church which was a front for the South Korean CIA (KCIA), which was the South Korean comprador intelligence service established and run by America's CIA:

In Congressional hearings [of the United States,] Moon was accused of working with South Korean intelligence in order to buy influence with the US government, with some US officials regarding the Unification Church as a "front" for the Korean CIA. (Reverend Sun Myung Moon: Self-styled 'prophet' and founder of the Unification Church, The Independent, September 4, 2012) (IMG)

The Rev. Sun Myun Moon's Unification Church was founded by a director of the Korean Central Intelligence Agency, Kim Chong Pil, as a political tool in 1961, according to intelligence reports released by a House investigating subcommittee. (Moon's Church was Founded by Korean CIA Chief, Panel Says, reprinted in CIA, p. 1) (IMG)

Among the financial sponsors of Raisa Gorbacheva was the South Korean spy Sun Myung Moon. A 1990 report by The Economist stated:

Even the Rev Sun Myung Moon is getting in on the act: he has given $100,000 to Mrs Raisa Gorbachev.... (The Economist, Volume 317, Issues 7683-7687, 1990) (IMG)

The funds provided to the Gorbachev family could only be of a money-laundered nature. Note that the Gorbachev family systematically destroyed the economy of Eurasia and the health of the Soviet peoples. That same family which destroyed the health and welfare of the people was setting up a 'humanitarian' project for 'medical assistance' to the people, and ostensibly for this 'medical' 'humanitarian' project, they were receiving these funds from the Anglo-American intelligence agencies. Actually, it was obvious that the 'medical' 'humanitarian' project, run by a Gorbachev family that destroyed the medicine of Eurasia and which caused a massive humanitarian crisis, could not have been anything but a money-laundering cover through which to receive funds from Anglo-American intelligence agencies and their front organizations, such as the Unification Church.

All along, behind Gorbachev lied the KGB chiefs Yevgeny Primakov and Viktor Chebrikov. They were the real and main figures behind Gorbachev. Gorbachev was a cover for the corrupt and traitorous chiefs of the KGB.

The class struggles in society always reflect themselves in the configuration of the power positions held in a state. It is therefore quite common for one of the high-ranking security officials of a state to be a traitor to that state. Already, in the 1980s, the Mossad Director Nahum Admoni was a revolutionary socialist anti-imperialist warrior who had infiltrated the highest rank of the Mossad, the Reagan-era US Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger was an anti-imperialist freedom-fighter who decimated the US military and was responsible for opening the front for the Lebanese martyrs to bomb the US Marines Barracks in 1983, and the Saudi Mukhaberat chief Turki Al-Faysal was the son and loyal protégé of his pro-Soviet pro-Nasserist father Saudi King Faysal bin Abdel-Aziz. All of this may seem strange at first, but it is not surprising in the slightest when we account for the fact that class struggles in a society affect the positional configuration in the cabinet, i.e. they affect the question of whom from what faction becomes the head of which government institution. Socialist class struggles help the proletariat destroy the material bases of the anti-proletarian classes, thus allowing for the workers' state to consolidate control over its own state and to launch a great purge against the intelligence agents reliant upon the anti-proletarian classes in the society. Unfortunately, in Eurasia by the Gorbachev era, the state was not a workers' state but was rather a dictatorship of the comprador bourgeoisie, particularly of the corrupt bureaucrats. This gave the upper hand to the anti-communist bureaucratic traitors who were leading the KGB, and such anti-communist bureaucrats pursued their agenda through the face of a 'pro-democracy' intellectual, Mikhail Gorbachev.

The root of the Gorbachev group emanated directly from Yuri Andropov, who, as was mentioned in C20S13, was a Beriaite operative assisting the MI6-backed Nazi rebels in Hungary in 1956 and collaborating with Tito's group. Sergio Beria recalled how the Anglo-Yugoslav agent and KGB chief Yuri Andropov told Sergio Beria:

'I have closely studied your father's proposals on economic and foreign policy fields. Many of them are absolutely correct.' ('Beria, My Father: Inside Stalin's Kremlin', Sergio Beria, p. 277) (IMG)

The rise of Gorbachev to power brought Andropov's allies in the KGB back to power.

Former KGB official Vyacheslav Matuzov confirmed that Gorbachev-era KGB leader Primakov was implementing Andropov's plans regarding Eurasia:

The personality of Primakov is conspiratorial to the limit to this day. I believe that he was the main actor who completed Andropov's plan to reorganize the Soviet Union. In simple terms, Primakov was overseeing the process - all these years. ('Vyacheslav Matuzov: Mikhail Gorbachev was a pawn in the plan for the collapse of the USSR', EurAsia Daily, interviewer: Sarkis Tsaturyan, March 11, 2019) (IMG)

The KGB as a whole was progressive and anti-imperialist, just like how the Mossad, Pentagon, and the Saudi Mukhaberat were, as wholes, reactionary. Yet just as how the Mossad, Pentagon, and the Saudi Mukhaberat were led by revolutionary traitors to such reactionary institutions, so was it also the case that the KGB was led by reactionary traitors to such a progressive institution. Such was why the KGB chief Yuri Andropov distrusted the medium ranks of the KGB command. During his years as KGB chief, Yuri Andropov established Eurasian think tanks that lied outside of the KGB. The Eurasian think tanks were centers in which American intelligence agents would begin their career in the Eurasian state hierarchy. Andropov first planted his agents in these think tanks and then would, over time, elevate these agents in the Eurasian state hierarchy:

The KGB was a system that did not allow to deviate from the general line. Andropov, himself creating this system, understood that if information gets into it, then it automatically becomes utilized by many employees who may be dissatisfied with one or another political position of the leadership.

Therefore, further changes (“restructuring”) were carried out not on the basis of the KGB, but with the help of the KGB, but outside the framework of the KGB. Where did Primakov come from? This is not the KGB system. He is from the side shoots that Andropov created, being already the chairman of the KGB and a member of the Politburo. Director of the Institute of USA and Canada, Georgi Arbatov, director of IMEMO Nikolai Inozemtsev, director of the Institute of Oriental Studies Bobojan Gafurov .

These were parallel structures that duplicated the KGB. Outwardly, they worked in conjunction with the party apparatus. But in reality, these institutions were so strong, being under the patronage of Andropov, that the influence of the leading departments of the Central Committee on them was zero.

(‘Vyacheslav Matuzov: Mikhail Gorbachev was a pawn in the plan for the collapse of the USSR’, EurAsia Daily, interviewer: Sarkis Tsaturyan, March 11, 2019) (IMG)

Bronfman, the President of the Zionist pro-imperialist intelligence front (chapter 16) ‘World Jewish Congress’, noted that the intelligentsia and the KGB were the only two categories supporting Gorbachev:

IN THE USSR, BRONFMAN SAID, THERE HAD BEEN A VIRTUAL "SEA CHANGE" IN DOMESTIC ACCEPTANCE OF JEWS AND JUDAISM. THIS EVEN INCLUDED THE IMPENDING OPENING OF A JEWISH CULTURAL CENTER IN WHAT HAD BEEN A MOSCOW SYNAGOGUE. AT THE SAME TIME, HE ADDED, THE COMMITMENT WAS REAL TO RESOLVING JEWISH EMIGRATION.... THE PROBLEM WAS, HE FELT, THAT EVERYTHING DEPENDED ON GORBACHEV "AND I AM SKEPTICAL ABOUT HIS ABILITY TO SURVIVE." HE ACCOMPANIED THIS JUDGMENT WITH A BRIEF ANALYSIS OF THE PROBLEMS GORBACHEV FACES, NOTING THAT THE ONLY TWO GROUPS NOW BACKING HIM WERE THE INTELLIGENTSIA AND THE KGB. (‘SUBJECT: WORLD JEWISH CONGRESS PRESIDENT BRONFMAN ON MIDDLE EAST, SOVIET UNION; ASIDES ON US ADMINISTRATION, AUSTRIA; GOL BALANCED’, US State Department, January 27, 1989, p. 4. Bold added.) (IMG)

The Gorbachev group, backed by the Chebrikov-Primakov group in the KGB, also gave a major boost to the CIA-Mossad presence in Eurasia. The Joint Distribution Committee, a CIA-Mossad front, was invited to and welcomed in Moscow. In an article for Jerusalem Post, Isi Leibler wrote:

In 1959 as a young graduate visiting Israel, I was recruited by Shaul Avigur, the talented head of Nativ (the then-covert agency dealing with Soviet Jews) who played an enormous role behind the scenes in the formulation of policy during the early years of the state.

(Candidly Speaking: A triumph of light over darkness, The Jerusalem Post, Isi Leibler, November 2, 2010) (IMG)

As may be recalled by the reader from C16S1, Shaul Avigur was the founder of the Mossad. There were co-founders of the Mossad, but the most well-known and most prominent among all of them was none other than Shaul Avigur, who was also the head of the Nativ (the organization in which the Mossad official Ya’kov Kedmi was a prominent official), as well as a co-leader of the American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (‘Joint’) which was the CIA-Mossad intelligence organization condemned for being involved in the assassination plots during the Doctors’ Plot case. For his subversive activities for the Mossad, Leibler had been arrested by socialist Soviet counter-intelligence:

Before the collapse of the USSR, Leibler made numerous visits to the Soviet Union and developed close associations with the leading Jewish dissidents and refuseniks. The visits came to an end in 1980 with his arrest and expulsion from the Soviet Union. (Isi Leibler z’l (Honorary Vice-President), World Jewish Congress) (IMG)

However, soon enough, the time for Leibler’s return came. Under the cover of ‘glasnost’, the MI6 spy Gorbachev opened up Eurasia for imperialist-fascist secret services to gather intelligence. As such, Leibler wrote in reference to his brief expulsion in 1980,:

Ironically, it was only seven years later, in 1987, that my wife and I were invited by the Moscow chief rabbi of the KGB-controlled Archipova Synagogue to be his guests over Rosh Hashana and address worshipers from the pulpit. Giving a Zionist address in broken Yiddish to a packed synagogue in the presence of refusenik friends who had previously refused to set foot in this KGB-controlled center was an unforgettable experience. I subsequently learned that I was the first international Jewish leader invited to evaluate the Gorbachev reforms.

That was followed by a series of visits which culminated in the establishment of the first Jewish cultural center since the revolution, named after Solomon Mykhoels, the famous Yiddish poet murdered by Stalin in 1948.

(Candidly Speaking: A triumph of light over darkness, The Jerusalem Post, Isi Leibler, November 2, 2010) (IMG)

The World Jewish Congress too stated:

Paradoxically, when Gorbachev liberalised the system with the introduction of perestroika, Leibler became the first international Jewish leader to be invited to the Soviet Union to evaluate the changes. He subsequently launched the first Jewish cultural centre in the Soviet Union – the Solomon Mykhoels Centre in Moscow – together with the first Hebrew Song Festivals in Moscow and Leningrad. (Isi Leibler z’l (Honorary Vice-President), World Jewish Congress) (IMG)

It should also come as no surprise that the Gorbachev group permitted the JDC to officially establish a base in Moscow:

Reflecting the profound changes unfolding in the Soviet Union, the Solomon Mikhoels International Cultural Center opens in Moscow, with the help of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC or "The Joint"), a social welfare agency whose mission is to assist Jews throughout the world. (Timeline of the American Soviet Jewry Movement, American Jewish Historical Society (AJHS)) (IMG)

Gorbachev was keen on sending Eurasia’s Yiddish and Juhuri peoples (‘Soviet Jews’) as cannon-fodder for Ariel Sharon:

Although the lack of direct flights was not hampering the exodus per se (a record 71,196 Jews were to leave in 1989), it did slow the potential emigration to Israel, which, nonetheless, had risen rapidly in the last three months of 1989 (1,565 Jews arrived from the USSR in October, 1,936 in November, and 3,590 in December). Indeed, the head of the Jewish Agency’s Aliyah (immigration) Department, Uri Gordon, had predicted that with direct flights, about 1,000 Soviet immigrants a day could land in Israel. (Soviet Policy Toward Israel Under Gorbachev, Robert Owen Freedman, p. 85) (IMG)

The Washington Times, an American news media founded by the prominent South Korean CIA operative Sun Myung Mun, reported that CIA director Webster had remarked that Gorbachev, under the cover of joint anti-terrorism efforts, has been getting the KGB to cooperate further with the CIA:

CIA Director William Webster said yesterday that the governments of the United States and the Soviet Union have discussed establishing a joint CIA-KGB cooperative effort to combat international terrorism.

(...). A tape recording of his remarks was obtained by The Washington Times.

(...). Soviet officials first approached Western governments in late 1986 about working together to oppose terrorism as part of Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's new foreign policy initiatives.

Moscow was linked to the support and training of international terrorists by Reagan administration CIA chief William Casey, who said in a 1987 speech that the Soviets have been training up to 600 terrorists each year in training camps in Eastern Europe.

(...). The Soviet overtures on joint cooperation appear to be gestures resulting from Mr. Gorbachev's glasnost, or openness, policies, Mr. Webster said. The January meeting in Moscow between KGB chief Vladimir Kryuchkov and U.S. Ambassador to the Soviet Union Jack Matlock was another similar gesture, he said.

State Department officials said at the time of the meeting that Mr. Kryuchkov assured Mr. Matlock that the KGB is fully supporting the Gorbachev reform program.

Mr. Webster said he has not seen any indications that the KGB is opposing Mr. Gorbachev's reforms. But he said the KGB is "a potential source of trouble" for Mr. Gorbachev if his reform program fails.

Rand Corporation Sovietologist Jeremy R. Azrael stated in a report on the KGB released last week that former KGB Chairman Viktor Chebrikov is the leading candidate to replace Mr. Gorbachev if hardliners pull off a coup to oust him.

Mr. Webster said the KGB currently appears to be on Mr. Gorbachev's "side of the aisle" in the struggle between reformers and hardliners.

Again, the KGB as a whole was an anti-imperialist body – and rumours to the contrary are baseless – but the high command of the KGB were utter traitors. Gorbachev's rise to power brought the KGB chief Chebrikov swiftly to power as well:

Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev, moving with unprecedented speed to consolidate his power, has elevated the head of the KGB and two other key party officials to the ruling Politburo.... ('KGB chief, 2 others elevated to Politburo', Washington Times, Michael J. Bonafield, April 24, 1985, p. 1. In: CIA archives) (IMG)

Mr. Chebrikov, who is a colonel general, was named director of the KGB in December 1982. His was one of the late Yuri V. Andropov's first major personnel changes after he took control of the party in that year. Mr. Chebrikov had worked under Mr. Andropov during the 15 years Mr. Andropov headed the KGB. ('KGB chief, 2 others elevated to Politburo', Washington Times, Michael J. Bonafield, April 24, 1985, p. 1. In: CIA archives) (IMG)

In his memoirs, the CIA-Mossad arms contractor Ari Ben Menashe has documented extensively the contacts of the KGB chief Chebrikov with the MI6, CIA, and Mossad. Another of the KGB elements from Andropov's group was Viktor Sharapov and he too was closely associated to Gorbachev:

Soviet relations with socialist countries are the domain of Viktor Sharapov, the one carryover on Gorbachev's inner staff. He appeared frequently at the side of Andropov and later Chernenko and now assists Gorbachev during meetings with the leaders of socialist countries. Sharapov has ties to Andropov and the KGB, experience in the media, and expertise in Asian affairs--an area receiving significant policy attention under Gorbachev. All of these factors, in our view, make him a logical choice for Gorbachev's circle of advisers. (...). Sharapov's position as an aide to Gorbachev on Socialist Bloc affairs is probably due as much to his personal connections as to his expertise. He may have been associated with the KGB since about 1972, and he served as a personal aide to Andropov from about 1976 (when Andropov was still chairman of the party) to his death in February 1984. In addition, while Andropov was ailing during the last few months of his tenure as General Secretary, only Sharapov and Gorbachev were permitted to see him. Sharapov retained his job as bloc affairs adviser throughout the brief tenure of Konstantin Chernenko. He was elected a member of the Central Auditing Commission at the close of the recent party congress on 6 March 1986. (USSR: GORBACHEV'S PERSONAL ADVISERS, CIA, May 8, 1986, p. 5) (IMG)

Two other major Gorbachev allies were Ligachev and Ryzhkov:

Yegor Ligachev, 64, and Nikolai Ryzhkov, 55, were named directly to the Politburo from the party Secretariat. The new Soviet leader has had a close working relationship with these men, who skipped the normal step of being named candidate members. ('KGB chief, 2 others elevated to Politburo', Washington Times, Michael J. Bonafield, April 24, 1985, p. 1. In: CIA archives) (IMG)

Only much later when Gorbachev became extremely unpopular, Ligachev opportunistically 'defected' to the camp of Gorbachev's 'critics'.

How to Navigate the Screenshots section

As mentioned in the Foreword, the screenshots and photos of the sources used throughout this book have been provided in the 'Screenshots' section. To find the screenshots corresponding to each part of the text of this book,:

Step 1. See the title. For example, the phrase ' IMG-All-{Mongolia}' corresponds to the title 'Mongolia'. The '(IMG{GDR})' corresponds to the title 'GDR'.

Step 2. Find the title in the following table of contents.

Step 3. See the page number of the title.

Step 4. Look for the screenshot(s) of the source used under that title.
